While the young officer was imparting discipline after this fashion, he was also acquiring his own experience of it. The infantry regiment he had joined at its inception went to the front in July 1861, when he was promoted from second to first lieutenant. In October he was transferred from the Second Massachusetts Infantry to the First Massachusetts Cavalry, formed in September, and received a captain's commission. In his brief infantry experience he saw no battle, but was much engrossed in the routine duties of soldiering. With the cavalry, which had by degrees to disprove its inferiority to the mounted forces of the Confederacy, his fighting began. It continued through the Antietam campaign, in the autumn of 1862, through the winter months before Fredericksburg, and the spring campaign of 1863 in Virginia. On June 17 it came to an end, at the beginning of the battle of Aldie, when Major Higginson, sent to recall a fellow officer, Captain Sargent, who had gone beyond the point to which he had been ordered to advance, followed him, in the zest of an unexpected fight, and found himself and his men overpowered by superior numbers. His horse was shot under him, and in the hand-to-hand encounter that ensued he was wounded by pistol-shot and sabre-cuts, one of which left a scar on his face for life. When he recovered consciousness, he contrived to save himself from capture, but the wounds he had received incapacitated him from any further active service. As soon as he could do anything, he made himself useful again in recruiting, and for a brief time served on the staff of General Francis C. Barlow.

He would himself have been the first to say that his war-record was not exceptional. The passionate spirit of patriotism in which it was rendered, and his communion in that spirit with noble young contemporaries, many of whom gave their lives for the Union cause, left their indelible marks upon his character. Like many another fighter against disunion, he gave to the reunited country in its entirety the same devotion through life that he had given to the cause of the North in his earlier years, and again and again spoke of the men against whom he had fought as only a chivalrous foe could speak.

Of women in general, and especially of their high place in the true partnership between man and wife, he was the unfailing champion. His own marriage, with a daughter of Louis Agassiz, about six months after his disabling fight at Aldie, placed him in a rarely harmonious domestic relation which to the end of his days afforded the basis of happiness, sympathy, and co-operation in which all his other relations were rooted. Through this marriage, moreover, his intimacy with his brother-in-law, Alexander Agassiz, his classmate in college, became so close as to count among the positive influences of his life, with notable results both in affairs and in thought.

Yet it was from his comrades in arms that the incentives to the citizenship he practised were primarily derived. Even before the war one of them, Charles Russell Lowell, a kinsman with whom he was in the closest sympathy, had revealed in a letter to their common friend, John C. Bancroft, son of the historian, the attitude toward life which their little circle of idealists was taking. 'Last February,' he wrote from Rome in 1857, 'when Henry [Higginson] joined me in Florence, we laid our heads together to get you across the water; as a preliminary standpoint we concocted an extensive plan of migration, you and Jim Savage and Henry and I were all to move to Virginia or somewhere — we were to cultivate the vine and the olive, to think none but high thoughts, to speak none but weighty words, and to become, in short, the worthies of our age.'

After they had 'moved to Virginia' several years later, for a purpose then quite unforeseen, the future took on a new aspect, and Lowell, who had discovered 'a thorough born merchant' in his friend Higginson while they were traveling as youths together in Europe, wrote to him in the last year of the war, 'I hope, Mr Higginson, that you are going to live like a plain Republican, mindful of the beauty and the duty of simplicity. Nothing fancy now, Sir, if you please. . . . I hope you have outgrown all foolish ambitions and are now content to become a "useful citizen." . . . Don't grow rich; if you once begin, you will find it much more difficult to be a useful citizen.'

The attempts to attain independence were at first unsuccessful, both in an oil-venture in Ohio and in a cotton-planting enterprise in Georgia, an experiment in which a patriotic motive played an important part. With his joining the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., in Boston, in 1868, more prosperous days began to dawn; but it was only after thirteen years of hard, self-denying work that he found himself in a position to carry out a purpose he had long been forming, the establishment and maintenance of a great orchestra which should give to the people of his own city and country music of the same supreme order of merit as that which had nourished his spirit as a young man in Europe. This was essentially a patriotic purpose, conceived in the desire to enrich the life of his own beloved country. Music, as he had long before written to his father from Europe, was his province in education. Long afterwards he quoted the words that Fanny Kemble had once spoken to him: 'Life in the United States is hard and dry. Your country is a great cornfield. See that you plant flowers in it.' Still later he amplified the same thought in saying, 'This beautiful land is our workshop, our playground, our garden, our home; and we can have no more urgent or pleasant task than to keep our workshop busy and content, our playground bright and gay, our garden well tilled and full of flowers and fruits, our home happy and pure.' It was precisely for these objects that he established the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1881.

At that time public benefactions of this general nature were far less familiar than they have since become, and such a benefaction in the realm of music was wholly original. The endowed or privately supported orchestra is now an accepted institution in many American cities, and this is so in large measure because of the pioneering example set by Mr Higginson. The value of that example lay by no means only in the spectacle of large annual expenditures, the fruit of annual earnings and income which might otherwise have been employed in the rolling up of a modern fortune, but also in the devotion of personal energies to an immensely difficult and complicated task. How exacting this task was, — in the selection and judicious handling of conductors, to say nothing of the whole company of highly temperamental persons who constitute the orchestra; in dealing with the genus irritabile of soloists and with a public sometimes only a little less difficult, — few could realize. Humor, patience, a decisive will, an infinite desire to serve his generation carried him over many rough patches of the long road. At the very end of it, when he had carried on this work with increasing success for thirty-seven years, the tensity of war-time feeling and the sorrow that came from clinging too long to the trust he had placed in one who proved unworthy of it, imposed a burden he could no longer bear, and, broken by the bitter experience, he committed to other hands the institution he had created. But on the very last day of his life he found occasion to deplore the course of a contemporary who had recently bequeathed a great fortune to a worthy object, on the ground that his wealth might have been doing good through many years of its accumulation, and to pity him for having missed all the fun of spending it for others.

When Mr Higginson wrote an article, 'A Word to the Rich', for the Atlantic nine years ago [1911], he began and ended it with this quotation from the gravestone of Edward Courtenay, Earl of Devonshire: —

What we gave, we have;
What we spent, we had;
What we left, we lost.

There was his whole philosophy of riches. His practice was itself a hint to the rich, for his constant refusal to count the cost in what he did for others was offset at every turn by the little severities he imposed upon his own mode of life. 'I look at fifty cents myself,' he wrote in a private letter soon after the war broke out in Europe, 'and think whether I will take a carriage or walk. Indeed I nearly missed my train on Sunday because I did not take a carriage. There is something about "the spigot and the bung" that applies to everybody.'

Personal indulgence of any kind was as alien to him as to his Puritan forebears. 'Puritanism!' he wrote to a friend in 1889; 'the older I grow, the more I incline to their ideal, and the luxury and the wastefulness and a thousand things send me that way — in thought, though hardly in deeds and living perhaps.' It could not have been entirely from the Puritans of tradition that he derived, for example, his interest in schemes of profit-sharing. It was a cardinal principle of his economic creed that the wage-earner should have 'a larger piece of the pie'. The same sympathy which prompted this feeling kept him youthful to the last, drew him and his young associates, in business and friendship, together, and placed him constantly with those whose eyes were turned toward the sunrise.

His personal presence truthfully bespoke the man within. Compact of stature, visaged with distinction, military in bearing, alert and vigorous, forthright and staccato of speech, both in public and in private, he visibly embodied the qualities of utter fearlessness and honesty, joined with a fortunate capacity for quick and righteous anger. These qualities, moreover, were not wholly unrelated to a human and endearing tendency to make impulsive mistakes. But they stood in an equally close relation to a definite gift for bestowing and winning affection. To a remarkable degree his letters spoke with his living voice. Nothing of good or evil fortune could befall his friends without his writing to them, briefly or at length, in terms appropriately compact of sympathy and humor. His good letters were not the product of accident, for he had a theory of letter-writing which he once communicated to a business associate as follows: 'You sit down and visualize the person you are addressing; you dictate exactly as if he were present; you watch the changes in his face and anticipate his replies. You go through it and cut out all the adjectives and adverbs; then you probably have a good letter.' A point of his own practice is not enumerated here — namely, the addition of a postscript in long hand, to almost every type-written letter, making it even more personal than it was before.

There is much, very much more that might be said. From the many fields of activity of this great private citizen — fields of business, education, art, friendship, and public service privately rendered — instances innumerable might be drawn to illustrate the living out of his avowed belief that 'there seems no other outcome, no other foundation for a happy mankind, for civilization, than a full, generous, wise use of our powers for the good of our fellow men, and a happy forgetfulness of ourselves.' But this is far less a memoir than a suggestion, a turning of consideration to the immediate meaning of such a life as Major Higginson's.

When the eighty-fifth birthday he did not quite attain was drawing near, and some observance of it had been proposed to him, he wrote to a friend: 'I've had only too many kind words of praise for doing my duty, and only my duty, as my eyes and those of dear, dead friends saw it. The simple tale — that he tried to fill up gaps and sought to bring sunshine into the lives of his fellow men and women, that he usually kept his word, given and implied, and that he worshipped his country and had the very best and most far-seeing of friends — is the whole story.'

Thus in retrospect he saw his life. To others it may stand pre-eminently, as these pages began by suggesting, for the possibility of sustaining from youth to old age an idealism born in time of war. This central meaning of it was richly symbolized at his burial. Into and out of the academic surroundings of a college chapel the veteran soldier, the indomitable lover of righteousness and beauty, was borne in the uniform of his army days, his sword at his side; and over his grave the 'grieving bugle' sounded its martial note of farewell. For his country and its ideals he enlisted in the war of more than half a century ago. The enlistment proved to be for life. He believed with all his heart that the young men of this later day were the true spiritual sons of their fathers. It is for them, in the light of such a life as his, to justify this faith of the older generation.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

FOUNDED IN 1881 BY HENRY LEE HIGGINSON

Whitestone

WILLIAM STEINBERG Music Director

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS Assistant Conductor

GUEST CONDUCTORS

ERICH LEINSDORF
CLAUDIO ABBADO
COLIN DAVIS
CARLO MARIA GIULINI
SEIJI OZAWA
GUNTHER SCHULLER

Tickets are available from the Subscription Office, Symphony Hall, Boston, Massachusetts 02115 (telephone 617-266-1492). Prices are listed in this booklet after the programs for each series.

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA RECORDS

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

THE TRUSTEES OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA INC.

TALCOTT M. BANKS President
PHILIP K. ALLEN Vice-President
ROBERT H. GARDINER Vice-President
JOHN L. THORNDIKE Treasurer
RICHARD P. CHAPMAN
ABRAM T. COLLIER
MRS HARRIS FAHNESTOCK
THEODORE P. FERRIS
FRANCIS W. HATCH
HAROLD D. HODGKINSON
E. MORTON JENNINGS JR
EDWARD M. KENNEDY
HENRY A. LAUGHLIN
EDWARD G. MURRAY
JOHN T. NOONAN
MRS JAMES H. PERKINS
SIDNEY R. RABB

TRUSTEES EMERITUS

HENRY B. CABOT
PALFREY PERKINS
EDWARD A. TAFT
RAYMOND S. WILKINS

ADMINISTRATION OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

THOMAS D. PERRY JR Manager

JAMES J. BROSNAHAN
Associate Manager, Business Affairs

HARRY J. KRAUT
Associate Manager, Public Affairs

MARY H. SMITH
Concert Manager

MARVIN SCHOFER
Press and Public Information

THE BOARD OF OVERSEERS OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA INC.

ABRAM T. COLLIER Chairman
ALLEN G. BARRY Vice-Chairman
LEONARD KAPLAN Secretary

MRS FRANK ALLEN
ROBERT C. ALSOP
OLIVER F. AMES
LEO L. BERANEK
DAVID W. BERNSTEIN
MRS CURTIS BROOKS
GARDNER L. BROWN
MRS LOUIS W. CABOT
MRS NORMAN L. CAHNERS
LEVIN H. CAMPBELL III
ERWIN D. CANHAM
JOHN L. COOPER
ROBERT CUTLER
NELSON J. DARLING JR
BYRON K. ELLIOTT
PAUL FROMM
CARLTON P. FULLER
MRS ALBERT GOODHUE
MRS JOHN L. GRANDIN JR
STEPHEN W. GRANT
SAMUEL A. GROVES
FRANCIS W. HATCH JR
MRS C. D. JACKSON
HOWARD W. JOHNSON
SEAVEY JOYCE
GEORGE H. KIDDER
LAWRENCE K. MILLER
LOUVILLE NILES
HERBERT W. PRATT
NATHAN M. PUSEY
MRS FAIRFIELD E. RAYMOND
PAUL REARDON
DONALD B. SINCLAIR
SIDNEY S. STONEMAN
JOHN HOYT STOOKEY
ROBERT G. WIESE

SYMPHONY HALL BOSTON MASSACHUSETTS

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

WILLIAM STEINBERG Music Director

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS Assistant Conductor

first violins
Joseph Silverstein
concertmaster
Charles Munch chair
Alfred Krips
Max Hobart
Rolland Tapley
Roger Shermont
Max Winder
Harry Dickson
Gottfried Wilfinger
Fredy Ostrovsky
Leo Panasevich
Noah Bielski
Herman Silberman
Stanley Benson
Sheldon Rotenberg
Alfred Schneider
Julius Schulman
Gerald Gelbloom
Raymond Sird

second violins
Clarence Knudson
William Marshall
Michel Sasson
Ronald Knudsen
Leonard Moss
William Waterhouse
Ayrton Pinto
Amnon Levy
Laszlo Nagy
Michael Vitale
Victor Manusevitch
John Korman
Christopher Kimber
Spencer Larrison
Ikuko Mizuno

violas
Burton Fine
Charles S. Dana chair
Reuben Green
Eugene Lehner
George Humphrey
Jerome Lipson
Robert Karol
Bernard Kadinoff
Vincent Mauricci
Earl Hedberg
Joseph Pietropaolo
Robert Barnes
Yizhak Schotten

cellos
Jules Eskin
Philip R. Allen chair
Martin Hoherman
Mischa Nieland
Karl Zeise
Robert Ripley
Luis Leguia
Stephen Geber
Hidenobu Tsuchida*
Jerome Patterson
Ronald Feldman
William Stokking

basses
Henry Portnoi
William Rhein
Joseph Hearne
Bela Wurtzler
Leslie Martin
John Salkowski
John Barwicki
Buell Neidlinger
Robert Olson

flutes
Doriot Anthony Dwyer
Walter Piston chair
James Pappoutsakis
Phillip Kaplan

piccolo
Lois Schaefer

oboes
Ralph Gomberg
John Holmes
Hugh Matheny

english horn
Laurence Thorstenberg

clarinets
Gino Cioffi
Pasquale Cardillo
Peter Hadcock
Eb clarinet

bass clarinet
Felix Viscuglia

bassoons
Sherman Walt
Ernst Panenka
Matthew Ruggiero

contra bassoon
Richard Plaster

horns
James Stagliano
Charles Yancich
Harry Shapiro
Thomas Newell
Paul Keaney
Ralph Pottle

trumpets
Armando Ghitalla
Roger Voisin
André Come
Gerard Goguen

trombones
William Gibson
Josef Orosz
Kauko Kahila

tuba
Chester Schmitz

timpani
Everett Firth

percussion
Charles Smith
Arthur Press
assistant timpanist
Thomas Gauger
Frank Epstein

harps
Bernard Zighera
Ann Hobson

librarians
Victor Alpert
William Shisler

stage manager
Alfred Robison

personnel manager William Moyer

*member of the Japan Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra participating in a one season exchange with Carol Procter.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

FOUNDED IN 1881 BY
HENRY LEE HIGGINSON

THE TRUSTEES OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA INC.

TALCOTT M. BANKS President
PHILIP K. ALLEN Vice-President
ROBERT H. GARDINER Vice-President
JOHN L. THORNDIKE Treasurer
RICHARD P. CHAPMAN
ABRAM T. COLLIER
MRS HARRIS FAHNESTOCK
THEODORE P. FERRIS
FRANCIS W. HATCH
HAROLD D. HODGKINSON
E. MORTON JENNINGS JR
EDWARD M. KENNEDY
HENRY A. LAUGHLIN
EDWARD G. MURRAY
JOHN T. NOONAN
MRS JAMES H. PERKINS
SIDNEY R. RABB

TRUSTEES EMERITUS

HENRY B. CABOT
PALFREY PERKINS
EDWARD A. TAFT
RAYMOND S. WILKINS

ADMINISTRATION OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

THOMAS D. PERRY JR Manager

JAMES J. BROSNAHAN
Associate Manager, Business Affairs

HARRY J. KRAUT
Associate Manager, Public Affairs

MARY H. SMITH
Concert Manager

MARVIN SCHOFER
Press and Public Information

THE BOARD OF OVERSEERS OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA INC.

ABRAM T. COLLIER Chairman
ALLEN G. BARRY Vice-Chairman
LEONARD KAPLAN Secretary

MRS FRANK ALLEN
ROBERT C. ALSOP
OLIVER F. AMES
LEO L. BERANEK
DAVID W. BERNSTEIN
MRS CURTIS BROOKS
GARDNER L. BROWN
MRS LOUIS W. CABOT
MRS NORMAN L. CAHNERS
LEVIN H. CAMPBELL III
ERWIN D. CANHAM
JOHN L. COOPER
ROBERT CUTLER
NELSON J. DARLING JR
BYRON K. ELLIOTT
PAUL FROMM
CARLTON P. FULLER
MRS ALBERT GOODHUE
MRS JOHN L. GRANDIN JR
STEPHEN W. GRANT
SAMUEL A. GROVES
FRANCIS W. HATCH JR
MRS C. D. JACKSON
HOWARD W. JOHNSON
SEAVEY JOYCE
GEORGE H. KIDDER
LAWRENCE K. MILLER
LOUVILLE NILES
HERBERT W. PRATT
NATHAN M. PUSEY
MRS FAIRFIELD E. RAYMOND
PAUL REARDON
DONALD B. SINCLAIR
SIDNEY S. STONEMAN
JOHN HOYT STOOKEY
ROBERT G. WIESE

SYMPHONY HALL BOSTON MASSACHUSETTS

Whitestone

WILLIAM STEINBERG Music Director
MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS Assistant Conductor

GUEST CONDUCTORS
ERICH LEINSDORF
CLAUDIO ABBADO
COLIN DAVIS
CARLO MARIA GIULINI
SEIJI OZAWA
GUNTHER SCHULLER

Tickets are available from the Subscription Office, Symphony Hall, Boston, Massachusetts 02115 (telephone 617-266-1492). Prices are listed in this booklet after the programs for each series.

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA RECORDS

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

WILLIAM STEINBERG Music Director
MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS Assistant Conductor

first violins
Joseph Silverstein
concertmaster
Charles Munch chair
Alfred Krips
Max Hobart
Rolland Tapley
Roger Shermont
Max Winder
Harry Dickson
Gottfried Wilfinger
Fredy Ostrovsky
Leo Panasevich
Noah Bielski
Herman Silberman
Stanley Benson
Sheldon Rotenberg
Alfred Schneider
Julius Schulman
Gerald Gelbloom
Raymond Sird

second violins
Clarence Knudson
William Marshall
Michel Sasson
Ronald Knudsen
Leonard Moss
William Waterhouse
Avrton Pinto
Amnon Levy
Laszlo Nagy
Michael Vitale
Victor Manusevitch
John Korman
Christopher Kimber
Spencer Larrison
Ikuko Mizuno

violas
Burton Fine
Charles S. Dana chair
Reuben Green
Eugene Lehner
George Humphrey
Jerome Lipson
Robert Karol
Bernard Kadinoff
Vincent Mauricci
Earl Hedberg
Joseph Pietropaolo
Robert Barnes
Yizhak Schotten

cellos
Jules Eskin
Philip R. Allen chair
Martin Hoherman
Mischa Nieland
Karl Zeise
Robert Ripley
Luis Leguia
Stephen Geber
Hidenobu Tsuchida*
Jerome Patterson
Ronald Feldman
William Stokking

basses
Henry Portnoi
William Rhein
Joseph Hearne
Bela Wurtzler
Leslie Martin
John Salkowski
John Barwicki
Buell Neidlinger
Robert Olson

flutes
Doriot Anthony Dwyer
Walter Piston chair
James Pappoutsakis
Phillip Kaplan

piccolo
Lois Schaefer

oboes
Ralph Gomberg
John Holmes
Hugh Matheny

english horn
Laurence Thorstenberg

clarinets
Gino Ciofti
Pasquale Cardillo
Peter Hadcock
Eb clarinet

bass clarinet
Felix Viscuglia

bassoons
Sherman Walt
Ernst Panenka
Matthew Ruggiero

contra bassoon
Richard Plaster

horns
James Stagliano
Charles Yancich
Harry Shapiro
Thomas Newell
Paul Keaney
Ralph Pottle

trumpets
Armando Ghitalla
Roger Voisin
André Come
Gerard Goguen

trombones
William Gibson
Josef Orosz
Kauko Kahila

tuba
Chester Schmitz

timpani
Everett Firth

percussion
Charles Smith
Arthur Press
assistant timpanist
Thomas Gauger
Frank Epstein

harps
Bernard Zighera
Ann Hobson

librarians
Victor Alpert
William Shisler

stage manager
Alfred Robison

personnel manager William Moyer

*member of the Japan Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra participating in a one season exchange with Carol Procter.

MUSIC — THE WORLD'S LANGUAGE

The means of transportation have advanced so far that Man has visited the moon. The means of communication have developed to so sophisticated a level that Man has instant communication with the opposite side of the globe. Our world has become very small.

The time has come for every man to hold 'dialogue' with his neighbor. This new age is the 'Information society'. Labor is being fast eliminated thanks to the machine. The computer stores up our society. Man experiences a new worth in man. Is it not time that man alone can discover his rich potential, the true satisfaction of the human spirit and a worthwhile life? Such satisfaction of the human spirit will spur on the exploration of the arts, for the fine arts are food for man's soul in the 'Information society'. Among the fine arts the aspirations of music are particularly significant. Music is the world's language.

For these reasons the Tokyo Junior Chamber of Commerce wishes to carry out an exchange program of artists throughout the world by establishing an 'International Artist Exchange Program'. As the first step in this exchange we are very glad to co-operate in the exchange of Carol Procter, cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Hidenobu Tsuchida, cellist of the Japan Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra. If you support our program, we should warmly appreciate your contribution to our 'International Artist Exchange Program', which will be accepted either at our Headquarters in Tokyo or at the administrative offices of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THE TOKYO JUNIOR CHAMBER OF COMMERCE
Tokyo Chamber of Commerce Building
14, 3-chome Marunouchi Chiyodaku
Tokyo, Japan

NEW MEMBERS OF THE ORCHESTRA

Ramon Scavelli

ANN HOBSON, who has been appointed to the second harp position this season, was born in Philadelphia. She started learning the piano with her mother, who was formerly a concert pianist and now a music teacher in the Philadelphia public schools. While at high school Ann Hobson began studying the harp through the Philadelphia public school music program. After graduating, she spent two years at the Philadelphia Music Academy where she was a pupil of Marilyn Costello. She then moved to Cleveland where she attended the Institute of Music, studying with Alice Chalifoux. She received her Bachelor's degree in music in 1966. During her last year at the Institute, she occasionally traveled to Pittsburgh to play second harp with the Symphony, and in the fall of 1966, Ann Hobson became principal harp of the Washington National Symphony, where she remained until her appointment to the Boston Symphony. During past years she has taken part in the Marlboro Music Festival, and has been a faculty member of the Philadelphia Musical Academy.

IKUKO MIZUNO was born in Tokyo, Japan. She joined the children's music class at the Toho-Gakuen School of music as the school's very first student, and two years later made her debut in Tokyo, playing the Violin concerto in E by Bach. Later she won the first prize in the violin competition for high school students throughout Japan. In 1963, after winning a national competition for players of all ages, she came to the United States as a member of the touring Toho-Gakuen String Orchestra. After graduating from the Toho-Gakuen School in 1965, she returned to the USA, having won a Spaulding award at Boston University to study with Roman Totenberg. The following summer she was a Fellow of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood. During the last three years Ikuko Mizuno has been increasingly active. She has given recitals at Boston University, the Harvard Musical Association and at other places in and around Boston; she has played concertos with the Boston Pops Orchestra, she has attended master classes in Europe with Franco Gulli and Henryk Szerying and has appeared on radio and television in Italy and Switzerland. She taught at Red Fox camp during the summer of 1967. Early this year she became a temporary member of the Boston Symphony. She graduated from Boston University with an award from Phi Kappa Lambda and the degree of Master of Music, and was appointed a permanent member of the Boston Symphony after her successful audition in August.

BOSTON SYMPHONY
PRESS COVERAGE
1969-1970 Season

I

PERFORMANCE ANNOUNCEMENTS AND REVIEWS

A SYMPHONY HALL CONCERTS (Wm. Steinberg directing, unless otherwise indicated)

	Dates and Series of Concert						Page NO.
	Fri-Sat	Tues A	Tues B	Cambr.	Thurs A	Thurs B
Sept.	26-27	30			Oct. 2		2
Oct.	3-4		14	7			8
(Thomas)	10-11	28					10	55
	17-18						13
(Giulini)	31-Nov. 1		4				15
Nov. "	7-8	11					17
(Ozawa)	14-15						18
"	[illegible]	[illegible]		18	20		20	59
"	21-22	25					21	61
(Leinsdorf)	28-29		Dec. 2				23	62
Dec. "	5-6			16			24	64
(Thomas)					18		25	66
	19-20			30			26	67
Jan.	2-3	6					27	67
	9-10					8	29	68
	PENSION FUND CONCERT----------						30	69
(Thomas)			13				31	70
	16-17						32	71
(Thomas)				20			33	71
(Abbado)	23-24	27			29		33	72
"	30-31						34	72
Feb. "			10				36	73
(Davis)	13-14	17				19	36	73+74
"	20-21						38	74.
Mar. (Thomas)		3					40	75
"	6-7			10	12		40	80
"	13-14	17				19	41
"	20-21						42	81
(Schuller)	27-28						43
	BEETHOVEN FESTIVAL* April 7-11 Rudolf and Bernstein						45
(Silverstein & Thomas)			14				52
(Sil.-Tho.)	17-18				16		52
(Thomas)		21					53
"	24-25						53	100

BSO and Deutsche Grammophone 85, 86, 86, 89, 91
Leinsdorf oriented articles 85, 86, 92, 95, 102, 103
Miscellaneous articles 87, 88, 101, 102, 103

II PUBLICITY ABOUT THE BOSTON SYMPHONY AND PERSONNEL

This includes pre-season announcements and commentary, commentary and criticism continuing through the season, articles about the conductors and other musicians, and all fund raising and social publicity. These items appear in calendar order except where items groupings or space allowances seem otherwise feasible. Particular interests may be located with an index opposite page 105.

MUSIC — THE WORLD'S LANGUAGE

The means of transportation have advanced so far that Man has visited the moon. The means of communication have developed to so sophisticated a level that Man has instant communication with the opposite side of the globe. Our world has become very small.

The time has come for every man to hold 'dialogue' with his neighbor. This new age is the 'Information society'. Labor is being fast eliminated thanks to the machine. The computer stores up our society. Man experiences a new worth in man. Is it not time that man alone can discover his rich potential, the true satisfaction of the human spirit and a worthwhile life? Such satisfaction of the human spirit will spur on the exploration of the arts, for the fine arts are food for man's soul in the 'Information society'. Among the fine arts the aspirations of music are particularly significant. Music is the world's language.

For these reasons the Tokyo Junior Chamber of Commerce wishes to carry out an exchange program of artists throughout the world by establishing an 'International Artist Exchange Program'. As the first step in this exchange we are very glad to co-operate in the exchange of Carol Procter, cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Hidenobu Tsuchida, cellist of the Japan Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra. If you support our program, we should warmly appreciate your contribution to our 'International Artist Exchange Program', which will be accepted either at our Headquarters in Tokyo or at the administrative offices of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THE TOKYO JUNIOR CHAMBER OF COMMERCE
Tokyo Chamber of Commerce Building
14, 3-chome Marunouchi Chiyodaku
Tokyo, Japan

NEW MEMBERS OF THE ORCHESTRA

Ramon Scavelli

ANN HOBSON, who has been appointed to the second harp position this season, was born in Philadelphia. She started learning the piano with her mother, who was formerly a concert pianist and now a music teacher in the Philadelphia public schools. While at high school Ann Hobson began studying the harp through the Philadelphia public school music program. After graduating, she spent two years at the Philadelphia Music Academy where she was a pupil of Marilyn Costello. She then moved to Cleveland where she attended the Institute of Music, studying with Alice Chalifoux. She received her Bachelor's degree in music in 1966. During her last year at the Institute, she occasionally traveled to Pittsburgh to play second harp with the Symphony, and in the fall of 1966, Ann Hobson became principal harp of the Washington National Symphony, where she remained until her appointment to the Boston Symphony. During past years she has taken part in the Marlboro Music Festival, and has been a faculty member of the Philadelphia Musical Academy.

IKUKO MIZUNO was born in Tokyo, Japan. She joined the children's music class at the Toho-Gakuen School of music as the school's very first student, and two years later made her debut in Tokyo, playing the Violin concerto in E by Bach. Later she won the first prize in the violin competition for high school students throughout Japan. In 1963, after winning a national competition for players of all ages, she came to the United States as a member of the touring Toho-Gakuen String Orchestra. After graduating from the Toho-Gakuen School in 1965, she returned to the USA, having won a Spaulding award at Boston University to study with Roman Totenberg. The following summer she was a Fellow of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood. During the last three years Ikuko Mizuno has been increasingly active. She has given recitals at Boston University, the Harvard Musical Association and at other places in and around Boston; she has played concertos with the Boston Pops Orchestra, she has attended master classes in Europe with Franco Gulli and Henryk Szerying and has appeared on radio and television in Italy and Switzerland. She taught at Red Fox camp during the summer of 1967. Early this year she became a temporary member of the Boston Symphony. She graduated from Boston University with an award from Phi Kappa Lambda and the degree of Master of Music, and was appointed a permanent member of the Boston Symphony after her successful audition in August.

B CONCERTS IN OTHER CITIES

Pre-Season Announcements 55

Reviews (Promotional announcements are with the concert reviews. Only the critic reviews are identified below. Not all concerts in other cities were reviewed, so the following is only a partial listing of the out-of-town concerts)

Date	Conductor	Place
Oct. 9	Steinberg	Providence	59
" 21	"	Lyric Theatre, Baltimore	61
" 22	" & Thomas	Phil. Hall, New York	62
Nov. 6	Giulini	Providence	64
Dec. 8	Leinsdorf	Acad. of Music, Philadelphia	66
" 9	"	Woolsey Hall, New Haven	67
" 10-12	"	Phil. Hall, New York	67
" 13	"	Carnegie Hall, New York	68
Jan. 15	Thomas	Providence	69
Feb. 4	Abbado	Phil. Hall, New York	70
" 24	Davis	Hackensack, N.J.	71
" 25-27	"	Phil. Hall, New York	71
" 28	"	Carnegie Hall, New York	72
Mar 5	Thomas	Providence	72
" 30	"	Washington	73
Apr 1	"	Phil Hall, N.Y.	73+74
" 4	"	Carnegie "	74.

C B.S.O. CHAMBER PLAYERS

Programs and itinerary on page 75

Spring Series - Council on the Arts and Humanities 80

D RADIO AND TELEVISION ANNOUNCEMENTS 81

General announcements and announcements of re-run or record broadcasts. Reminders of live concert listening and viewing are with the Performance Announcements of each concert.)

E RECORDINGS (Reviews of specific recordings may be located with index on page 84)

Articles about four channel stereo	85, 90, 97, 100
BSO and Deutsche Grammophone	85, 86, 86, 89, 91
Leinsdorf oriented articles	85, 86, 92, 95, 102, 103
Miscellaneous articles	87, 88, 101, 102, 103

II PUBLICITY ABOUT THE BOSTON SYMPHONY AND PERSONNEL

This includes pre-season announcements and commentary, commentary and criticism continuing through the season, articles about the conductors and other musicians, and all fund raising and social publicity. These items appear in calendar order except where items groupings or space allowances seem otherwise feasible. Particular interests may be located with an index opposite page 105.

MUSIC — THE WORLD'S LANGUAGE

The means of transportation have advanced so far that Man has visited the moon. The means of communication have developed to so sophisticated a level that Man has instant communication with the opposite side of the globe. Our world has become very small.

The time has come for every man to hold 'dialogue' with his neighbor. This new age is the 'Information society'. Labor is being fast eliminated thanks to the machine. The computer stores up our society. Man experiences a new worth in man. Is it not time that man alone can discover his rich potential, the true satisfaction of the human spirit and a worthwhile life? Such satisfaction of the human spirit will spur on the exploration of the arts, for the fine arts are food for man's soul in the 'Information society'. Among the fine arts the aspirations of music are particularly significant. Music is the world's language.

For these reasons the Tokyo Junior Chamber of Commerce wishes to carry out an exchange program of artists throughout the world by establishing an 'International Artist Exchange Program'. As the first step in this exchange we are very glad to co-operate in the exchange of Carol Procter, cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Hidenobu Tsuchida, cellist of the Japan Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra. If you support our program, we should warmly appreciate your contribution to our 'International Artist Exchange Program', which will be accepted either at our Headquarters in Tokyo or at the administrative offices of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THE TOKYO JUNIOR CHAMBER OF COMMERCE
Tokyo Chamber of Commerce Building
14, 3-chome Marunouchi Chiyodaku
Tokyo, Japan

NEW MEMBERS OF THE ORCHESTRA

Ramon Scavelli

ANN HOBSON, who has been appointed to the second harp position this season, was born in Philadelphia. She started learning the piano with her mother, who was formerly a concert pianist and now a music teacher in the Philadelphia public schools. While at high school Ann Hobson began studying the harp through the Philadelphia public school music program. After graduating, she spent two years at the Philadelphia Music Academy where she was a pupil of Marilyn Costello. She then moved to Cleveland where she attended the Institute of Music, studying with Alice Chalifoux. She received her Bachelor's degree in music in 1966. During her last year at the Institute, she occasionally traveled to Pittsburgh to play second harp with the Symphony, and in the fall of 1966, Ann Hobson became principal harp of the Washington National Symphony, where she remained until her appointment to the Boston Symphony. During past years she has taken part in the Marlboro Music Festival, and has been a faculty member of the Philadelphia Musical Academy.

IKUKO MIZUNO was born in Tokyo, Japan. She joined the children's music class at the Toho-Gakuen School of music as the school's very first student, and two years later made her debut in Tokyo, playing the Violin concerto in E by Bach. Later she won the first prize in the violin competition for high school students throughout Japan. In 1963, after winning a national competition for players of all ages, she came to the United States as a member of the touring Toho-Gakuen String Orchestra. After graduating from the Toho-Gakuen School in 1965, she returned to the USA, having won a Spaulding award at Boston University to study with Roman Totenberg. The following summer she was a Fellow of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood. During the last three years Ikuko Mizuno has been increasingly active. She has given recitals at Boston University, the Harvard Musical Association and at other places in and around Boston; she has played concertos with the Boston Pops Orchestra, she has attended master classes in Europe with Franco Gulli and Henryk Szeryng and has appeared on radio and television in Italy and Switzerland. She taught at Red Fox camp during the summer of 1967. Early this year she became a temporary member of the Boston Symphony. She graduated from Boston University with an award from Phi Kappa Lambda and the degree of Master of Music, and was appointed a permanent member of the Boston Symphony after her successful audition in August.

BOSTON SYMPHONY
PRESS COVERAGE
1969-1970 Season

PERFORMANCE ANNOUNCEMENTS AND REVIEWS

SYMPHONY HALL CONCERTS (Wm. Steinberg directing, unless otherwise indicated)

	Dates and Series of Concert						Page NO.
	Fri-Sat	Tues A	Tues B	Cambr.	Thurs A	Thurs B
Sept.	26-27	30			Oct. 2		2
Oct.	3-4		14	7			8
(Thomas)	10-11	28					10	55
	17-18						13
(Giulini)	31-Nov. 1		4				15
Nov. "	7-8	11					17
(Ozawa)	14-15						18
"				18	20		20
"	21-22	25					21	59
(Leinsdorf)	28-29		Dec. 2				23	61
Dec. "	5-6			16			24	62
(Thomas)					18		25	64
	19-20			30			26	66
Jan.	2-3	6					27	67
	9-10					8	29	67
	PENSION FUND CONCERT----------						30	68
(Thomas)			13				31	69
	16-17						32	70
(Thomas)				20			33	71
(Abbado)	23-24	27			29		33	71
"	30-31						34	72
Feb. "			10				36	73
(Davis)	13-14	17				19	36	73
"	20-21						38	74
Mar. (Thomas)		3					40
"	6-7			10	12		40	75
"	13-14	17				19	41	80
"	20-21						42
(Schuller)	27-28						43	81
	BEETHOVEN FESTIVAL April 7-11 Rudolf and Bernstein						45
(Silverstein & Thomas)			14				52
(Sil.-Tho.)	17-18				16		52
(Thomas)		21					53
"	24-25						53

Articles about four channel stereo	85, 90, 97, 100
BSO and Deutsche Grammophone	86, 89, 91
Leinsdorf oriented articles	86, 92, 95, 102, 103
Miscellaneous articles	87, 88, 101, 102, 103

PUBLICITY ABOUT THE BOSTON SYMPHONY AND PERSONNEL

This includes pre-season announcements and commentary, commentary and criticism continuing through the season, articles about the conductors and other musicians, and all fund raising and social publicity. These items appear in calendar order except where items groupings or space allowances seem otherwise feasible. Particular interests may be located with an index opposite page 105.

PROGRAM announcements & reviews

THE ARTS

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

SEP 24 1969

Steinberg tailors programs for two cities he serves

By MICHAEL STEINBERG

William Steinberg is now music director of the both the Pittsburgh and the Boston Symphony Orchestras. He began his 18th season in Pittsburgh last Friday night, and he starts his Boston tenure this Friday afternoon.

He will alternate through the season between the two cities, and Boston will see a little more of him than Pittsburgh. Each orchestra has a core subscription series of 24 pairs of concerts.

In Pittsburgh, Steinberg will take 11 of the 24 Friday-Sunday pairs, while in Boston he will take 12 Friday-Saturday pairs and more than half the concerts offered on the Symphony's shorter series. He will do some touring with both orchestras.

When it was announced in Spring 1968 that Steinberg would take on the Boston Symphony while continuing his music directorship in Pittsburgh, he was asked about duplication of repertory in the two cities. Steinberg replied that he would shape two essentially distinct repertories based on the needs of each city, most specifically on what had or had not been played recently in each.

In the event, the overlap of repertory will amount to approximately one third of the music Steinberg will conduct during the 1969-70 season. The works include two standard repertory symphonies, the Schubert 9th, which is on the opening program in both places, and the Brahms 2nd.

The other works scheduled for both the Pittsburgh and Boston seasons are relatively rare: Bartok's opera, "Bluebeard's Castle," Beethoven's Missa Solemnis (to be done in Boston only on an extra non-subscription Beethoven series), Bruckner's Symphony No. 6, the 2nd Symphonies of Benjamin Lees and the late Ernst Toch, "Das Lied von der Erde" by Mahler, and Reger's Variations on a Theme by Mozart.

Of the rarer works, the Bruckner 6th was performed by the Boston Symphony last season under Steinberg's predecessor, Erich Leinsdorf. "Bluebeard's Castle" has had recent performances in two seasons by the Opera Company of Boston.

The Missa Solemnis will have the same soloists (Martina Arroyo, Lili Chookasian, Richard Lewis, Thomas Paul) and the same chorus (Rutgers University Choir) in both performances; the Bartok will be done with the same two singers (Evelyn Lear and Arnold Voketaitis); in "Das Lied von der Erde" the contralto soloist will be the same (Maureen Forrester, with tenor Jean Cox being replaced in Boston by Jon Vickers).

In Pittsburgh, Steinberg will share the season with associate conductor Henry Mazer and with guest conductors Hans Bauer, Lukas Foss, Donald Johanos, Bruno Maderna, Jorge Mester, Eugene Ormandy, Thomas Schippers, and Michael Tilson Thomas.

In Boston, Steinberg will be spelled by assistant conductor Michael Tilson Thomas, and by guest conductors Claudio Abbado, Colin Davis, Carlo Maria Giulini, Erich Leinsdorf, Seiji Ozawa, and Gunther Schuller.

This will be the Boston Symphony's first experience in sharing a music director with another orchestra. Pittsburgh, however, has done it before, because Steinberg doubled with the London Philharmonic 1958-60.

THE MUSIC DIRECTOR

WILLIAM STEINBERG was born in Cologne. Graduating from the Conservatory of his native city in 1920, he became assistant to Otto Klemperer at the Cologne Opera. Soon afterwards he was appointed one of the company's principal conductors. He was engaged as first conductor of the German Theatre at Prague in 1925, becoming Opera director two years later. In 1929 he was invited to Frankfurt as music director of the Opera and of the famous Museum-concerts. There he conducted many contemporary operas for the first time, one of which was Berg's Wozzeck; he also directed the world premières of Weill's Mahagonny, Schoenberg's Von Heute auf Morgen and George Antheil's Transatlantic. During this period he was a regular guest conductor of the Berlin State Opera.

The Nazis dismissed Mr Steinberg from his posts in 1933, and he then founded the Jewish Culture League in Frankfurt, and under its auspices conducted concerts and opera for Jewish audiences. He later did similar work for the Jewish community in Berlin. He left Germany in 1936. He was co-founder with Bronislav Huberman of the Palestine Orchestra (now the Israel Philharmonic), becoming its first conductor after the inaugural concert, which was directed in December 1936 by Arturo Toscanini. Mr Steinberg came to the United States in 1938, at Toscanini's invitation, to assist in the formation and training of the NBC Symphony Orchestra. During his time as Associate Conductor of the NBC Symphony Mr Steinberg appeared as a guest conductor from coast to coast both with the major symphony orchestras and with the San Francisco Opera. He became music director of the Buffalo Philharmonic in 1945, and seven years later was engaged as Music Director of the Pittsburgh Symphony, with whom he now has a lifetime contract.

Between 1958 and 1960 Mr Steinberg traveled regularly between Pittsburgh and London, while he served as music director of the London Philharmonic Orchestra. In the 1964-1965 season he appeared as guest conductor with the Metropolitan Opera in New York. The Orchestra in Pittsburgh has become under his direction one of the foremost in the country. In 1964 he and the orchestra made a three-month tour of Europe and the Near East under the auspices of the State Department's office of Cultural Presentations, a journey covering 25,000 miles in fourteen countries and including 50 concerts.

Later in 1964 Mr Steinberg became principal guest conductor of the New York Philharmonic, and directed concerts for twelve weeks during several winter seasons. In the summer of 1965 he conducted the Orchestra during the first week of its free concerts in the parks of New York City. The performance of Beethoven's Ninth symphony in Central Park, which opened the series, attracted an audience of more than 75,000. Mr Steinberg has also had extensive engagements in Europe, and during the summer of 1967 he conducted many of the concerts given during its tour of the United States by the Israel Philharmonic, the orchestra with which he had been so closely associated thirty years earlier. He has directed many recordings for the Command and RCA labels.

As this season opens, William Steinberg is the only conductor who holds the post of music director of two of the world's major orchestras, the Boston Symphony and the Pittsburgh Symphony.

ITEM
LYNN, MASS.
(E) 38,000

SEP 25 1969

William Steinberg opens the 89th session of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with the first pair of Friday and Saturday concerts tomorrow at 2 p.m. and Saturday at 8:30 p.m.

The major works of the programs are Schubert's Symphony No. 9 in C and Anton Webern's Six Pieces for Orchestra Opus 8. Beethoven's The Consecration of the House overture opens and Richard Strauss' Till Eulenspiegel closes the program.

This is Steinberg's first season as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He is the 14th music director in the 89-year history of the orchestra.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

SEP 26 1969

BSO: Steinberg conducting

The Boston Symphony begins its 89th season this afternoon at 2 p.m. in Symphony Hall with a concert which officially introduces William Steinberg as the 14th music director in its history. Mr. Steinberg, who is also music director of the Pittsburgh Symphony—the only conductor to hold this post simultaneously with two world-famed orchestras—will conduct 12 of the Friday-Saturday series and more than half of the other Boston concerts this season.

The program for this afternoon and tomorrow evening opens with Beethoven's "Consecration of the House" overture, and further includes Schubert's Symphony No. 9 in C, Webern's Six Pieces for Orchestra, and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel."

The orchestra has extended its traditional "rush seats" policy to the Saturday evening concerts this year, so that 150 tickets at $1 will be available two hours before concert time (Friday at noon; Saturday at 6:30 p.m.) on a first-come, first-serve basis.

THE ASSISTANT CONDUCTOR

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS was born in Hollywood. His family, the Thomashefskys, has been connected with the theatre for several generations. He began his formal musical studies at the age of ten, took part in the accelerated program of the Los Angeles city schools, and attended the University of Southern California simultaneously with his last two years at high school. Enrolling at the University of Southern California in 1962 with advanced standing, he studied with Ingolf Dahl and John Crown and was awarded the Alumni Prize as the outstanding student at the time of his graduation.

For four years Michael Tilson Thomas was conductor of the Young Musicians Foundation Debut Orchestra, a resident company of the Los Angeles Music Center. At the Monday Evening concerts he was conductor and piano soloist during this time in performances, many of them premières, by contemporary composers, including Igor Stravinsky, Pierre Boulez, Karlheinz Stockhausen, Lukas Foss and Ingolf Dahl. He has been pianist in the classes of Gregor Piatigorsky and has prepared the orchestra for the Heifetz-Piatigorsky concerts. During the 1966 Bayreuth Festival and the Ojai Festival the following year, Michael Tilson Thomas was assistant conductor to Pierre Boulez. He has been Conductor of the Ojai Festival for the past two summers.

A conducting fellow of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood during 1968, he conducted the première of Elephant steps, and was awarded the Koussevitzky Prize in conducting. During the 1968-1969 season he conducted youth concerts of the Los Angeles Philharmonic, and appeared as guest conductor with the Boston Philharmonia. He returned to Tanglewood this last summer as a fellow of the Berkshire Music Center, where he conducted the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra and was much involved in the musical preparation of the Center's production of Berg's Wozzeck. Michael Tilson Thomas will also be the regular pianist of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players. His first recording, which includes the two-piano version of Stravinsky's The rite of spring, has recently been released by Angel Records.

PROGRAM announcements & reviews

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

SEP 24 1969 En

Steinberg tailors programs for two cities he serves

THE MUSIC DIRECTOR

WILLIAM STEINBERG was born in Cologne. Graduating from the Conservatory of his native city in 1920, he became assistant to Otto Klemperer at the Cologne Opera. Soon afterwards he was appointed one of the company's principal conductors. He was engaged as first conductor of the German Theatre at Prague in 1925, becoming Opera director two years later. In 1929 he was invited to Frankfurt as music director of the Opera and of the famous Museum-concerts. There he conducted many contemporary operas for the first time, one of which was Berg's Wozzeck; he also directed the world premières of Weill's Mahagonny, Schoenberg's Von Heute auf Morgen and George Antheil's Transatlantic. During this period he was a regular guest conductor of the Berlin State Opera.

The Nazis dismissed Mr Steinberg from his posts in 1933, and he then founded the Jewish Culture League in Frankfurt, and under its auspices conducted concerts and opera for Jewish audiences. He later did similar work for the Jewish community in Berlin. He left Germany in 1936. He was co-founder with Bronislav Huberman of the Palestine Orchestra (now the Israel Philharmonic), becoming its first conductor after the inaugural concert, which was directed in December 1936 by Arturo Toscanini. Mr Steinberg came to the United States in 1938, at Toscanini's invitation, to assist in the formation and training of the NBC Symphony Orchestra. During his time as Associate Conductor of the NBC Symphony Mr Steinberg appeared as a guest conductor from coast to coast both with the major symphony orchestras and with the San Francisco Opera. He became music director of the Buffalo Philharmonic in 1945, and seven years later was engaged as Music Director of the Pittsburgh Symphony, with whom he now has a lifetime contract.

Between 1958 and 1960 Mr Steinberg traveled regularly between Pittsburgh and London, while he served as music director of the London Philharmonic Orchestra. In the 1964-1965 season he appeared as guest conductor with the Metropolitan Opera in New York. The Orchestra in Pittsburgh has become under his direction one of the foremost in the country. In 1964 he and the orchestra made a three-month tour of Europe and the Near East under the auspices of the State Department's office of Cultural Presentations, a journey covering 25,000 miles in fourteen countries and including 50 concerts.

Later in 1964 Mr Steinberg became principal guest conductor of the New York Philharmonic, and directed concerts for twelve weeks during several winter seasons. In the summer of 1965 he conducted the Orchestra during the first week of its free concerts in the parks of New York City. The performance of Beethoven's Ninth symphony in Central Park, which opened the series, attracted an audience of more than 75,000. Mr Steinberg has also had extensive engagements in Europe, and during the summer of 1967 he conducted many of the concerts given during its tour of the United States by the Israel Philharmonic, the orchestra with which he had been so closely associated thirty years earlier. He has directed many recordings for the Command and RCA labels.

As this season opens, William Steinberg is the only conductor who holds the post of music director of two of the world's major orchestras, the Boston Symphony and the Pittsburgh Symphony.

By MICHAEL STEINBERG

William Steinberg is now music director of the both the Pittsburgh and the Boston Symphony Orchestras. He began his 18th season in Pittsburgh last Friday night, and he starts his Boston tenure this Friday afternoon.

He will alternate through the season between the two cities, and Boston will see a little more of him than Pittsburgh. Each orchestra has a core subscription series of 24 pairs of concerts.

In Pittsburgh, Steinberg will take 11 of the 24 Friday-Sunday pairs, while in Boston he will take 12 Friday-Saturday pairs and more than half the concerts offered on the Symphony's shorter series. He will do some touring with both orchestras.

When it was announced in Spring 1968 that Steinberg would take on the Boston Symphony while continuing his music directorship in Pittsburgh, he was asked about duplication of repertory in the two cities. Steinberg replied that he would shape two essentially distinct repertories based on the needs of each city, most specifically on what had or had not been played recently in each.

In the event, the overlap of repertory will amount to approximately one third of the music Steinberg will conduct during the 1969-70 season. The works include two standard repertory symphonies, the Schubert 9th, which is on the opening program in both places, and the Brahms 2nd.

The other works scheduled for both the Pittsburgh and Boston seasons are relatively rare: Bartok's opera, "Bluebeard's Castle," Beethoven's Missa Solemnis (to be done in Boston only on an extra non-subscription Beethoven series), Bruckner's Symphony No. 6, the 2nd Symphonies of Benjamin Lees and the late Ernst Toch, "Das Lied von der Erde" by Mahler, and Reger's Variations on a Theme by Mozart.

Of the rarer works, the Bruckner 6th was performed by the Boston Symphony last season under Steinberg's predecessor, Erich Leinsdorf. "Bluebeard's Castle" has had recent performances in two seasons by the Opera Company of Boston.

The Missa Solemnis will have the same soloists (Martina Arroyo, Lili Chookasian, Richard Lewis, Thomas Paul) and the same chorus (Rutgers University Choir) in both performances; the Bartok will be done with the same two singers (Evelyn Lear and Arnold Voketaitis); in "Das Lied von der Erde" the contralto soloist will be the same (Maureen Forrester, with tenor Jean Cox being replaced in Boston by Jon Vickers).

In Pittsburgh, Steinberg will share the season with associate conductor Henry Mazer and with guest conductors Hans Bauer, Lukas Foss, Donald Johanos, Bruno Maderna, Jorge Mester, Eugene Ormandy, Thomas Schippers, and Michael Tilson Thomas.

In Boston, Steinberg will be spelled by assistant conductor Michael Tilson Thomas, and by guest conductors Claudio Abbado, Colin Davis, Carlo Maria Giulini, Erich Leinsdorf, Seiji Ozawa, and Gunther Schuller.

This will be the Boston Symphony's first experience in sharing a music director with another orchestra. Pittsburgh, however, has done it before, because Steinberg doubled with the London Philharmonic 1958-60.

ITEM
LYNN, MASS.
(E) 32,...

SEP 25 1969

* * *

William Steinberg opens the 89th session of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with the first pair of Friday and Saturday concerts tomorrow at 2 p.m. and Saturday at 8:30 p.m.

The major works of the programs are Schubert's Symphony No. 9 in C and Anton Webern's Six Pieces for Orchestra Opus 8. Beethoven's The Consecration of the House overture opens and Richard Strauss' Till Eulenspiegel closes the program.

This is Steinberg's first season as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He is the 14th music director in the 89-year history of the orchestra.

* * *

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

SEP 26 1969

BSO: Steinberg conducting

The Boston Symphony begins its 89th season this afternoon at 2 p.m. in Symphony Hall with a concert which officially introduces William Steinberg as the 14th music director in its history. Mr. Steinberg, who is also music director of the Pittsburgh Symphony—the only conductor to hold this post simultaneously with two world-famed orchestras—will conduct 12 of the Friday-Saturday series and more than half of the other Boston concerts this season.

The program for this afternoon and tomorrow evening opens with Beethoven's "Consecration of the House" overture, and further includes Schubert's Symphony No. 9 in C, Webern's Six Pieces for Orchestra, and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel."

The orchestra has extended its traditional "rush seats" policy to the Saturday evening concerts this year, so that 150 tickets at $1 will be available two hours before concert time (Friday at noon; Saturday at 6:30 p.m.) on a first-come, first-serve basis.

THE ASSISTANT CONDUCTOR

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS was born in Hollywood. His family, the Thomashefskys, has been connected with the theatre for several generations. He began his formal musical studies at the age of ten, took part in the accelerated program of the Los Angeles city schools, and attended the University of Southern California simultaneously with his last two years at high school. Enrolling at the University of Southern California in 1962 with advanced standing, he studied with Ingolf Dahl and John Crown and was awarded the Alumni Prize as the outstanding student at the time of his graduation.

For four years Michael Tilson Thomas was conductor of the Young Musicians Foundation Debut Orchestra, a resident company of the Los Angeles Music Center. At the Monday Evening concerts he was conductor and piano soloist during this time in performances, many of them premières, by contemporary composers, including Igor Stravinsky, Pierre Boulez, Karlheinz Stockhausen, Lukas Foss and Ingolf Dahl. He has been pianist in the classes of Gregor Piatigorsky and has prepared the orchestra for the Heifetz-Piatigorsky concerts. During the 1966 Bayreuth Festival and the Ojai Festival the following year, Michael Tilson Thomas was assistant conductor to Pierre Boulez. He has been Conductor of the Ojai Festival for the past two summers.

A conducting fellow of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood during 1968, he conducted the première of Elephant steps, and was awarded the Koussevitzky Prize in conducting. During the 1968-1969 season he conducted youth concerts of the Los Angeles Philharmonic, and appeared as guest conductor with the Boston Philharmonia. He returned to Tanglewood this last summer as a fellow of the Berkshire Music Center, where he conducted the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra and was much involved in the musical preparation of the Center's production of Berg's Wozzeck. Michael Tilson Thomas will also be the regular pianist of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players. His first recording, which includes the two-piano version of Stravinsky's The rite of spring, has recently been released by Angel Records.

2.

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Friday afternoon September 26 1969 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening September 27 1969 at 8.30
Tuesday evening September 30 1969 at 8.30
Thursday evening October 2 1969 at 8.30
Monday evening October 6 1969 at 8 o'clock at the University of New Hampshire Field House

WILLIAM STEINBERG conductor

BEETHOVEN — Overture to 'The consecration of the house' op. 124

SCHUBERT — Symphony no. 9 in C*
Andante – allegro ma non troppo
Andante con moto
Scherzo
Finale

intermission

WEBERN — Six pieces for orchestra op. 6
Langsam (Slowly)
Bewegt (With movement)
Mässig (Moderately)
Sehr mässig (Very moderately)
Sehr langsam (Very slowly)
Langsam (Slowly)

STRAUSS — Till Eulenspiegels lustige Streiche op. 28*

William Steinberg conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood

Whitestone

Steinberg Takes BSO Helm

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

THE BOSTON Symphony Orchestra set out on its 89th annual season yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall in Boston under a new skipper. William Steinberg, who has appeared as guest conductor of the orchestra many times in the past several years, made his first appearance as the orchestra's musical director succeeding Erich Leinsdorf, who had held the post for the past seven years.

* * *

IF CONDUCTORS may be classified as of one tradition or another, Steinberg, Leinsdorf's senior by more than a decade, nevertheless came under some of the same influences and contacts his predecessor enjoyed. Both derived great benefits from the tutelage of Toscanini. The two preceding musical directors, Charles Munch and Serge Koussevitzky, were of an ultramontane school which had its roots in France by way of Russia.

One concert heard by radio broadcast does not make a season and, to be sure, there was no anticipation of a tremendous change and approach to the repertory. Steinberg did not make any bid for easy popularity with a Beethoven overture, "The Consecration of the House," the Schubert hour-long C major symphony, the 13-minute "Six Pieces" of Webern, and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel."

* * *

THE C-MAJOR half of the program had vitality and contrast. After intermission, he left the third decade of the 19th symphony and came to the decades which close the year 1900. Steinberg introduced the 1909 Webern "Pieces" to America in 1957. No one of the six exceeds 30 measures unless you include the seven bars of percussive introduction to the funeral march. They represent the disintegration of melody, harmony, rythm and tone-color. Webern relented a bit in the following years.

IN 1895 "TILL" was pretty bold music. It still is, happily. The orchestra played with virtuosity. One couldn't be sure whether the air distorted intonation, but Steinberg at this point no longer needs to prove himself. Every conductor, granted a sufficient term of office, brings a new repertory and the orchestra very often gets, or takes, a fresh injection of esprit de corps with a new man. From here it looks like a calm sea and a prosperous voyage.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

SEP 27 1969

SYMPHONY OPENS SEASON — By L. DAVID HARRIS

Great Steinberg Debut

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its 89th concert season yesterday with a celebration of sounds—the grandeur of the classics, the richness of the Romantics and the new tones and rhythms of 20th century music.

It was an excellent debut for Conductor William Steinberg, now music director of both the Boston and Pittsburgh Symphonies. The orchestra responded to his direction with music that was articulate, yet emotional; extremely well paced and balanced and exceptionally exhilarating particularly in its Schubert and Strauss offerings.

Steinberg, himself, was impressive and the orchestra followed him well. In most cases he showed less emotion and flamboyancy than do many symphony conductors. Brilliant, emotional passages of music often only brought the barest conducting gestures; occasionally, a foot would rise, an arm would flail — but essentially this was not his style.

As the audience saw it, Steinberg let the music speak its richness and emotions for itself. And the music spoke—and it was heard and appreciated.

The concert was well programmed and included works by Beethoven, Schubert, Webern and Strauss. It will be repeated today at 2 p. m.; tomorrow, Tuesday and Thursday at 8:30 p. m., and Oct 6 at 2 p. m. at the University of New Hampshire Field House.

Beethoven's "Overture to 'The Consecration of the House'" provided a meaningful, if not sentimental, opening to the concert and the season. The piece was the first performed at the orchestra's first concert in the Music Hall in 1881. It again was performed on the orchestras's 50th anniversary.

Perhaps the high point of the concert was Schubert's "Symphony No. 9 in C," which was distinguished by tremendous orchestral climaxes, rich harmonies and extended almost-lyrical melodies, which occasionally were almost obscured (such as in the third "Scherzo" movement) by the fascinatingly varied rhythms and patterns often accompanying them.

The symphony also was distinguished by its contrasts, particularly exceptionally performed passages by strings and woodwinds in the second "Andate con moto" moveemnt.

Echoes — but not images — of Schoenberg came to life with Webern's "Six Pieces for Orchestra" — almost vignette offerings that were a superb listening experience — and an excellent contrast to the closing Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegels lustige Streiche."

Whereas Webern's music was ethereal, fragile, Strauss' tone poem brought many of the same musical ideas to the fore with brazen, tremendous force—yet both were fine to hear in their own ways.

The orchestra gave "Till Eulenspiegel" a nice once-upon-a-time effect, then glowingly showed off its violin and horn sections in the work's two basic motives. It was a piece to be heard, remembered — bold, crackling with sounds and rhythms.

But so was the concert. And the season begins.

William Steinberg, new music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts orchestra during his first concert at Symphony Hall.
Record American Photo, Kevin Co

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 429,000

SEP 27 1969

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

SEP 27 1969

Steinberg Launches New Season at BSO

By GEORGE GELLES
HT Music Critic

It's official. At five past two yesterday afternoon, William Steinberg strode to the podium of Symphony Hall, acknowledged the applause of his audience and orchestra, gave the downbeat of Beethoven's "Consecration of the House" and in so doing started his reign as Music Director of the Boston Symphony, the 14th since the orchestra was founded in 1881.

Steinberg, dividing his duties between Boston and the Pittsburgh Symphony, will this season conduct half the weekend series here. With his first program he both defined the stylistic limits in which he will work and showed us pretty much what we can expect musically.

AT EITHER END of his repertory stand the two Viennese schools. Yesterday gave us Schubert's Ninth Symphony on one side — and since there's a total absence of Baroque music, Schubert and Mozart are as far back as we go — and on the other Webern's "Six Pieces," Opus 6 — which is compositionally the most modern music to be heard, though there are scores by more contemporary figures, to be sure.

Sandwiched between these poles were the Beethoven overture and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," all adding up to an admittedly unimaginative program (structured, incidentally, in a less than ideal way; why not have the three smaller works before the break, the Schubert alone afterwards?), but one that was solid and free of gimmicks.

In an obvious way, Steinberg stands as a foil to his predecessor, Erich Leinsdorf. While Leinsdorf most often seemed to favor a light approach and tried to make his music airy and the end in elegance, Steinberg digs into his scores for all their sonic worth.

AND YESTERDAY his conducting at its best was alert and rhythmically potent and crudely forceful — as it often was in the outer movements of the Schubert and for much of the Strauss.

But by and large his work was lacking a vital pulse and drive; what was left was heavy-handed, rough, unpolished. Phrasing was workaday — how ordinary, for instance were the wind solos at the start of the Schubert's first two movements — and for all the gut excitement it could generate, Steinberg's conducting stayed on the surface and didn't have much in the way of intellectual fodder.

Though the big pieces were somewhat disappointingly sprawling, their over-all shape not clearly articulated, the smaller ones, those miniatures by Webern, got very respectable performances indeed. Steinberg led the American premiere of these pieces with the Pittsburgh Symphony in 1957, and yesterday his readings were flexible, well-paced and sympathetic.

It's a performance that will settle down more firmly under the musicians' fingers in subsequent concerts, but even with some tentativeness and less than perfect execution, the Opus 6 made a good deal of sense and gave a small measure of distinction to a concert that was in too many ways routine.

TONIGHT AT 8.30

WILLIAM STEINBERG

Beethoven: 'Consecration of the House' Overture
Schubert: Symphony No. 9
Webern: Six pieces Op. 6
Strauss: 'Till Eulenspiegel'

A limited number of 'Rush Seats', at $1 each, for this evening, goes on sale two hours before the concert.

SYMPHONY HALL
266-1492
BALDWIN PIANO/RCA RECORDS

Steinberg Gets Mixed Reviews

BOSTON (UPI) — William Steinberg has launched into his career as Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with mixed reviews.

Michael Steinberg of the Boston Globe called Steinberg's first concert Friday "a generally soggy and undistinguished start . . ."

George Gelles of the Herald Traveler said, ". . . by and large his work was lacking a vital pulse and drive; what was left was heavy handed, rough, unpolished."

However, L. David Harris of the Boston Record American called Steinberg's debut "excellent."

Steinberg comes to Boston from the Pittsburgh Symphony, where he will spend half his time in the coming seasons. He replaces Erich Leinsdorf at Boston.

HERALD NEWS
FALL RIVER, MASS.
(E) 41,966

SEP 27 1969

ENTERPRISE & TIMES
BROCKTON, MASS.
(E) 53,254

SEP 27 1969

MUSIC

BOSTON SYMPHONY — Subscriptions are now available for the 89th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra opening Sept. 30 in Symphony Hall. Subscription prices range from $59 to $10, and are available through the Symphony office, Symphony Hall, Boston.

TIMES
GLOUCESTER, MASS.
(E) 10,850

SEP 27 1969

2.

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Friday afternoon September 26 1969 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening September 27 1969 at 8.30
Tuesday evening September 30 1969 at 8.30
Thursday evening October 2 1969 at 8.30
Monday evening October 6 1969 at 8 o'clock at the University of New Hampshire Field House

WILLIAM STEINBERG conductor

BEETHOVEN — Overture to 'The consecration of the house' op. 124

SCHUBERT — Symphony no. 9 in C*
Andante – allegro ma non troppo
Andante con moto
Scherzo
Finale

intermission

WEBERN — Six pieces for orchestra op. 6
Langsam (Slowly)
Bewegt (With movement)
Mässig (Moderately)
Sehr mässig (Very moderately)
Sehr langsam (Very slowly)
Langsam (Slowly)

STRAUSS — Till Eulenspiegels lustige Streiche op. 28*

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

SEP 27 1969

William Steinberg conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood

Whitestone

Steinberg Launches New Season at BSO

By GEORGE GELLES
HT Music Critic

It's official. At five past two yesterday afternoon, William Steinberg strode to the podium of Symphony Hall, acknowledged the applause of his audience and orchestra, gave the downbeat of Beethoven's "Consecration of the House" and in so doing started his reign as Music Director of the Boston Symphony, the 14th since the orchestra was founded in 1881.

Steinberg, dividing his duties between Boston and the Pittsburgh Symphony, will this season conduct half the weekend series here. With his first program he both defined the stylistic limits in which he will work and showed us pretty much what we can expect musically.

AT EITHER END of his repertory stand the two Viennese schools. Yesterday gave us Schubert's Ninth Symphony on one side — and since there's a total absence of Baroque music, Schubert and Mozart are as far back as we go — and on the other Webern's "Six Pieces," Opus 6 — which is compositionally the most modern music to be heard, though there are scores by more contemporary figures, to be sure.

Sandwiched between these poles were the Beethoven overture and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," all adding up to an admittedly unimaginative program (structured, incidentally, in a less than ideal way; why not have the three smaller works before the break, the Schubert alone afterwards?), but one that was solid and free of gimmicks.

In an obvious way, Steinberg stands as a foil to his predecessor, Erich Leinsdorf. While Leinsdorf most often seemed to favor a light approach and tried to make his music airy and the end in elegance, Steinberg digs into his scores for all their sonic worth.

AND YESTERDAY his conducting at its best was alert and rhythmically potent and crudely forceful — as it often was in the outer movements of the Schubert and for much of the Strauss.

But by and large his work was lacking a vital pulse and drive; what was left was heavy-handed, rough, unpolished. Phrasing was workaday — how ordinary, for instance were the wind solos at the start of the Schubert's first two movements — and for all the gut excitement it could generate, Steinberg's conducting stayed on the surface and didn't have much in the way of intellectual fodder.

Though the big pieces were somewhat disappointingly sprawling, their over-all shape not clearly articulated, the smaller ones, those miniatures by Webern, got very respectable performances indeed. Steinberg led the American premiere of these pieces with the Pittsburgh Symphony in 1957, and yesterday his readings were flexible, well-paced and sympathetic.

It's a performance that will settle down more firmly under the musicians' fingers in subsequent concerts, but even with some tentativeness and less than perfect execution, the Opus 6 made a good deal of sense and gave a small measure of distinction to a concert that was in too many ways routine.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

TONIGHT AT 8.30

WILLIAM STEINBERG

Beethoven: 'Consecration of the House' Overture
Schubert: Symphony No. 9
Webern: Six pieces Op. 6
Strauss: 'Till Eulenspiegel'

A limited number of 'Rush Seats', at $1 each, for this evening, goes on sale two hours before the concert.

SYMPHONY HALL
266-1492
BALDWIN PIANO/RCA RECORDS

Steinberg Takes BSO Helm

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

THE BOSTON Symphony Orchestra set out on its 89th annual season yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall in Boston under a new skipper. William Steinberg, who has appeared as guest conductor of the orchestra many times in the past several years, made his first appearance as the orchestra's musical director succeeding Erich Leinsdorf, who had held the post for the past seven years.

* * *

IF CONDUCTORS may be classified as of one tradition or another, Steinberg, Leinsdorf's senior by more than a decade, nevertheless came under some of the same influences and contacts his predecessor enjoyed. Both derived great benefits from the tutelage of Toscanini. The two preceding musical directors, Charles Munch and Serge Koussevitzky, were of an ultramontane school which had its roots in France by way of Russia.

One concert heard by radio broadcast does not make a season and, to be sure, there was no anticipation of a tremendous change and approach to the repertory. Steinberg did not make any bid for easy popularity with a Beethoven overture, "The Consecration of the House," the Schubert hour-long C major symphony, the 13-minute "Six Pieces" of Webern, and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel."

* * *

THE C-MAJOR half of the program had vitality and contrast. After intermission, he left the third decade of the 19th symphony and came to the decades which close the year 1900. Steinberg introduced the 1909 Webern "Pieces" to America in 1957. No one of the six exceeds 30 measures unless you include the seven bars of percussive introduction to the funeral march. They represent the disintegration of melody, harmony, rythm and tone-color. Webern relented a bit in the following years.

IN 1895 "TILL" was pretty bold music. It still is, happily. The orchestra played with virtuosity. One couldn't be sure whether the air distorted intonation, but Steinberg at this point no longer needs to prove himself. Every conductor, granted a sufficient term of office, brings a new repertory and the orchestra very often gets, or takes, a fresh injection of esprit de corps with a new man. From here it looks like a calm sea and a prosperous voyage.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 33,180

SEP 27 1969

SYMPHONY OPENS SEASON — By L. DAVID HARRIS

Great Steinberg Debut

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its 89th concert season yesterday with a celebration of sounds—the grandeur of the classics, the richness of the Romantics and the new tones and rhythms of 20th century music.

It was an excellent debut for Conductor William Steinberg, now music director of both the Boston and Pittsburgh Symphonies. The orchestra responded to his direction with music that was articulate, yet emotional; extremely well paced and balanced and exceptionally exhilarating particularly in its Schubert and Strauss offerings.

Steinberg, himself, was impressive and the orchestra followed him well. In most cases he showed less emotion and flamboyancy than do many symphony conductors. Brilliant, emotional passages of music often only brought the barest conducting gestures; occasionally, a foot would rise, an arm would flail — but essentially this was not his style.

As the audience saw it, Steinberg let the music speak its richness and emotions for itself. And the music spoke—and it was heard and appreciated.

The concert was well programmed and included works by Beethoven, Schubert, Webern and Strauss. It will be repeated today at 2 p. m.; tomorrow, Tuesday and Thursday at 8:30 p. m., and Oct 6 at 2 p. m. at the University of New Hampshire Field House.

Beethoven's "Overture to 'The Consecration of the House'" provided a meaningful, if not sentimental, opening to the concert and the season. The piece was the first performed at the orchestra's first concert in the Music Hall in 1881. It again was performed on the orchestras's 50th anniversary.

Perhaps the high point of the concert was Schubert's "Symphony No. 9 in C," which was distinguished by tremendous orchestral climaxes, rich harmonies and extended almost-lyrical melodies, which occasionally were almost obscured (such as in the third "Scherzo" movement) by the fascinatingly varied rhythms and patterns often accompanying them.

The symphony also was distinguished by its contrasts, particularly exceptionally performed passages by strings and woodwinds in the second "Andate con moto" moveemnt.

Echoes — but not images — of Schoenberg came to life with Webern's "Six Pieces for Orchestra" — almost vignette offerings that were a superb listening experience — and an excellent contrast to the closing Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegels lustige Streiche."

Whereas Webern's music was ethereal, fragile, Strauss' tone poem brought many of the same musical ideas to the fore with brazen, tremendous force—yet both were fine to hear in their own ways.

The orchestra gave "Till Eulenspiegel" a nice once-upon-a-time effect, then glowingly showed off its violin and horn sections in the work's two basic motives. It was a piece to be heard, remembered — bold, crackling with sounds and rhythms.

But so was the concert. And the season begins.

William Steinberg, new music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts orchestra during his first concert at Symphony Hall.
Record American Photo. Kevin Cole

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.

SEP 27 1969

Steinberg Gets Mixed Reviews

BOSTON (UPI) — William Steinberg has launched into his career as Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with mixed reviews.

Michael Steinberg of the Boston Globe called Steinberg's first concert Friday "a generally soggy and undistinguished start . . ."

George Gelles of the Herald Traveler said, ". . . by and large his work was lacking a vital pulse and drive; what was left was heavy handed, rough, unpolished."

However, L. David Harris of the Boston Record American called Steinberg's debut "excellent."

Steinberg comes to Boston from the Pittsburgh Symphony, where he will spend half his time in the coming seasons. He replaces Erich Leinsdorf at Boston.

HERALD NEWS
FALL RIVER, MASS.
(E) 41,976

SEP 27 1969

ENTERPRISE & TIMES
BROCKTON, MASS.
(E) 53,256

SEP 27 1969

MUSIC

BOSTON SYMPHONY — Subscriptions are now available for the 89th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra opening Sept. 30 in Symphony Hall. Subscription prices range from $59 to $10, and are available through the Symphony office, Symphony Hall, Boston.

TIMES
GLOUCESTER, MASS.
(E) 10,850

SEP 27 1969

FIRST APPEARANCE as permanent conductor of the Boston Symphony is made by William Steinberg, as orchestra members rise to greet him. (Ted Dully Photo)

Steinberg Debuts With Symphony

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Staff

Except for a sharply characterized and amusing "Till Eulenspiegel" at the end of the program, the William Steinberg years at the Boston Symphony got off to a generally soggy and undistinguished start Friday afternoon.

The audience rose to greet Steinberg when he appeared on stage to begin his first concert as music director of the orchestra whose guest conductor he has been on a number of occasions since 1960.

Later, though, the applause was polite rather than enthusiastic.

The program was oddly put together. Its first part —Beethoven's "Consecration of the House" and the Schubert 9th—of excessive length and weight, was was emphasized by the clumsy planning that put a long and assertive C major symphony right after a long and assertive overture in the same key.

The second part—Webern's Six Pieces and the Strauss tone poem—was very short.

STEINBERG Page 9

Steinberg—new man for BSO

★ STEINBERG
Continued from Page 1

The Beethoven Overture is a strange piece and a great one, a highly formalized Handelian style exercise, yet with an almost ferocious intensity of invention within the bounds Beethoven thus set himself.

In performance, it wants not just drive and grandeur, a difficult combination anyhow, but the utmost in clarity of texture and finesse of accent.

Steinberg provided the drive, but his reading was somehow generalized, almost coarse, so that not much sense of character came across.

CONDUCTOR WILLIAM STEINBERG
. . . relaxing after concert (Ted Dully Photo)

Schubert's Symphony went much as it had when Steinberg had conducted it a week earlier at the start of the season of the Pittsburgh Symphony where he is also Music Director.

It was generally straightforward, mostly on the slow and heavy side, rather under-characterized and under-articulated, neither refined nor imaginative in the treatment of orchestral sonority, but perverse only in the insistence on imposing a slow ending on the first movement, an interpretive touch that drastically falsified Schubert's dramatic intentions.

The Boston performance was a little less lively than the Pittsburgh, especially in the Trio and finale.

The Boston orchestra is the more virtuosic and flexible in most ways; the horn and trombone playing was better in Pittsburgh, though, and Pittsburgh seems generally more alert and disciplined about intonation.

The Webern did have character, a clearer sense, that is, than in many performances of the differences among the six movements, but a performance rather more accurate in its details would have had more character still.

I am puzzled by Steinberg's choice of the 1928 version in which the 1909 scoring for very large orchestra is reduced to a more normal instrumentation.

To be sure, the differences between the two are subtle, but the 1928 edition is a makeshift and a compromise, and I cannot imagine a good reason why the conductor of an orchestra like the Boston Symphony, that has the resources to play the original, would turn instead to the revision.

In "Till Eulenspiegel," too, the playing was often rough, but the performance had a strong and natural sense of continuity, along with plenty of humor and delight in the details of Strauss' exuberant imagery.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA: William Steinberg conducting Beethoven: Overture, "The Consecration of the House;" Schubert: Symphony No. 9 in C major; Webern: Six Pieces for Orchestra, Op. 6 (1928 version); Strauss: "Till Eulenspiegel." Friday afternoon in Symphony Hall, opening concert of the orchestra's 89th season.

THE CRITICS—SYMPHONY PATRONS LEAVE SYMPHONY HALL AFTER NEW CONDUCTOR'S DEBUT (Ted Dully Photo)

GLOBE
BOSTON, MA
(M) 237,
(S) 506,
SEP 1969
694,700

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette
Sun-Telegraph
D. 243,038 SAT. 232,767
SEP 27 1969

Symphony Greets New Director

Boston Music Season Opened by Steinberg

By DONALD STEINFIRST
Post-Gazette Music Critic

BOSTON, Sept. 26—The eighty-ninth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened this afternoon at Symphony Hall with a noticeable difference for the first time in seven years. The orchestra has a new musical director. William Steinberg, musical director of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra.

To direct two major symphony orchestras six hundred miles apart is an awesome prospect and Steinberg will need the physical strength of a lion, the spiritual strength of Moses and the patience of Job.

Steinberg

Predominantly feminine Friday afternoon audience gave Steinberg an affectionate greeting when he arrived on the stage and rose when the orchestra did to welcome the new conductor.

Will Divide Duties

Steinberg is as much musical director of Boston as he is Pittsburgh.

He will select his own programs as well as those of his guest conductors and handle whatever changes are to be made in the orchestra personnel with the management, the musicians union and directors.

He will conduct twelve out of the symphony's 24 standard pairs in the various out-of-town series in New York, Providence, Baltimore, etc. In Pittsburgh, he will conduct 11 of the 24 pairs as well as take the orchestra on tours so that the director's tasks will be about divided between the two cities.

Steinberg's program here will include the overture, Consecration of the House of Beethoven, a jubilant piece of dubious worth, but which was probably an augury of the new directors reign, Shubert's C Major Symphony, which was heard at last week's opening concerts in Pittsburgh; Webern Six Pieces for Orchestra; and, finally, Strauss' Till Eulenspiegel, which is being played in Pittsburgh this week.

Making the acquaintance of the Boston Symphony in its own accoustically superb hall is a pleasure not to be discounted. The Shubert symphony seemed even longer than usual and, while I often think it could go on forever and would make everyone happy, the symphony did seem to be overlong. Steinberg and the Boston Symphony Orches- often and this jointure was re- tra have made music together flected in the Shubert which was smooth and without error.

Sophisticated Audiences

The audiences of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are sophisticated and knowing in the ways of contemporary music if indeed Webern can be called modern. I saw only 4 or 5 persons leaving the hall during the playing of the six pieces which, after all, are over 50 yeas old. To be precise about the six pieces, it was my impression that Steinberg and the orchestra played them all with delicacy. A very light hand evoked admiration if not a great deal of sympathy.

In order to make a plane to reach Syria Mosque in time for last night's concert I heard only the start of the Till, but it started brightly and I have no doubt that this familiar piece went well.

The critics here are not very happy about the concert. Michael Steinberg of the Boston Globe will say this morning that, except for the amusingly characterized Till, it was the soggiest and generally most undistinguished concert he has ever heard the Boston Symphony play.

4.

Greeting guests at Thursday night's Symphony Hall reception were, seated from right, the guest of honor, William Steinberg, new B.S.O. director, Mrs. Francis Sargent, wife of the governor, and Talcott M. Banks, president of the B.S.O. trustees.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

SEP 27 1969

A director and a gift come to Symphony Hall

By Louis Snyder

On the eve of its season's opening, the Boston Symphony revealed two proud new acquisitions Thursday afternoon at Symphony Hall—its new music director, William Steinberg, and the announcement of a $180,000 gift for its youth concerts from the Frederick J. Kennedy Memorial Foundation.

Although Mr. Steinberg is not scheduled to meet the press officially until Oct. 1, he was presented by Talcott M. Banks, president of the orchestra's board of trustees, to representatives of news media who had gathered for details of the Kennedy gift.

Mayor Kevin White also arrived to offer his congratulations to the orchestra on signing Mr. Steinberg, and to express Boston's appreciation of the foundation's three-year grant, which will permit 5,100 children from the city's public schools, many of whom have never been to Symphony Hall, to attend three concerts a year. The gift also provides for a week at Tanglewood, the orchestra's country home, during the coming summer for 320 of these children.

Representing Mrs. Audrey Kennedy, who established the fund in memory of her father, Harry W. Anderson, the foundation's treasurer, cited the community aim of the gift, and William Ohrenberger, superintendent of Boston's schools, spoke particularly of the benefits derived from youth concerts by disadvantaged children. Also expressing his gratitude was Harry Ellis Dickson, conductor since 1958 of Youth Concerts at Symphonay Hall, an affiliated organization of the BSO, which now presents four series of three programs each.

900 handclasps

Later in the afternoon, Mr. Steinberg was the guest of honor at a reception given by the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony in the lobbies and corridors of Symphony Hall.

Acceptances were sent by more than 800 friends, but more than 900 came to shake hands with the new music director and with Mr. Banks, who were joined on the receiving line at varying times by Mayor White, Mrs. Francis W. Sargent, wife of the Governor, and Mrs. Albert Goodhue and Mrs. John L. Grandin, Jr., cochairmen of the council.

There were refreshments before, after, and during the waiting-on-line period to meet Mr. Steinberg, and everyone seemd so glad to see everyone else in these familiar surroundings that time passed very quickly. Members of the orchestra were also among the guests, and were greeted like the old friends they are. Then too, there were those subscribers who felt they couldn't wait for the first concert to sit in their accustomed seats, so the hall was dotted with regulars, just becoming acclimated again.

Further preparation for the season's concerts was assured by the announcement that the symphony's program editor, Andrew Raeburn, would succeed the late Prof. G. Wallace Woodworth as commentator on its radio programs.

New Baton for Boston

William Steinberg began his career with the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday at an age (70) when most men have passed the time for new ventures.

But given Mr. Steinberg's extraordinary record as an indefatigable and peripatetic conductor, his appetite for new responsibilities is not surprising.

Mr. Steinberg was, by conductors' standards, a young man (39) when Arturo Toscanini invited him to the United States as his associate. He immediately established a reputation for musical ability and industriousness, making guest engagements with the nation's major orchestras and with the San Francisco Opera. He was named music director of the Buffalo Philharmonic in 1945 and music director of the Pittsburgh Symphony in 1952.

His musical excursions since then have been amazing. Between 1958 and 1960 he commuted 3500 miles across the Atlantic to direct the activities of both the Pittsburgh Symphony and the London Philharmonic. In 1964 he took his Pittsburgh musicians to Europe for three months, returned to double as principal guest conductor of the New York Philharmonic and also directed productions at the Metropolitan Opera.

Since then he has traveled extensively, keeping guest engagements in Europe and in 1967 touring the United States with the Israel Philharmonic.

When the Boston Symphony found it had an impending vacancy in the directorship and began to look for a conductor of stature, Mr. Steinberg's seasoned musicianship and unflagging energy for labor and travel made him a likely choice. We hope he enjoys his association with the Boston Symphony and inspires it to new heights of performance for the enjoyment of all.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 218,305 • (S) 228,557

SEP 27 1969

The Boston Globe Saturday, September 27, 1969

Steinberg at Symphony

MARJORIE SHERMAN
Globe Staff

All Symphony Hall—and that's Omnia Gallia for Boston on 24 Friday afternoons a year-was divided in three parts yesterday afternoon for the 89th Fall gathering of the faithful, to whose communion with Beethoven, Brahms and Bach is added a rarity-comething new.

Music Director William Steinberg was about to turn his well-seasoned back on his first official B.S.O. congregation.

The buzz of reunion, as one of the world's most privileged audiences betook themselves to their longtime locations (Boston Symphony ushers are strictly for visitors), had three distinct divisions.

First place went to those who could make delightful intimate references to Mr. Steinberg's Tanglewood appearances with exquisite Mme. Serge Koussevitzky. She's the widow of the B.S.O.'s most fabulous conductor who established Tanglewood, Berkshire's Summer home of the Boston Symphony and one of the world's finest music centers.

Considerable distinction also went to those yesterday who could make cozy references to Thursday's handsome turnout for the Council of Friends' "Happy Boston to you, dear Mr. Steinberg." ("My dear, have you ever seen so many people you knew? I mean, everyone was there. Such a sweet man, he really took time over names, and he shook hands for hours.")

And statistics show that the new man in Boston's music life did just that. Standing a story-and-a-half above the corner of Huntington and Massachusetts avs. in the corner of the Symphony Gallery the smiling, tireless "musician's musician," as the orchestra already hails him, gave a firm warm hand to 900 constituents.

The party was momentous as anything is that combines the guidance of Fran Fahnestock, Betsy Goodhue, Susanne Grandin and those other gals on the Women's Council. The Council will be resuming its lustrous luncheons which are roses-and-wine elegancies at Horticultural Hall before at least four of the Friday concerts.

For those who had not met Mr. Steinberg until yesterday's Beethoven Overture, it was a benign afternoon of favorites like Shubert and Weber and Strauss. The genuine appreciation, quite vociferous for mannerly Boston, one hopes may compensate for the little leisure left to this man for the next two seasons, since in addition to Boston he is full-time director of the Pittsburgh Symphony.

Not that this is anything new. Mr. Steinberg combined the London Philharmonic concert with his Pittsburgh duties for several years.

Boston will seem next door.

B.S.O.'s Steinberg is greeted by Mrs. William Gratick, an admirer of his from Buffalo, N.Y., where he once conducted.
ELLIS HERWIG PHOTOS

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
TONIGHT AT 8.30
WILLIAM STEINBERG
Beethoven: 'Consecration of the House' Overture
Schubert: Symphony no. 9
Webern: Six pieces op. 6
Strauss: 'Till Eulenspiegel'
A limited number of 'Rush Seats' at $1 each, for this evening, goes on sale two hours before the concert.
SYMPHONY HALL
266-1492
BALDWIN PIANO/RCA RECORDS

MONITOR THEATERGOERS
Since Monitor entertainment advertising is meant to be informative, its appearance does not necessarily imply Monitor endorsement. For information on productions endorsed in the Monitor watch the daily columns for reviews and refer to the Monitor Movie Guide which appears every Wednesday.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
TONIGHT AT 8.30
WILLIAM STEINBERG
Beethoven: 'Consecration of the House' Overture
Schubert: Symhony no. 9
Webern: Six pieces op. 6
Strauss: 'Till Eulensipiegel'
A limited number of 'Rush Seats' at $1 each, for this evening, goes on sale two hours before the concert.
SYMPHONY HALL
BALDWIN PIANO RCA RECORDS

The Pittsburgh Press
D. 346,090 SUN. 744,732

SEP 28 1969

Scribes Put Conductor In Famed Company

Steinberg Debut Panned By Critics In Boston

By CARL APONE
Press Music Editor

BOSTON — At age 70, a time when most men are rocking gently in their rocking chairs, conductor William Steinberg is rocking enthusiastically on the podiums of orchestras in Pittsburgh and Boston.

But after making his debut as music director here Friday, one could hardly blame Dr. Steinberg if he preferred to be back in friendly Pittsburgh sitting in a rocking chair.

Critics of Boston's leading newspapers were sharply critical of Dr. Steinberg's debut. Indeed, it was the harshest, and most severe criticism in memory.

New York critics, considered the most influential in the nation, are generally highly favorable toward Steinberg and so are critics in other leading cities around the world.

'Soggy Start But not Boston

Michael Steinberg, of the Globe (heaven's no, he is no relation to the conductor) put it this way:

"Except for a sharply characterized and amusing 'Till Eulenspiegel' .. the William Steinberg years at the Boston Symphony got off to a generally soggy and undistinguished start..."

The capacity audience rose to greet Steinberg when he appeared on stage to begin the concert, but later, "The applause was polite rather than enthusiastic," critic Steinberg wrote.

The program, in addition to "Till Eulenspiegel," included Beethoven's "Consecration of the House," and the Schubert Symphony No. 9.

Critic Steinberg, who heard the Pittsburgh Symphony play the Schubert in Pittsburgh last week, said the work went much the same here.

Musicians Included

He called it "on the slow and heavy side, rather under-characterized and under-articulated, neither refined nor imaginative."

If the musicians in the Boston orchestra thought all fire would be directed at Steinberg they were wrong. Critic Steinberg called the Boston playing "a little less lively than the Pittsburgh."

George Gelles, Boston Herald Traveler critic, also had some harsh words about Steinberg's debut. He called it an 'unimaginative program" but admitted it was "free of gimmicks."

When Steinberg's conducting was at its best it was "alert and rhythmically potent and crudely forceful . . . but by and large his work was lacking a vital pulse and drive; and what was left was heavy-handed, rough, unpolished."

There is a strong sense of history in Boston, and Dr. Steinberg is the 14th music director since the orchestra was founded in 1881.

If Dr. Steinberg is upset by what the critics wrote, which is doubtful, he would do well to take a long look at Boston's literary and journalistic past.

Boston scribes have a tradition of being crabby, mean and provincial.

Back in the mid-19th Century when Boston intellectuals considered themselves the "hub of the universe," the story is told of one literary critic who even refused to read Shakespeare because the Bard wasn't from Boston.

When the critic finally did read Shakespeare he gave what he thought was a tribute, admitting there were not three writers in Boston who could write as well as Shakespeare.

In more recent years, Boston sportswriters have scorched sports figures. Back in the days when Casey Stengel was manager of the hapless old Braves, he was hit by a truck and his leg broken.

Driver Congratulated

One Boston scribe congratulated the truck driver for his contribution to Boston baseball.

The Boston writers wrote just as harshly of baseball's immortal Ted Williams. And he often threatened to crack their skulls with a baseball bat.

If Dr. Steinberg wishes to thrash the present critics with a baton, he need only remember that Shakespeare, Stengel and Williams did very well without praise from local writers.

And there is good reason to believe Dr. Steinberg will do the same.

The venerable home of the Boston orchestra, Symphony Hall, is clearly this nation's finest sounding concert hall. The orchestra sounds are clear, clean and crisp.

After hearing the sound one visiting Pittsburgh orchestra official noted "We lose 40 per cent of our sound in Syria Mosque."

Despite the fine sound of the hall, the stiff, straight-back leather seats haven't been replaced since the hall was opened in 1900.

They are so uncomfortable they seem to have been designed by Puritan priest Cotton Mather as a means of keeping the congregation awake during his long sermons.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
SEP 28 1969

Not enough new

What symphony lacks

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Staff

There are some fresh things I am glad to see on the Boston Symphony's programs ~~for the 1969-70~~ season: Haydn's Symphonies 55 and 98 (the former new to the BSO, the latter not as rare as all that, but still too rare), Elgar's two symphonies and his Cello Concerto, "Three Places in New England" by Ives (not played at the BSO since 1948), at last Berg's Altenberg Songs and a piece of recent Stravinsky, the Huxley Variations, Toru Takemitsu's "November Steps No. 1," the Liszt "Faust" Symphony, Webern's Five Pieces, Op. 10 (played last season, but rare enough for their quick reappearance to be very much justified), Franco Donatoni's "Puppenspiel No. 2," the 2nd Symphony by Michael Tippett, the Reger Mozart Variations, "Paris" by Delius, Three Pieces by Seymour Shifrin, and something as yet unspecified by Gunther Schuller that I hope might turn out to be the interesting "Triplum."

It is not really enough, though. Above all, I am bothered by the Boston Symphony's continued timidity about offering its audiences some notion of contemporary, that is, with-the-times music. Yes, I am grateful for the Huxley Variations, for the Donatoni, and so forth, but all that is going to amount to at most is an hour's music for the whole season. On paper, the programs contain several names of 20th century composers, but to play "Petrushka," the concert excerpts from "Wozzeck," Bartok's Music for Strings, Percussion, and Celesta, or his 2nd Piano Concerto, Webern's Six Pieces, Op. 6, is like playing the Schubert 9th and "Till Eulenspiegel." Those are acknowledged, established, and much played classics. ment, the appearance of works by composers like Robert Starer, Benjamin Lees, Nikolai Lopatnikoff, Ernst Toch and Carl Orff is tokenism. Samuel Barber and William Walton are composers who have written interesting music of an exceedingly conservative stamp, but "Die Natali" and "Belshazzar's Feast" do not represent them at their best.

Meanwhile it would be a responsible and appropriate action for the Boston Symphony to let its audiences know about the orchestral music of, for example, Milton Babbitt, Luciano Berio, Pierre Boulez, Roberto Gerhard, Alexander Goehr, Andrew Imbrie, Ingvar Lidholm, Gyorgy Ligeti, Donald Martino, Salvatore Martirano, Luigi Nono, Krzysztof Penderecki, Nikos Skalkottas, Karlheinz Stockhausen, Iannis Xenakis, to name just a few, all key figures in recent music or highly regarded in the profession, whose music never has been played by the orchestra.

I point out, too, that the Boston Symphony has not played Berg's Chamber Concerto nor even the Seven Early Songs; that it has played Britten's Spring Symphony only at Tanglewood, 20 years ago at that, and other fine works of his, including "Illuminations," the Serenade, and the Nocturne, not at all; that Dallapiccola has been scandalously neglected, with "Canti di prigonia" and "Canti di liberazione" particularly due for a hearing (a more urgent priority, I should think, than yet another Boston performance of "Carmina burana"); that the 2d, 4th, and 5th Symphonies of Bohuslav Martinu have not been played, the 4th being especially fine work; that the Nielsen 4th has not been done; that the only representative work of Petrassi's on a Boston Symphony program was the Concerto for Orchestra No. 5, 14 years ago; that Carl Ruggles, one of the most individual figures in American music, had had only performances of "Portals" in 1965, and one of "Sun Treader" in 1966, but not in Boston; that there are important pieces by Schoenberg yet unplayed at these concerts, including "Erwartung," the Songs, Op. 22, "Kol Nidre," "Ode to Napoleon," the "Genesis" Prelude, the Cello Concerto after Monn, and the Concerto Grosso after Handel, and, for that matter, that "Pelleas and Melisande" has not been played by the orchestra since 1934, that the Symphony has played no major work by Roger Sessions since 1957 (and, parenthetically that the performance of the 3d Symphony then was butchery); that Stravinsky's "Flood," Movements, "Sermon, Narrative, and Prayer," and "Threni," have not been heard; that until "Deserts" was done last season, not a note of Varese had been played; that Webern's Five Pieces for Strings, Op. 5, his Symphony, his Cantatas, and even his luminous transcription of Bach's six-voice Ricercare from The Musical Offering, have not yet appeared on Boston Symphony programs.

On another plane of compositional achieve-

Now, I am aware that much of the Boston Symphony's subscription audience would be happy to continue not to know most of that music. Some of the music probably would not please; much of it, I am certain, would find an interested audience. I know that much of that music is difficult, therefore time-consuming, therefore expensive to prepare.

The fact is, though, that the Symphony has to all intents a monopoly in Boston on professional performance of music for large orchestra. With monopoly goes responsibility (ask the telephone company). There are things that the Boston Symphony ought to be doing and that it is not doing. My catalogue of complaints about repertory is specific, but it points to where the broader problems lie. But with all of the economic miseries and with all of the frictional drag produced by the subscription audience as it is now constituted, these problems are not insoluble, though their solution will want a willingness to question some hitherto basic assumptions about symphony orchestras and how they are run. In the next Sunday coumn I should like to explore the matter further.

Subsequent articles may be found on pages 117 & 121.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(S) 238,557.
SEP 28 1969

How Steinberg Got Where He Is

By GEORGE GELLES

William Steinberg is now among us as music director of the Boston Symphony, yet we've had no really satisfactory introduction.

The biographical gloss that he authorized is incomplete and dull as paint, while an appreciation written by a member of the Pittsburg press and widely circulated here made Steinberg seem like one of the original good guys.

Yet if we set all this aside and consider when he was born and what he first did we can come to a more honest understanding of the man.

HANS WILHELM STEINBERG received his artistic training during those years and in those cities that were musically most intense. Born five months before the new century, he studied in Cologne and upon graduation was named assistant to Otto Klemperer at the local opera. (It is Klemperer, in fact, fourteen years his senior, whose career Steinberg's most closely parallels).

Through the 20s and early 30s Steinberg was the model of the modern major Music Director. His first love was opera, and he was associated not only with the Cologne house, but with those in Prague and Frankfurt, at both of which he was Music Director, and Berlin, where his boss was Klemperer.

Just as his mentor was a champion of modern music in the Weimar Republic—Schoenberg's "Accompaniment to a Film Scene" and Hindemith's opera "Neuse vom Tage" are two world premieres to his credit—so Steinberg was a strong advocate of the new. He led the first Frankfurt production of Berg's "Wozzeck", for instance, and the first performances ever of Weill's "Mahagonny" and Schoenberg's "Von Heute auf Morgen".

BUT THE NAZI take-over in the early 30s altered the lives of both colleagues. Klemperer left Germany for Los Angeles in '33 after the Jewish personnel of the Staatsoper was dismissed, and in the same year Steinberg lost his posts at the state-supported houses in Berlin and Frankfurt. For the ensuing three seasons he organized and conducted the concerts of the Jewish Culture League in Frankfurt. Then he left.

His first stop was Palestine, where with the violin virtuoso Bronislav Huberman he founded what is now the Israel Philharmonic. Toscanini led the orchestra's inaugural in 1936 and came to know Steinberg's work well—so well, that two years later the German expatriate was invited to join the NBC Symphony as Associate Conductor.

FROM HERE on the story is well known. Steinberg guest conducted much on these shores, headed the Buffalo Philharmonic — while next door Erich Leinsdorf led the Rochester Philharmoic —and in '52 accepted the post of permanent conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony, an ensemble refurbished a few years earlier by Otto Klemperer.

Steinberg's story is fairly familiar in its outlines. Klemperer, as we see, followed a similar path, as did Leinsdorf and Fritz Reiner and Josef Krips (who succeeded Steinberg in Buffalo).

German opera trained these men, the political situation cost them their jobs, American concert halls became their new homes. To disregard the odyssey they made, to neglect, in particular, Steinberg's early years, is to miss a large part of what the man is all about.

The Heights, Boston College
Tuesday, Sept. 30, 1969

Steinberg plays Merry Pranks at BSO

By GAFFNEY J. FESKOE

At 2:05 p.m. Friday the lights of Symphony Hall dimmed, the orchestra tuned, the stage door opened, and the 12th Music Director of the Boston Symphony made his way slowly, solemnly and deliberately to the red-carpeted podium. It was clear that William Steinberg considered his new position "the supreme accolade of my career."

After receiving a standing ovation, the new Music Director began the 89th season of the BSO with Beethoven's Overture to the Consecration of the House – the same work which opened the first season of the Orchestra.

Steinberg's precise and deliberate style was broken by his rather unorthodox habit of stamping his left foot at a change of tempo. Another unorthodox characteristic was the arrangement of his program, which consisted of the Beethoven concert overture, Schubert's Symphony No 9 in C Anton von Webern's Six Pieces for Orchestra and Richard Strauss' Till Eulenspiegels lustige Streiche (Merry Pranks) – and played in that order.

The Beethoven overture, written in the sedate style of Mandel, was taken at a slow, broad tempo, which resulted in an orchestration of incomparable, solemn nobility. The clarity of Steinberg's beat was remarkable. He beat the four quarter bars of the overture in an unobscure, conventional manner with none of the gyrations of which some conductors are distinguished.

Steinberg's polished baton technique resulted in a performance of the Schubert symphony of unsurpassed precision, though it was a bit heavy. It was possible to hear each instrument individually of the 106-man ensemble – a rare quality of unison for which the acoustics of Symphony Hall were in no small way responsible.

The striking and clever atonal "Six Pieces for Orchestra," composed in 1909 by von Webern, consisted of six short orchestral sketches contrasted to one another. The pieces were marked "Langsam," or "slow." Webern used adverbs to describe his sketches in place of the customary adjectives: emphasis was placed on the flow of the music. Despite its seeming cacophony, atonal music demands more precision and control than most other forms. Steinberg's clarity of beat lent itself admirably to the task.

The final work on the program to round out this triptych of contrast was the colorful Till Eulenspiegels Merry Pranks of Strauss, a type of musical joke based on a fantasy story. An impish knave, portrayed by a wind instrument solos interrupts the more serious portion of the music. The oboe theme recurs throughout and lends color to the music. Steinberg's sedate conducting style gave way to a rich interpretation.

Steinberg's unfrivolous technique makes him capable of a wide range of interpretation. As the product of a solid and scholarly musicianship, he is eminently suited to be the BSO's Music Director.

6.

BSO's 89th season opens at Symphony Hall

With its new music director, William Steinberg, on the podium, "all the ideal elements for making music have been gathered together in one place" for the orchestra's first weekend concerts of the season.

Review: Page 6

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

SEP 29 1969

Whitestone Photo

William Steinberg

. . . began his tenure as the Boston Symphony's 14th music director at weekend concerts in Symphony Hall which opened the orchestra's 89th season.

BSO and Steinberg: reason to be proud

By Louis Snyder

Fortunate is the city with an orchestra like the Boston Symphony, a music director like William Steinberg, and a home to perform in like Symphony Hall. After Friday afternoon's opening concert, a newcomer from Mars (or even from Pittsburgh) would have to agree that all the ideal elements for making music have been gathered together in one place. Even though you may have heard the BSO in Carnegie Hall, at Tanglewood, or in Timbuktu, there is nothing like experiencing for the first time that sound in that hall, and now under these new directorial auspices. Bostonians have reason to be proud.

When Mr. Steinberg appeared on the stage of Symphony Hall on Friday for the first time in his new capacity as the orchestra's music director, its members and the audience stood to welcome and applaud him. And with the golden Beethoven plaque glowing on the proscenium arch above his head, he began his new association with the orchestra as the orchestra itself had begun its career in 1881—with Beethoven's overture "The Consecration of the House."

It is reported that, at his recent first meeting with the orchestra, Mr. Steinberg related that his first listening experience after his arrival in the United States in 1938 was a Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall. He confessed sitting with folded hands, hoping for some mishap to assure him that the sounds he was hearing were not of divine origin.

Melody-drenched

Now Mr. Steinberg is in a position to bring forth such sounds, and he did so in the Schubert Ninth Symphony which followed. In this magnificent, melody-drenched work, evidence was continuous of the rapport existing between the new music director and his musicians. In the matters of tempi, balances, and contrasts there was a give-and-take between conductor and instrumentalists onstage which produced, more than a brilliant musicianly performance, a memorable emotional experience.

With Webern's Six Pieces for Orchestra, the program entered the 20th century — a program happily devised, incidentally, to stimulate audience interest as well as to reveal strengths in musicians and conductor. It is hard to believe that these six engaging fragments of the "new sound" could have provoked a riot at their premiere in 1913—but of course they couldn't have been played with the virtuosity lavished on them on Friday by the BSO.

Strauss a la mode

As a kind of rich dessert, Strauss's 'Till Eulenspiegel" was served up a la mode. It once seemed so full of intriguing and dangerous ingredients, but as it turns out, they aren't bad for you at all.

The audience, obviously glad to be back in Symphony Hall, was generous in its reception of the program, its orchestra, and Mr. Steinberg. It is to be hoped that, in its polite enthusiasm, it does not take for granted the treasures it possesses.

During the season, musician-watchers in the audience will observe three new faces in the orchestra—two of them feminine. Ann Hobson has become second harpist, and Ikuko Mizuno is a new member of the second violin section, replacing Max Hobart, now moved to the first violins where he succeeds George Zazofsky, retiring after 30 years with the BSO. Miss Carol Procter is also missing from the cello section. She's spending a year with the Japan Philharmonic Symphony, while her place in the section is filled here by a gentleman from Japan, Hidenobu Tsuchida.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

SEP 28 1969

Two Concerts By Symphony This Week

The second pair of Friday/Saturday Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, Oct. 3 at 2 p.m. and Oct. 4 at 8:30 p.m., will be conducted by music director William Steinberg.

Joseph Silverstein and Jules Eskin, the orchestra's concertmaster and principal cellist respectively, will be soloists in the program's principal work, Robert Starer's Concerto for violin, cello and orchestra. Haydn's Symphony no. 55 opens the program and Elgar's Symphony no. 2 closes the program.

Robert Starer was born in Vienna on Jan. 8, 1924. He composed the triple concerto during the summer of 1967. After fleeing from his native Vienna in 1937 when the Germans came into power, Mr. Starer received training at the Jerusalem Conservatoire and the Julliard School of Music. He became an American citizen in 1957.

Among his principal works are four ballets, "The Dybbuk" (commissioned for the 1957 Berlin Festival), "Samson Agonistes", "Phaedra" and "The lady of the house of sleep" (all three commissioned by Martha Graham).

In addition he has composed piano and orchestral pieces, songs, choral pieces and opera.

Columbus Citizen-Journal
COLUMBUS, OHIO
D. 116,444

SEP 29 1969

Steinberg Rickenbacker

RICKENBACKER

Columbus native Capt. Eddie Rickenbacker says airports should be built far from the nation's big cities. The 79-year-old WW-I hereo is publicizing his autobigraphy "Rickenbacker."

FIRST YEAR

Portugal's Premier Marcelo Caetano has completed his first year in power since his predecessor Antonio de Oliveira Salazar became incapacitated.

DIRECTOR

William Steinberg has launched his career as director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with mixed reviews. Favorable reviews called his first performance excellent. Critics called it "heavy-handed, unpolished and generally soggy."

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901

SEP 30 1969

BSO Open Rehearsals

BOSTON — The Boston Symphony Orchestra is providing seven open rehearsals at 7:30 p.m. in Symphony Hall, when these conductors may be watched in informal action: Oct. 16, Steinberg; Oct. 30, Giulini; Nov. 13, Ozawa; Dec. 4, Leinsdorf; Jan. 22, Abbado, Feb. 12, Colin Davis; April 23, Steinberg.

Seats for the rehearsal series (all seats unreserved) are now available on a subscription basis at $17.50 and may be secured in person, by mail or phone, from Symphony Hall box office.

The Tokyo Junior Chamber of Commerce is attempting to establish an "International Artist Exchange Program." As the first step, it is cooperating this season in the exchange of Carol Procter, celliest of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Hidenobu Tsuchida, cellist of the Japan Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra. Other exchanges between these orchestras have occurred in recent seasons.

6.

BSO's 89th season opens at Symphony Hall

With its new music director, William Steinberg, on the podium, "all the ideal elements for making music have been gathered together in one place" for the orchestra's first weekend concerts of the season.

Review: Page 6

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

SEP 29 1969

Whitestone Photo

William Steinberg

. . . began his tenure as the Boston Symphony's 14th music director at weekend concerts in Symphony Hall which opened the orchestra's 89th season.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

SEP 28 1969

Two Concerts By Symphony This Week

The second pair of Friday/Saturday Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, Oct. 3 at 2 p.m. and Oct. 4 at 8:30 p.m., will be conducted by music director William Steinberg.

Joseph Silverstein and Jules Eskin, the orchestra's concertmaster and principal cellist respectively, will be soloists in the program's principal work, Robert Starer's Concerto for violin, cello and orchestra. Haydn's Symphony no. 55 opens the program and Elgar's Symphony no. 2 closes the program.

Robert Starer was born in Vienna on Jan. 8, 1924. He composed the triple concerto during the summer of 1967. After fleeing from his native Vienna in 1937 when the Germans came into power, Mr. Starer received training at the Jerusalem Conservatoire and the Julliard School of Music. He became an American citizen in 1957.

Among his principal works are four ballets, "The Dybbuk" (commissioned for the 1957 Berlin Festival), "Samson Agonistes", "Phaedra" and "The lady of the house of sleep" (all three commissioned by Martha Graham).

In addition he has composed piano and orchestral pieces, songs, choral pieces and opera.

Columbus Citizen-Journal
COLUMBUS, OHIO
D. 116,444

SEP 29 1969

Steinberg Rickenbacker

RICKENBACKER

Columbus native Capt. Eddie Rickenbacker says airports should be built far from the nation's big cities. The 79-year-old WW-I hereo is publicizing his autobigraphy "Rickenbacker."

FIRST YEAR

Portugal's Premier Marcelo Caetano has completed his first year in power since his predecessor Antonio de Oliveira Salazar became incapacitated.

DIRECTOR

William Steinberg has launched his career as director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with mixed reviews. Favorable reviews called his first performance excellent. Critics called it "heavy-handed, unpolished and generally soggy."

BSO and Steinberg: reason to be proud

By Louis Snyder

Fortunate is the city with an orchestra like the Boston Symphony, a music director like William Steinberg, and a home to perform in like Symphony Hall. After Friday afternoon's opening concert, a newcomer from Mars (or even from Pittsburgh) would have to agree that all the ideal elements for making music have been gathered together in one place. Even though you may have heard the BSO in Carnegie Hall, at Tanglewood, or in Timbuktu, there is nothing like experiencing for the first time that sound in that hall, and now under these new directorial auspices. Bostonians have reason to be proud.

When Mr. Steinberg appeared on the stage of Symphony Hall on Friday for the first time in his new capacity as the orchestra's music director, its members and the audience stood to welcome and applaud him. And with the golden Beethoven plaque glowing on the proscenium arch above his head, he began his new association with the orchestra as the orchestra itself had begun its career in 1881—with Beethoven's overture "The Consecration of the House."

It is reported that, at his recent first meeting with the orchestra, Mr. Steinberg related that his first listening experience after his arrival in the United States in 1938 was a Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall. He confessed sitting with folded hands, hoping for some mishap to assure him that the sounds he was hearing were not of divine origin.

Melody-drenched

Now Mr. Steinberg is in a position to bring forth such sounds, and he did so in the Schubert Ninth Symphony which followed. In this magnificent, melody-drenched work, evidence was continuous of the rapport existing between the new music director and his musicians. In the matters of tempi, balances, and contrasts there was a give-and-take between conductor and instrumentalists onstage which produced, more than a brilliant musicianly performance, a memorable emotional experience.

With Webern's Six Pieces for Orchestra, the program entered the 20th century — a program happily devised, incidentally, to stimulate audience interest as well as to reveal strengths in musicians and conductor. It is hard to believe that these six engaging fragments of the "new sound" could have provoked a riot at their premiere in 1913—but of course they couldn't have been played with the virtuosity lavished on them on Friday by the BSO.

Strauss a la mode

As a kind of rich dessert, Strauss's 'Till Eulenspiegel" was served up a la mode. It once seemed so full of intriguing and dangerous ingredients, but as it turns out, they aren't bad for you at all.

The audience, obviously glad to be back in Symphony Hall, was generous in its reception of the program, its orchestra, and Mr. Steinberg. It is to be hoped that, in its polite enthusiasm, it does not take for granted the treasures it possesses.

During the season, musician-watchers in the audience will observe three new faces in the orchestra—two of them feminine. Ann Hobson has become second harpist, and Ikuko Mizuno is a new member of the second violin section, replacing Max Hobart, now moved to the first violins where he succeeds George Zazofsky, retiring after 30 years with the BSO. Miss Carol Procter is also missing from the cello section. She's spending a year with the Japan Philharmonic Symphony, while her place in the section is filled here by a gentleman from Japan, Hidenobu Tsuchida.

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,907

SEP 30 1969

BSO Open Rehearsals

BOSTON — The Boston Symphony Orchestra is providing seven open rehearsals at 7:30 p.m. in Symphony Hall, when these conductors may be watched in informal action: Oct. 16, Steinberg; Oct. 30, Giulini; Nov. 13, Ozawa; Dec. 4, Leinsdorf; Jan. 22, Abbado, Feb. 12, Colin Davis; April 23, Steinberg.

Seats for the rehearsal series (all seats unreserved) are now available on a subscription basis at $17.50 and may be secured in person, by mail or phone, from Symphony Hall box office.

The Tokyo Junior Chamber of Commerce is attempting to establish an "International Artist Exchange Program." As the first step, it is cooperating this season in the exchange of Carol Procter, celliest of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Hidenobu Tsuchida, cellist of the Japan Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra. Other exchanges between these orchestras have occurred in recent seasons.

7

BSO's 89th year opens with less than dazzle

by Eleanor Weber

Is it kind, on the occasion of William Steinberg's first performance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra as its new Music Director, to come right out and say that the concert was (at best) merely competent, and (at worst) disappointingly dull? Probably not, but that's the way it was.

The musical puzzle at the Friday afternoon (Sept. 26) concert, it seems, was to decipher just exactly why the group wasn't "clicking." The program began, traditionally enough, with the overture to "The Consecration of the House" (op. 24) by Beethoven, the very first piece of music ever to be performed by the BSO when it began its first season at the Music Hall 'way back in Oct. 22, 1881. It was a pleasant, if musically predictable, piece, given lackluster performance possibly caused by tardy responses to his directions.

The main piece on the program, Schubert's "Symphony No. 9 in C," is a lush, expressive work, which demanded and usually got a solid concern for the richness of sound. The horns performed well, in their andante introduction and throughout the piece, and the strings maintained a light, accurate sense of rhythm particularly enjoyable at the end of the first and final movements. But it seemed awfully long (a few people even thought it was over after the scherzo and began scattered applause), which can probably be attributed to the somewhat heavy pace at which it was played.

Webern's "Six Pieces for Orchestra" (op. 6) came and went almost before it had a chance to impress and delight with its subtle semi-comments and contrasting violent percussive statements. This piece, incidentally, seemed to call forth the greatest attention and unity from the orchestra.

The program, which will be repeated Thursday, Oct. 2, concluded with a fun rendition of "Till Eulenspiegel" (op 28) by Strauss. Steinberg and his players were obviously enjoying the work's self-indulgent schmaltz and self-satisfied finale. In terms of sheer enjoyment—both by audience and performers—this piece was the most successful. But is this going to be the level, or the depth, of BSO's performances this year?

Although Steinberg first conducted the BSO in 1960, and appeared several times with the orchestra at Tangle in 1964, '67, and '68, some communication between them still seems to be lacking.

Steinberg is a somewhat stolid conductor. He uses sparse movements, often the same movement to indicate different demands, and conveys much of what he wants in the way of color by the expressions which constantly mold and re-mold his craggy face. The extent to which the BSO players actually watched him in Friday's concert was disappointing: many glanced at the conductor only when they themselves were not playing, thus often missing his desires for modification. Familiarity with some of the pieces on the program didn't actually breed contempt, but it did seem to foster indifference.

Perhaps this was just an off-afternoon. Perhaps Steinberg's sincere and intense desire to do well at the helm of the BSO worked perversely against him. Perhaps the players in the BSO shouldn't be expected to have both generated and mastered a smooth working relationship.

But this is a season which is going to see many guest conductors and many works of varied color and meaning. Will the BSO be the BSO be the BSO—a monolith of musicians— or will it be Ozawa's orchestra, Davis' orchestra—and prove that flexibility of sound and dynamism in performance are the real tests of professional excellence?

BOSTON AFTER DARK
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 7,555
OCT 1 1969

ITEM
LYNN, MASS.
(E) 38,000
OCT 2 1969

The second pair of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, tomorrow at 2 o'clock and Saturday at 8:30 p.m., will be conducted by the orchestra's music director William Steinberg. Joseph Silverstein and Jules Eskin, the orchestra's concertmaster and principal cellist respectively, will be soloists in the program's principal work, Robert Starer's Concerto for violin, cello and orchestra. Haydn's Symphony no. 55 opens the program and Elgar's Symphony no. 2 closes the program.

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,337
OCT 1 1969

The Sound of Music

Steinberg promises contemporary program

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Staff

More contemporary music, including some under the heading of avant-garde, will be played by the Boston Symphony in future, William Steinberg, the orchestra's new music director, promised yesterday.

At a Symphony Hall meeting, his first with members of the Boston press, Steinberg said that for himself he had made it a rule to conduct only that music with which he could "identify emotionally, sentimentally, and intellectually (if you pardon the expression)."

Declining to mention composers' names, Steinberg said that he had occupied himself at length with three recent pieces with a view to performing them this season, discovering, however, that he could find no such identification with any, and therefore dropping them from his programs.

Music, he said, has to be entertaining, "on the highest level, of course"; that is, its first requirement is that it not be boring. He does not mind having people dislike music he plays, nor having them express their distaste, but he does not want them to be bored, he said.

Was there music he was not interested in conducting, but felt that should be done? Steinberg mentioned Michael Tilson Thomas, the orchestra's new assistant conductor, a member of the younger generation — Thomas is 24 — and attuned to the newest music.

He said, too, that he hoped in future seasons he would have more success in persuading guest conductors to include such music on their programs, explaining that these men had very much their own ideas about what was appropriate for them to conduct at guest appearances with the Boston Symphony.

Finally, Steinberg added that he himself planned certainly to contribute to the number of performances of contemporary music here.

An orchestra, he said, has the obligation, among others, to inform audiences of what is in the repertory, and that definitely means the repertory, not only of a hundred years ago, but of today.

Steinberg also divulged some plans for Boston Symphony recordings for RCA this year. Schubert's C major Symphony, No. 9, had already been recorded. Scheduled to be recorded by him with the orchestra later in the season are Bruckner's Symphony No. 6; Mahler's Symphony No. 4 (recorded in 1960 by Erich Leinsdorf, but never released); a record of famous scherzi ("one of those recording company ideas," Steinberg said) to include "Till Eulenspiegel," the orchestral version of the Scherzo of Mendelssohn's Octet, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," and two pieces by Stravinsky; and Toch's Symphony No. 2 with Reger's Variations of a Theme by Mozart on the reverse side. (Steinberg: "This will be a best-seller. Why do you laugh?").

He himself has no time to listen to records. His favorite among his own earlier recordings with other orchestras? "'My Fair Lady.' This is a joke, of course."

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
OCT 2 1969

TAKE IT FROM THE TOP — William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is shown in an informal rehearsal session.

Changes At Symphony

By Peter M. Knapp

What may become known as the Steinberg interregnum has begun at Symphony Hall. Erich Leinsdorf has departed, and William Steinberg will spend the winter commuting between his two orchestral commands in Boston and Pittsburgh. And to complete the Boston Symphony's new look, several players sport new black beards.

In his first programs, repeated last night, Steinberg is remaining mostly in the 19th century German-Austrian repertoire: Beethoven's "Consecration of the House" overture, Schubert's Symphony No. 9 in C, Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel". The exception is Webern's Six Pieces for Orchestra, Opus 6.

Curator Of The Score

Steinberg is a solid, precise and sober musician who generally strikes an objective, curator of the score approach rather than the subjective-interpretive style. Physically, there is little movement to his conducting (a great visual difference from Leinsdorf's kinetic style, and he is not one of those directors who feel they must shape every note.

Steinberg doesn't exaggerate, and he can draw shapely melodic lines. At the same time, there is a certain heaviness to his work at times, less color than Leinsdorf, and generally a restrained, even low, emotional content. The BSO seems not be thoroughly "played in" to his style as yet, and some of the playing had a cautious, tentative feeling.

Thus in general the concert was orderly, methodical and with little emotional impulse — exceptions being the finale of the Schubert symphony, otherwise mainly uneventful, and portions of "Till Eulenspiegel."

Strangely, some of the most committed playing came in the atonal Opus 6 pieces of Anton von Webern. These brief six movements for large orchestra sparely employed are as concentrated as heavy water and their use of sound (and silence) still remains extraordinary half a century after their composition.

"Till," of course, is another, vastly different, exercise in instrumental color, and here Steinberg likes to let the sound out. It was, however, a rather severe performance with a few loose ends.

Clear Fugue

In the Beethoven overture, the four-square introduction picked up in the fugue, brisk and clear with a fine string texture. Steinberg chooses sensible tempi and manages his transitions skillfully, and the legato episode before the opening of the fugue was handsomely presented.

The Schubert symphony — a work he never heard performed — is a lengthy masterpiece of melodic invention and serenity in which there are many beguiling touches, as well as repetition. Steinberg drew a nice mellow sound from the orchestra and let the music generally speak for itself. However, the performance as a whole lacked the spark of fervor, and while nothing was out of place, there was also little excitement.

BSO's 89th year opens with less than dazzle

by Eleanor Weber

Is it kind, on the occasion of William Steinberg's first performance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra as its new Music Director, to come right out and say that the concert was (at best) merely competent, and (at worst) disappointingly dull? Probably not, but that's the way it was.

The musical puzzle at the Friday afternoon (Sept. 26) concert, it seems, was to decipher just exactly why the group wasn't "clicking." The program began, traditionally enough, with the overture to "The Consecration of the House" (op. 24) by Beethoven, the very first piece of music ever to be performed by the BSO when it began its first season at the Music Hall 'way back in Oct. 22, 1881. It was a pleasant, if musically predictable, piece, given lackluster performance possibly caused by tardy responses to his directions.

The main piece on the program, Schubert's "Symphony No. 9 in C," is a lush, expressive work, which demanded and usually got a solid concern for the richness of sound. The horns performed well, in their andante introduction and throughout the piece, and the strings maintained a light, accurate sense of rhythm particularly enjoyable at the end of the first and final movements. But it seemed awfully long (a few people even thought it was over after the scherzo and began scattered applause), which can probably be attributed to the somewhat heavy pace at which it was played.

Webern's "Six Pieces for Orchestra" (op. 6) came and went almost before it had a chance to impress and delight with its subtle semi-comments and contrasting violent percussive statements. This piece, incidentally, seemed to call forth the greatest attention and unity from the orchestra.

The program, which will be repeated Thursday, Oct. 2, concluded with a fun rendition of "Till Eulenspiegel" (op 28) by Strauss. Steinberg and his players were obviously enjoying the work's self-indulgent schmaltz and self-satisfied finale. In terms of sheer enjoyment—both by audience and performers—this piece was the most successful. But is this going to be the level, or the depth, of BSO's performances this year?

Although Steinberg first conducted the BSO in 1960, and appeared several times with the orchestra at Tangle in 1964, '67, and '68, some communication between them still seems to be lacking.

Steinberg is a somewhat stolid conductor. He uses sparse movements, often the same movement to indicate different demands, and conveys much of what he wants in the way of color by the expressions which constantly mold and re-mold his craggy face. The extent to which the BSO players actually watched him in Friday's concert was disappointing: many glanced at the conductor only when they themselves were not playing, thus often missing his desires for modification. Familiarity with some of the pieces on the program didn't actually breed contempt, but it did seem to foster indifference.

Perhaps this was just an off-afternoon. Perhaps Steinberg's sincere and intense desire to do well at the helm of the BSO worked perversely against him. Perhaps the players in the BSO shouldn't be expected to have both generated and mastered a smooth working relationship.

But this is a season which is going to see many guest conductors and many works of varied color and meaning. Will the BSO be the BSO—a monolith of musicians— or will it be Ozawa's orchestra, Davis' orchestra—and prove that flexibility of sound and dynamism in performance are the real tests of professional excellence?

BOSTON AFTER DARK
BOSTON, MASS.
OCT 1 1969

ITEM
LYNN, MASS.
(E) 38,000
OCT 2 1969

The second pair of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, tomorrow at 2 o'clock and Saturday at 8:30 p.m., will be conducted by the orchestra's music director William Steinberg. Joseph Silverstein and Jules Eskin, the orchestra's concertmaster and principal cellist respectively, will be soloists in the program's principal work, Robert Starer's Concerto for violin, cello and orchestra. Haydn's Symphony no. 55 opens the program and Elgar's Symphony no. 2 closes the program.

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,337
OCT 1 1969

The Sound of Music

TAKE IT FROM THE TOP — William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is shown in an informal rehearsal session.

Changes At Symphony

By Peter M. Knapp

What may become known as the Steinberg interregnum has begun at Symphony Hall. Erich Leinsdorf has departed, and William Steinberg will spend the winter commuting between his two orchestral commands in Boston and Pittsburgh. And to complete the Boston Symphony's new look, several players sport new black beards.

In his first programs, repeated last night, Steinberg is remaining mostly in the 19th century German-Austrian repertoire: Beethoven's "Consecration of the House" overture, Schubert's Symphony No. 9 in C, Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel". The exception is Webern's Six Pieces for Orchestra, Opus 6.

Curator Of The Score

Steinberg is a solid, precise and sober musician who generally strikes an objective, curator of the score approach rather than the subjective-interpretive style. Physically, there is little movement to his conducting (a great visual difference from Leinsdorf's kinetic style, and he is not one of those directors who feel they must shape every note.

Steinberg doesn't exaggerate, and he can draw shapely melodic lines. At the same time, there is a certain heaviness to his work at times, less color than Leinsdorf, and generally a restrained, even low, emotional content. The BSO seems not be thoroughly "played in" to his style as yet, and some of the playing had a cautious, tentative feeling.

Thus in general the concert was orderly, methodical and with little emotional impulse — exceptions being the finale of the Schubert symphony, otherwise mainly uneventful, and portions of "Till Eulenspiegel."

Strangely, some of the most committed playing came in the atonal Opus 6 pieces of Anton von Webern. These brief six movements for large orchestra sparely employed are as concentrated as heavy water and their use of sound (and silence) still remains extraordinary half a century after their composition.

"Till," of course, is another, vastly different, exercise in instrumental color, and here Steinberg likes to let the sound out. It was, however, a rather severe performance with a few loose ends.

Clear Fugue

In the Beethoven overture, the four-square introduction picked up in the fugue, brisk and clear with a fine string texture. Steinberg chooses sensible tempi and manages his transitions skillfully, and the legato episode before the opening of the fugue was handsomely presented.

The Schubert symphony — a work he never heard performed — is a lengthy masterpiece of melodic invention and serenity in which there are many beguiling touches, as well as repetition. Steinberg drew a nice mellow sound from the orchestra and let the music generally speak for itself. However, the performance as a whole lacked the spark of fervor, and while nothing was out of place, there was also little excitement.

Steinberg promises contemporary program

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Staff

More contemporary music, including some under the heading of avant-garde, will be played by the Boston Symphony in future, William Steinberg, the orchestra's new music director, promised yesterday.

At a Symphony Hall meeting, his first with members of the Boston press, Steinberg said that for himself he had made it a rule to conduct only that music with which he could "identify emotionally, sentimentally, and intellectually (if you pardon the expression)."

Declining to mention composers' names, Steinberg said that he had occupied himself at length with three recent pieces with a view to performing them this season, discovering, however, that he could find no such identification with any, and therefore dropping them from his programs.

Music, he said, has to be entertaining, "on the highest level, of course"; that is, its first requirement is that it not be boring. He does not mind having people dislike music he plays, nor having them express their distaste, but he does not want them to be bored, he said.

Was there music he was not interested in conducting, but felt that should be done? Steinberg mentioned Michael Tilson Thomas, the orchestra's new assistant conductor, a member of the younger generation — Thomas is 24 — and attuned to the newest music.

He said, too, that he hoped in future seasons he would have more success in persuading guest conductors to include such music on their programs, explaining that these men had very much their own ideas about what was appropriate for them to conduct at guest appearances with the Boston Symphony.

Finally, Steinberg added that he himself planned certainly to contribute to the number of performances of contemporary music here.

An orchestra, he said, has the obligation, among others, to inform audiences of what is in the repertory, and that definitely means the repertory, not only of a hundred years ago, but of today.

Steinberg also divulged some plans for Boston Symphony recordings for RCA this year. Schubert's C major Symphony, No. 9, had already been recorded. Scheduled to be recorded by him with the orchestra later in the season are Bruckner's Symphony No. 6; Mahler's Symphony No. 4 (recorded in 1960 by Erich Leinsdorf, but never released); a record of famous scherzi ("one of those recording company ideas," Steinberg said) to include "Till Eulenspiegel," the orchestral version of the Scherzo of Mendelssohn's Octet, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," and two pieces by Stravinsky; and Toch's Symphony No. 2 with Reger's Variations of a Theme by Mozart on the reverse side. (Steinberg: "This will be a best-seller. Why do you laugh?").

He himself has no time to listen to records. His favorite among his own earlier recordings with other orchestras? "'My Fair Lady.' This is a joke, of course."

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
OCT 2 1969

Steinberg Offers Elgar's 'Edwardian' Symphony

By GEORGE GELLES
HT Music Critic

The latest, if surely not the last, word on things "Edwardian" comes from the dons who gave us "American Heritage Dictionary." Culture under Albert Edward, Victoria's eldest son, was "opulent, ornate, overrefined and pompous." Harsh words.

Well, the "Edwardian" symphony par excellence is Edward Elgar's Second, which the Boston Symphony played on Friday afternoon under William Steinberg, and it's none of these things, or at any rate, shares these failings to no greater extent, say, than does the music of Strauss. Strauss.

ELGAR WROTE his Second Symphony between 1903 and '10, the last eight years of Edward's brief decade. As the score was nearing completion, the Monarch died, and thus the dedication "to the Memory of his late Majesty King Edward VII" — while in a letter Elgar signed that the "dear sweet-tempered King-Man was always so 'pleasant' to me."

With the Symphony he paid a more-than-pleasant tribute. It is not opulent but marvellously rich and varied in texture, not ornate but highly detailed, not overrefined but cunning in every particular, not pompous but proud and wistful with a last backward glance, while coasting toward the tragedy of war, at Victorian days.

ALTHOUGH it's unfashionable to speak of Zeitgeist, that certain something that pervades all aspects of an age, it's nevertheless plain that Elgar's last Symphony is filled with the most menacing juxtapositions of both a melodic and harmonic nature, and that in its slow sunset ending it might be gazing at an earlier age that is lost and that won't be relived. For this, surely, was the realization that Edward's reign brought to the most enlightened of his subjects.

Steinberg's performance was a very good one indeed, and enjoyable for its emotional grasp, for its rhythmic impulse, for the care lavished on details of tempo and phrasing. The Second is admittedly an imperfect symphonic structure, weakest in its outer movements, and thus, difficult to put across. But Steinberg sustained the work well, and kept it alive and interesting throughout.

IT WASN'T a totally convincing reading, though, for the big climaxes never quite made it. I'm thinking of the last statement of the initial theme in the opening movement, which wasn't any more forceful than earlier sections, and those wonderful measures in the 'Rondo' where several melodic strands are woven together what Elgar describes as a "hammering . . . like that horrible throbbing in the head during some fever." What we got here could have been taken care of with a couple of aspirin. But these spots aside, it was a thoughtful, sympathetic reading that deserves to be heard.

The novelty of the afternoon was Robert Starer's "Concerto for Violin, Cello and Orchestra." It was written two years ago by the 45-year-old New Yorker, and strikes me as pretty dreadful.

NO ONE of Starer's ideas is original or truly imaginative or personally profiled. His orchestral texture is chromatically colored, conventionally and conservatively scored, his rhetoric without purpose, while his formal layout here seems artificial; that is, there seems little inherent musical justification for any detail, little way in which the small relates intimately to the large.

From a practical point of view, the work sent waves of boredom through my section of the audience, not because it was 'Modern Music,' for no piece of Schoenberg, for instance, has failed to challenge the ladies, but because it was empty.

THOUGH I HAD no score, the performance by BSO concertmaster Joseph Silverstein and solo cellist Jules Eskin seemed letter-perfect, and taken by themselves, sounded beautiful.

Opening the concert was a generally unsatisfactory reading of Haydn's 55th Symphony. Tempi of all the fast music were too slow, repeats made in seemingly random fashion, orchestral playing routine, the atmosphere heavy and labored. Taken with the Schubert of last week, it appears that what we call 'Classical' isn't Steinberg's forte.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
OCT 4 1969

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
OCT 4 1969

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 430,000
OCT 4 1969

GIVES NEW INSIGHT

By L. DAVID HARRIS

Steinberg Is Refreshing

Concertgoers received new insights into the musical tastes and ways of William Steinberg in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert yesterday at Symphony Hall.

The new insights came in the musical forms of Starer's "Concert for Violin, Cello and Orchestra" and Elgar's "Symphony No. Two in E Flat." The former was appreciated by this reviewer, the latter was not.

Conductor Steinberg has advanced the cause of Starer and Elgar in recent years, introducing their works into his programs with the New York Philharmonic, his Pittsburgh Symphony—and now Boston. In yesterday's concert, Starer appeared as a refreshing contemporary Bartok, Elgar, a musical equivalent of Kipling, was just too thick and too long.

The concert began with Haydn's "Symphony No. 55 in E Flat Schoolmaster" and the work was thoroughly enjoyed. Such words as "competent" and "pleasing" well describe it. It had charm, freshness and was lightly handled.

At the same time, it also could be said the symphony lacked a certain stylishness and except in a few places it did not possess that gay, happy spontaneity a score originally composed for a Parisian orchestra should possess. Just the right French touch could have enhanced it more.

The work's second movement was particularly appreciated especially the offerings of the harpsichordist and solo cellist. However, the accompaniment occasionally was a bit too loud and the harpsichord melody was not heard.

Composer Starer was present for the performance of his concerto and took well deserved bows to the applause of the audience. Joseph Silverstein, violinist, and Jules Eskin, cellist, were the respective soloists.

As a vehicle for violin and cello solo work, the concerto left something to be desired. The orchestra — woodwinds, brass, percussion, etc. — had such interesting chunky harmonies, tricky rhythms, that the listener found himself often distracted from the soloists—unaware they were still at work.

The concerto, however, gave adequate opportunities for the soloists, to display their technical skills and dexterity (which they did with excellent verve) and gave the concertgoer the interesting listening experience of the two instruments against and complimenting each other (high violin, lower cello sounds). But at the same time, it seemed to afford little opportunities for the soloists to dig into their music with themselves—their emotions, interpretations.

If Elgar's works are to be played, presumably an orchestra such as Boston's should be the one to do it. Elgar requires a large orchestra—with plenty of sound —that still can allow for a great amount of ingenuity.

Yet, there remains a real question as to whether Elgar is the best use of contemporary concert time. Yes, he is solid, entertaining, full of sounds. He also often appears overorchestrated, heavy, tiring—and there was a bit of all of this in his Second Symphony yesterday afternoon.

But there still is good Elgar around. His "Dream of Gerontius," his cello concerto . . .

And it's always fun to graduate to "Pomp and Circumstance."

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Friday afternoon October 3 1969 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening October 4 1969 at 8.30
Tuesday evening October 7 1969 at 8.30
Tuesday evening October 14 1969 at 7.30

WILLIAM STEINBERG conductor

HAYDN — Symphony no. 55 in E flat 'Schoolmaster'
Allegro di molto
Adagio, ma semplicemente
Menuetto & trio
Presto

first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

Robert STARER — Concerto for violin, cello and orchestra
Moderato
Presto
Andante
Maestoso

JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN violin
JULES ESKIN cello

first performance in Boston

intermission

ELGAR — Symphony no. 2 in E flat op. 63
Allegro vivace e nobilmente
Larghetto
Rondo: presto
Finale: moderato e maestoso

THE ARTS

The ladies left too soon—Elgar needs more patience

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Staff

In 1911, as Sir Edward Elgar left the platform of Queen's Hall in London where he had just conducted the premiere of his second Symphony, he muttered to Henry J. Wood: "They don't like it, Henry, they don't like it."

The ladies in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon didn't like it much either, walking out in droves between movements, and, when it was over, staying for hardly more than a minimal show of politeness.

Perhaps it is not a piece that speaks easily to an uninitiated and not altogether involved audience, but it is, I am certain, one deeply informed by human and musical greatness.

It is also hard to imagine a performance of it more strongly conceived and more beautifully executed than that given yesterday by William Steinberg and the Boston Symphony.

Elgar's music is of disturbing emotional depth and complexity, and its subject often is pain. The most nearly comparable figure among his contemporaries is Mahler, but Elger, lacking Mahler's relish for agony in public, masks his Weltschmerz and allows his music to be outspoken and explicit only in its moments of triumph and of nobility.

Those seem to have become almost alien quantities to us today, and their representation in music so patently sincere, not completely purged of doubt, is no easy thing to face.

The mixture of optimism and melancholy is an altogether personal quality of Elgar's, and his music now moves me more deeply than any of its time.

The grandly laid out Second Symphony travels a strange path, beginning exuberantly and in splendor, subsiding in hard-won serenity with the cascading opening music heard now as though distantly and in a luminous mist.

Yes, it comes from the Brahms' Third, and Elgar is often rich with echoes of Brahms and Wagner, too, but his music, including the sunset close of the Second Symphony, is some of the most profoundly original ever composed, with glowing sonorities, rugged melodic shapes, and a harmonic gait all its own, immediately and uniquely recognizable as Elgar's.

The Larghetto extraordinarily combines public elegy and private: it mourns Edward VII, to whose memory the symphony is dedicated, but we know, too, that the genesis of its theme was Elgar's response years earlier to the death of a close friend.

Again, we know other such dark processions, the "Eroica" and, for that matter, the first movement of Elgar's own First Symphony, but none speaking of quite the same thing so shaped.

There is a Scherzo, coruscating virtuoso music, but weird, even a touch nightmarish. After that, the finale, so unlike other finales even down to being in three-quarter time (Brahms' Fourth, Tchaikovsky's Sixth, but how few others!), yet so perfect a summation of and destination for the whole work.

The performance was very nearly beyond praise. Steinberg was superbly responsive to the flexibility of pace that is built into the symphony, to the variety and interaction of its mood, to its inherent nobility of style.

With just the fewest reservations about some of the brass playing, the orchestra's work was both refined and splendid. It really sounded like the Boston Symphony.

Without further urging, I point out that Elgar will be repeated on tonight's program and on Oct. 7 and 14.

Before the intermission, Steinberg conducted a Concerto for violin, cello and orchestra by the Vienna-born American composer Robert Starer, written in 1967 and first performed under Steinberg in Pittsburgh last October. The playing Friday, with Joseph Silverstein and Jules Eskin as soloists, was clear and at times pleasingly brilliant.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. Haydn: Symphony No. 55 in E flat; Starer: Concerto for violin, cello, and orchestra, with Joseph Silverstein and Jules Eskin, soloists (first time in Boston); Elgar: Symphony No. 2 in E. flat. Friday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

THE SOLOISTS

JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1962, joined the Orchestra seven years earlier at the age of twenty-three, the youngest member at that time. Born in Detroit, he studied at the Curtis Institute in Philadelphia, and later with Joseph Gingold and Mischa Mischakoff. He was a prize winner in the 1959 Queen Elisabeth of Belgium International Competition, and a year later won the Naumberg Foundation Award. Before coming to Boston he played in the orchestras of Houston, Denver and Philadelphia.

Joseph Silverstein has established an international reputation as soloist and as first violin of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players. In 1967 he led their tour to the Soviet Union, Germany and England, and last spring a tour to the Virgin Islands and Florida. During past seasons he has performed with the Orchestra concertos by Bartók and Stravinsky (which he has recorded for RCA), and by Bach, Beethoven, Brahms, Bruch, Schoenberg and Sibelius; the Brahms he also played with Leopold Stokowski and the American Symphony Orchestra in New York. During the 1969 Berkshire Festival he played the solo violin part in works by Bach, Bartók and Haydn, and conducted a concert at Tanglewood by the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra.

Violinist of the Boston Symphony String Trio, Joseph Silverstein is also organizer of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, a faculty member of the New England Conservatory and Chairman of the Faculty of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood. He recently received an honorary Doctorate of Music from Tufts University.

JULES ESKIN, principal cello of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, came to Boston in 1964 from the Cleveland Orchestra, where he held the same chair. He was born in Philadelphia and studied at the Curtis Institute with Leonard Rose. His other teachers were Gregor Piatigorsky and Janos Starker. He won the Naumberg Foundation award in 1954 and made his debut at Town Hall, New York, the same year under the Foundation's auspices. He joined the Dallas Symphony and was later first cellist of the New York City Opera and Ballet Orchestra.

Jules Eskin is on the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center and is a member of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, with whom he has traveled on their national and international tours. He has played several concertos with the Orchestra, including the Brahms Double, the Beethoven Triple, the Haydn C major, and the Schumann. He played the solo cello part in Haydn's Sinfonia concertante with the Orchestra at Tanglewood during the summer, and was soloist with the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra in a performance of Tchaikovsky's Rococo variations.

Steinberg Offers Elgar's 'Edwardian' Symphony

By GEORGE GELLES
HT Music Critic

The latest, if surely not the last, word on things "Edwardian" comes from the dons who gave us "American Heritage Dictionary." Culture under Albert Edward, Victoria's eldest son, was "opulent, ornate, overrefined and pompous." Harsh words.

Well, the "Edwardian" symphony par excellence is Edward Elgar's Second, which the Boston Symphony played on Friday afternoon under William Steinberg, and it's none of these things, or at any rate, shares these failings to no greater extent, say, than does the music of Strauss. Strauss.

ELGAR WROTE his Second Symphony between 1903 and '10, the last eight years of Edward's brief decade. As the score was nearing completion, the Monarch died, and thus the dedication "to the Memory of his late Majesty King Edward VII" — while in a letter Elgar signed that the "dear sweet-tempered King-Man was always so 'pleasant' to me."

With the Symphony he paid a more-than-pleasant tribute. It is not opulent but marvellously rich and varied in texture, not ornate but highly detailed, not overrefined but cunning in every particular, not pompous but proud and wistful with a last backward glance, while coasting toward the tragedy of war, at Victorian days.

ALTHOUGH it's unfashionable to speak of Zeitgeist, that certain something that pervades all aspects of an age, it's nevertheless plain that Elgar's last Symphony is filled with the most menacing juxtapositions of both a melodic and harmonic nature, and that in its slow sunset ending it might be gazing at an earlier age that is lost and that won't be relived. For this, surely, was the realization that Edward's reign brought to the most enlightened of his subjects.

Steinberg's performance was a very good one indeed, and enjoyable for its emotional grasp, for its rhythmic impulse, for the care lavished on details of tempo and phrasing. The Second is admittedly an imperfect symphonic structure, weakest in its outer movements, and thus, difficult to put across. But Steinberg sustained the work well, and kept it alive and interesting throughout.

IT WASN'T a totally convincing reading, though, for the big climaxes never quite made it. I'm thinking of the last statement of the initial theme in the opening movement, which wasn't any more forceful than earlier sections, and those wonderful measures in the 'Rondo' where several melodic strands are woven together what Elgar describes as a "hammering . . . like that horrible throbbing in the head during some fever." What we got here could have been taken care of with a couple of aspirin. But these spots aside, it was a thoughtful, sympathetic reading that deserves to be heard.

The novelty of the afternoon was Robert Starer's "Concerto for Violin, Cello and Orchestra." It was written two years ago by the 45-year-old New Yorker, and strikes me as pretty dreadful.

NO ONE of Starer's ideas is original or truly imaginative or personally profiled. His orchestral texture is chromatically colored, conventionally and conservatively scored, his rhetoric without purpose, while his formal layout here seems artificial; that is, there seems little inherent musical justification for any detail, little way in which the small relates intimately to the large.

From a practical point of view, the work sent waves of boredom through my section of the audience, not because it was 'Modern Music,' for no piece of Schoenberg, for instance, has failed to challenge the ladies, but because it was empty.

THOUGH I HAD no score, the performance by BSO concertmaster Joseph Silverstein and solo cellist Jules Eskin seemed letter-perfect, and taken by themselves, sounded beautiful.

Opening the concert was a generally unsatisfactory reading of Haydn's 55th Symphony. Tempi of all the fast music were too slow, repeats made in seemingly random fashion, orchestral playing routine, the atmosphere heavy and labored. Taken with the Schubert of last week, it appears that what we call 'Classical' isn't Steinberg's forte.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 293,557
OCT 4 1969

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
OCT 4 1969

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
OCT 4 1969

GIVES NEW INSIGHT

By L. DAVID HARRIS

Steinberg Is Refreshing

Concertgoers received new insights into the musical tastes and ways of William Steinberg in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert yesterday at Symphony Hall.

The new insights came in the musical forms of Starer's "Concert for Violin, Cello and Orchestra" and Elgar's "Symphony No. Two in E Flat." The former was appreciated by this reviewer, the latter was not.

Conductor Steinberg has advanced the cause of Starer and Elgar in recent years, introducing their works into his programs with the New York Philharmonic, his Pittsburgh Symphony—and now Boston. In yesterday's concert, Starer appeared as a refreshing contemporary Bartok, Elgar, a musical equivalent of Kipling, was just too thick and too long.

The concert began with Haydn's "Symphony No. 55 in E Flat Schoolmaster" and the work was thoroughly enjoyed. Such words as "competent" and "pleasing" well describe it. It had charm, freshness and was lightly handled.

At the same time, it also could be said the symphony lacked a certain stylishness and except in a few places it did not possess that gay, happy spontaneity a score originally composed for a Parisian orchestra should possess. Just the right French touch could have enhanced it more.

The work's second movement was particularly appreciated especially the offerings of the harpsichordist and solo cellist. However, the accompaniment occasionally was a bit too loud and the harpsichord melody was not heard.

Composer Starer was present for the performance of his concerto and took well deserved bows to the applause of the audience. Joseph Silverstein, violinist, and Jules Eskin, cellist, were the respective soloists.

As a vehicle for violin and cello solo work, the concerto left something to be desired. The orchestra — woodwinds, brass, percussion, etc. — had such interesting chunky harmonies, tricky rhythms, that the listener found himself often distracted from the soloists—unaware they were still at work.

The concerto, however, gave adequate opportunities for the soloists, to display their technical skills and dexterity (which they did with excellent verve) and gave the concertgoer the interesting listening experience of the two instruments against and complimenting each other (high violin, lower cello sounds). But at the same time, it seemed to afford little opportunities for the soloists to dig into their music with themselves—their emotions, interpretations.

If Elgar's works are to be played, presumably an orchestra such as Boston's should be the one to do it. Elgar requires a large orchestra—with plenty of sound—that still can allow for a great amount of ingenuity.

Yet, there remains a real question as to whether Elgar is the best use of contemporary concert time. Yes, he is solid, entertaining, full of sounds. He also often appears overorchestrated, heavy, tiring—and there was a bit of all of this in his Second Symphony yesterday afternoon.

But there still is good Elgar around. His "Dream of Gerontius," his cello concerto . . .

And it's always fun to graduate to "Pomp and Circumstance."

THE ARTS

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Friday afternoon October 3 1969 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening October 4 1969 at 8.30
Tuesday evening October 7 1969 at 8.30
Tuesday evening October 14 1969 at 7.30

WILLIAM STEINBERG conductor

HAYDN — Symphony no. 55 in E flat 'Schoolmaster'
Allegro di molto
Adagio, ma semplicemente
Menuetto & trio
Presto

first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

Robert STARER — Concerto for violin, cello and orchestra
Moderato
Presto
Andante
Maestoso

JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN violin
JULES ESKIN cello

first performance in Boston

intermission

ELGAR — Symphony no. 2 in E flat op. 63
Allegro vivace e nobilmente
Larghetto
Rondo: presto
Finale: moderato e maestoso

The ladies left too soon—Elgar needs more patience

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Staff

In 1911, as Sir Edward Elgar left the platform of Queen's Hall in London where he had just conducted the premiere of his second Symphony, he muttered to Henry J. Wood: "They don't like it, Henry, they don't like it."

The ladies in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon didn't like it much either, walking out in droves between movements, and, when it was over, staying for hardly more than a minimal show of politeness.

Perhaps it is not a piece that speaks easily to an uninitiated and not altogether involved audience, but it is, I am certain, one deeply informed by human and musical greatness.

It is also hard to imagine a performance of it more strongly conceived and more beautifully executed than that given yesterday by William Steinberg and the Boston Symphony.

Elgar's music is of disturbing emotional depth and complexity, and its subject often is pain. The most nearly comparable figure among his contemporaries is Mahler, but Elger, lacking Mahler's relish for agony in public, masks his Weltschmerz and allows his music to be outspoken and explicit only in its moments of triumph and of nobility.

Those seem to have become almost alien quantities to us today, and their representation in music so patently sincere, not completely purged of doubt, is no easy thing to face.

The mixture of optimism and melancholy is an altogether personal quality of Elgar's, and his music now moves me more deeply than any of its time.

The grandly laid out Second Symphony travels a strange path, beginning exuberantly and in splendor, subsiding in hard-won serenity with the cascading opening music heard now as though distantly and in a luminous mist.

Yes, it comes from the Brahms' Third, and Elgar is often rich with echoes of Brahms and Wagner, too, but his music, including the sunset close of the Second Symphony, is some of the most profoundly original ever composed, with glowing sonorities, rugged melodic shapes, and a harmonic gait all its own, immediately and uniquely recognizable as Elgar's.

The Larghetto extraordinarily combines public elegy and private: it mourns Edward VII, to whose memory the symphony is dedicated, but we know, too, that the genesis of its theme was Elgar's response years earlier to the death of a close friend.

Again, we know other such dark processions, the "Eroica" and, for that matter, the first movement of Elgar's own First Symphony, but none speaking of quite the same thing so shaped.

There is a Scherzo, coruscating virtuoso music, but weird, even a touch nightmarish. After that, the finale, so unlike other finales even down to being in three-quarter time (Brahms' Fourth, Tchaikovsky's Sixth, but how few others!), yet so perfect a summation of and destination for the whole work.

The performance was very nearly beyond praise. Steinberg was superbly responsive to the flexibility of pace that is built into the symphony, to the variety and interaction of its mood, to its inherent nobility of style.

With just the fewest reservations about some of the brass playing, the orchestra's work was both refined and splendid. It really sounded like the Boston Symphony.

Without further urging, I point out that Elgar will be repeated on tonight's program and on Oct. 7 and 14.

Before the intermission, Steinberg conducted a Concerto for violin, cello and orchestra by the Vienna-born American composer Robert Starer, written in 1967 and first performed under Steinberg in Pittsburgh last October. The playing Friday, with Joseph Silverstein and Jules Eskin as soloists, was clear and at times pleasingly brilliant.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. William Steinberg conducting. Haydn: Symphony No. 55 in E flat; Starer: Concerto for violin, cello, and orchestra, with Joseph Silverstein and Jules Eskin, soloists (first time in Boston); Elgar: Symphony No. 2 in E flat. Friday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

THE SOLOISTS

JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1962, joined the Orchestra seven years earlier at the age of twenty-three, the youngest member at that time. Born in Detroit, he studied at the Curtis Institute in Philadelphia, and later with Joseph Gingold and Mischa Mischakoff. He was a prize winner in the 1959 Queen Elisabeth of Belgium International Competition, and a year later won the Naumberg Foundation Award. Before coming to Boston he played in the orchestras of Houston, Denver and Philadelphia.

Joseph Silverstein has established an international reputation as soloist and as first violin of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players. In 1967 he led their tour to the Soviet Union, Germany and England, and last spring a tour to the Virgin Islands and Florida. During past seasons he has performed with the Orchestra concertos by Bartók and Stravinsky (which he has recorded for RCA), and by Bach, Beethoven, Brahms, Bruch, Schoenberg and Sibelius; the Brahms he also played with Leopold Stokowski and the American Symphony Orchestra in New York. During the 1969 Berkshire Festival he played the solo violin part in works by Bach, Bartók and Haydn, and conducted a concert at Tanglewood by the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra.

Violinist of the Boston Symphony String Trio, Joseph Silverstein is also organizer of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, a faculty member of the New England Conservatory and Chairman of the Faculty of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood. He recently received an honorary Doctorate of Music from Tufts University.

JULES ESKIN, principal cello of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, came to Boston in 1964 from the Cleveland Orchestra, where he held the same chair. He was born in Philadelphia and studied at the Curtis Institute with Leonard Rose. His other teachers were Gregor Piatigorsky and Janos Starker. He won the Naumberg Foundation award in 1954 and made his debut at Town Hall, New York, the same year under the Foundation's auspices. He joined the Dallas Symphony and was later first cellist of the New York City Opera and Ballet Orchestra.

Jules Eskin is on the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center and is a member of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, with whom he has traveled on their national and international tours. He has played several concertos with the Orchestra, including the Brahms Double, the Beethoven Triple, the Haydn C major, and the Schumann. He played the solo cello part in Haydn's Sinfonia concertante with the Orchestra at Tanglewood during the summer, and was soloist with the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra in a performance of Tchaikovsky's Rococo variations.

Starer duo concerto performed by BSO

By Louis Snyder

First performances by the Boston Symphony of two works composed 193 years apart opened the orchestra's second series of subscription programs on Friday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The earlier of the composers, Joseph Haydn, has had time to become familiar hereabouts. The contemporary one, Robert Starer (born in 1924), has been serving the kind of apprenticeship that today's composing talents are heir to—winning fellowships, producing a body of shorter compositions for voice and various instruments, and filling commissions for ballet scores and religious works. A full-length opera is also in the making.

The Haydn Symphony No. 55 in E flat, played for the first time by the BSO, is, in the most pleasant sense, a nice way to begin a program. It is fresh and uncomplicated, tuneful and neatly tailored, has not one but two movements in theme and variation form, and offers a number of delectable solo opportunities for cello and horn, which were indeed delectably played. It has been labeled the "Schoolmaster" symphony somewhere along the way, and if this enhances its charm for anyone, so much the better. In any case, it doesn't detract from it—Mr. Steinberg used his master's conducting rod with wisdom.

Good to soloists

The Starer Concerto for violin, cello, and orchestra is barely one year old, performance-wise, having had its premiere in Pittsburgh, under Mr. Steinberg, last October. In form, it bespeaks the composer's originality of conception in choosing two solo string instruments as soloists, a device seemingly neglected, as he points out, "since Brahms wrote his famous Double concerto in 1887."

In his writing for them, Mr. Starer has been as good to his soloists as Friday's splendid violinist, Joseph Silverstein, and cellist, Jules Eskin, were to him. They have been given solo and interweaving passages of unusual lyric appeal, which, despite a greater use of percussive figures than usual and some complex orchestration in the tuttis, never resulted in their being buried in sheer volume of sound.

Not surprisingly, the concerto often emerges as dance-oriented rhythmically. Will some foresighted choreographer get it in his clutches? It certainly moves, and sings, and makes good sense, that is, until the last movement, when somehow, the compositional thread becomes lost in a climactic scramble of sound. However, it is a work that reveals a growing individual style, not necessarily dictated by contemporary fashion, and a respect for form without the pedantic trimmings. Mr. Starer, his concerto, the conductor, soloists, and orchestra were most cordially received, as they deserved to be.

Big and healthy

After intermission, the music was Sir Edward Elgar's Second Symphony (in E flat, Op. 63), last played by the orchestra in 1964. It is a big, healthy, expansive work, solidly put together, and despite musicological hints of programmatic content, better just listened to than mentally accompanied by a "Rule, Britannia" scenario. Not that the composer's identity and patriotic leanings are ever in doubt, but the design and substance of his thematic material are of ample musical weight, and he employs them with the skill of a true craftsman. And without wearing the "Union Jack" on his sleeve.

Appropriately enough, Mr. Steinberg shaped the orchestra's performance into something grand and monumental, as firmly founded as the Albert Hall, but much more enjoyable to contemplate.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 28,850

OCT 6 1969

BSO assistant conductor debuts Friday

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Staff

Michael Tilson Thomas, the Boston Symphony's 24-year-old assistant conductor, will make his debut with the orchestra Friday afternoon. The program: Haydn's Symphony No. 98, "Three Places in New England" by Ives, Stravinsky's Variations (Aldous Huxley In Memoriam), and Debussy's "La Mer."

Thomas feels particularly close to Haydn and says: "It just wouldn't feel right not to have a Haydn symphony on the program." He loves what he calls "the casual genius in Hayden" the marvelous wealth of detail so copious even in the works that are not great masterpieces.

In building a program, Thomas says he starts with something he particularly wants to do and then builds around it. There was Haydn, and then there was the Ives, which he stresses is a transcendently beautiful, completely achieved thing, "in no way just experimental music." He was anxious, as well, to include something by Stravinsky.

Thomas thinks of him as "the Faberge of composers," and suggests that the short, exquisitely worked Variations are like an object to hold in and turn over in the hand and marvel at.

"What I most want is to have people just listen to those pieces and take them in without worrying how they are made, what styles they are composed in, what schools they belong to. The whole is much greater, and much more important, than any such considerations."

He recalled how two Summers ago at Tanglewood he prepared Schoenberg's Five Pieces for Orchestra, the third of which, a strangely static piece in shifting tone colors, Schoenberg at various times called, or thought of calling "Colors, "Textures," and "Summer Morning on a Lake."

Thomas had studied and analyzed the piece in enormous detail. Then, early one morning he stood by a pond — "Yes, I know, it sounds like a movie biography" — and saw in the slowly shifting light on the water's surface the counterpart of Schoenberg's almost imperceptibly changing music.

"Suddenly a fish jumped from the water, and it was harp and clarinet going biddlylip, and there, like a flash, I had the sense of the whole piece. That, that flash, is what I want people to get when they listen."

A lot, he feels, is expected of him, and his first challenge is to prove himself worthy. "It's wonderful, of course, to have people expect a lot of you," and apropos, he recounted what he called "the most superb combination put-down and compliment" in his experience.

He was playing for Jascha Heifetz and the violinist suddenly stopped. The pianist looked at him, puzzled. Said Heifetz: "Mr. Thomas, since I have heard you at your best, how can you expect me to accept that? Let us go back to number 19, please."

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

OCT 8 1969 New Engl

Too cruel

Please do not let Michael Steinberg write the reviews of the Boston Symphony Concerts. He is too cruel. The audience wanted to give the new conductor a warm reception and were delighted with his conducting, feeling that the orchestra felt a new incentive and the whole sound of the orchestra was a step-up from the preceding doldrums.

I don't know how anyone wants to accept the position as the conductor of the Boston Symphony, let alone play in the orchestra, as long as Mr. Michael Steinberg tears them to pieces so unremittingly. His long, erudite analyses of the compositions are indeed unnecessary—they sound like a special course given gratis for his own enjoyment.

ELIZABETH ROOT
Boston

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

OCT 8 1969 New Engla

Steinberg Conducts

Second Boston Symphony Program

By HAROLD C. SPROUL

William Steinberg has the business-like approach of Toscanini, whom he once assisted—a small clean (classic) beat, a fine control of tempo and its changes, a wide musicianship. The refreshing Boston Symphony program of three little-known works began with the lightest, Haydn's Symphony No. 55 in E flat, a skillfully simpl concoction of sentiment and action-music (my term) like many composed for the entertainment of the Esterhazy court. It reads like dozens of his string quartets of the same period, each novel but modest in scope, and though the chamber orchestra has the tone-amplification of assorted minds, the quartets are richer in conception. Development passages in No. 55 don't get deeply involved, indeed, Haydn prefers here the more titilating contrasts of obvious variation. Mr. Steinberg, happily, did not force his half-size orchestra to sound big or to inflate the modest ideas.

The Concerto for Violin, cello and orchestra, is a 1967 product by Robert Starer, a Viennese-American who has evolved an idiom, thoroughly modern in sound and in originality of design, that is sensuously hearable and integral with inner relationships. The dialogues of the higher and lower soloists, and both with the orchestra, are cannily contrived so that there is plenty of acoustical space around the solo voices and one does not have to wait for a cadenza to hear what they sound like. At the same time there are enchanting movements of orchestra tone achieved by shrewd instrumental combinations, often in tone-clusters, animated by affective rhythm.

The percussion section did a beautiful job, especially with the jazzier passages. Silverstein and Eskin projected the duet—difficult with its rapid range from bottom notes to top—with no scramble and with tonal eloquence. It seems a now fashion for conductors to call up a blaring tone from the brass in climaxes and there is a question in my mind: does this really give weight and glow to the total orchestral sound or does it cut through and blast holes in the mass leaving it in valiant tatters? A marching band of course, is thrilling because the trumpets bray down the street-vista.

The big piece was Elgar's Symphony No. 2 in E flat. This great late-Romantic work (ranking with the best of Mahler and Tchaikowsky) was played by the BSO in 1911, the year of its completion, and again in 1964. It might be said to have set-off the whole modern revival of English composition, so badly overwhelmed by Germans and Italians ever since 17th century Purcell. Like Brahms, Elgar did not bid for serious attention until he was forty, after a slow growth, learning, from age fifteen, by doing—helping his all-purpose father (tuner, organist, music merchant, fiddler, etc.), picking up instruments as needed, conducting, listening—an odd-job youngster with the odd ambition to learn from every musical occasion. His mother wrote poetry. And there was nothing provincial about the provinces for as far as choral tradition was concerned, it had been the life-line of English music from Elizabethan times.

Like Brahms, again, Elgar began composing modestly for special groups, including an unbalanced combination (in two senses) in a "Pauper Lunatic Asylum." Eventually, as Shoenberg celebrated the progressivism of Brahms, Richard Strauss and Bernard Shaw acclaimed the technical mastery of Elgar.

Such suggestive biographical detail would mean nothing if the creative production had not flowered with distinction. But the ability to write three resounding Pomp-and-Circumstances and to keep his footing in the society of Edward VII was no limitation to musical-poetic ideas. Symphony No. 2 is a grand and glorious piece, good to remember as composed within the life-time of any of us over 58. There was then an open horizon and none of the later retreat of young composers into esoteric formalism and jealous novelty. The Starer Concerto suggests that the way is widening again and that humanism is not dead.

By 1911 Elgar had become Sir Edward, with honorary degrees, but did not decline into poet-laureate stuffiness. The symphony, as played under Steinberg, has a range of experience as wide as Whitman, all alive with variety under the control of design. Sweeping melodic lines (a magnificent one for 'cellos) involved developments in which the counterpoint of choirs and the spread of harmony really fill the whole stage with action; passages of marching nobility and the sorrowful pacing of the largetto. Always there is a progression of integrity so that long climaxes grow to power (compare the short ejaculations of Starer). But the ending is anti-climax, an inward focus of serene quiet. No rabble-rousing in that end. The audience on Saturday, however, expressed quick appreciation for this elucidation of a richly expressive work.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

OCT 9 1969

TO LEAD BSO—Michael Tilson Thomas, the Boston Symphony's 24-year-old assistant conductor, will make his debut with the orchestra this Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The program will include Haydn's Symphony No. 98, "Three Places in New England" by Ives, Stravinsky's Variations (Aldous Huxley In Memoriam) and Debussy's "La Mer."

ITEM
LYNN, MASS.
(E) 38,000

OCT 9 1969

Michael Tilson Thomas, making his Boston Symphony debut as the orchestra's new assistant conductor, will conduct a third pair of Friday-Saturday Boston Symphony Orchestra Concerts tomorrow at 2 p.m. and Saturday at 8:30 p.m. The program includes Haydn's Symphony No. 98, Charles Ives' "Three Places in New England", Stravinsky's "Huxley Variations" and Debussy's "La Mer."

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

OCT 9 1969

E. J. Dias Review

New Boston Symphony Music Director Impresses

Subscribers to the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Tuesday "B" Series, had their opportunity last night, in Symphony Hall, to assess the capabilities of the orchestra's new music director, the veteran conductor, William Steinberg. Steinberg, incidentally, is one of the busiest men in the world of music inasmuch as he still retains his post also as director of the Pittsburgh Symphony.

For his Tuesday debut, Steinberg chose to perform Haydn's "Symphony No. 55 in E Flat" ("Schoolmaster"), Robert Starer's "Concerto for Violin, Cello, and Orchestra," and Sir Edward Elgar's "Symphony No. 2 in E Flat, Opus 63."

The first factor that impresses about Steinberg's conducting is his complete lack of flamboyance. He goes about his work quietly and surely, with a firm, steady beat (he uses his right hand almost exclusively), with a dedication to clarity of phrasing and sound.

This clarity was particularly evident in the Haydn, which is no great shakes as a symphonny as far as emotional depth or genuine substannce is concerned but is pleasing to the ear, cheerful in approach, and, especially in its lovely slow movement and in its charming menuetto, thoroughly ingratiating.

Steinberg wisely let the music speak for itself, with no fancy embellishments but with a sharp eye for musical detail.

The Starer work, with violinist Joseph Silverstein and cellist Jules Eskin as soloists, owes much to Stravinsky, Bartok and Hindemith. It is sometimes astringic, sometimes spectacular in sound, and competently structured. Steinberg has conducted the work in Pittsburgh and New York and knows it well. Its intricacies were well played by the soloists and the orchestra in a performance that, although not exactly exciting, added at least a touch of novelty to the program.

Steinberg also has had much success with Elgar in Pittsburgh, and the "Symphony No. 2" is typical of the composer — very romantic, occasionally long-winded, but filled with moments of genuine beauty.

Actually, Elgar does not sound much different from the 19th Century German romantic composers — except that he adds to their romanticism a sort of British nationalism reminiscent of Kipling. In fact, he is of the stiff-upper lip, keep-the-Empire-going era. However, this is not to ridicule him; the Larghetto, for example, is a movement of considerable effectiveness, and the Finale achieves some glorious sound. In this work, Steinberg and the musicians were in fine fettle — often making the rafters shake.

The next concert of the series will be on Nov. 4, with Carlo Maria Giulini as guest conductor.

An additional comment on this concert may be found on p. 12.

STANDARD-TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
(E) 70,000 (S) 60,000

OCT 15 1969 Ev Ne

Starer duo concerto performed by BSO

By Louis Snyder

First performances by the Boston Symphony of two works composed 193 years apart opened the orchestra's second series of subscription programs on Friday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The earlier of the composers, Joseph Haydn, has had time to become familiar hereabouts. The contemporary one, Robert Starer (born in 1924), has been serving the kind of apprenticeship that today's composing talents are heir to—winning fellowships, producing a body of shorter compositions for voice and various instruments, and filling commissions for ballet scores and religious works. A full-length opera is also in the making.

The Haydn Symphony No. 55 in E flat, played for the first time by the BSO, is, in the most pleasant sense, a nice way to begin a program. It is fresh and uncomplicated, tuneful and neatly tailored, has not one but two movements in theme and variation form, and offers a number of delectable solo opportunities for cello and horn, which were indeed delectably played. It has been labeled the "Schoolmaster" symphony somewhere along the way, and if this enhances its charm for anyone, so much the better. In any case, it doesn't detract from it—Mr. Steinberg used his master's conducting rod with wisdom.

Good to soloists

The Starer Concerto for violin, cello, and orchestra is barely one year old, performance-wise, having had its premiere in Pittsburgh, under Mr. Steinberg, last October. In form, it bespeaks the composer's originality of conception in choosing two solo string instruments as soloists, a device seemingly neglected, as he points out, "since Brahms wrote his famous Double concerto in 1887."

In his writing for them, Mr. Starer has been as good to his soloists as Friday's splendid violinist, Joseph Silverstein, and cellist, Jules Eskin, were to him. They have been given solo and interweaving passages of unusual lyric appeal, which, despite a greater use of percussive figures than usual and some complex orchestration in the tuttis, never resulted in their being buried in sheer volume of sound.

Not surprisingly, the concerto often emerges as dance-oriented rhythmically. Will some foresighted choreographer get it in his clutches? It certainly moves, and sings, and makes good sense, that is, until the last movement, when somehow, the compositional thread becomes lost in a climactic scramble of sound. However, it is a work that reveals a growing individual style, not necessarily dictated by contemporary fashion, and a respect for form without the pedantic trimmings. Mr. Starer, his concerto, the conductor, soloists, and orchestra were most cordially received, as they deserved to be.

Big and healthy

After intermission, the music was Sir Edward Elgar's Second Symphony (in E flat, Op. 63), last played by the orchestra in 1964. It is a big, healthy, expansive work, solidly put together, and despite musicological hints of programmatic content, better just listened to than mentally accompanied by a "Rule, Britannia" scenario. Not that the composer's identity and patriotic leanings are ever in doubt, but the design and substance of his thematic material are of ample musical weight, and he employs them with the skill of a true craftsman. And without wearing the "Union Jack" on his sleeve.

Appropriately enough, Mr. Steinberg shaped the orchestra's performance into something grand and monumental, as firmly founded as the Albert Hall, but much more enjoyable to contemplate.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 130,859

OCT 6 1969

BSO assistant conductor debuts Friday

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Staff

Michael Tilson Thomas, the Boston Symphony's 24-year-old assistant conductor, will make his debut with the orchestra Friday afternoon. The program: Haydn's Symphony No. 98, "Three Places in New England" by Ives, Stravinsky's Variations (Aldous Huxley In Memoriam), and Debussy's "La Mer."

Thomas feels particularly close to Haydn and says: "It just wouldn't feel right not to have a Haydn symphony on the program." He loves what he calls "the casual genius in Hayden" the marvelous wealth of detail so copious even in the works that are not great masterpieces.

In building a program, Thomas says he starts with something he particularly wants to do and then builds around it. There was Haydn, and then there was the Ives, which he stresses is a transcendently beautiful, completely achieved thing, "in no way just experimental music." He was anxious, as well, to include something by Stravinsky.

Thomas thinks of him as "the Faberge of composers," and suggests that the short, exquisitely worked Variations are like an object to hold in and turn over in the hand and marvel at.

"What I most want is to have people just listen to those pieces and take them in without worrying how they are made, what styles they are composed in, what schools they belong to. The whole is much greater, and much more important, than any such considerations."

He recalled how two Summers ago at Tanglewood he prepared Schoenberg's Five Pieces for Orchestra, the third of which, a strangely static piece in shifting tone colors, Schoenberg at various times called, or thought of calling "Colors, "Textures," and "Summer Morning on a Lake."

Thomas had studied and analyzed the piece in enormous detail. Then, early one morning he stood by a pond — "Yes, I know, it sounds like a movie biography" — and saw in the slowly shifting light on the water's surface the counterpart of Schoenberg's almost imperceptibly changing music.

"Suddenly a fish jumped from the water, and it was harp and clarinet going biddlylip, and there, like a flash, I had the sense of the whole piece. That, that flash, is what I want people to get when they listen."

A lot, he feels, is expected of him, and his first challenge is to prove himself worthy. "It's wonderful, of course, to have people expect a lot of you," and apropos, he recounted what he called "the most superb combination put-down and compliment" in his experience.

He was playing for Jascha Heifetz and the violinist suddenly stopped. The pianist looked at him, puzzled. Said Heifetz: "Mr. Thomas, since I have heard you at your best, how can you expect me to accept that? Let us go back to number 19, please."

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

OCT 8 1969 New Engl

Too cruel

Please do not let Michael Steinberg write the reviews of the Boston Symphony Concerts. He is too cruel. The audience wanted to give the new conductor a warm reception and were delighted with his conducting, feeling that the orchestra felt a new incentive and the whole sound of the orchestra was a step-up from the preceding doldrums.

I don't know how anyone wants to accept the position as the conductor of the Boston Symphony, let alone play in the orchestra, as long as Mr. Michael Steinberg tears them to pieces so unremittingly. His long, erudite analyses of the compositions are indeed unnecessary—they sound like a special course given gratis for his own enjoyment.

ELIZABETH ROOT
Boston

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

OCT 8 1969 New Engla

Steinberg Conducts

Second Boston Symphony Program

By HAROLD C. SPROUL

William Steinberg has the business-like approach of Toscanini, whom he once assisted—a small clean (classic) beat, a fine control of tempo and its changes, a wide musicianship. The refreshing Boston Symphony program of three little-known works began with the lightest, Haydn's Symphony No. 55 in E flat, a skillfully simpl concoction of sentiment and action-music (my term) like many composed for the entertainment of the Esterhazy court. It reads like dozens of his string quartets of the same period, each novel but modest in scope, and though the chamber orchestra has the tone-amplification of assorted minds, the quartets are richer in conception. Development passages in No. 55 don't get deeply involved, indeed, Haydn prefers here the more titilating contrasts of obvious variation. Mr. Steinberg, happily, did not force his half-size orchestra to sound big or to inflate the modest ideas.

The Concerto for Violin, 'cello and orchestra, is a 1967 product by Robert Starer, a Viennese-American who has evolved an idiom, thoroughly modern in sound and in originality of design, that is sensuously hearable and integral with inner relationships. The dialogues of the higher and lower soloists, and both with the orchestra, are cannily contrived so that there is plenty of acoustical space around the solo voices and one does not have to wait for a cadenza to hear what they sound like. At the same time there are enchanting movements of orchestra tone achieved by shrewd instrumental combinations, often in tone-clusters, animated by affective rhythm.

The percussion section did a beautiful job, especially with the jazzier passages. Silverstein and Eskin projected the duet—difficult with its rapid range from bottom notes to top—with no scramble and with tonal eloquence. It seems a now fashion for conductors to call up a blaring tone from the brass in climaxes and there is a question in my mind: does this really give weight and glow to the total orchestral sound or does it cut through and blast holes in the mass leaving it in valiant tatters? A marching band of course, is thrilling because the trumpets bray down the street-vista.

The big piece was Elgar's Symphony No. 2 in E flat. This great late-Romantic work (ranking with the best of Mahler and Tchaikowsky) was played by the BSO in 1911, the year of its completion, and again in 1964. It might be said to have set-off the whole modern revival of English composition, so badly overwhelmed by Germans and Italians ever since 17th century Purcell. Like Brahms, Elgar did not bid for serious attention until he was forty, after a slow growth, learning, from age fifteen, by doing—helping his all-purpose father (tuner, organist, music merchant, fiddler, etc.), picking up instruments as needed, conducting, listening—an odd job youngster with the odd ambition to learn from every musical occasion. His mother wrote poetry. And there was nothing provincial about the provinces for as far as choral tradition was concerned, it had been the life-line of English music from Elizabethan times.

Like Brahms, again, Elgar began composing modestly for special groups, including an unbalanced combination (in two senses) in a "Pauper Lunatic Asylum." Eventually, as Shoenberg celebrated the progressivism of Brahms, Richard Strauss and Bernard Shaw acclaimed the technical mastery of Elgar.

Such suggestive biographical detail would mean nothing if the creative production had not flowered with distinction. But the ability to write three resounding Pomp-and-Circumstances and to keep his footing in the society of Edward VII was no limitation to musical-poetic ideas. Symphony No. 2 is a grand and glorious piece, good to remember as composed within the life-time of any of us over 53. There was then an open horizon and none of the later retreat of young composers into esoteric formalism and jealous novelty. The Starer Concerto suggests that the way is widening again and that humanism is not dead.

By 1911 Elgar had become Sir Edward, with honorary degrees, but did not decline into poet-laureate stuffiness. The symphony, as played under Steinberg, has a range of experience as wide as Whitman, all alive with variety under the control of design. Sweeping melodic lines (a magnificent one for 'cellos) involved developments in which the counterpoint of choirs and the spread of harmony really fill the whole stage with action; passages of marching nobility and the sorrowful pacing of the largetto. Always there is a progression of integrity so that long climaxes grow to power (compare the short ejaculations of Starer). But the ending is anti-climax, an inward focus of serene quiet. No rabble-rousing in that end. The audience on Saturday, however, expressed quick appreciation for this elucidation of a richly expressive work.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

OCT 9 1969

TO LEAD BSO—Michael Tilson Thomas, the Boston Symphony's 24-year-old assistant conductor, will make his debut with the orchestra this Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The program will include Haydn's Symphony No. 98, "Three Places in New England" by Ives, Stravinsky's Variations (Aldous Huxley In Memoriam) and Debussy's "La Mer."

ITEM
LYNN, MASS.
(E) 58,000

OCT 9 1969

Michael Tilson Thomas, making his Boston Symphony debut as the orchestra's new assistant conductor, will conduct a third pair of Friday-Saturday Boston Symphony Orchestra Concerts tomorrow at 2 p.m. and Saturday at 8:30 p.m. The program includes Haydn's Symphony No. 98, Charles Ives' "Three Places in New England", Stravinsky's "Huxley Variations" and Debussy's "La Mer."

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

OCT 9 1969

E. J. Dias Review

New Boston Symphony Music Director Impresses

Subscribers to the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Tuesday "B" Series, had their opportunity last night, in Symphony Hall, to assess the capabilities of the orchestra's new music director, the veteran conductor, William Steinberg. Steinberg, incidentally, is one of the busiest men in the world of music inasmuch as he still retains his post also as director of the Pittsburgh Symphony.

For his Tuesday debut, Steinberg chose to perform Haydn's "Symphony No. 55 in E Flat" ("Schoolmaster"), Robert Starer's "Concerto for Violin, Cello, and Orchestra," and Sir Edward Elgar's "Symphony No. 2 in E Flat, Opus 63."

The first factor that impresses about Steinberg's conducting is his complete lack of flamboyance. He goes about his work quietly and surely, with a firm, steady beat (he uses his right hand almost exclusively), with a dedication to clarity of phrasing and sound.

This clarity was particularly evident in the Haydn, which is no great shakes as a symphonny as far as emotional depth or genuine substannce is concerned but is pleasing to the ear, cheerful in approach, and, especially in its lovely slow movement and in its charming menuetto, thoroughly ingratiating. Steinberg wisely let the music speak for itself, with no fancy embellishments but with a sharp eye for musical detail.

The Starer work, with violinist Joseph Silverstein and cellist Jules Eskin as soloists, owes much to Stravinsky, Bartok and Hindemith. It is sometimes astringic, sometimes spectacular in sound, and competently structured. Steinberg has conducted the work in Pittsburgh and New York and knows it well. Its intricacies were well played by the soloists and the orchestra in a performance that, although not exactly exciting, added at least a touch of novelty to the program.

Steinberg also has had much success with Elgar in Pittsburgh, and the "Symphony No. 2" is typical of the composer — very romantic, occasionally long-winded, but filled with moments of genuine beauty.

Actually, Elgar does not sound much different from the 19th Century German romantic composers — except that he adds to their romanticism a sort of British nationalism reminiscent of Kipling. In fact, he is of the stiff-upper lip, keep-the-Empire-going era. However, this is not to ridicule him; the Larghetto, for example, is a movement of considerable effectiveness, and the Finale achieves some glorious sound. In this work, Steinberg and the musicians were in fine fettle — often making the rafters shake.

The next concert of the series will be on Nov. 4, with Carlo Maria Giulini as guest conductor.

An additional comment on this concert may be found on p. 12.

STANDARD-TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
(E) 70,000 (S) 60,000

OCT 15 1969

10.

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300

OCT 10 1969 New England

THOMAS' TREASURE

Symphony Assistant Seeks Aware Audience

By L. DAVID HARRIS

Michael Tilson Thomas has a treasure — the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Of course, it's not all his (a man named William Steinberg has first claims), but Friday he will have it all to himself when he makes his debut as its assistant conductor. Concertgoers will have an opportunity to view the 24-year-old's rapport with the orchestra and hear the music his directing inspires from its musicians.

And watching Thomas, the musicians will see a man totally absorbed in his work. "A conductor has to be involved in the task at hand," he said in an interview. "You have to be so involved that you convince the musicians the music is worth playing and also convince the listeners it's worth listening to . . ."

Are listeners that important?

"This is a major goal with me — the development of virtuoso listeners," he answered.

"We're still in a time when music is entertainment in the worst sense of the word; art to many means interior decorating. I'd like to recapture the time when the arts were disciplines, their purpose was the refinement of the individual . . .

"There are such individuals in Boston — virtuoso listeners. But I wish music could become more of an interior phenomenon for all — where listeners could come in and become totally involved with the music."

As assistant conductor, Thomas will conduct nine or 10 concerts this season — as well as truly being the "assistant"; that is, he will know the music for all concerts and be ready to step in if needed.

He also performs with the orchestra, playing all keyboard instruments (piano, celeste, harpsichord, etc.) and during the season will be doing recordings along with guest conductor appearances in Boston, Los Angeles, Pittsburgh and other places.

Thomas insists his musical tastes not be stereotyped. He said he likes "many, many" kinds of music from different periods, but added he particularly is attracted to some medieval and renaissance music. Bach, Haydn, Mozart — he listed the masters whom he admires, but then surprised the interviewer with "Asiatic music," eighth century ceremonial music, music from Japan . . .

"People tend to like music in which they feel comfortable," he said. "That's the kind of music they want to hear. But I like the other too . . . I'm for new ideas, new music, performances vibrant with new musical content."

Already evident is the fact that Thomas is quite inspired by the orchestra. He sees his new position as a learning experience, a treasured step in a career he feels will make more and greater demands upon him.

"I'm terribly pleased to be the assistant conductor," he said. "The orchestra is the source of an enormous wealth of persons, artists. What one learns by just watching them . . . it's invaluable."

How does a young man become assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra?

Thomas modestly deferred to answer. But his professional biography hints at what it takes — a young man studies, works, impresses, wins . . . It helps, too, if he's brilliant.

A native of California, Thomas began formal music studies in childhood, attended the University of Southern California yet during high school. When he graduated from USC, he was honored as "outstanding graduate" of his class. He later earned a master of music degree from the university.

Thomas served four years as conductor of the Young Musicians Foundation Debut Orchestra, a resident company of the Los Angeles Music Center, and was conductor and piano soloist for premiers of works by composers like Stravinsky, Boulez, Stockhausen, Foss and Ingolf Dahl, with whom he studied at USC.

He also was pianist in classes of Gregor Piatigorsky and has served as conductor for several major music festivals.

Thomas was a conducting fellow at the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood and won the Koussevitzky Prize in conducting in 1968. Also during 1968, he conducted the youth concerts of the Los Angeles Philharmonic and was guest conductor of the Boston Philharmonia.

He worked at Tanglewood again this year and also has performed with the Boston Symphony Chamber Players. In addition to the Koussevitzky prize, he holds the Young Artists Award from Musical America.

Outwardly, he seems quite calm about his Friday debut. He chose the concert's music, he has memorized the musical scores.

He also is grateful.

"Yes," he said, "I have tremendous gratitude to those who have helped and encouraged me to the place where now I can work with such an august and glorious group of people — the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"I see this as a beginning. It will make great demands. I will have to work harder — and take in more information — than I've ever had to do in my entire life. I intend to rise to the challenge."

And yes, girls, he's single.

Is he "available?"

"Well, yes, maybe . . . perhaps," he answered — the first break in the "cool" of the remarkably unflappable young man during the interview.

Would he marry a professional musician?

"Well, I really don't know: I doubt it," came the answer. "I'd be conducting — there would be a lot of running about to different places . . . It might be difficult."

It was an unfair question. Why think about girls when one is about to make his debut as assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra?

Additional interviews may be found on pages 123 & 124

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Friday afternoon October 10 1969 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening October 11 1969 at 8.30

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS conductor

HAYDN	Symphony no. 98 in B flat Adagio – allegro Adagio cantabile Menuetto & trio Presto
IVES	'Three places in New England', an orchestral set The 'St Gaudens' in Boston Common (Colonel Shaw and his colored regiment) Putnam's camp, Redding, Connecticut From The Housatonic at Stockbridge
intermission
STRAVINSKY	Variations (Aldous Huxley in memoriam) first performance in Boston
DEBUSSY	La mer: trois esquisses symphoniques* (The sea: three symphonic sketches) De l'aube à midi sur la mer (From dawn to noon on the sea) Jeux de vagues (The playing of the waves) Dialogue du vent et de la mer (Dialogue between the wind and the sea)

The Boston Globe Saturday, October 11, 1969 23

One of ablest conductors . . .

Thomas' BSO debut dazzling

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Staff

Michael Tilson Thomas, now 24 and the Boston Symphony's assistant conductor, made his debut with the orchestra Friday afternoon.

Resisting the temptation to prophesy, let me say simply that right now he is one of the ablest and most interesting conductors in the profession. He knows how the pieces go, he appears to handle the orchestra with easy authority, and he is full of life. He has the ancillary advantages of interesting good looks and of just a touch of theatricality, but he plays on those stops only between numbers.

While conducting, he is all business, and he is, in fact, a pleasant conductor to watch, not only because his movements are in themselves arresting and even beautiful, but particularly because they are unfailingly relevant to the musical result.

What came of all this Friday was one of the liveliest and finest concerts I have heard at the Boston Symphony, and it was so, to begin with, because of the music Thomas had chosen.

The program a performer puts together is the first statement he makes, and one of the most revealing he makes at any time, about himself as a musician.

Thomas made his statement with Haydn's Symphony No. 98 in B flat, "Three Places in New England" by Ives, with the first performance here of Stravinsky's Variations (Aldous Huxley in memoriam), and Debussy's "La Mer."

The Debussy, though brilliant, is risky and anything other than sure-fire, and the program altogether was far from the customary debut bid for facile success.

Good Haydn conductors are rare, but Thomas is one. The Symphonny No. 98 is, even among the marvelous, one of the most marvelous, dramatic, richly lyric in the farewell-to-Mozart Adagio, witty, and, in the finale, crazily funny with all those charmingly wilful violin solos. I found the first Allegro just a little round, but otherwise the performance was incisive, both quick-witted and patient, varied and multi-faceted though always completely natural, and it was one with tremendous relish for the fun in the piece as well as feeling for its depths.

The one really unsolved problem was the harpsichord, which was delightfully effective in the last movement, but not even audible (to say nothing of telling) elsewhere.

"Three Places in New England" is a beautiful achievement in musical poetry and, I would add, as a declaration of love to America and this corner of it.

Ives's tragic interpretation of the solemn and commanding St. Gaudens in Boston Common is the grandest in scope, the most elaborately inventive, the most profoundly felt of the three movements, but the Housatonic at Stockbridge is a singularly touching landscape with figures and a piece of extraordinary sensuous beauty.

Between the two, for the depiction of a 4th of July picnic at Putnam's Camp, Ives made of one of his breeziest, infectiously captivating Pop Pourris (to borrow a phrase from David Del Tredici). The performance was superb.

Stravinsky's dozen Variations, written in 1964, are very different stuff. Everything is sharp-edged, precise, economical, multi-functional, lucidly audible.

The music sometimes proceeds in the sparest imaginable textures, but three times, once with 12 violins, once with 10 violas and two basses, and last with 11 woodwinds and a horn, it goes into time-suspending shocks of the densest ployphony anywhere in Stravinsky's music.

Not even Webern ever made five minutes of music so varied. Of the writing for orchestra, one might way what a London reviewer wrote about Haydn's symphony 170 years ago, that "every instrument is respected by his Muse, for he gives to each his due proportion of efficacy."

It is new and fresh music, totally characteristic of Stravinsky, an object of cold and fascinating beauty.

The performance was first-rate on the conductor's part and on the players', and Thomas took advantge of the extreme brevity of the piece to repeat it at once, to the benefit, I am sure, of all.

Meaning, I would guess, to build toward the last movement, Thomas held back rather drastically in the first of "La Mer," and let it go slack in the process.

In the second movement a more characteristic plasticity and flexibility returned, and the finale went brilliantly, with an exciting pictorial suggestiveness.

The orchestra's playing was near to ideal for the dazzling and fine score, and indeed it had been at an extraordinarily high level all afternoon.

The concert pleased, and at its end there was vigorous cheering. "We're lucky," said one of the customers as she left the hall. I think so.

4 ▲ Monday, October 13, 1969 WEEKEND ISSUE THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

Symphony weekend

Thomas in debut

By Louis Snyder

People who read biographies of musical greats for reasons of business or pleasure (and some do), are accustomed to the early paragraph that tells how so-and-so, at an incredibly early age, performed a spectacular feat which speeded him on his career. The telling always evokes a kind of legendary never-never land outside one's experience, and the venerable musical subject emerges as someone with a faulty memory, or with an overly imaginative biographer.

Such things do happen, though, and the debut on Friday afternoon of Michael Tilson Thomas, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's new assistant conductor, directing his first scheduled concert with the orchestra, is the stuff from which legends grow. Mr. Thomas is 24 years old, and ever since his studies began at the age of 10, has apparently been thinking, living, and performing music. His abilities and his opportunities have led him under the most highly respected auspices from the West Coast to the East, and lo and behold, there he was on Friday, a tall, slim, dark-haired young man, standing before one of the great orchestras of the world in Symphony Hall.

The program began with Haydn's Symphony No. 98 in B flat, and there followed Charles Ives's "Three Places in New England," the Boston premiere of Stravinsky's Variations (Aldous Huxley in memoriam), and Debussy's "La Mer." Obviously, Mr. Thomas's interests are in this century, but not without a bow to the past.

Somehow the Haydn turned out to be the least interesting feature of the afternoon. Tempi were on the slow side, and the crispness which is so much a part of Haydn just wasn't always in evidence. But then maybe we all were a little nervous.

Those three wonderful Ives pictures in sound were something else again. Uncovering them after more than 20 years' absence from BSO concerts, Mr. Thomas revealed, for all to hear, the colors, textures, and tonal curiosities that Ives discovered on Boston Common, in what remained of Putnam's camp, and in the fields by the Housatonic at Stockbridge. It is hard to believe that this music can be conveyed successfully without great personal empathy as well as true musicianship, and Mr. Thomas and the orchestra delivered it stunningly to the heart and to the ear.

The Stravinsky Variations had not only their first but their second performance by the orchestra on this occasion, although it was not expressly by popular demand that the short work was repeated. As in stubbing one's toe the second time, neither the toe nor the intelligence benefited, despite the conductor's meticulous attention.

The afternoon ended with "La Mer," which has had a long Boston history, and into which Mr. Thomas plunged with a vigor bespeaking his seaworthiness. Sound shimmered, spumed, and splashed, and yet it was all kept contained within aural bounds. At its close, there was thunderous applause, from the top of the hall to the floor—for the orchestra, as always, but rather specially for Mr. Thomas who had stood up straight and strong in front of it, and added a very important sentence to his expanding biography.

© Hookailo Studio

Michael Tilson Thomas
. . . conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time on the weekend.

Tuesday evening October 28 1969 at 8.30

Same Concert - later date

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS conductor

reviewed →

HAYDN	Symphony no. 98 in B flat Adagio – allegro Adagio cantabile Menuetto & trio Presto
IVES	'Three places in New England', an orchestral set The 'St Gaudens' in Boston Common (Colonel Shaw and his colored regiment) Putnam's camp, Redding, Connecticut From The Housatonic at Stockbridge
intermission
STRAVINSKY	Variations (Aldous Huxley in memoriam)
DEBUSSY	La mer: trois esquisses symphoniques* (The sea: three symphonic sketches) De l'aube à midi sur la mer (From dawn to noon on the sea) Jeux de vagues (The playing of the waves) Dialogue du vent et de la mer (Dialogue between the wind and the sea)

10.

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433 300

OCT 10 1969 New England

THOMAS' TREASURE

Symphony Assistant Seeks Aware Audience

By L. DAVID HARRIS

Michael Tilson Thomas has a treasure — the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Of course, it's not all his (a man named William Steinberg has first claims), but Friday he will have it all to himself when he makes his debut as its assistant conductor. Concertgoers will have an opportunity to view the 24-year-old's rapport with the orchestra and hear the music his directing inspires from its musicians.

And watching Thomas, the musicians will see a man totally absorbed in his work. "A conductor has to be involved in the task at hand," he said in an interview. "You have to be so involved that you convince the musicians the music is worth playing and also convince the listeners it's worth listening to . . ."

Are listeners that important?

"This is a major goal with me — the development of virtuoso listeners," he answered.

"We're still in a time when music is entertainment in the worst sense of the word; art to many means interior decorating. I'd like to recapture the time when the arts were disciplines, their purpose was the refinement of the individual . . .

"There are such individuals in Boston — virtuoso listeners. But I wish music could become more of an interior phenomenon for all — where listeners could come in and become totally involved with the music."

As assistant conductor, Thomas will conduct nine or 10 concerts this season — as well as truly being the "assistant"; that is, he will know the music for all concerts and be ready to step in if needed.

He also performs with the orchestra, playing all keyboard instruments (piano, celeste, harpsichord, etc.) and during the season will be doing recordings along with guest conductor appearances in Boston, Los Angeles, Pittsburgh and other places.

Thomas insists his musical tastes not be stereotyped. He said he likes "many, many" kinds of music from different periods, but added he particularly is attracted to some medieval and renaissance music. Bach, Haydn, Mozart — he listed the masters whom he admires, but then surprised the interviewer with "Asiatic music," eighth century ceremonial music, music from Japan . . .

"People tend to like music in which they feel comfortable," he said. "That's the kind of music they want to hear. But I like the other too . . . I'm for new ideas, new music, performances vibrant with new musical content."

Already evident is the fact that Thomas is quite inspired by the orchestra. He sees his new position as a learning experience, a treasured step in a career he feels will make more and greater demands upon him.

"I'm terribly pleased to be the assistant conductor," he said. "The orchestra is the source of an enormous wealth of persons, artists. What one learns by just watching them . . . it's invaluable."

How does a young man become assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra?

Thomas modestly deferred to answer. But his professional biography hints at what it takes — a young man studies, works, impresses, wins . . . It helps, too, if he's brilliant.

A native of California, Thomas began formal music studies in childhood, attended the University of Southern California yet during high school. When he graduated from USC, he was honored as "outstanding graduate" of his class. He later earned a master of music degree from the university.

Thomas served four years as conductor of the Young Musicians Foundation Debut Orchestra, a resident company of the Los Angeles Music Center, and was conductor and piano soloist for premiers of works by composers like Stravinsky, Boulez, Stockhausen, Foss and Ingolf Dahl, with whom he studied at USC.

He also was pianist in classes of Gregor Piatigorsky and has served as conductor for several major music festivals.

Thomas was a conducting fellow at the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood and won the Koussevitzky Prize in conducting in 1968. Also during 1968, he conducted the youth concerts of the Los Angeles Philharmonic and was guest conductor of the Boston Philharmonia.

He worked at Tanglewood again this year and also has performed with the Boston Symphony Chamber Players. In addition to the Koussevitzky prize, he holds the Young Artists Award from Musical America.

Outwardly, he seems quite calm about his Friday debut. He chose the concert's music, he has memorized the musical scores.

He also is grateful.

"Yes," he said, "I have tremendous gratitude to those who have helped and encouraged me to the place where now I can work with such an august and glorious group of people — the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"I see this as a beginning. It will make great demands. I will have to work harder — and take in more information — than I've ever had to do in my entire life. I intend to rise to the challenge."

And yes, girls, he's single.

Is he "available?"

"Well, yes, maybe . . . perhaps," he answered — the first break in the "cool" of the remarkably unflappable young man during the interview.

Would he marry a professional musician?

"Well, I really don't know: I doubt it," came the answer. "I'd be conducting — there would be a lot of running about to different places . . . It might be difficult."

It was an unfair question. Why think about girls when one is about to make his debut as assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra?

Additional interviews may be found on pages 123 & 124

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Friday afternoon October 10 1969 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening October 11 1969 at 8.30

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS conductor

HAYDN — Symphony no. 98 in B flat
- Adagio – allegro
- Adagio cantabile
- Menuetto & trio
- Presto

IVES — 'Three places in New England', an orchestral set
- The 'St Gaudens' in Boston Common (Colonel Shaw and his colored regiment)
- Putnam's camp, Redding, Connecticut
- From The Housatonic at Stockbridge

intermission

STRAVINSKY — Variations (Aldous Huxley in memoriam)
first performance in Boston

DEBUSSY — La mer: trois esquisses symphoniques*
(The sea: three symphonic sketches)
- De l'aube à midi sur la mer (From dawn to noon on the sea)
- Jeux de vagues (The playing of the waves)
- Dialogue du vent et de la mer (Dialogue between the wind and the sea)

The Boston Globe Saturday, October 11, 1969 23

One of ablest conductors . . .

Thomas' BSO debut dazzling

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Staff

Michael Tilson Thomas, now 24 and the Boston Symphony's assistant conductor, made his debut with the orchestra Friday afternoon.

Resisting the temptation to prophesy, let me say simply that right now he is one of the ablest and most interesting conductors in the profession. He knows how the pieces go, he appears to handle the orchestra with easy authority, and he is full of life. He has the ancillary advantages of interesting good looks and of just a touch of theatricality, but he plays on those stops only between numbers.

While conducting, he is all business, and he is, in fact, a pleasant conductor, to watch, not only because his movements are in themselves arresting and even beautiful, but particularly because they are unfailingly relevant to the musical result.

What came of all this Friday was one of the liveliest and finest concerts I have heard at the Boston Symphony, and it was so, to begin with, because of the music Thomas had chosen.

The program a performer puts together is the first statement he makes, and one of the most revealing he makes at any time, about himself as a musician.

Thomas made his statement with Haydn's Symphony No. 98 in B flat, "Three Places in New ENGland" by Ives, with the first performance here of Stravinsky's Variations (Aldous Huxley in memoriam), and Debussy's "La Mer."

The Debussy, though brilliant, is risky and anything other than sure-fire, and the program altogether was far from the customary debut bid for facile success.

Good Haydn conductors are rare, but Thomas is one. The Symphonny No. 98 is, even among the marvelous, one of the most marvelous, dramatic, richly lyric in the farewell-to-Mozart Adagio, witty, and, in the finale, crazily funny with all those charmingly wilful violin solos. I found the first Allegro just a little round, but otherwise the performance was incisive, both quick-witted and patient, varied and multi-faceted though always completely natural, and it was one with tremendous relish for the fun in the piece as well as feeling for its depths.

The one really unsolved problem was the harpsichord, which was delightfully effective in the last movement, but not even audible (to say nothing of telling) elsewhere.

"Three Places in New England" is a beautiful achievement in musical poetry and, I would add, as a declaration of love to America and this corner of it.

Ives's tragic interpretation of the solemn and commanding St. Gaudens in Boston Common is the grandest in scope, the most elaborately inventive, the most profoundly felt of the three movements, but the Housatonic at Stockbridge is a singularly touching landscape with figures and a piece of extraordinary sensuous beauty.

Between the two, for the depiction of a 4th of July picnic at Putnam's Camp, Ives made of one of his breeziest, infectiously captivating Pop Pourris (to borrow a phrase from David Del Tredici). The performance was superb.

Stravinsky's dozen Variations, written in 1964, are very different stuff. Everything is sharp-edged, precise, economical, multi-functional, lucidly audible.

The music sometimes proceeds in the sparest imaginable textures, but three times, once with 12 violins, once with 10 violas and two basses, and last with 11 woodwinds and a horn, it goes into time-suspending shocks of the densest ployphony anywhere in Stravinsky's music.

Not even Webern ever made five minutes of music so varied. Of the writing for orchestra, one might say what a London reviewer wrote about Haydn's symphony 170 years ago, that "every instrument is respected by his Muse, for he gives to each his due proportion of efficacy."

It is new and fresh music, totally characteristic of Stravinsky, an object of cold and fascinating beauty.

The performance was first-rate on the conductor's part and on the players', and Thomas took advantge of the extreme brevity of the piece to repeat it at once, to the benefit, I am sure, of all.

Meaning, I would guess, to build toward the last movement, Thomas held back rather drastically in the first of "La Mer," and let it go slack in the process.

In the second movement a more characteristic plasticity and flexibility returned, and the finale went brilliantly, with an exciting pictorial suggestiveness.

The orchestra's playing was near to ideal for the dazzling and fine score, and indeed it had been at an extraordinarily high level all afternoon.

The concert pleased, and at its end there was vigorous cheering. "We're lucky," said one of the customers as she left the hall. I think so.

---

4 ▲ Monday, October 13, 1969 WEEKEND ISSUE THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

Symphony weekend

Thomas in debut

By Louis Snyder

People who read biographies of musical greats for reasons of business or pleasure (and some do), are accustomed to the early paragraph that tells how so-and-so, at an incredibly early age, performed a spectacular feat which speeded him on his career. The telling always evokes a kind of legendary never-never land outside one's experience, and the venerable musical subject emerges as someone with a faulty memory, or with an overly imaginative biographer.

Such things do happen, though, and the debut on Friday afternoon of Michael Tilson Thomas, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's new assistant conductor, directing his first scheduled concert with the orchestra, is the stuff from which legends grow. Mr. Thomas is 24 years old, and ever since his studies began at the age of 10, has apparently been thinking, living, and performing music. His abilities and his opportunities have led him under the most highly respected auspices from the West Coast to the East, and lo and behold, there he was on Friday, a tall, slim, dark-haired young man, standing before one of the great orchestras of the world in Symphony Hall.

The program began with Haydn's Symphony No. 98 in B flat, and there followed Charles Ives's "Three Places in New England," the Boston premiere of Stravinsky's Variations (Aldous Huxley in memoriam), and Debussy's "La Mer." Obviously, Mr. Thomas's interests are in this century, but not without a bow to the past.

Somehow the Haydn turned out to be the least interesting feature of the afternoon. Tempi were on the slow side, and the crispness which is so much a part of Haydn just wasn't always in evidence. But then maybe we all were a little nervous.

Those three wonderful Ives pictures in sound were something else again. Uncovering them after more than 20 years' absence from BSO concerts, Mr. Thomas revealed, for all to hear, the colors, textures, and tonal curiosities that Ives discovered on Boston Common, in what remained of Putnam's camp, and in the fields by the Housatonic at Stockbridge. It is hard to believe that this music can be conveyed successfully without great personal empathy as well as true musicianship, and Mr. Thomas and the orchestra delivered it stunningly to the heart and to the ear.

The Stravinsky Variations had not only their first but their second performance by the orchestra on this occasion, although it was not expressly by popular demand that the short work was repeated. As in stubbing one's toe the second time, neither the toe nor the intelligence benefited, despite the conductor's meticulous attention.

The afternoon ended with "La Mer," which has had a long Boston history, and into which Mr. Thomas plunged with a vigor bespeaking his seaworthiness. Sound shimmered, spumed, and splashed, and yet it was all kept contained within aural bounds. At its close, there was thunderous applause, from the top of the hall to the floor—for the orchestra, as always, but rather specially for Mr. Thomas who had stood up straight and strong in front of it, and added a very important sentence to his expanding biography.

© Hookailo Studio

Michael Tilson Thomas
. . . conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time on the weekend.

Tuesday evening October 28 1969 at 8.30

Some Concert - later date

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS conductor

reviewed →

HAYDN — Symphony no. 98 in B flat
- Adagio – allegro
- Adagio cantabile
- Menuetto & trio
- Presto

IVES — 'Three places in New England', an orchest
- The 'St Gaudens' in Boston Common (Colonel Shaw and his colored regiment)
- Putnam's camp, Redding, Connecticut
- From The Housatonic at Stockbridge

intermission

STRAVINSKY — Variations (Aldous Huxley in memoriam

DEBUSSY — La mer: trois esquisses symphoniques*
(The sea: three symphonic sketches)
- De l'aube à midi sur la mer (From dawn to noon on the sea)
- Jeux de vagues (The playing of the waves)
- Dialogue du vent et de la mer (Dialogue between the wind and the sea)

11.

RKO GENERAL
WNAC • TV
RKO GENERAL BUILDING • GOVERNMENT CENTER
BOSTON, MASSACHUSETTS 02114 • 617-742-9000

SYMPHONY REVIEW BOOKSPAN FOR FRIDAY, OCTOBER 10, 1969

VIDEO

BOOKSPAN ON CAMERA

AUDIO

Thank you, Bill, and good evening, everyone. The Boston Symphony concerts this week-end may well become historic events as time goes on: they mark the first appearances here of the Orchestra's new Assistant Conductor, 24-year old Michael Tilson Thomas.

He comes here with impressive credentials: a native of the West Coast, he has prepared the orchestra for the famous Heifetz-Piatigorsky Concerts in the Hollywood Bowl, and l Tilson Thomas for two summers he served as assistant to Pie: he has rre Boulez. For the past two summers he has podium and he been one of the most prominent of the conduc- throws him- ting fellows at Tanglewood, and he did much and delivers of the preparatory work for Erich Leinsdorf's ment. And - widely-acclaimed performances of Berg's opera asically a Wozzeck.

But these credentials would really have been sic-making meaningless this afternoon, if young Mr. at Symphony Thomas had not delivered the goods. ow - and it

Ladies and gentlemen, I am here to tell you that we have an extraordinary new conductor Haydn Symphoy, in our midst. I am reminded of the period land by Charles during the early 1940's when another young ry of Aldous conductor protegee from Tanglewood was begin- bussy's La Mer. ning a professional career - but in New York, fine guiding as Assistant Conductor of the Philharmonic. s. Mark the His name, of course, was Leonard Bernstein - g it more and and the rest, as the saying goes, is history. n.

s.

10, 1969

Thomas Shows Mature Skill

By Peter M. Knapp

Michael Tilson Thomas has returned to Boston with some renown. The 24-year-old assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony substituted for Music Director William Steinberg when the latter became ill during the orchestra's New York concerts last week.

In view of his appearance with the Boston Symphony last night, Thomas' acclaim in New York is not surprising. Despite his youth, Michael Thomas is a conductor of poise, skill and maturity, a musician who can kindle excitement both on the stage and in the audience, Boston is fortunate to have him.

Decisive Confidence

Actually, the lean, dark-haired, sharp-featured pianist-conductor has had several years' conducting experience, has been an assistant to Pierre Boulez and winner of the Koussevitzky prize in conducting at Tanglewood. So he is not a beginner, and his confident manner, clear beat and precise gestures show it.

His program last night began in the 18th century, with Haydn's Symphony No. 98 in B-flat, and promptly left it for the 20th century with music of Charles Ives, Stravinsky and Debussy.

The Haydn had the benefit of verve, clarity and incorporation of the harpsichord, necessary for the final movement's banter with solo violin. And the piece was a pleasure, despite a few instrumental flaws, for its sense of style and more classical feeling than the BSO generally manages, as well as for its shapeliness and the foretaste of Rossini in the playful finale.

But for this listener, the major excitement of a stimulating evening was the performance of Ives' "Three Places in New England." This marvellous score by the Connecticut Yankee insurance man-composer was directed and played with extraordinary polish and verve. Neither Ives' layering of sound-pictures, tonality and density, nor his simultaneous use of different rhythms and tempo were obstacles to Thomas, and whatever the complexity, his direction was unfailingly clear.

More than that, he captured the "feel" of the score and its Ivesian enthusiasm: the sense of endless, weary plodding in the St. Gaudens movement; the glorious din of General Putnam's camp; and the glassy impressionism of the Housatonic at Stockbridge.

After the Ives, the rest of the concert might have been anti-climax, but there were also fine performances of the Stravinsky Variations dedicated to Aldous Huxley. The Debussy's "La Mer." Stravinsky's lean serial transformations were repeated — to only cool applause. "La Mer" was not so much a sonic excercise as a demonstration of rhythmic suppleness, pulse, and a number of fine details.

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,387
OCT 29 1969

Thomas Impresses in Debut with Boston Symphony

By GEORGE GELLES
HT Music Critic

Michael Tilson Thomas is the Real Thing. The 24-year-old assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony made his debut with the orchestra yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall, and as they used to say, it was an auspicious occasion.

Watching Thomas work, first of all, is like looking in on the proverbial fish in water. His conducting technique flows naturally and his podium deportment is completely authoritative. Ther is nothing of the student, except in the best sense, about hs work.

AND HE'S EQUALLY impressive musically. Tempi he chose were never less than comfortable, often just right. Though at times he let the winds and percussion overwhelm the strings, Thomas showed a fine ear for balance and shading and a love of orchestral detail.

He has, as well, an easy melodic gift and an uncommon sense of style and phrasing. And he was also able to get the players to care about their work and to join him in the drama of every piece they played together.

The program he gave us was wide-ranging and meaty and accurately reflected Thomas' interests. Like his mentor, Pierre Boulez (to whom he was assistant in 1966 and '67), Thomas, above all, is temperamentally at one with the modern.

THE NEWEST PIECE he played was a Boston first, Stravinsky's 1964 memorial tribute to Aldous Huxley, his "Variations." This is serial Stravinsky, and prime. While Stravinsky once stated that "In writing variations my method is to remain faithful to the theme as a melody—never mind the rest" (referring obviously to passages in "Pulcinella" and the Octet and "Jeu de Cartes," for example), he more recently admitted that "Yes, the 'Variations' are different . . . it is ancient music, far older than you imagine."

What he had in mind, I think, was this. Every aspect of the Huxley "Variations" is intimately related to the number 12, which is the number of notes in his "tone row." The rhythmic scheme and the instrumentation and the tonal marrow of the piece all spring from a common seed; and in so doing, they spiritually relate the "Variations" to products of the Ars Nova and the more mannered phase of the Renaiisance. In a sense the Huxley piece is a tour de force, but one brilliant in conception and execution both.

THIS WAS THOMAS' toughest challenge, and he met it wonderfully well. Even though the writing is not all that difficult, there will clearly be a problem in teaching such a work to symphony men whose musical lives are lived in the 19th century. Yet both performances, for Thomas played it twice, were fyrstea; ehtr-it twice, were first-rate; they were precise and vital and showed the Stravinsky as an eloquent, moving five minutes of music.

Charles Ives was the other modern, and how well he wears. His "Three Places in New England" are the best of that personal blend of late-Romantic harmony, in general, Mahler's evocative stance, in particular, and the most audacious and naive manipulation of native tunes.

What, for instance, can we find in the repertory to match those wonderful moments in "Putnam's Camp," the second "Place," where the most inane penny-whistle tune plays foil for a raccus, dissonant, very Ivesian march? We can find nothing.

AGAIN, THOMAS' reading was excellent, beautifully shaped and forceful and poetic and full of spirit, even if the balance at times got out of hand.

I found Thomas somewhat removed emotionally from the Haydn 98th Symphony that opened the afternoon. His reading was well thought out, well led and well played, but a bit cool for my taste.

Debussy's "La Mer," which closed the concert, was a pleasure as well, spacious and carefully paced, if without a special lightness and finesse. The reading lacked the immediacy of the two newer works we heard, but made clear just the same that Thomas is a major talent, a natural from whom we'll hear much more.

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901
OCT 11 1969

Young Conductor Welcomed

By JOHN F. KYES
Gazette Music Critic

BOSTON — Michael Tilson Thomas, who's been seen here as guest conductor of the Boston Philharmonia and who won the Koussevitzky prize for conducting at Tanglewood, made his debut yesterday as assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and received a rousing welcome from the capacity audience in Symphony Hall.

This tall, slim young man in his middle twenties, with eloquent long arms and expressive hands, has already worked with many great musicians of the present day and is highly regarded by them. Stravinsky, Boulez, Bernstein all are enthusiastic.

Gazette Review

Thomas will be the regular pianist for the Boston Symphony Chamber Players.

Yesterday's program was diversified and revealing. Thomas contributed part of the program notes. Especially, he tried to explain to the layman the complex methods and ideas of Stravinsky's "Variations (Aldous Huxley in Memoriam)" The net result was respect for the technical skill of the conductor and players, rather than high enthusiasm.

This exploitation of "concise serial language" was composed in 1963 and 1964. This was the first performance in Boston.

The orchestra was reduced to about 40 players for Hydn's "Symphony No 98 in B flat." Thomas had the familiar Haydn elements of daintiness and incisiveness under complete control.

The change to Charles Ives' "Three Places in New England" was brilliant and stirring. Mysticism of souls marching to conflict was expressed in "The 'St. Gaudens' in Boston Common," the statue depicting Col. Shaw and his Negro regiment. "Putnam's Camp, Redding, Connecticut," had zestful use of novel techniques, like the two bands playing at once, in different tempos. "From the Housatonic at Stockbridge" pictured a "contented river."

These all stressed Thomas' power to let the orchestra sing, without consciousness of tight measures or techniques.

Debussy's "La Mer" was a continual delight, with its interplay between sunlight, waves, wind and sea.

This concert will be repeated tonight, also in Symphony Hall on Oct. 28, Dec. 18 and aJn. 13, in Cambridge on Jan. 20 and in Providence March 26.

11.

BOSTON HERALD TRAVELER, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 11, 1969 A 7

Thomas Impresses in Debut with Boston Symphony

By GEORGE GELLES
HT Music Critic

Michael Tilson Thomas is the Real Thing. The 24-year-old assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony made his debut with the orchestra yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall, and as they used to say, it was an auspicious occasion.

Watching Thomas work, first of all, is like looking in on the proverbial fish in water. His conducting technique flows naturally and his podium deportment is completely authoritative. Ther is nothing of the student, except in the best sense, about hs work.

AND HE'S EQUALLY impressive musically. Tempi he chose were never less than comfortable, often just right. Though at times he let the winds and percussion overwhelm the strings, Thomas showed a fine ear for balance and shading and a love of orchestral detail.

He has, as well, an easy melodic gift and an uncommon sense of style and phrasing. And he was also able to get the players to care about their work and to join him in the drama of every piece they played together.

The program he gave us was wide-ranging and meaty and accurately reflected Thomas' interests. Like his mentor, Pierre Boulez (to whom he was assistant in 1966 and '67), Thomas, above all, is temperamentally at one with the modern.

THE NEWEST PIECE he played was a Boston first, Stravinsky's 1964 memorial tribute to Aldous Huxley, his "Variations." This is serial Stravinsky, and prime. While Stravinsky once stated that "In writing variations my method is to remain faithful to the theme as a melody—never mind the rest" (referring obviously to passages in "Pulcinella" and the Octet and "Jeu de Cartes," for example), he more recently admitted that "Yes, the 'Variations' are different . . . it is ancient music, far older than you imagine."

What he had in mind, I think, was this. Every aspect of the Huxley "Variations" is intimately related to the number 12, which is the number of notes in his "tone row." The rhythmic scheme and the instrumentation and the tonal marrow of the piece all spring from a common seed; and in so doing, they spiritually relate the "Variations" to products of the Ars Nova and the more mannered phase of the Renaiisance. In a sense the Huxley piece is a tour de force, but one brilliant in conception and execution both.

THIS WAS THOMAS' toughest challenge, and he met it wonderfully well. Even though the writing is not all that difficult, there will clearly be a problem in teaching such a work to symphony men whose musical lives are lived in the 19th century. Yet both performances, for Thomas played it twice, were fyrstea; ehtr- it twice, were first-rate; they were precise and vital and showed the Stravinsky as an eloquent, moving five minutes of music.

Charles Ives was the other modern, and how well he wears. His "Three Places in New England" are the best of that personal blend of late-Romantic harmony, in general, Mahler's evocative stance, in particular, and the most audacious and naive manipulation of native tunes.

What, for instance, can we find in the repertory to match those wonderful moments in "Putnam's Camp," the second "Place," where the most inane penny-whistle tune plays foil for a raccus, dissonant, very Ivesian march? We can find nothing.

AGAIN, THOMAS' reading was excellent, beautifully shaped and forceful and poetic and full of spirit, even if the balance at times got out of hand.

I found Thomas somewhat removed emotionally from the Haydn 98th Symphony that opened the afternoon. His reading was well thought out, well led and well played, but a bit cool for my taste.

Debussy's "La Mer," which closed the concert, was a pleasure as well, spacious and carefully paced, if without a special lightness and finesse. The reading lacked the immediacy of the two newer works we heard, but made clear just the same that Thomas is a major talent, a natural from whom we'll hear much more.

RKO GENERAL
WNAC • TV
RKO GENERAL BUILDING • GOVERNMENT CENTER
BOSTON, MASSACHUSETTS 02114 • 617-742-9000

SYMPHONY REVIEW BOOKSPAN FOR FRIDAY, OCTOBER 10, 1969

VIDEO

BOOKSPAN ON CAMERA

AUDIO

Thank you, Bill, and good evening, everyone. The Boston Symphony concerts this week-end may well become historic events as time goes on: they mark the first appearances here of the Orchestra's new Assistant Conductor, 24-year old Michael Tilson Thomas.

He comes here with impressive credentials: a native of the West Coast, he has prepared the orchestra for the famous Heifetz-Piatigorsky Concerts in the Hollywood Bowl, and for two summers he served as assistant to Pierre Boulez. For the past two summers he has been one of the most prominent of the conducting fellows at Tanglewood, and he did much of the preparatory work for Erich Leinsdorf's widely-acclaimed performances of Berg's opera Wozzeck.

But these credentials would really have been meaningless this afternoon, if young Mr. Thomas had not delivered the goods.

Ladies and gentlemen, I am here to tell you that we have an extraordinary new conductor in our midst. I am reminded of the period during the early 1940's when another young conductor protegee from Tanglewood was beginning a professional career - but in New York, as Assistant Conductor of the Philharmonic. His name, of course, was Leonard Bernstein - and the rest, as the saying goes, is history.

10, 1969

l Tilson Thomas
: he has podium and he throws him-and delivers ment. And - asically a ty of fire sic-making at Symphony ow - and it

Haydn Symphony, land by Charles ry of Aldous bussy's La Mer. fine guiding
s. Mark the ng it more and n.
s.

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,387
OCT 29 1969

Thomas Shows Mature Skill

By Peter M. Knapp

Michael Tilson Thomas has returned to Boston with some renown. The 24-year-old assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony substituted for Music Director William Steinberg when the latter became ill during the orchestra's New York concerts last week.

In view of his appearance with the Boston Symphony last night, Thomas' acclaim in New York is not surprising. Despite his youth, Michael Thomas is a conductor of poise, skill and maturity, a musician who can kindle excitement both on the stage and in the audience, Boston is fortunate to have him.

Decisive Confidence

Actually, the lean, dark-haired, sharp-featured pianist-conductor has had several years' conducting experience, has been an assistant to Pierre Boulez and winner of the Koussevitzky prize in conducting at Tanglewood. So he is not a beginner, and his confident manner, clear beat and precise gestures show it.

His program last night began in the 18th century, with Haydn's Symphony No. 98 in B-flat, and promptly left it for the 20th century with music of Charles Ives, Stravinsky and Debussy.

The Haydn had the benefit of verve, clarity and incorporation of the harpsichord, necessary for the final movement's banter with solo violin. And the piece was a pleasure, despite a few instrumental flaws, for its sense of style and more classical feeling than the BSO generally manages, as well as for its shapeliness and the foretaste of Rossini in the playful finale.

But for this listener, the major excitement of a stimulating evening was the performance of Ives' "Three Places in New England." This marvellous score by the Connecticut Yankee insurance man-composer was directed and played with extraordinary polish and verve. Neither Ives' layering of sound-pictures, tonality and density, nor his simultaneous use of different rhythms and tempo were obstacles to Thomas, and whatever the complexity, his direction was unfailingly clear.

More than that, he captured the "feel" of the score and its Ivesian enthusiasm: the sense of endless, weary plodding in the St. Gaudens movement; the glorious din of General Putnam's camp; and the glassy impressionism of the Housatonic at Stockbridge.

After the Ives, the rest of the concert might have been anti-climax, but there were also fine performances of the Stravinsky Variations dedicated to Aldous Huxley. The Debussy's "La Mer." Stravinsky's lean serial transformations were repeated — to only cool applause. "La Mer" was not so much a sonic excercise as a demonstration of rhythmic suppleness, pulse, and a number of fine details.

Young Conductor Welcomed

By JOHN F. KYES
Gazette Music Critic

BOSTON — Michael Tilson Thomas, who's been seen here as guest conductor of the Boston Philharmonia and who won the Koussevitzky prize for conducting at Tanglewood, made his debut yesterday as assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and received a rousing welcome from the capacity audience in Symphony Hall.

This tall, slim young man in his middle twenties, with eloquent long arms and expressive hands, has already worked with many great musicians of the present day and is highly regarded by them. Stravinsky, Boulez, Bernstein all are enthusiastic.

Gazette Review

Thomas will be the regular pianist for the Boston Symphony Chamber Players.

Yesterday's program was diversified and revealing. Thomas contributed part of the program notes. Especially, he tried to explain to the layman the complex methods and ideas of Stravinsky's "Variations (Aldous Huxley in Memoriam)" The net result was respect for the technical skill of the conductor and players, rather than high enthusiasm.

This exploitation of "concise serial language" was composed in 1963 and 1964. This was the first performance in Boston.

The orchestra was reduced to about 40 players for Hydn's "Symphony No 98 in B flat." Thomas had the familiar Haydn elements of daintiness and incisiveness under complete control.

The change to Charles Ives' "Three Places in New England" was brilliant and stirring. Mysticism of souls marching to conflict was expressed in "The 'St. Gaudens' in Boston Common," the statue depicting Col. Shaw and his Negro regiment. "Putnam's Camp, Redding, Connecticut," had zestful use of novel techniques, like the two bands playing at once, in different tempos. "From the Housatonic at Stockbridge" pictured a "contented river."

These all stressed Thomas' power to let the orchestra sing, without consciousness of tight measures or techniques.

Debussy's "La Mer" was a continual delight, with its interplay between sunlight, waves, wind and sea.

This concert will be repeated tonight, also in Symphony Hall on Oct. 28, Dec. 18 and aJn. 13, in Cambridge on Jan. 20 and in Providence March 26.

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901
OCT 11 1969

11.

Thomas Impresses in Debut with Boston Symphony

By GEORGE GELLES
HT Music Critic

Michael Tilson Thomas is the Real Thing. The 24-year-old assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony made his debut with the orchestra yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall, and as they used to say, it was an auspicious occasion.

Watching Thomas work, first of all, is like looking in on the proverbial fish in water. His conducting technique flows naturally and his podium deportment is completely authoritative. Ther is nothing of the student, except in the best sense, about hs work.

AND HE'S EQUALLY impressive musically. Tempi he chose were never less than comfortable, often just right. Though at times he let the winds and percussion overwhelm the strings, Thomas showed a fine ear for balance and shading and a love of orchestral detail.

He has, as well, an easy melodic gift and an uncommon sense of style and phrasing. And he was also able to get the players to care about their work and to join him in the drama of every piece they played together.

The program he gave us was wide-ranging and meaty and accurately reflected Thomas' interests. Like his mentor, Pierre Boulez (to whom he was assistant in 1966 and '67), Thomas, above all, is temperamentally at one with the modern.

THE NEWEST PIECE he played was a Boston first, Stravinsky's 1964 memorial tribute to Aldous Huxley, his "Variations." This is serial Stravinsky, and prime. While Stravinsky once stated that "In writing variations my method is to remain faithful to the theme as a melody—never mind the rest" (referring obviously to passages in "Pulcinella" and the Octet and "Jeu de Cartes," for example), he more recently admitted that "Yes, the 'Variations' are different . . . it is ancient music, far older than you imagine."

What he had in mind, I think, was this. Every aspect of the Huxley "Variations" is intimately related to the number 12, which is the number of notes in his "tone row." The rhythmic scheme and the instrumentation and the tonal marrow of the piece all spring from a common seed; and in so doing, they spiritually relate the "Variations" to products of the Ars Nova and the more mannered phase of the Renaiisance. In a sense the Huxley piece is a tour de force, but one brilliant in conception and execution both.

THIS WAS THOMAS' toughest challenge, and he met it wonderfully well. Even though the writing is not all that difficult, there will clearly be a problem in teaching such a work to symphony men whose musical lives are lived in the 19th century. Yet both performances, for Thomas played it twice, were fyrstea; ehtr-it twice, were first-rate; they were precise and vital and showed the Stravinsky as an eloquent, moving five minutes of music.

Charles Ives was the other modern, and how well he wears. His "Three Places in New England" are the best of that personal blend of late-Romantic harmony, in general, Mahler's evocative stance, in particular, and the most audacious and naive manipulation of native tunes.

What, for instance, can we find in the repertory to match those wonderful moments in "Putnam's Camp," the second "Place," where the most inane penny-whistle tune plays foil for a raccus, dissonant, very Ivesian march? We can find nothing.

AGAIN, THOMAS' reading was excellent, beautifully shaped and forceful and poetic and full of spirit, even if the balance at times got out of hand.

I found Thomas somewhat removed emotionally from the Haydn 98th Symphony that opened the afternoon. His reading was well thought out, well led and well played, but a bit cool for my taste.

Debussy's "La Mer," which closed the concert, was a pleasure as well, spacious and carefully paced, if without a special lightness and finesse. The reading lacked the immediacy of the two newer works we heard, but made clear just the same that Thomas is a major talent, a natural from whom we'll hear much more.

RKO GENERAL
WNAC • TV
RKO GENERAL BUILDING • GOVERNMENT CENTER
BOSTON, MASSACHUSETTS 02114 • 617-742-9000

SYMPHONY REVIEW BOOKSPAN FOR FRIDAY, OCTOBER 10, 1969

VIDEO

BOOKSPAN ON CAMERA

AUDIO

Thank you, Bill, and good evening, everyone. The Boston Symphony concerts this week-end may well become historic events as time goes on: they mark the first appearances here of the Orchestra's new Assistant Conductor, 24-year old Michael Tilson Thomas.

He comes here with impressive credentials: a native of the West Coast, he has prepared the orchestra for the famous Heifetz-Piatigorsky Concerts in the Hollywood Bowl, and for two summers he served as assistant to Pierre Boulez. For the past two summers he has been one of the most prominent of the conducting fellows at Tanglewood, and he did much of the preparatory work for Erich Leinsdorf's widely-acclaimed performances of Berg's opera Wozzeck.

But these credentials would really have been meaningless this afternoon, if young Mr. Thomas had not delivered the goods.

Ladies and gentlemen, I am here to tell you that we have an extraordinary new conductor in our midst. I am reminded of the period during the early 1940's when another young conductor protegee from Tanglewood was beginning a professional career - but in New York, as Assistant Conductor of the Philharmonic. His name, of course, was Leonard Bernstein - and the rest, as the saying goes, is history.

10, 1969

el Tilson Thomas or: he has e podium and he he throws him-
d and delivers tment. And - basically a nty of fire usic-making y at Symphony now - and it

Haydn Symphoy, land by Charles ory of Aldous ebussy's La Mer. fine guiding
as. Mark the ng it more and n.
s.

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(C) 66 387

OCT 29 1969

Thomas Shows Mature Skill

By Peter M. Knapp

Michael Tilson Thomas has returned to Boston with some renown. The 24-year-old assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony substituted for Music Director William Steinberg when the latter became ill during the orchestra's New York concerts last week.

In view of his appearance with the Boston Symphony last night, Thomas' acclaim in New York is not surprising. Despite his youth, Michael Thomas is a conductor of poise, skill and maturity, a musician who can kindle excitement both on the stage and in the audience, Boston is fortunate to have him.

Decisive Confidence

Actually, the lean, dark-haired, sharp-featured pianist-conductor has had several years' conducting experience, has been an assistant to Pierre Boulez and winner of the Koussevitzky prize in conducting at Tanglewood. So he is not a beginner, and his confident manner, clear beat and precise gestures show it.

His program last night began in the 18th century, with Haydn's Symphony No. 98 in B-flat, and promptly left it for the 20th century with music of Charles Ives, Stravinsky and Debussy.

The Haydn had the benefit of verve, clarity and incorporation of the harpsichord, necessary for the final movement's banter with solo violin. And the piece was a pleasure, despite a few instrumental flaws, for its sense of style and more classical feeling than the BSO generally manages, as well as for its shapeliness and the foretaste of Rossini in the playful finale.

But for this listener, the major excitement of a stimulating evening was the performance of Ives' "Three Places in New England." This marvellous score by the Connecticut Yankee insurance man-composer was directed and played with extraordinary polish and verve. Neither Ives' layering of sound-pictures, tonality and density, nor his simultaneous use of different rhythms and tempo were obstacles to Thomas, and whatever the complexity, his direction was unfailingly clear.

More than that, he captured the "feel" of the score and its Ivesian enthusiasm: the sense of endless, weary plodding in the St. Gaudens movement; the glorious din of General Putnam's camp; and the glassy impressionism of the Housatonic at Stockbridge.

After the Ives, the rest of the concert might have been anti-climax, but there were also fine performances of the Stravinsky Variations dedicated to Aldous Huxley. The Debussy's "La Mer." Stravinsky's lean serial transformations were repeated — to only cool applause. "La Mer" was not so much a sonic excercise as a demonstration of rhythmic suppleness, pulse, and a number of fine details.

Young Conductor Welcomed

By JOHN F. KYES
Gazette Music Critic

BOSTON — Michael Tilson Thomas, who's been seen here as guest conductor of the Boston Philharmonia and who won the Koussevitzky prize for conducting at Tanglewood, made his debut yesterday as assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and received a rousing welcome from the capacity audience in Symphony Hall.

This tall, slim young man in his middle twenties, with eloquent long arms and expressive hands, has already worked with many great musicians of the present day and is highly regarded by them. Stravinsky, Boulez, Bernstein all are enthusiastic.

Gazette Review

Thomas will be the regular pianist for the Boston Symphony Chamber Players.

Yesterday's program was diversified and revealing. Thomas contributed part of the program notes. Especially, he tried to explain to the layman the complex methods and ideas of Stravinsky's "Variations (Aldous Huxley in Memoriam)" The net result was respect for the technical skill of the conductor and players, rather than high enthusiasm.

This exploitation of "concise serial language" was composed in 1963 and 1964. This was the first performance in Boston.

The orchestra was reduced to about 40 players for Hydn's "Symphony No 98 in B flat." Thomas had the familiar Haydn elements of daintiness and incisiveness under complete control.

The change to Charles Ives' "Three Places in New England" was brilliant and stirring. Mysticism of souls marching to conflict was expressed in "The 'St. Gaudens' in Boston Common," the statue depicting Col. Shaw and his Negro regiment. "Putnam's Camp, Redding, Connecticut," had zestful use of novel techniques, like the two bands playing at once, in different tempos. "From the Housatonic at Stockbridge" pictured a "contented river."

These all stressed Thomas' power to let the orchestra sing, without consciousness of tight measures or techniques.

Debussy's "La Mer" was a continual delight, with its interplay between sunlight, waves, wind and sea.

This concert will be repeated tonight, also in Symphony Hall on Oct. 28, Dec. 18 and aJn. 13, in Cambridge on Jan. 20 and in Providence March 26.

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94 931

OCT 11 1969

11.

Thomas Impresses in Debut with Boston Symphony

By GEORGE GELLES
HT Music Critic

Michael Tilson Thomas is the Real Thing. The 24-year-old assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony made his debut with the orchestra yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall, and as they used to say, it was an auspicious occasion.

Watching Thomas work, first of all, is like looking in on the proverbial fish in water. His conducting technique flows naturally and his podium deportment is completely authoritative. Ther is nothing of the student, except in the best sense, about hs work.

AND HE'S EQUALLY impressive musically. Tempi he chose were never less than comfortable, often just right. Though at times he let the winds and percussion overwhelm the strings, Thomas showed a fine ear for balance and shading and a love of orchestral detail.

He has, as well, an easy melodic gift and an uncommon sense of style and phrasing. And he was also able to get the players to care about their work and to join him in the drama of every piece they played together.

The program he gave us was wide-ranging and meaty and accurately reflected Thomas' interests. Like his mentor, Pierre Boulez (to whom he was assistant in 1966 and '67), Thomas, above all, is temperamentally at one with the modern.

THE NEWEST PIECE he played was a Boston first, Stravinsky's 1964 memorial tribute to Aldous Huxley, his "Variations." This is serial Stravinsky, and prime. While Stravinsky once stated that "In writing variations my method is to remain faithful to the theme as a melody—never mind the rest" (referring obviously to passages in "Pulcinella" and the Octet and "Jeu de Cartes," for example), he more recently admitted that "Yes, the 'Variations' are different . . . it is ancient music, far older than you imagine."

What he had in mind, I think, was this. Every aspect of the Huxley "Variations" is intimately related to the number 12, which is the number of notes in his "tone row." The rhythmic scheme and the instrumentation and the tonal marrow of the piece all spring from a common seed; and in so doing, they spiritually relate the "Variations" to products of the Ars Nova and the more mannered phase of the Renaiisance. In a sense the Huxley piece is a tour de force, but one brilliant in conception and execution both.

THIS WAS THOMAS' toughest challenge, and he met it wonderfully well. Even though the writing is not all that difficult, there will clearly be a problem in teaching such a work to symphony men whose musical lives are lived in the 19th century. Yet both performances, for Thomas played it twice, were fyrstea; ehtrit twice, were first-rate; they were precise and vital and showed the Stravinsky as an eloquent, moving five minutes of music.

Charles Ives was the other modern, and how well he wears. His "Three Places in New England" are the best of that personal blend of late-Romantic harmony, in general, Mahler's evocative stance, in particular, and the most audacious and naive manipulation of native tunes.

What, for instance, can we find in the repertory to match those wonderful moments in "Putnam's Camp," the second "Place," where the most inane penny-whistle tune plays foil for a raccus, dissonant, very Ivesian march? We can find nothing.

AGAIN, THOMAS' reading was excellent, beautifully shaped and forceful and poetic and full of spirit, even if the balance at times got out of hand.

I found Thomas somewhat removed emotionally from the Haydn 98th Symphony that opened the afternoon. His reading was well thought out, well led and well played, but a bit cool for my taste.

Debussy's "La Mer," which closed the concert, was a pleasure as well, spacious and carefully paced, if without a special lightness and finesse. The reading lacked the immediacy of the two newer works we heard, but made clear just the same that Thomas is a major talent, a natural from whom we'll hear much more.

RKO GENERAL

WNAC • TV
RKO GENERAL BUILDING • GOVERNMENT CENTER
BOSTON, MASSACHUSETTS 02114 • 617-742-9000

SYMPHONY REVIEW BOOKSPAN FOR FRIDAY, OCTOBER 10, 1969

VIDEO

BOOKSPAN ON CAMERA

AUDIO

Thank you, Bill, and good evening, everyone. The Boston Symphony concerts this week-end may well become historic events as time goes on: they mark the first appearances here of the Orchestra's new Assistant Conductor, 24-year-old Michael Tilson Thomas.

BOOKSPAN FOR FRIDAY, OCTOBER 10, 1969

AUDIO

Well, like Bernstein, Michael Tilson Thomas seems to be a born conductor: he has tremendous authority on the podium and he is a marvelous musician, who throws himself into the music at hand and delivers performances of total commitment. And - wonder of wonders - his is basically a Romantic approach, with plenty of fire and passion. This kind of music-making hasn't been heard regularly at Symphony Hall for a good many years now - and it is doubly welcome.

The program is made up of a Haydn Symphony, the Three Places in New England by Charles Ives, the Variations in memory of Aldous Huxley by Stravinsky, and Debussy's La Mer. All of it benefits from the fine guiding hand of Michael Tilson Thomas. Mark the name well....we'll be hearing it more and more prominently from now on.

And now, back to Bill Brooks.

Thomas Shows Mature Skill

By Pe

Michael Boston with assistant co phony subs
William Ste ill during concerts las

In view
Boston Sy acclaim in Despite his conductor c musician w on the stag is fortunate

Actually, featured pi years' conc assistant to the Kousse Tanglewood
his confid precise ges

His pro
18th centu
98 in B-fla
20th centu
Stravinsky

The Ha clarity an chord, nec banter wit a pleasur flaws, for classical manages, and the fo finale.

But fo ment of performa
New Eng
the Conn composer extraordi
Ives' lay and dens different obstacles complexi clear.

More of the s the sens
the St.
din of glassy i Stockbri

After might h were Stravins
Huxley. The Debussy's "La Mer." Stravinsky's lean serial transformations were repeated — to only cool applause. "La Mer" was not so much a sonic excercise as a demonstration of rhythmic suppleness, pulse, and a number of fine details.

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.

OCT 29 1969

Young Conductor Welcomed

By JOHN F. KYES
Gazette Music Critic

BOSTON — Michael Tilson Thomas, who's been seen here as guest conductor of the Boston Philharmonia and who won the Koussevitzky prize for conducting at Tanglewood, made his debut yesterday as assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and received a rousing welcome from the capacity audience in Symphony Hall.

This tall, slim young man in his middle twenties, with eloquent long arms and expressive hands, has already worked with many great musicians of the present day and is highly regarded by them. Stravinsky, Boulez, Bernstein all are enthusiastic.

Gazette Review

Thomas will be the regular pianist for the Boston Symphony Chamber Players.

Yesterday's program was diversified and revealing. Thomas contributed part of the program notes. Especially, he tried to explain to the layman the complex methods and ideas of Stravinsky's "Variations (Aldous Huxley in Memoriam)" The net result was respect for the technical skill of the conductor and players, rather than high enthusiasm.

This exploitation of "concise serial language" was composed in 1963 and 1964. This was the first performance in Boston.

The orchestra was reduced to about 40 players for Hydn's "Symphony No 98 in B flat." Thomas had the familiar Haydn elements of daintiness and incisiveness under complete control.

The change to Charles Ives' "Three Places in New England" was brilliant and stirring. Mysticism of souls marching to conflict was expressed in "The 'St. Gaudens' in Boston Common," the statue depicting Col. Shaw and his Negro regiment. "Putnam's Camp, Redding, Connecticut," had zestful use of novel techniques, like the two bands playing at once, in different tempos. "From the Housatonic at Stockbridge" pictured a "contented river."

These all stressed Thomas' power to let the orchestra sing, without consciousness of tight measures or techniques.

Debussy's "La Mer" was a continual delight, with its interplay between sunlight, waves, wind and sea.

This concert will be repeated tonight, also in Symphony Hall on Oct. 28, Dec. 18 and aJn. 13, in Cambridge on Jan. 20 and in Providence March 26.

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS

OCT 11 1969

12.

Casadesus joins symphony Oct. 17, 18

OCT 11 1969

Robert Casadesus, the distinguished French-American pianist, joins Music Director William Steinberg and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the fourth program of the 1969-1970 season, Friday afternoon Oct. 17 at 2 p.m. and Saturday evening October 18 at 8:30 p.m. They will play Mozart's Piano concerto in c minor, K. 491.

William Steinberg opens the program with Benjamin Lees' Symphony no. 2, composed in the late 1950s under a commission from the Louisville Symphony and premiered by that orchestra. The program closes with the Second symphony of Brahms.

Robert Casadesus is an outstanding member of an outstanding French musical family. His wife, Gaby, and son, Jean, are also noted pianists who appear in concert with him on occasion, and he himself is a composer as well as one of this century's first-rank pianists. He appeared with the Boston Symphony for the first time in March, 1938, and last played with the orchestra in Edinburgh in August, 1956.

The Orchestra's Tuesday "B" series opens Tuesday, Oct. 14 at 7:30 p.m. William Steinberg conducts Haydn's Symphony no. 55 ("The Schoolmaster"), Robert Starer's Concerto for violin, cello, and orchestra and Elgar's Symphony no. 2. Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein and Principal cellist Jules Eskin are soloists in the Starer concerto.

The first of this season's informal Open Rehearsals is Thursday, Oct. 16 at 7:30 p.m. William Steinberg will rehearse the next afternoon's concert, with Robert Casadesus as piano solo. All seats are unreserved at the single price of $3. Until concert time, subscribers may buy tickets for all seven of the season's Open Rehearsals for $17.50. The income from the Open Rehearsals benefits the Orchestra's Pension Fund.

MUSIC

William Steinberg leads the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood

STEINBERG: first rate at times, limited at times

By GEORGE GELLES
HT Music Critic

With two of his twelve regular Boston Symphony programs past, William Steinberg—who this week has given the podium to Michael Tilson Thomas, BSO Assistant Conductor—has already told us much about himself, through both choice of pieces and performance. It's clear that with a certain slice of the repertory he's thoroughly at home, elsewhere less so, and clear as well that in important ways his scope seems limited.

So far Steinberg has given us performances of Strauss and Elgar that were both first-rate. In speaking of Elgar after last week's concert, I compared him to Strauss in matters of orchestration, instrumental disposition and so forth, but there was more on my mind than that alone.

Both composers, to simplify somewhat, wrote scores filled with extra-musical meaning, offering the conductor a second plane on which he might operate. Strauss did this openly; his "Till Eulenspiegel," which Steinberg led opening week, is a wide-ranging canvas covering the exploits of the 14th century daredevil who was stilled only by the Black Death.

Through much of the Strauss scenario a one-to-one relation to "Till's" pranks can be plotted (and, in fact, Strauss seems to have been drawn to "Till" by an opera that he saw in Weimar, "Eulenspiegel," by Cyrill Kistler). In any event, the score is highly literary-minded in conception, about things other than music alone.

GEORGE GELLES has been appointed music critic of the Boston Herald Traveler. A one-time student of the Juilliard and Manhattan Schools of Music, cum laude graduate of Princeton, graduate student at Brandeis and the Free University of Berlin, Gelles' duties at the Herald Traveler are effective immediately.

THIS IS TRUE, too, of the other piece that Steinberg led so well, the Elgar Second Symphony, of course, the piece is not programmatic. Elgar was heir to late-Romantic symphonic techniques, and he was rigorous in his adherence to a formal lay-out of times not too far past. Which, in fact, accounts for musical weaknesses—the time-killing fugue in the finale, for instance.

But the Second, on one level stays close to the physical world. Elgar prefaced the score with a couplet from Shelley's "Invocation," setting the poetic tone of the piece, and even described the work as "the passionate pilgrimage of a soul."

Like so much of Elgar's music, it is closely connected with the lives of him and his friends, in this case Alice Stuart-Wortley, the female dearest to him after his wife, and Albert Rodewald, a textile magnate and amateur musician. And thus, in its own way, the Second is not only self-sufficient as absolute music, but is a reflection of the drama of Elgar's everyday life.

Elgar's musical dialect is naturally different from that spoken by Strauss, but in essence, much of the musical conflict and story-telling sensibility of their pieces is akin.

STEINBERG IS excellent with this sort of score. It takes him, perhaps, back to situations similar to those he faced in the opera house, where he was trained. And with works staged and sung, Steinberg here has emotionally volatile dramatically fluid scores, and putting such stories across he does very well.

Far less good was his work with the purely symphonic Schubert 7th and Haydn 55th. Again to simplify, the basic problem of both these pieces is met in articulating large-scale constructions, in making formal sense of abstract material free of extra-musical associations. And in both these pieces the results were ill-proportioned and poorly judged.

The final point I would make is this: that in his choice of contemporary scores Steinberg is sadly out of touch. At his first meeting with the local press, Steinberg sensibly stated that he would play only music with which he could "identify emotionally, sentimentally, and intellectually."

But if Robert Starer's Double Concerto, which we got last week, is typical of his tastes and capabilities, then in Steinberg the BSO has found a man not truly representative of the best and most adventurous in music today, and not completely responsible to his audience.

MINUTE MAN
LEXINGTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 2,028

MINUTEMAN
BEDFORD, MASS.
WEEKLY 3,100

OCT 9 1969 OCT 9 1969

BURLINGTON TIMES
UNION
WEEKLY

OCT 9 1969

Boston Symphony

Robert Casadesus, the distinguished French-American pianist, joins Music Director William Steinberg and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the fourth program of the 1969-1970 season, Friday afternoon, Oct. 17, at 2 p.m. and Saturday evening Oct. 18, at 8:30 p.m. They will play Mozart's Piano concerto in c minor, K. 491.

ITEM
LYNN, MASS.
(E) 46,000

OCT 9 1969

CITIZEN
BELMONT, MASS.
DAILY 4,000

FENCE VIEWER
SUDBURY, MASS
WEEKLY 3,510

STANDARD-TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
(E) 70,000 (S) 80,000

OCT 9 196 OCT 9 19

OCT 19 1969

A Note on William Steinberg

One of the busiest men in the world of music, William Steinberg, who now holds simultaneously two of the most important positions in American music, director of the Pittsburgh Symphony and of the Boston Symphony, made his Tuesday "B" Series debut with the Boston group last week.

To manage two simultaneous music directorships is not new for Steinberg; between 1958 and 60, he commuted regularly between Pittsburgh and London because he was, during that period, also music director of the London Philharmonic.

In his Symphony Hall program, which included Haydn's "Schoolmaster" Symphony, Starer's "Concerto for Violin, Cello, and Orchestra," and Elgar's "Symphony No. 2," Steinberg displayed the same conducting technique and precise musicianship that I have heretofore seen him evidence in his guest appearances at Tanglewood and in his performances locally with both the Buffalo and Pittsburgh orchestras. He is not a showy man with the baton; rather, using his right hand almost exclusively, he conducts with a firm steady beat, and, when the orchestra sounds especially good, rewards the players with what can be best described as a beatific smile.

Fortunately, on last Tuesday night the orchestra was in excellent form. Soloists Joseph Silverstein and Jules Eskin were certainy competent in the Starer concerto — with its Schoenbergian overtones; there was plenty of spectacular sound in the Elgar, and the Haydn, not one of the master's more substantial works, was performed with admirable clarity and considerable charm.

It is obvious that there is a workmanlike conductor of wide and varied experience at the helm of the Boston Symphony.

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Friday afternoon October 17 1969 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening October 18 1969 at 8.30

WILLIAM STEINBERG conductor

MOZART — Masonic funeral music K. 477
in memory of G. Wallace Woodworth

Benjamin LEES — Symphony no. 2
Andante mesto – vivo – tempo primo
Scherzo
Adagio
first performance in Boston

MOZART — Piano concerto in C minor K. 491
Allegro
Larghetto
Allegretto
ROBERT CASADESUS

intermission

BRAHMS — Symphony no. 2 in D op. 73*
Allegro non troppo
Adagio non troppo
Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino
Allegro con spirito

THE SOLOIST

ROBERT CASADESUS, who has played with the Boston Symphony on many occasions since his first appearance in 1938, was born in Paris into a family of artists and musicians. He started to study the piano at the age of four, and when he was twelve he entered the Paris Conservatoire. While there he won all the major awards. During his career he has played recitals in many parts of the world, has appeared with major orchestras and has been active as a composer. He made his debut in the United States with the New York Philharmonic in 1935, and since then he has appeared in New York alone more than 200 times.

Robert Casadesus has given many recitals with the violinist Zino Francescatti, and with his wife Gaby, also a distinguished pianist. Husband and wife are occasionally joined by their son Jean in triple piano concerts. He has been named a Commander of the Legion of Honor in his native France, and the Queen of the Netherlands has appointed him a Commander of the Order of Orange-Nassau. He has made many recordings for Columbia Records.

G. WALLACE WOODWORTH

November 6 1902 — July 18 1969

Born in Boston, G. Wallace Woodworth received from Harvard University the AB degree with honors in history in 1924, and the AM degree in music in 1926. He began his career of teaching and conducting at Harvard in 1925, and was for many years James Edward Ditson Professor of Music.

Professor Woodworth was known to many students of music for the course he gave at Harvard on the history of music. He is remembered too by the countless singers who were members of the Radcliffe Choral Society, which he led for 33 years, and of the Harvard Glee Club, of which he was conductor for 25 years. Professor Woodworth was best known to Symphony audiences for his weekly radio 'Rehearsal' of 'This week's Symphony', which he broadcast for seventeen seasons since WGBH-FM opened in 1951. The program received the national award of the Institute for Education by Radio-TV for the best radio program in the humanities — 'exceptional in spontaneity, authenticity and comprehensiveness'.

Professor Woodworth — known affectionately to everybody as 'Woody' — conducted several concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and there are especially fond memories of his interpretations of Stravinsky's Oedipus Rex, Bach's Mass in B minor and of works by Mozart. Woody's many friends will surely be happy to know that a sum of money has been donated to the Orchestra in his memory, and that a metal plate engraved with his name has been affixed to the seat in Symphony Hall — W 1 on the floor — where he sat for many years.

Droopy Reading Mars Lees' 2nd

By GEORGE GELLES

"Safety first" was the Boston Symphony's motto yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall. The program was conservative and the soloist sure and dependable, but in laying so little on the line, in taking few chances, William Steinberg gained almost nothing in a concert that through its first half was dull as paint.

Benjamin Lees is a 45-year-old who teaches at the Peabody Conservatory in Baltimore, and his Second Symphony was the afternoon's unknown quantity. The really crucial question I'll only ask here: that is, with works of Sessions and Kirchner and Carter virtually unplayed by the BSO, why was the spotlight thrown on a work written 11 years ago by Lees, who in no quarter is acknowledged a Modern Master? Priorities, to say the least, are jumbled.

BUT LEES is by no means a bad composer. Formally he is highly traditional and he speaks a musical language no racier than Bartok's, whom in many other ways he resembles—in the shape and content of large-scale gestures, in finely wrought, closely detailed ornamentation draped over slow music, in quickly alternating rhythmic patterns, giving the surface of the Second many twists and turns, and in the disposition of the orchestra itself.

Lees composes very well. There are no loose ends musically, for he realizes the consequences of each move and logically follows through. The Second is a serious work, an enjoyable and good one, if essentially its substance is thin. And although I expect I'd like any Lees piece once through over, several hearing the scores, I imagine, would wear less well.

The performance on Friday was sadly inadequate. Steinberg stuck his nose in the score with the first downbeat and rarely took it out. The Second may not be Great Art, but in a crisp, heads-up performance it could be far more engrossing than Steinberg's droopy reading made it.

• Robert Casadesus was soloist in Mozart's C Minor Piano Concerto, and considering that he's now a septuagenarian, it was an amazing performance for its technical fluidity, its freshness and elan.

BUT CASADESUS'S playing left much to the imagination; dynamics, for instance, or elegance of phrasing, or variety of articulation, or proper ornamentation. What we got was a reading far too smooth, homogenized in every way and without drama.

Steinberg, for his part, did little more than beat time. He has been most disappointing, to date, in his apparent lack of involvement with his players, in his neglecting to fix balances and his easy acceptance of any old sound that comes from his woodwinds. In part, it was vulgar, out-of-tune clarinet playing that spoiled the orchestral half of the Mozart, but more basic, and more troubling, was the way Steinberg let these things get by.

The Second Brahms Symphony ended the afternoon, and finally conducting without a score, Steinberg came to life. His reading offered no insights, was rough and without a drop of polish, but it was well-paced (especially in the finale, where the silent downbeats felt just right) and if only on a gut level, exciting and forceful.

AS A PREFACE, the concert opened with Mozart's "Masonic Funeral Music," K. 477, played in memory of G. Wallace Woodworth, who died this past summer.

Affectionately and universally known as "Woody," Woodworth was Ditson Professor of Music at Harvard. He headed for years the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Harvard Glee Club, but was most familiar to Symphony audiences through his weekly radio show, "This Week's Symphony."

In so honoring him, the Symphony program was taken some 10 minutes past its 4 P. M. end, and what was intended as a tribute turned into a travesty, as many of the ladies fairly tripped over one another in a stampede for the doors before the Brahms was done. It was a disgraceful display, and Woody would have been deeply dismayed.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
OCT 18 1969 Ex

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300
OCT 18 1969 New England Newsclip

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
OCT 18 1969 New England Newsclip

BSO concert as gray as the skies

By HARRY NEVILLE

Yesterday was not one of the Boston Symphony's better days. The music inside Symphony Hall, as a matter of fact, seemed every bit as monochromatic as the skies outside. The latter held a vague intimation at least of something threatening, but nothing so interesting emanated from conductor William Steinberg and the BSO

Contributing to this impression was the Second Symphony of Benjamin Lees, a work which was receiving its first Boston performance. It is a piece that invites the question: "Why this and not some other work?" Wahtever the reasons for programming this symphony, it rather strains the imagination to fathom them.

Not that it shouldn't be playedor shouldn't have been writeen — Lee's craftsmanship is unassailable and he develops his ideas with a logic that is clear, although annoyingly circumspect. But, as the contemporary music festival at Berkshire showed us this Summer, there is symphonic music being written today that is urgent, compelling and enormously attractive — things that Lees' symphony is not — and it seems sad and unnecessary that the very limited space made available to the new should go to the second-rate.

Robert Casadesus appeared as soloist in Mozart's Piano Concerto in C minor, . 491, which is surely one of that composer's greatest concertos and one, moreover, that Casdesus has in the past played with surpassing beauty.

Yesterday, the -ianist seemed not at all in his best form, giving a performance that was oddly indifferent from beginning to end.

It is true that the cconcerto maintains throughout a certain sameness of mood — that marvelously sustained, all-pervading melancholy that can be found also in the G minor string quintet — but within that emotional context there are ideas of striking contrast, and little of that ccame through yesterday. Casadesus uses a first movement cadenza — I would guess by Saint Saens — that struck this listener as being a trifle egregious.

Brahms' Symphony No. 2 concluded the program. (It had begun with Mozart's Masonic funeral music as a tribute to the late G. Wallace Woodworth.) It got playing that in the final mmovement at least had a kind of frennzied life about it, but not much there or elsewhere in the way of textural clarity.

ROBERT CASADESUS AT THE PIANO

Mozart Concerto Performed Brilliantly

By L. DAVID HARRIS
Music Critic

Let the reader beware of a reviewer's prejudices.

Indead, this reviewer is strongly pro-Mozart. A Mozart concerto or symphony hits him deeply; he has been known to shed tears of joy and emotion during "Don Giovanni" at the Met.

The whole thing is very, very embarrassing, particularly when the reviewer fancies himself a 'hard, tough newsman" when not occupying a concert seat. But that's the way it is.

Consequently, the reader will have to allow for all this when he reads here that Robert Casadesus, a master of a concert pianist, brilliantly performed Mozart's "Concerto for Piano and Orchestra No. 24 in C Minor" yesterday with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Giving the pianist his due: His presentation was balanced. When playing Mozart there must be a middle ground — and Casadesus found it. The music cannot be all gentility, grace and elegance, and neither can it be all lively and flashing. Many pianists tend to favor one of the two approaches, but not Casadesus.

Casadesus covered the grave eloquence of the first movement, the beautiful calmness of the second. His phrasing was pure Mozart — gradually allowing his music to rise in intensity and then dramatically finishing it off with a striking — indeed, resounding — final chord.

There also was a dualism to his playing—emphasizing both the gloom and the smiles of the music, and the feeling in Mozart that so moves this reviewer — a tension of sadness and longing against a backdrop of other musical emotions — was often present.

Interestingly enough, the work is the only one of Mozart's concertos using both clarinets and oboes and this reviewer had planned to note the consequent sounds when they occurred in the music. It wasn't to be—he got wrapped up in Casadesus he forgot all about clarinets and oboes.

The symphony also premiered (in Boston) Benjamin Lees' "Symphony No. 2" and following its performance the composer took bows to waves of applause.

The orchestra performed it quite well and if concert goers took advantage of their excellent program notes, they no doubt found the symphony a facinating listening experience.

But without the program helps and simply on the basis of sound, it seemed to not have the magnetic quality of some other 20th century music (including other works by Lees).

However, it did have an abundance of melody, seemed quite original and in its own way had a fair share of musical surprises—in tones, harmonies, theme development, etc. But, with the exception of some strong moments in the second movement, it didn't stir the audience.

At the concert's beginning, the orchestra played a memoriam (Mozart's funeral music) to Dr. G. Wallace Woodworth, former Harvard music professor, area conductor and moderator of the weekly radio "Rehearsal" of "This Week's Symphony" on a local radio station.

The program noted a "sum of money" has been donated to the orchestra in Prof. Woodworth's memory and a metal plate engraved with his name has been affixed to the seat in Symphony Hall — W1 on the floor—where he sat for many years.

The concert concluded with an enjoyable, competent performance of Brahms' Second Symphony. To the director, William Steinberg's, credit, there was a good balance between the lyrical and dramatic sections, yet it wasn't overdone.

This reviewer had expected a little more with respect to the woodwinds in the beginning of the third movement and the combined violin-horn work in the finale. But strong "plus" points were beautiful cello passages and later spectacular brass playing in the finale.

The excellent balance between brass and other sections was kept even up to the very end, when it might be said an "even" balance was traded — perhaps unintentionally — for an "effective" one. The concertgoer left with one high trumpet note dramatically echoing in his ear.

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Friday afternoon October 17 1969 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening October 18 1969 at 8.30

WILLIAM STEINBERG conductor

MOZART — Masonic funeral music K. 477
in memory of G. Wallace Woodworth

Benjamin LEES — Symphony no. 2
Andante mesto – vivo – tempo primo
Scherzo
Adagio
first performance in Boston

MOZART — Piano concerto in C minor K. 491
Allegro
Larghetto
Allegretto
ROBERT CASADESUS

intermission

BRAHMS — Symphony no. 2 in D op. 73*
Allegro non troppo
Adagio non troppo
Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino
Allegro con spirito

THE SOLOIST

ROBERT CASADESUS, who has played with the Boston Symphony on many occasions since his first appearance in 1938, was born in Paris into a family of artists and musicians. He started to study the piano at the age of four, and when he was twelve he entered the Paris Conservatoire. While there he won all the major awards. During his career he has played recitals in many parts of the world, has appeared with major orchestras and has been active as a composer. He made his debut in the United States with the New York Philharmonic in 1935, and since then he has appeared in New York alone more than 200 times.

Robert Casadesus has given many recitals with the violinist Zino Francescatti, and with his wife Gaby, also a distinguished pianist. Husband and wife are occasionally joined by their son Jean in triple piano concerts. He has been named a Commander of the Legion of Honor in his native France, and the Queen of the Netherlands has appointed him a Commander of the Order of Orange-Nassau. He has made many recordings for Columbia Records.

G. WALLACE WOODWORTH

November 6 1902 — July 18 1969

Born in Boston, G. Wallace Woodworth received from Harvard University the AB degree with honors in history in 1924, and the AM degree in music in 1926. He began his career of teaching and conducting at Harvard in 1925, and was for many years James Edward Ditson Professor of Music.

Professor Woodworth was known to many students of music for the course he gave at Harvard on the history of music. He is remembered too by the countless singers who were members of the Radcliffe Choral Society, which he led for 33 years, and of the Harvard Glee Club, of which he was conductor for 25 years. Professor Woodworth was best known to Symphony audiences for his weekly radio 'Rehearsal' of 'This week's Symphony', which he broadcast for seventeen seasons since WGBH-FM opened in 1951. The program received the national award of the Institute for Education by Radio-TV for the best radio program in the humanities — 'exceptional in spontaneity, authenticity and comprehensiveness'.

Professor Woodworth — known affectionately to everybody as 'Woody' — conducted several concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and there are especially fond memories of his interpretations of Stravinsky's Oedipus Rex, Bach's Mass in B minor and of works by Mozart. Woody's many friends will surely be happy to know that a sum of money has been donated to the Orchestra in his memory, and that a metal plate engraved with his name has been affixed to the seat in Symphony Hall — W 1 on the floor — where he sat for many years.

Droopy Reading Mars Lees' 2nd

By GEORGE GELLES

"Safety first" was the Boston Symphony's motto yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall. The program was conservative and the soloist sure and dependable, but in laying so little on the line, in taking few chances, William Steinberg gained almost nothing in a concert that through its first half was dull as paint.

Benjamin Lees is a 45-year-old who teaches at the Peabody Conservatory in Baltimore, and his Second Symphony was the afternoon's unknown quantity. The really crucial question I'll only ask here: that is, with works of Sessions and Kirchner and Carter virtually unplayed by the BSO, why was the spotlight thrown on a work written 11 years ago by Lees, who in no quarter is acknowledged a Modern Master? Priorities, to say the least, are jumbled.

BUT LEES is by no means a bad composer. Formally he is highly traditional and he speaks a musical language no racier than Bartok's, whom in many other ways he resembles—in the shape and content of large-scale gestures, in finely wrought, closely detailed ornamentation draped over slow music, in quickly alternating rhythmic patterns, giving the surface of the Second many twists and turns, and in the disposition of the orchestra itself.

Lees composes very well. There are no loose ends musically, for he realizes the consequences of each move and logically follows through. The Second is a serious work, an enjoyable and good one, if essentially its substance is thin. And although I expect I'd like any Lees piece once through over, several hearing the scores, I imagine, would wear less well.

The performance on Friday was sadly inadequate. Steinberg stuck his nose in the score with the first downbeat and rarely took it out. The Second may not be Great Art, but in a crisp, heads-up performance it could be far more engrossing than Steinberg's droopy reading made it.

• Robert Casadesus was soloist in Mozart's C Minor Piano Concerto, and considering that he's now a septuagenarian, it was an amazing performance for its technical fluidity, its freshness and elan.

BUT CASADESUS'S playing left much to the imagination; dynamics, for instance, or elegance of phrasing, or variety of articulation, or proper ornamentation. What we got was a reading far too smooth, homogenized in every way and without drama.

Steinberg, for his part, did little more than beat time. He has been most disappointing, to date, in his apparent lack of involvement with his players, in his neglecting to fix balances and his easy acceptance of any old sound that comes from his woodwinds. In part, it was vulgar, out-of-tune clarinet playing that spoiled the orchestral half of the Mozart, but more basic, and more troubling, was the way Steinberg let these things get by.

The Second Brahms Symphony ended the afternoon, and finally conducting without a score, Steinberg came to life. His reading offered no insights, was rough and without a drop of polish, but it was well-paced (especially in the finale, where the silent downbeats felt just right) and if only on a gut level, exciting and forceful.

AS A PREFACE, the concert opened with Mozart's "Masonic Funeral Music," K. 477, played in memory of G. Wallace Woodworth, who died this past summer.

Affectionately and universally known as "Woody," Woodworth was Ditson Professor of Music at Harvard. He headed for years the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Harvard Glee Club, but was most familiar to Symphony audiences through his weekly radio show, "This Week's Symphony."

In so honoring him, the Symphony program was taken some 10 minutes past its 4 P. M. end, and what was intended as a tribute turned into a travesty, as many of the ladies fairly tripped over one another in a stampede for the doors before the Brahms was done. It was a disgraceful display, and Woody would have been deeply dismayed.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
OCT 18 1969

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
OCT 18 1969
New England Newsclip

ROBERT CASADESUS AT THE PIANO

Mozart Concerto Performed Brilliantly

By L. DAVID HARRIS
Music Critic

Let the reader beware of a reviewer's prejudices.

Indeed, this reviewer is strongly pro-Mozart. A Mozart concerto or symphony stirs him deeply; he has been known to shed tears of joy and emotion during "Don Giovanni" at the Met.

The whole thing is very, very embarrassing, particularly when the reviewer fancies himself a "hard, tough newsman" when not occupying a concert seat. But that's the way it is.

Consequently, the reader will have to allow for all this when he reads here that Robert Casadesus, a master of a concert pianist, brilliantly performed Mozart's "Concerto for Piano and Orchestra No. 24 in C Minor" yesterday with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Giving the pianist his due: His presentation was balanced. When playing Mozart there must be a middle ground — and Casadesus found it. The music cannot be all gentility, grace and elegance, and neither can it be all lively and flashing. Many pianists tend to favor one of the two approaches, but not Casadesus.

Casadesus covered the grave eloquence of the first movement, the beautiful calmness of the second. His phrasing was pure Mozart — gradually allowing his music to rise in intensity and then dramatically finishing it off with a striking — indeed, resounding — final chord.

There also was a dualism to his playing—emphasizing both the gloom and the smiles of the music, and the feeling in Mozart that so moves this reviewer — a tension of sadness and longing against a backdrop of other musical emotions — was often present.

Interestingly enough, the work is the only one of Mozart's concertos using both clarinets and oboes and this reviewer had planned to note the consequent sounds when they occurred in the music. It wasn't to be—he got wrapped up in Casadesus he forgot all about clarinets and oboes.

The symphony also premiered (in Boston) Benjamin Lees' "Symphony No. 2" and following its performance the composer took bows to waves of applause.

The orchestra performed it quite well and if concert goers took advantage of their excellent program notes, they no doubt found the symphony a facinating listening experience.

But without the program helps and simply on the basis of sound, it seemed to not have the magnetic quality of some other 20th century music (including other works by Lees).

However, it did have an abundance of melody, seemed quite original and in its own way had a fair share of musical surprises—in tones, harmonies, theme development, etc. But, with the exception of some strong moments in the second movement, it didn't stir the audience.

At the concert's beginning, the orchestra played a memoriam (Mozart's funeral music) to Dr. G. Wallace Woodworth, former Harvard music professor, area conductor and moderator of the weekly radio "Rehearsal" of "This Week's Symphony" on a local radio station.

The program noted a "sum of money" has been donated to the orchestra in Prof. Woodworth's memory and a metal plate engraved with his name has been affixed to the seat in Symphony Hall — W1 on the floor—where he sat for many years.

The concert concluded with an enjoyable, competent performance of Brahms' Second Symphony. To the director, William Steinberg's, credit, there was a good balance between the lyrical and dramatic sections, yet it wasn't overdone.

This reviewer had expected a little more with respect to the woodwinds in the beginning of the third movement and the combined violin-horn work in the finale. But strong "plus" points were beautiful cello passages and later spectacular brass playing in the finale.

The excellent balance between brass and other sections was kept even up to the very end, when it might be said an "even" balance was traded — perhaps unintentionally — for an "effective" one. The concertgoer left with one high trumpet note dramatically echoing in his ear.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
OCT 18 1969
New England Newsclip

BSO concert as gray as the skies

By HARRY NEVILLE

Yesterday was not one of the Boston Symphony's better days. The music inside Symphony Hall, as a matter of fact, seemed every bit as monochromatic as the skies outside. The latter held a vague intimation at least of something threatening, but nothing so interesting emanated from conductor William Steinberg and the BSO

Contributing to this impression was the Second Symphony of Benjamin Lees, a work which was receiving its first Boston performance. It is a piece that invites the question: "Why this and not some other work?" Wahtever the reasons for programming this symphony, it rather strains the imagination to fathom them.

Not that it shouldn't be playedor shouldn't have been writeen — Lee's craftsmanship is unassailable and he develops his ideas with a logic that is clear, although annoyingly circumspect. But, as the contemporary music festival at Berkshire showed us this Summer, there is symphonic music being written today that is urgent, compelling and enormously attractive — things that Lees' symphony is not — and it seems sad and unnecessary that the very limited space made available to the new should go to the second-rate.

Robert Casadesus appeared as soloist in Mozart's Piano Concerto in C minor, . 491, which is surely one of that composer's greatest concertos and one, moreover, that Casdesus has in the past played with surpassing beauty.

Yesterday, the -ianist seemed not at all in his best form, giving a performance that was oddly indifferent from beginning to end.

It is true that the cconcerto maintains throughout a certain sameness of mood — that marvelously sustained, all-pervading melancholy that can be found also in the G minor string quintet — but within that emotional context there are ideas of striking contrast, and little of that ccame through yesterday. Casadesus uses a first movement cadenza — I would guess by Saint Saens — that struck this listener as being a trifle egregious.

Brahms' Symphony No. 2 concluded the program. (It had begun with Mozart's Masonic funeral music as a tribute to the late G. Wallace Woodworth.) It got playing that in the final mmovement at least had a kind of frennzied life about it, but not much there or elsewhere in the way of textural clarity.

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Friday afternoon October 17 1969 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening October 18 1969 at 8.30

WILLIAM STEINBERG conductor

MOZART — Masonic funeral music K. 477
in memory of G. Wallace Woodworth

Benjamin LEES — Symphony no. 2
Andante mesto – vivo – tempo primo
Scherzo
Adagio
first performance in Boston

MOZART — Piano concerto in C minor K. 491
Allegro
Larghetto
Allegretto
ROBERT CASADESUS

intermission

BRAHMS — Symphony no. 2 in D op. 73*
Allegro non troppo
Adagio non troppo
Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino
Allegro con spirito

THE SOLOIST

ROBERT CASADESUS, who has played with the Boston Symphony on many occasions since his first appearance in 1938, was born in Paris into a family of artists and musicians. He started to study the piano at the age of four, and when he was twelve he entered the Paris Conservatoire. While there he won all the major awards. During his career he has played recitals in many parts of the world, has appeared with major orchestras and has been active as a composer. He made his debut in the United States with the New York Philharmonic in 1935, and since then he has appeared in New York alone more than 200 times.

Robert Casadesus has given many recitals with the violinist Zino Francescatti, and with his wife Gaby, also a distinguished pianist. Husband and wife are occasionally joined by their son Jean in triple piano concerts. He has been named a Commander of the Legion of Honor in his native France, and the Queen of the Netherlands has appointed him a Commander of the Order of Orange-Nassau. He has made many recordings for Columbia Records.

G. WALLACE WOODWORTH

November 6 1902 — July 18 1969

Born in Boston, G. Wallace Woodworth received from Harvard University the AB degree with honors in history in 1924, and the AM degree in music in 1926. He began his career of teaching and conducting at Harvard in 1925, and was for many years James Edward Ditson Professor of Music.

Professor Woodworth was known to many students of music for the course he gave at Harvard on the history of music. He is remembered too by the countless singers who were members of the Radcliffe Choral Society, which he led for 33 years, and of the Harvard Glee Club, of which he was conductor for 25 years. Professor Woodworth was best known to Symphony audiences for his weekly radio 'Rehearsal' of 'This week's Symphony', which he broadcast for seventeen seasons since WGBH-FM opened in 1951. The program received the national award of the Institute for Education by Radio-TV for the best radio program in the humanities — 'exceptional in spontaneity, authenticity and comprehensiveness'.

Professor Woodworth — known affectionately to everybody as 'Woody' — conducted several concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and there are especially fond memories of his interpretations of Stravinsky's Oedipus Rex, Bach's Mass in B minor and of works by Mozart. Woody's many friends will surely be happy to know that a sum of money has been donated to the Orchestra in his memory, and that a metal plate engraved with his name has been affixed to the seat in Symphony Hall — W 1 on the floor — where he sat for many years.

Droopy Reading Mars Lees' 2nd

By GEORGE GELLES

"Safety first" was the Boston Symphony's motto yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall. The program was conservative and the soloist sure and dependable, but in laying so little on the line, in taking few chances, William Steinberg gained almost nothing in a concert that through its first half was dull as paint.

Benjamin Lees is a 45-year-old who teaches at the Peabody Conservatory in Baltimore, and his Second Symphony was the afternoon's unknown quantity. The really crucial question I'll only ask here: that is, with works of Sessions and Kirchner and Carter virtually unplayed by the BSO, why was the spotlight thrown on a work written 11 years ago by Lees, who in no quarter is acknowledged a Modern Master? Priorities, to say the least, are jumbled.

BUT LEES is by no means a bad composer. Formally he is highly traditional and he speaks a musical language no racier than Bartok's, whom in many other ways he resembles—in the shape and content of large-scale gestures, in finely wrought, closely detailed ornamentation draped over slow music, in quickly alternating rhythmic patterns, giving the surface of the Second many twists and turns, and in the disposition of the orchestra itself.

Lees composes very well. There are no loose ends musically, for he realizes the consequences of each move and logically follows through. The Second is a serious work, an enjoyable and good one, if essentially its substance is thin. And although I expect I'd like any Lees piece once through over, several hearing the scores, I imagine, would wear less well.

The performance on Friday was sadly inadequate. Steinberg stuck his nose in the score with the first downbeat and rarely took it out. The Second may not be Great Art, but in a crisp, heads-up performance it could be far more engrossing than Steinberg's droopy reading made it.

• Robert Casadesus was soloist in Mozart's C Minor Piano Concerto, and considering that he's now a septuagenarian, it was an amazing performance for its technical fluidity, its freshness and elan.

BUT CASADESUS'S playing left much to the imagination; dynamics, for instance, or elegance of phrasing, or variety of articulation, or proper ornamentation. What we got was a reading far too smooth, homogenized in every way and without drama.

Steinberg, for his part, did little more than beat time. He has been most disappointing, to date, in his apparent lack of involvement with his players, in his neglecting to fix balances and his easy acceptance of any old sound that comes from his woodwinds. In part, it was vulgar, out-of-tune clarinet playing that spoiled the orchestral half of the Mozart, but more basic, and more troubling, was the way Steinberg let these things get by.

The Second Brahms Symphony ended the afternoon, and finally conducting without a score, Steinberg came to life. His reading offered no insights, was rough and without a drop of polish, but it was well-paced (especially in the finale, where the silent downbeats felt just right) and if only on a gut level, exciting and forceful.

AS A PREFACE, the concert opened with Mozart's "Masonic Funeral Music," K. 477, played in memory of G. Wallace Woodworth, who died this past summer.

Affectionately and universally known as "Woody," Woodworth was Ditson Professor of Music at Harvard. He headed for years the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Harvard Glee Club, but was most familiar to Symphony audiences through his weekly radio show, "This Week's Symphony."

In so honoring him, the Symphony program was taken some 10 minutes past its 4 P. M. end, and what was intended as a tribute turned into a travesty, as many of the ladies fairly tripped over one another in a stampede for the doors before the Brahms was done. It was a disgraceful display, and Woody would have been deeply dismayed.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
OCT 18 1969

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300
OCT 18 1969

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
OCT 18 1969

BSO concert as gray as the skies

By HARRY NEVILLE

Yesterday was not one of the Boston Symphony's better days. The music inside Symphony Hall, as a matter of fact, seemed every bit as monochromatic as the skies outside. The latter held a vague intimation at least of something threatening, but nothing so interesting emanated from conductor William Steinberg and the BSO

Contributing to this impression was the Second Symphony of Benjamin Lees, a work which was receiving its first Boston performance. It is a piece that invites the question: "Why this and not some other work?" Wahtever the reasons for programming this symphony, it rather strains the imagination to fathom them.

Not that it shouldn't be playedor shouldn't have been writeen — Lee's craftsmanship is unassailable and he develops his ideas with a logic that is clear, although annoyingly circumspect. But, as the contemporary music festival at Berkshire showed us this Summer, there is symphonic music being written today that is urgent, compelling and enormously attractive — things that Lees' symphony is not — and it seems sad and unnecessary that the very limited space made available to the new should go to the second-rate.

Robert Casadesus appeared as soloist in Mozart's Piano Concerto in C minor, . 491, which is surely one of that composer's greatest concertos and one, moreover, that Casdesus has in the past played with surpassing beauty.

Yesterday, the -ianist seemed not at all in his best form, giving a performance that was oddly indifferent from beginning to end.

It is true that the cconcerto maintains throughout a certain sameness of mood — that marvelously sustained, all-pervading melancholy that can be found also in the G minor string quintet — but within that emotional context there are ideas of striking contrast, and little of that ccame through yesterday. Casadesus uses a first movement cadenza — I would guess by Saint Saens — that struck this listener as being a trifle egregious.

Brahms' Symphony No. 2 concluded the program. (It had begun with Mozart's Masonic funeral music as a tribute to the late G. Wallace Woodworth.) It got playing that in the final mmovement at least had a kind of frennzied life about it, but not much there or elsewhere in the way of textural clarity.

ROBERT CASADESUS AT THE PIANO

Mozart Concerto Performed Brilliantly

By L. DAVID HARRIS
Music Critic

Let the reader beware of a reviewer's prejudices.

Indead, this reviewer is strongly pro-Mozart. A Mozart concerto or symphony lifts him deeply; he has been known to shed tears of joy and emotion during "Don Giovanni" at the Met.

The whole thing is very, very embarrassing, particularly when the reviewer fancies himself a "hard, tough newsman" when not occupying a concert seat. But that's the way it is.

Consequently, the reader will have to allow for all this when he reads here that Robert Casadesus, a master of a concert pianist, brilliantly performed Mozart's "Concerto for Piano and Orchestra No. 24 in C Minor" yesterday with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Giving the pianist his due: His presentation was balanced. When playing Mozart there must be a middle ground — and Casadesus found it. The music cannot be all gentility, grace and elegance, and neither can it be all lively and flashing. Many pianists tend to favor one of the two approaches, but not Casadesus.

Casadesus covered the grave eloquence of the first movement, the beautiful calmness of the second. His phrasing was pure Mozart — gradually allowing his music to rise in intensity and then dramatically finishing it off with a striking — indeed, resounding — final chord.

There also was a dualism to his playing—emphasizing both the gloom and the smiles of the music, and the feeling in Mozart that so moves this reviewer — a tension of sadness and longing against a backdrop of other musical emotions — was often present.

Interestingly enough, the work is the only one of Mozart's concertos using both clarinets and oboes and this reviewer had planned to note the consequent sounds when they occurred in the music. It wasn't to be—he got wrapped up in Casadesus he forgot all about clarinets and oboes.

The symphony also premiered (in Boston) Benjamin Lees' "Symphony No. 2" and following its performance the composer took bows to waves of applause.

The orchestra performed it quite well and if concert goers took advantage of their excellent program notes, they no doubt found the symphony a facinating listening experience.

But without the program helps and simply on the basis of sound, it seemed to not have the magnetic quality of some other 20th century music (including other works by Lees).

However, it did have an abundance of melody, seemed quite original and in its own way had a fair share of musical surprises—in tones, harmonies, theme development, etc. But, with the exception of some strong moments in the second movement, it didn't stir the audience.

At the concert's beginning, the orchestra played a memoriam (Mozart's funeral music) to Dr. G. Wallace Woodworth, former Harvard music professor, area conductor and moderator of the weekly radio "Rehearsal" of "This Week's Symphony" on a local radio station.

The program noted a "sum of money" has been donated to the orchestra in Prof. Woodworth's memory and a metal plate engraved with his name has been affixed to the seat in Symphony Hall — W1 on the floor—where he sat for many years.

The concert concluded with an enjoyable, competent performance of Brahms' Second Symphony. To the director, William Steinberg's, credit, there was a good balance between the lyrical and dramatic sections, yet it wasn't overdone.

This reviewer had expected a little more with respect to the woodwinds in the beginning of the third movement and the combined violin-horn work in the finale. But strong "plus" points were beautiful cello passages and later spectacular brass playing in the finale.

The excellent balance between brass and other sections was kept even up to the very end, when it might be said an "even" balance was traded — perhaps unintentionally — for an "effective" one. The concert-goer left with one high trumpet note dramatically echoing in his ear.

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Friday afternoon October 17 1969 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening October 18 1969 at 8.30

WILLIAM STEINBERG conductor

MOZART — Masonic funeral music K. 477
in memory of G. Wallace Woodworth

Benjamin LEES — Symphony no. 2
Andante mesto – vivo – tempo primo
Scherzo
Adagio
first performance in Boston

MOZART — Piano concerto in C minor K. 491
Allegro
Larghetto
Allegretto
ROBERT CASADESUS

intermission

BRAHMS — Symphony no. 2 in D op. 73*
Allegro non troppo
Adagio non troppo
Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino
Allegro con spirito

THE SOLOIST

ROBERT CASADESUS, who has played with the Boston Symphony on many occasions since his first appearance in 1938, was born in Paris into a family of artists and musicians. He started to study the piano at the age of four, and when he was twelve he entered the Paris Conservatoire. While there he won all the major awards. During his career he has played recitals in many parts of the world, has appeared with major orchestras and has been active as a composer. He made his debut in the United States with the New York Philharmonic in 1935, and since then he has appeared in New York alone more than 200 times.

Robert Casadesus has given many recitals with the violinist Zino Francescatti, and with his wife Gaby, also a distinguished pianist. Husband and wife are occasionally joined by their son Jean in triple piano concerts. He has been named a Commander of the Legion of Honor in his native France, and the Queen of the Netherlands has appointed him a Commander of the Order of Orange-Nassau. He has made many recordings for Columbia Records.

G. WALLACE WOODWORTH

November 6 1902 — July 18 1969

Born in Boston, G. Wallace Woodworth received from Harvard University the AB degree with honors in history in 1924, and the AM degree in music in 1926. He began his career of teaching and conducting at Harvard in 1925, and was for many years James Edward Ditson Professor of Music.

Professor Woodworth was known to many students of music for the course he gave at Harvard on the history of music. He is remembered too by the countless singers who were members of the Radcliffe Choral Society, which he led for 33 years, and of the Harvard Glee Club, of which he was conductor for 25 years. Professor Woodworth was best known to Symphony audiences for his weekly radio 'Rehearsal' of 'This week's Symphony', which he broadcast for seventeen seasons since WGBH-FM opened in 1951. The program received the national award of the Institute for Education by Radio-TV for the best radio program in the humanities — 'exceptional in spontaneity, authenticity and comprehensiveness'.

Professor Woodworth — known affectionately to everybody as 'Woody' — conducted several concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and there are especially fond memories of his interpretations of Stravinsky's Oedipus Rex, Bach's Mass in B minor and of works by Mozart. Woody's many friends will surely be happy to know that a sum of money has been donated to the Orchestra in his memory, and that a metal plate engraved with his name has been affixed to the seat in Symphony Hall — W 1 on the floor — where he sat for many years.

Droopy Reading Mars Lees' 2nd

By GEORGE GELLES

"Safety first" was the Boston Symphony's motto yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall. The program was conservative and the soloist sure and dependable, but in laying so little on the line, in taking few chances, William Steinberg gained almost nothing in a concert that through its first half was dull as paint.

Benjamin Lees is a 45-year-old who teaches at the Peabody Conservatory in Baltimore, and his Second Symphony was the afternoon's unknown quantity. The really crucial question I'll only ask here: that is, with works of Sessions and Kirchner and Carter virtually unplayed by the BSO, why was the spotlight thrown on a work written 11 years ago by Lees, who in no quarter is acknowledged a Modern Master? Priorities, to say the least, are jumbled.

BUT LEES is by no means a bad composer. Formally he is highly traditional and he speaks a musical language no racier than Bartok's, whom in many other ways he resembles—in the shape and content of large-scale gestures, in finely wrought, closely detailed ornamentation draped over slow music, in quickly alternating rhythmic patterns, giving the surface of the Second many twists and turns, and in the disposition of the orchestra itself.

Lees composes very well. There are no loose ends musically, for he realizes the consequences of each move and logically follows through. The Second is a serious work, an enjoyable and good one, if essentially its substance is thin. And although I expect I'd like any Lees piece once through over, several hearing the scores, I imagine, would wear less well.

The performance on Friday was sadly inadequate. Steinberg stuck his nose in the score with the first downbeat and rarely took it out. The Second may not be Great Art, but in a crisp, heads-up performance it could be far more engrossing than Steinberg's droopy reading made it.

• Robert Casadesus was soloist in Mozart's C Minor Piano Concerto, and considering that he's now a septuagenarian, it was an amazing performance for its technical fluidity, its freshness and elan.

BUT CASADESUS'S playing left much to the imagination; dynamics, for instance, or elegance of phrasing, or variety of articulation, or proper ornamentation. What we got was a reading far too smooth, homogenized in every way and without drama.

Steinberg, for his part, did little more than beat time. He has been most disappointing, to date, in his apparent lack of involvement with his players, in his neglecting to fix balances and his easy acceptance of any old sound that comes from his woodwinds. In part, it was vulgar, out-of-tune clarinet playing that spoiled the orchestral half of the Mozart, but more basic, and more troubling, was the way Steinberg let these things get by.

The Second Brahms Symphony ended the afternoon, and finally conducting without a score, Steinberg came to life. His reading offered no insights, was rough and without a drop of polish, but it was well-paced (especially in the finale, where the silent downbeats felt just right) and if only on a gut level, exciting and forceful.

AS A PREFACE, the concert opened with Mozart's "Masonic Funeral Music," K. 477, played in memory of G. Wallace Woodworth, who died this past summer.

Affectionately and universally known as "Woody," Woodworth was Ditson Professor of Music at Harvard. He headed for years the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Harvard Glee Club, but was most familiar to Symphony audiences through his weekly radio show, "This Week's Symphony."

In so honoring him, the Symphony program was taken some 10 minutes past its 4 P. M. end, and what was intended as a tribute turned into a travesty, as many of the ladies fairly tripped over one another in a stampede for the doors before the Brahms was done. It was a disgraceful display, and Woody would have been deeply dismayed.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
OCT 18 1969

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300
OCT 18 1969
New England Newsclip

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
OCT 18 1969
New England Newsclip

BSO concert as gray as the skies

By HARRY NEVILLE

Yesterday was not one of the Boston Symphony's better days. The music inside Symphony Hall, as a matter of fact, seemed every bit as monochromatic as the skies outside. The latter held a vague intimation at least of something threatening, but nothing so interesting emanated from conductor William Steinberg and the BSO

Contributing to this impression was the Second Symphony of Benjamin Lees, a work which was receiving its first Boston performance. It is a piece that invites the question: "Why this and not some other work?" Wahtever the reasons for programming this symphony, it rather strains the imagination to fathom them.

Not that it shouldn't be playedor shouldn't have been writeen — Lee's craftsmanship is unassailable and he develops his ideas with a logic that is clear, although annoyingly circumspect. But, as the contemporary music festival at Berkshire showed us this Summer, there is symphonic music being written today that is urgent, compelling and enormously attractive — things that Lees' symphony is not — and it seems sad and unnecessary that the very limited space made available to the new should go to the second-rate.

Robert Casadesus appeared as soloist in Mozart's Piano Concerto in C minor, . 491, which is surely one of that composer's greatest concertos and one, moreover, that Casdesus has in the past played with surpassing beauty.

Yesterday, the -ianist seemed not at all in his best form, giving a performance that was oddly indifferent from beginning to end.

It is true that the cconcerto maintains throughout a certain sameness of mood — that marvelously sustained, all-pervading melancholy that can be found also in the G minor string quintet — but within that emotional context there are ideas of striking contrast, and little of that ccame through yesterday. Casadesus uses a first movement cadenza — I would guess by Saint Saens — that struck this listener as being a trifle egregious.

Brahms' Symphony No. 2 concluded the program. (It had begun with Mozart's Masonic funeral music as a tribute to the late G. Wallace Woodworth.) It got playing that in the final mmovement at least had a kind of frennzied life about it, but not much there or elsewhere in the way of textural clarity.

ROBERT CASADESUS AT THE PIANO

Mozart Concerto Performed Brilliantly

By L. DAVID HARRIS
Music Critic

Let the reader beware of a reviewer's prejudices.

Indead, this reviewer is strongly pro-Mozart. A Mozart concerto or symphony stirs him deeply; he has been known to shed tears of joy and emotion during "Don Giovanni" at the Met.

The whole thing is very, very embarrassing, particularly when the reviewer fancies himself a "hard, tough newsman" when not occupying a concert seat. But that's the way it is.

Consequently, the reader will have to allow for all this when he reads here that Robert Casadesus, a master of a concert pianist, brilliantly performed Mozart's "Concerto for Piano and Orchestra No. 24 in C Minor" yesterday with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Giving the pianist his due: His presentation was balanced. When playing Mozart there must be a middle ground — and Casadesus found it. The music cannot be all gentility, grace and elegance, and neither can it be all lively and flashing. Many pianists tend to favor one of the two approaches, but not Casadesus.

Casadesus covered the grave eloquence of the first movement, the beautiful calmness of the second. His phrasing was pure Mozart — gradually allowing his music to rise in intensity and then dramatically finishing it off with a striking — indeed, resounding — final chord.

There also was a dualism to his playing—emphasizing both the gloom and the smiles of the music, and the feeling in Mozart that so moves this reviewer — a tension of sadness and longing against a backdrop of other musical emotions — was often present.

Interestingly enough, the work is the only one of Mozart's concertos using both clarinets and oboes and this reviewer had planned to note the consequent sounds when they occurred in the music. It wasn't to be—he got wrapped up in Casadesus he forgot all about clarinets and oboes.

The symphony also premiered (in Boston) Benjamin Lees' "Symphony No. 2" and following its performance the composer took bows to waves of applause.

The orchestra performed it quite well and if concert goers took advantage of their excellent program notes, they no doubt found the symphony a facinating listening experience.

But without the program helps and simply on the basis of sound, it seemed to not have the magnetic quality of some other 20th century music (including other works by Lees).

However, it did have an abundance of melody, seemed quite original and in its own way had a fair share of musical surprises—in tones, harmonies, theme development, etc. But, with the exception of some strong moments in the second movement, it didn't stir the audience.

At the concert's beginning, the orchestra played a memoriam (Mozart's funeral music) to Dr. G. Wallace Woodworth, former Harvard music professor, area conductor and moderator of the weekly radio "Rehearsal" of "This Week's Symphony" on a local radio station.

The program noted a "sum of money" has been donated to the orchestra in Prof. Woodworth's memory and a metal plate engraved with his name has been affixed to the seat in Symphony Hall — W1 on the floor—where he sat for many years.

The concert concluded with an enjoyable, competent performance of Brahms' Second Symphony. To the director, William Steinberg's, credit, there was a good balance between the lyrical and dramatic sections, yet it wasn't overdone.

This reviewer had expected a little more with respect to the woodwinds in the beginning of the third movement and the combined violin-horn work in the finale. But strong "plus" points were beautiful cello passages and later spectacular brass playing in the finale.

The excellent balance between brass and other sections was kept even up to the very end, when it might be said an "even" balance was traded — perhaps unintentionally — for an "effective" one. The concertgoer left with one high trumpet note dramatically echoing in his ear.

14.

BSO plays "war horse" symphony

BY GAFFNEY JON FESKOE

His bald head bent, taking determined steps, the conductor arrives, acknowledges the audience, puts on his wire-rimmed spectacles and raises his baton for all the world looking like an old time school-master in a tailcoat. But at that point, the solemnity ends.

William Steinberg plants himself firmly and conducts with his shoulders and forearms as much as with his hands. He glares at his men, smiles, snorts and sings along, totally off-key, with the music.

So it was with the entire concert the Saturday before last: restraint and precision. The opening work was Mozart's Masonic Funeral Music, certainly restrained with its dirge-like character, played in tribute to Harvard's late G. Wallace Woodworth, Professor of Music and well known radio commentator. This brief work was written at the behest of the local Vienna chapter of the friendly society of Free Masons.

This brief prelude was followed by the first Boston performance of Benjamin Lee's Second Symphony, composed in 1958. (Since September, Steinberg has conducted three works in their Boston premiere: this symphony, the Haydn Symphony No. 55 ("The Schoolmaster") and the Starer Double Concerto. Unlike other contemporary works, this symphony is not atonal or discordant.

The symphony is in three movements: Andante, Scherzo, and suprisingly Adagio (slow) in place of the customary allegro (fast) for the final movement. According to the composer, the form of the symphony follows the natural progression of tension, release tension, and repose - in the character of an epilogue. It is a serene and thoughtful work, one which does not subscribe to or reflect the urgency of most contemporary works. The composer, who was present, and the conductor were both roundly applauded for their efforts. The feature of the evening was the soloist, Robert Casadesus, the distinguished French pianist. Casadesus presented a thoughtful and sedate performance of Mozart's Piano Concerto in C Minor, k. 491. This work, one of Mozart's most enigmatic because of its brooding themes, is strikingly similar in temperment to his G minor Symphony. The minor key is one which suggests a thoughtful mood, certainly not one of excitement and emotion. Beethoven, upon hearing the work, was moved to say to a friend, "We shall never get any idea for a composition like this one." The work requires a piano portion of delicate yet firm control. Only one intimately familar with it can do it justice, and Casadesus was suited perfectly to express the work. The work also depends on sympathetic orchestral accompaniment, and the winds and reed instruments of the BSO did a superb job of it. Steinberg, however, tended to understate the work as a whole: the orchestra lacked the luster and polish required.

The concert closed with the orchestral war horse - Brahms' Second Symphony. This is probably one of the heaviest symphonic works, and as it is played so often it tends to lack inspiration, freshness and interest, despite its lyrical themes and qualities. Steinberg and the Orchestra overcame these hazards with flags flying and gave one of the most exciting reactings of a well-worn work.

It is safe to state that Steinberg is entirely at home with Brahms, probably more than most conductors. The innate strength of this massive work was admirably tempered with taste and orchestral coloring resulting in not so much a sensuous sound as one which appealed to the intellect. The danger of this work is that its sounds are so heavily orchestrated that they tend to overlap and become obscure at the hands of many conductors (Seiji Ozawa in particular) who slur one theme into another. That creates a sensuous sound - one which should be avoided. Steinberg, however, was not guilty of this as he represented each theme as an integral unit, with the utmost restraint and clarity.

BOSTON AFTER DARK
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 7,500

OCT 22 1969

Steinberg and the BSO

By Ralph Locke

Last month William Steinberg conducted his first concert as the new Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the Boston critics spent those two hours on the edge of their seats, listening for things to complain about to their readers. Apparently they found them, because by the following morning half of Boston had been informed that Steinberg is dull, stodgy, faceless, and incompetent. The man had flunked.

But Boston audiences, especially the experienced Saturday night crowd, are not so quick to roast a performer or conductor. Especially in the case of a new conductor, they know by now that there has to be a period of adjustment before the conductor and orchestra can work together as a totally effective unit. And so they don't start searching frantically for someone to buy their tickets, just because they are disappointed by one concert. They come, listen, and react, and within a few weeks they are hearing first-rate music-making.

This was certainly the situation at the concerts this past weekend. Within a few weeks, the supposedly "incompetent" Steinberg is already able to draw beautiful sounds from the orchestra and is creating personalized interpretations of the most standard repertory pieces. This is not to say that the men are playing like angels for him. There was a lot of rough playing in the Second Symphony of Brahms, and in general the players were more responsive last week to Michael Tilson Thoms. But it should be made clear that any criticisms about Steinberg and the orchestra from now on, can be made only from the highest musical and professional standards. In other words, as far as I am concerned William Steinberg has passed – with great distinction.

Of course, Steinberg's interpretations grow out of a particular German tradition, and his tempos are sometimes a bit broad for certain tastes. But within this framework his readings are often perceptive, full of life, and surprisingly subtle. Even if the opinions of the critics have proved worthless, the best way to know Boston's new conductor is still the most enjoyable (and we recommend it): Go listen for yourself!

Television review for WHRB

Prior to the BSO's last concert I'd heard next to nothing about William Steinberg's Mozart. Unfortunately there seems to be a good reason why.

Saturday evening the BSO offered, among other works, Mozart's Masonic Funeral Music and, as piece de résistance, Robert Casadesus in the c minor piano concerto. The funeral music, presented in memory of late Harvard Professor G. Wallace Woodworth, began the concert in puzzling fashion. Steinberg performed this fiercely dramatic work with metronomic tempi and a minimum of dynamic variation. One assumes he was attempting to approximate eighteenth century practice, but this performance belittled all contrasts--in orchestration, in dynamics, in thematic material--written into the score. Without contrast there was no drama, and without drama the piece fell apart. Since the funeral music lasts for only about seven minutes, this did not augur well for the rest of the concert.

In the Mozart c minor piano concerto the BSO sounded disturbingly amateurish. Prominent wind parts were muddled; in particular the solo clarinet played out of tune, with poor intonation, and with a disconcerting lack of basic musicality. Such things I suppose were not Steinberg's fault, but the serious problems with orchestral balance and dramatic structure were. As in the funeral music there was no contrast, no drama, and, with few accents, a very weak rhythmic pulse. The orchestra remained innocuously in the background even when the pianist wasn't playing. This was a real shame because, while Casadesus' performance was both sensitive and well-thought-out, his lyrical style in Mozart needs firm support owever,

2

in n ory.

two yrical s have itself.
icularly teinberg's haped the o t the eldom yed old, and orchestral

, he
m

The Heights
Boston College
10-28-69

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

OCT 23 1969

BSO: program of substance

By Louis Snyder

A musical tribute to the late G. Wallace Woodworth, the Boston premiere of Benjamin Lees's Symphony No. 2, Robert Casadesus playing a Mozart concerto, and the Second Symphony of Brahms comprised the Boston Symphony's program last Friday afternoon. The orchestra will be on tour next week, but there was enough substance in this concert to bridge the gap until Oct. 31.

First of all, William Steinberg led the orchestra in Mozart's Masonic Funeral Music in memory of Mr. Woodworth, whose influence and good offices were for so many years a part of Boston's musical life. This music is heard so often on such occasions that one sometimes doesn't consider how beautiful it is without being sentimental, and how reverential without being morbid—the best kind of memorial in sound.

The Symphony No. 2 of Benjamin Lees is the third of his works to be performed by the BSO, and it too perhaps suggests the composer's staying power. It is listenable, if not entirely consumable, the first time around; rhythmically, texturally, and in its use of solo instruments (flute, oboe, and percussion are favored), it sustains interest; and its composer seems to have known how to stop when he had said his say. The audience was attentive, and rewarded Mr. Lees, Mr. Steinberg and the players with solid applause.

There was applause too for Mr. Casadesus, who gave a warm, comfortable performance of Mozart's C minor piano conterto (K.491). This is not one of the sparkling ones, but it is all Mozart just the same, and thus holds an unending series of wonders. The playing by Mr. Casadesus, particularly at the beginning of the second movement, was pianistic magic, and the woodwinds were also in their element, as was suitably recognized by audience and soloist at the end of the concerto.

Following intermission came the Brahms Second, a warm wash of BSO sound. Last played by the orchestra here in 1967, it was like uncovering one of the most prized family heirlooms—everyone had forgotten how magnificently it was wrought. Mr. Steinberg was thoroughly in command, and brought the work to a climax which generated an unusual amount of Friday excitement—the last note and the cheers coincided.

At The BSO

Conductor Steinberg in Full Control

By HAROLD C. SPROUL

William Steinberg's gestures are always anticipating to the beat at the tip of the baton, and the resulting music was remarkably in motion, all through the well-balanced program of the Boston Symphony on Saturday night. There was no loafing, no ambiguity in transitions—shrewd balancing of instrumental tones for their special contributions to becoming.

The sorrowing Masonic funeral music by Mozart preceded the regular program, in memory of Professor G. Wallace Woodworth, the warm-hearted proponent of great music at Harvard and for twenty-odd years infectious commentator on Boston Symphony programs for radio. "Woody" would have loved the eloquent reading of Mozart, as directly expressive as Bach, with sighing woodwinds, the solemn pacing of the basses in dotted rhythm, the lament of the oboe and the surge of strings. Pax and the audience celebrated a good man by silence.

Benjamin Lees (Symphony No. 2) has been given a wide hearing lately for obvious reasons. He uses a big orchestra to hearable effect — no coy twiddle of novelty-sounds of happenstance. He even finds still some valid use of old formations (keys and sonata-form for example) but only as far as they are useful to his ideas and adaptable to his sense of immediacy. Mr. Lees comes naturally by his broad view of modern idiom—born in China of Russian parents, an American by age seven, educated in California, living abroad for eight years, now attached to Peabody Conservatory. The general effect in Symphony No. 2 is reminiscent of Stravinsky ballets (Les Noces, for example). Strong rhythm with much shifting of meter, short motives in the winds (elements) emerging from the mass with some repetition, much use of bass instruments for anchorage in "ground-bass," but more over-all design than is usual with Stravinsky, and always—especially in this performance—clean perspectives of line and mass. Not earth-shaking in conception, but worth hearing played well.

White-haired Robert Casadesus came on for one of the great Mozart Concertos—C/minor, K. 491. And here, pianist, conductor and orchestra were in rare empathy with no imbalance of forces. Casadesus was a voice in the orchestra, picking up a line from another instrument, or an iridescence of lift or swirl in the general movement, or a momentary soloist but never out of touch. Cadenzas were appropriately short; and if they stretched the Mozart manner in the nineteenth century ways, why not? (We enjoy Bach's "modern" settings for older music). The orchestra collaborated with chamber music subtlety "feminine endings" fading to the same degrees heard in the piano, the woodwinds doing a specially sensitive job of collaboration.

There has been a lot of worshipful palaver about the sorrows of Mozart's life informing this piece. I don't find it so—he was too good a professional. Even the slow movement could have come out of the sentiment in Figaro (written almost simultaneously). But there is, as in all the mature music of the man, an almost chemical solution of melancholy and wit that made him one of the subtle clowns of history. And there is, too, something Mozart could not quite have intended — the heartbreak of all perfect things.

The performance of the Brahms Symphony No. 2 was one of the best I have heard. From the first sure outline of D major by the French horn to the theatrical close, Mr. Steinberg called for all the right imaginable things and got them handsomely. It was even demonstrated that a "fugato" in the Adagio could be a tender involvement. The rich duet of violas and 'cellos was phrased urgently to the lyrical limit and dramatic passages were incisive in rhythmic impact. I did wish for an easier Allegretto — not so pushed, singing with less ambition; but then, the conductor might have been trying for more contrast in the tempi of the movements and there was still a lilt to it—and a ravishing sound. The complexities of Brahms require not only intuition but great skill in adjusting tone to movement so that all is a flow of evolution. And that we had—without the aura of a Bavarian Beer Garden.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

OCT 20 1969

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

OCT 16 1969

BSO ON RADIO

Michael Tilson Thomas and Carlo Maria Giulini will conduct thet Boston Symphony this week, and their concerts will be broadcast live and in stereo by WGBH-FM.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

14.

BSO plays "war horse" symphony

BY GAFFNEY JON FESKOE

His bald head bent, taking determined steps, the conductor arrives, acknowledges the audience, puts on his wire-rimmed spectacles and raises his baton for all the world looking like an old time school-master in a tailcoat. But at that point, the solemnity ends.

William Steinberg plants himself firmly and conducts with his shoulders and forearms as much as with his hands. He glares at his men, smiles, snorts and sings along, totally off-key, with the music.

So it was with the entire concert the Saturday before last: restraint and precision. The opening [illegible] was Mozart's Masonic Funeral Mus[illegible] restrained with its dirge-lik[illegible] in tribute to Ha[illegible] Woodworth, [illegible] known radio [illegible] was writt[illegible] Vienna [illegible] Free [illegible] first Boston performance of Benjamin Lee's Second Symphony, composed in 1958. (Since September, Steinberg has conducted three works in their Boston premiere: this symphony, the Haydn Symphony No. 55 ("The Schoolmaster") and the Starer Double Concerto. Unlike other contemporary works, this symphony is not atonal or discordant.

The symphony is in three movements: Andante, Scherzo, and suprisingly Adagio (slow) in place of the customary allegro (fast) for the final movement. According to the composer, the form of the symphony follows the natural progression of tension, release tension, and repose - in the character of an epilogue. It is a serene and thoughtful work, one which does not subscribe to or reflect the urgency of most contemporary works. The composer, who [illegible] present, and the conductor were both [illegible] applauded for their efforts. The [illegible] the evening was the soloist, [illegible] the distinguished French [illegible] presented a thoughtful and sedate performance of Mozart's Piano Concerto in C Minor, k. 491. This work, one of Mozart's most enigmatic because of its brooding themes, is strikingly similar in temperment to his G minor Symphony. The minor key is one which suggests a thoughtful mood, certainly not one of excitement and emotion. Beethoven, upon hearing the work, was moved to say to a friend, "We shall never get any idea for a composition like this one." The work requires a piano portion of delicate yet firm control. Only one intimately familar with it can do it justice, and Casadesus was suited perfectly to express the work. The work also depends on sympathetic orchestral accompaniment, and the winds and reed instruments of the BSO did a superb job of it. Steinberg, however, tended to understate the work as a whole: the orchestra lacked the luster and polish required.

The concert closed with the orchestral war horse - Brahms' Second Symphony. This is probably one of the heaviest symphonic works, and as it is played so often it tends to lack inspiration, freshness and interest, despite its lyrical themes and qualities. Steinberg and the Orchestra overcame these hazards with flags flying and gave one of the most exciting reactings of a well-worn work.

It is safe to state that Steinberg is entirely at home with Brahms, probably more than most conductors. The innate strength of this massive work was admirably tempered with taste and orchestral coloring resulting in not so much a sensuous sound as one which appealed to the intellect. The danger of this work is that its sounds are so heavily orchestrated that they tend to overlap and become obscure at the hands of many conductors (Seiji Ozawa in particular) who slur one theme into another. That creates a sensuous sound - one which should be avoided. Steinberg, however, was not guilty of this as he represented each theme as an integral unit, with the utmost restraint and clarity.

The Heights
Boston College
10-28-69

BOSTON AFTER DARK
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 7,588
OCT 22 1969

Steinberg and the BSO

By Ralph Locke

Last month William Steinberg conducted his first concert as the new Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the Boston critics spent those two hours on the edge of their seats, listening for things to complain about to their readers. Apparently they found them, because by the following morning half of Boston had been informed that Steinberg is dull, stodgy, faceless, and incompetent. The man had flunked.

But Boston audiences, especially the experienced Saturday night crowd, are not so quick to roast a performer or conductor. Especially in the case of a new conductor, they know by now that there has to be a period of adjustment before the conductor and orchestra can work together as a totally effective unit. And so they don't start searching frantically for someone to buy their tickets, just because they are disappointed by one concert. They come, listen, and react, and within a few weeks they are hearing first-rate music- making.

This was certainly the situation at the concerts this past weekend. Within a few weeks, the supposedly "incompetent" Steinberg is already able to draw beautiful sounds from the orchestra and is creating personalized interpretations of the most standard repertory pieces. This is not to say that the men are playing like angels for him. There was a lot of rough playing in the Second Symphony of Brahms, and in general the players were more responsive last week to Michael Tilson Thoms. But it should be made clear that any criticisms about Steinberg and the orchestra from now on, can be made only from the highest musical and professional standards. In other words, as far as I am concerned William Steinberg has passed – with great distinction.

Of course, Steinberg's interpretations grow out of a particular German tradition, and his tempos are sometimes a bit broad for certain tastes. But within this framework his readings are often perceptive, full of life, and surprisingly subtle. Even if the opinions of the critics have proved worthless, the best way to know Boston's new conductor is still the most enjoyable (and we recommend it): Go listen for yourself!

2

a. The best moments Saturday night, however,
. Orchestral passages that reappeared in nzas were incomparably more alive than in form.

of Steinberg's program was more satisfactory.
s' Second Symphony, which came between the two s, is something akin to good movie music. Lyrical ear against quiet strings, and rhythmic figures have brass behind them, so the piece tends to play itself.
ormance could have used a little more bite, particularly scherzo, but it was certainly adequate.
rahms' Second Symphony came after intermission. Steinberg's ng was convincing: individual movements were well-shaped the orchestra produced a rich, appealing sound. At the e time, however, there was nothing really exciting about the rformance; and detail, notably in orchestration, was seldom rought out. A popular work was given a solid if hackneyed performance.

Steinberg's tenure with the BSO is just a few weeks old, and one hopes that the difficulties with interpretation and orchestral discipline are matters of adjustment. Thus far, however, he has not demonstrated either the insight or the enthusiasm of a first rate conductor.

For WHRB this is Jerry Gechter.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000
OCT 23 1969

BSO: program of substance

By Louis Snyder

A musical tribute to the late G. Wallace Woodworth, the Boston premiere of Benjamin Lees's Symphony No. 2, Robert Casadesus playing a Mozart concerto, and the Second Symphony of Brahms comprised the Boston Symphony's program last Friday afternoon. The orchestra will be on tour next week, but there was enough substance in this concert to bridge the gap until Oct. 31.

First of all, William Steinberg led the orchestra in Mozart's Masonic Funeral Music in memory of Mr. Woodworth, whose influence and good offices were for so many years a part of Boston's musical life. This music is heard so often on such occasions that one sometimes doesn't consider how beautiful it is without being sentimental, and how reverential without being morbid—the best kind of memorial in sound.

The Symphony No. 2 of Benjamin Lees is the third of his works to be performed by the BSO, and it too perhaps suggests the composer's staying power. It is listenable, if not entirely consumable, the first time around, rhythmically, texturally, and in its use of solo instruments (flute, oboe, and percussion are favored), it sustains interest; and its composer seems to have known how to stop when he had said his say. The audience was attentive, and rewarded Mr. Lees, Mr. Steinberg and the players with solid applause.

There was applause too for Mr. Casadesus, who gave a warm, comfortable performance of Mozart's C minor piano concerto (K.491). This is not one of the sparkling ones, but it is all Mozart just the same, and thus holds an unending series of wonders. The playing by Mr. Casadesus, particularly at the beginning of the second movement, was pianistic magic, and the woodwinds were also in their element, as was suitably recognized by audience and soloist at the end of the concerto.

Following intermission came the Brahms Second, a warm wash of BSO sound. Last played by the orchestra here in 1967, it was like uncovering one of the most prized family heirlooms—everyone had forgotten how magnificently it was wrought. Mr. Steinberg was thoroughly in command, and brought the work to a climax which generated an unusual amount of Friday excitement—the last note and the cheers coincided.

At The BSO

Conductor Steinberg in Full Control

By HAROLD C. SPROUL

William Steinberg's gestures are always anticipating to the beat at the tip of the baton, and the resulting music was remarkably in motion, all through the well-balanced program of the Boston Symphony on Saturday night. There was no loafing, no ambiguity in transitions—shrewd balancing of instrumental tones for their special contributions to becoming.

The sorrowing Masonic funeral music by Mozart preceded the regular program, in memory of Professor G. Wallace Woodworth, the warm-hearted proponent of great music at Harvard and for twenty-odd years infectious commentator on Boston Symphony programs for radio. "Woody" would have loved the eloquent reading of Mozart, as directly expressive as Bach, with sighing woodwinds, the solemn pacing of the basses in dotted rhythm, the lament of the oboe and the surge of strings. Pax and the audience celebrated a good man by silence.

Benjamin Lees (Symphony No. 2) has been given a wide hearing lately for obvious reasons. He uses a big orchestra to hearable effect — no coy twiddle of novelty-sounds of happenstance. He even finds still some valid use of old formations (keys and sonata-form for example) but only as far as they are useful to his ideas and adaptable to his sense of immediacy. Mr. Lees comes naturally by his broad view of modern idiom—born in China of Russian parents, an American by age seven, educated in California, living abroad for eight years, now attached to Peabody Conservatory. The general effect in Symphony No. 2 is reminiscent of Stravinsky ballets (Les Noces, for example). Strong rhythm with much shifting of meter, short motives in the winds (elements) emerging from the mass with some repetition, much use of bass instruments for anchorage in "ground-bass," but more over-all design than is usual with Stravinsky, and always—especially in this performance—clean perspectives of line and mass. Not earth-shaking in conception, but worth hearing played well.

White-haired Robert Casadesus came on for one of the great Mozart Concertos—C/minor, K. 491. And here, pianist, conductor and orchestra were in rare empathy with no imbalance of forces. Casadesus was a voice in the orchestra, picking up a line from another instrument, or an iridescence of lift or swirl in the general movement, or a momentary soloist but never out of touch. Cadenzas were appropriately short; and if they stretched the Mozart manner in the nineteenth century ways, why not? (We enjoy Bach's "modern" settings for older music). The orchestra collaborated with chamber music subtlety "feminine endings" fading to the same degrees heard in the piano, the woodwinds doing a specially sensitive job of collaboration.

There has been a lot of worshipful palaver about the sorrows of Mozart's life informing this piece. I don't find it so—he was too good a professional. Even the slow movement could have come out of the sentiment in Figaro (written almost simultaneously). But there is, as in all the mature music of the man, an almost chemical solution of melancholy and wit that made him one of the subtle clowns of history. And there is, too, something Mozart could not quite have intended — the heartbreak of all perfect things.

The performance of the Brahms Symphony No. 2 was one of the best I have heard. From the first sure outline of D major by the French horn to the theatrical close, Mr. Steinberg called for all the right imaginable things and got them handsomely. It was even demonstrated that a "fugato" in the Adagio could be a tender involvement. The rich duet of violas and 'cellos was phrased urgently to the lyrical limit and dramatic passages were incisive in rhythmic impact. I did wish for an easier Allegretto — not so pushed, singing with less ambition; but then, the conductor might have been trying for more contrast in the tempi of the movements and there was still a lilt to it—and a ravishing sound. The complexities of Brahms require not only intuition but great skill in adjusting tone to movement so that all is a flow of evolution. And that we had—without the aura of a Bavarian Beer Garden.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850
OCT 20 1969

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000
OCT 16 1969

BSO ON RADIO

Michael Tilson Thomas and Carlo Maria Giulini will conduct that Boston Symphony this week, and their concerts will be broadcast live and in stereo by WGBH-FM.

14.

BSO plays "war horse" symphony

BY GAFFNEY JON FESKOE

His bald head bent, taking determined steps, the conductor arrives, acknowledges the audience, puts on his wire-rimmed spectacles and raises his baton for all the world looking like an old time school-master in a tailcoat. But at that point, the solemnity ends.

William Steinberg plants himself firmly and conducts with his shoulders and forearms as much as with his hands. He glares at his men, smiles, snorts and sings along, totally off-key, with the music.

So it was with the entire concert the Saturday before last: restraint and precision. The opening work was Mozart's Masonic Funeral Music, certainly restrained with its dirge-like character, played in tribute to Harvard's late G. Wallace Woodworth, Professor of Music and well known radio commentator. This brief work was written at the behest of the local Vienna chapter of the friendly society of Free Masons.

This brief prelude was followed by the first Boston performance of Benjamin Lee's Second Symphony, composed in 1958. (Since September, Steinberg has conducted three works in their Boston premiere: this symphony, the Haydn Symphony No. 55 ("The Schoolmaster") and the Starer Double Concerto. Unlike other contemporary works, this symphony is not atonal or discordant.

The symphony is in three movements: Andante, Scherzo, and suprisingly Adagio (slow) in place of the customary allegro (fast) for the final movement. According to the composer, the form of the symphony follows the natural progression of tension, release tension, and repose - in the character of an epilogue. It is a serene and thoughtful work, one which does not subscribe to or reflect the urgency of most contemporary works. The composer, who was present, and the conductor were both roundly applauded for their efforts. The feature of the evening was the soloist, Robert Casadesus, the distinguished French pianist. Casadesus presented a thoughtful and sedate performance of Mozart's Piano Concerto in C Minor, k. 491. This work, one of Mozart's most enigmatic because of its brooding themes, is strikingly similar in temperment to his G minor Symphony. The minor key is one which suggests a thoughtful mood, certainly not one of excitement and emotion. Beethoven, upon hearing the work, was moved to say to a friend, "We shall never get any idea for a composition like this one." The work requires a piano portion of delicate yet firm control. Only one intimately familar with it can do it justice, and Casadesus was suited perfectly to express the work. The work also depends on sympathetic orchestral accompaniment, and the winds and reed instruments of the BSO did a superb job of it. Steinberg, however, tended to understate the work as a whole: the orchestra lacked the luster and polish required.

The concert closed with the orchestral war horse - Brahms' Second Symphony. This is probably one of the heaviest symphonic works, and as it is played so often it tends to lack inspiration, freshness and interest, despite its lyrical themes and qualities. Steinberg and the Orchestra overcame these hazards with flags flying and gave one of the most exciting reactings of a well-worn work.

It is safe to state that Steinberg is entirely at home with Brahms, probably more than most conductors. The innate strength of this massive work was admirably tempered with taste and orchestral coloring resulting in not so much a sensuous sound as one which appealed to the intellect. The danger of this work is that its sounds are so heavily orchestrated that they tend to overlap and become obscure at the hands of many conductors (Seiji Ozawa in particular) who slur one theme into another. That creates a sensuous sound - one which should be avoided. Steinberg, however, was not guilty of this as he represented each theme as an integral unit, with the utmost restraint and clarity.

BOSTON AFTER DARK
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 7,000

OCT 22 1969

Steinberg and the BSO

By Ralph Locke

Last month William Steinberg conducted his first concert as the new Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the Boston critics spent those two hours on the edge of their seats, listening for things to complain about to their readers. Apparently they found them, because by the following morning half of Boston had been informed that Steinberg is dull, stodgy, faceless, and incompetent. The man had flunked.

But Boston audiences, especially the experienced Saturday night crowd, are not so quick to roast a performer or conductor. Especially in the case of a new conductor, they know by now that there has to be a period of adjustment before the conductor and orchestra can work together as a totally effective unit. And so they don't start searching frantically for someone to buy their tickets, just because they are disappointed by one concert. They come, listen, and react, and within a few weeks they are hearing first-rate music- making.

This was certainly the situation at the concerts this past weekend. Within a few weeks, the supposedly "incompetent" Steinberg is already able to draw beautiful sounds from the orchestra and is creating personalized interpretations of the most standard repertory pieces. This is not to say that the men are playing like angels for him. There was a lot of rough playing in the Second Symphony of Brahms, and in general the players were more responsive last week to Michael Tilson Thoms. But it should be made clear that any criticisms about Steinberg and the orchestra from now on, can be made only from the highest musical and professional standards. In other words, as far as I am concerned William Steinberg has passed -- with great distinction.

Of course, Steinberg's interpretations grow out of a particular German tradition, and his tempos are sometimes a bit broad for certain tastes. But within this framework his readings are often perceptive, full of life, and surprisingly subtle. Even if the opinions of the critics have proved worthless, the best way to know Boston's new conductor is still the most enjoyable (and we recommend it): Go listen for yourself!

Television review for WHRB

Prior to the BSO's last concert I'd heard next to nothing about William Steinberg's Mozart. Unfortunately there seems to be a good reason why.

Saturday evening the BSO offered, among other works, Mozart's Masonic Funeral Music and, as piece de résistance, Robert Casadesus in the c minor piano concerto. The funeral music, presented in memory of late Harvard Professor G. Wallace Woodworth, began the concert in puzzling fashion. Steinberg performed this fiercely dramatic work with metronomic tempi and a minimum of dynamic variation. One assumes he was attempting to approximate eighteenth century practice, but this performance belittled all contrasts--in orchestration, in dynamics, in thematic material--written into the score. Without contrast there was no drama, and without drama the piece fell apart. Since the funeral music lasts for only about seven minutes, this did not augur well for the rest of the concert.

In the Mozart c minor piano concerto the BSO sounded disturbingly amateurish. Prominent wind parts were muddled; in particular the solo clarinet played out of tune, with poor intonation, and with a disconcerting lack of basic musicality. Such things I suppose were not Steinberg's fault, but the serious problems with orchestral balance and dramatic structure were. As in the funeral music there was no contrast, no drama, and, with few accents, a very weak rhythmic pulse. The orchestra remained innocuously in the background even when the pianist wasn't playing. This was a real shame because, while Casadesus' performance was both sensitive and well-thought-out, his lyrical style in Mozart needs firm support however,

2

in n ory.
two yrical es have itself.
ticularly
Steinberg's
- haped
the ot the seldom eyed old, and orchestral
, he
m

The Heights
Boston College
10-28-69

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

OCT 23 1969

BSO: program of substance

By Louis Snyder

A musical tribute to the late G. Wallace Woodworth, the Boston premiere of Benjamin Lees's Symphony No. 2, Robert Casadesus playing a Mozart concerto, and the Second Symphony of Brahms comprised the Boston Symphony's program last Friday afternoon. The orchestra will be on tour next week, but there was enough substance in this concert to bridge the gap until Oct. 31.

First of all, William Steinberg led the orchestra in Mozart's Masonic Funeral Music in memory of Mr. Woodworth, whose influence and good offices were for so many years a part of Boston's musical life. This music is heard so often on such occasions that one sometimes doesn't consider how beautiful it is without being sentimental, and how reverential without being morbid —the best kind of memorial in sound.

The Symphony No. 2 of Benjamin Lees is the third of his works to be performed by the BSO, and it too perhaps suggests the composer's staying power. It is listenable, if not entirely consumable, the first time around; rhythmically, texturally, and in its use of solo instruments (flute, oboe, and percussion are favored), it sustains interest; and its composer seems to have known how to stop when he had said his say. The audience was attentive, and rewarded Mr. Lees, Mr. Steinberg and the players with solid applause.

There was applause too for Mr. Casadesus, who gave a warm, comfortable performance of Mozart's C minor piano conterto (K.491). This is not one of the sparkling ones, but it is all Mozart just the same, and thus holds an unending series of wonders. The playing by Mr. Casadesus, particularly at the beginning of the second movement, was pianistic magic, and the woodwinds were also in their element, as was suitably recognized by audience and soloist at the end of the concerto.

Following intermission came the Brahms Second, a warm wash of BSO sound. Last played by the orchestra here in 1967, it was like uncovering one of the most prized family heirlooms—everyone had forgotten how magnificently it was wrought. Mr. Steinberg was thoroughly in command, and brought the work to a climax which generated an unusual amount of Friday excitement—the last note and the cheers coincided.

At The BSO

Conductor Steinberg in Full Control

By HAROLD C. SPROUL

William Steinberg's gestures are always anticipating to the beat at the tip of the baton, and the resulting music was remarkably in motion, all through the well-balanced program of the Boston Symphony on Saturday night. There was no loafing, no ambiguity in transitions—shrewd balancing of instrumental tones for their special contributions to becoming.

The sorrowing Masonic funeral music by Mozart preceded the regular program, in memory of Professor G. Wallace Woodworth, the warm-hearted proponent of great music at Harvard and for twenty-odd years infectious commentator on Boston Symphony programs for radio. "Woody" would have loved the eloquent reading of Mozart, as directly expressive as Bach, with sighing woodwinds, the solemn pacing of the basses in dotted rhythm, the lament of the oboe and the surge of strings. Pax and the audience celebrated a good man by silence.

Benjamin Lees (Symphony No. 2) has been given a wide hearing lately for obvious reasons. He uses a big orchestra to hearable effect — no coy twiddle of novelty-sounds of happenstance. He even finds still some valid use of old formations (keys and sonata-form for example) but only as far as they are useful to his ideas and adaptable to his sense of immediacy. Mr. Lees comes naturally by his broad view of modern idiom—born in China of Russian parents, an American by age seven, educated in California, living abroad for eight years, now attached to Peabody Conservatory. The general effect in Symphony No. 2 is reminiscent of Stravinsky ballets (Les Noces, for example). Strong rhythm with much shifting of meter, short motives in the winds (elements) emerging from the mass with some repetition, much use of bass instruments for anchorage in "ground-bass," but more over-all design than is usual with Stravinsky, and always—especially in this performance—clean perspectives of line and mass. Not earth-shaking in conception, but worth hearing played well.

White-haired Robert Casadesus came on for one of the great Mozart Concertos—C/minor, K. 491. And here, pianist, conductor and orchestra were in rare empathy with no imbalance of forces. Casadesus was a voice in the orchestra, picking up a line from another instrument, or an iridescence of lift or swirl in the general movement, or a momentary soloist but never out of touch. Cadenzas were appropriately short; and if they stretched the Mozart manner in the nineteenth century ways, why not? (We enjoy Bach's "modern" settings for older music). The orchestra collaborated with chamber music subtlety "feminine endings" fading to the same degrees heard in the piano, the woodwinds doing a specially sensitive job of collaboration.

There has been a lot of worshipful palaver about the sorrows of Mozart's life informing this piece. I don't find it so—he was too good a professional. Even the slow movement could have come out of the sentiment in Figaro (written almost simultaneously). But there is, as in all the mature music of the man, an almost chemical solution of melancholy and wit that made him one of the subtle clowns of history. And there is, too, something Mozart could not quite have intended — the heartbreak of all perfect things.

The performance of the Brahms Symphony No. 2 was one of the best I have heard. From the first sure outline of D major by the French horn to the theatrical close, Mr. Steinberg called for all the right imaginable things and got them handsomely. It was even demonstrated that a "fugato" in the Adagio could be a tender involvement. The rich duet of violas and 'cellos was phrased urgently to the lyrical limit and dramatic passages were incisive in rhythmic impact. I did wish for an easier Allegretto — not so pushed, singing with less ambition; but then, the conductor might have been trying for more contrast in the tempi of the movements and there was still a lilt to it—and a ravishing sound. The complexities of Brahms require not only intuition but great skill in adjusting tone to movement so that all is a flow of evolution. And that we had—without the aura of a Bavarian Beer Garden.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

OCT 20 1969

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

OCT 16 1969

BSO ON RADIO

Michael Tilson Thomas and Carlo Maria Giulini will conduct thet Boston Symphony this week, and their concerts will be broadcast live and in stereo by WGBH-FM.

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Friday afternoon October 31 1969 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening November 1 1969 at 8.30
Tuesday evening November 4 1969 at 7.30

CARLO MARIA GIULINI conductor

BONPORTI — Concerto a quattro in D op. 11 no. 8
(transcribed by Guglielmo Barblan)
Allegro
Largo
Allegro vivace
first performance in Boston

SCHUBERT — Symphony no. 4 in C minor 'Tragic'
Adagio molto – allegro vivace
Andante
Menuetto: allegro vivace
Allegro assai

intermission

PIZZETTI — Prelude to 'Fedra'
first performance in Boston

MUSSORGSKY — Pictures at an exhibition, pieces for piano
(arranged for orchestra by Maurice Ravel)
Promenade – Gnomus (the gnome) – Promenade – Il vecchio castello (the old castle) – Promenade – Tuileries (children in the Tuileries gardens) – Bydlo (ox cart) – Promenade – Ballet of chicks in their shells – Samuel Goldenberg and Schmuyle – Limoges, the market – Catacombs – Con mortuis in lingua mortua (with the dead in a dead language) – The hut on hens' legs (Baba Yaga the witch) – The great gate of Kiev

Guest conductor provides a decent BSO concert

15.

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Staff

The news from Pittsburgh is that William Steinberg is recovered from the illness that interrupted his New York concert 10 days ago, and that he was expected to conduct his scheduled concert with the Pittsburgh Symphony last night. As Steinberg looked after his other orchestra, the Boston Symphony was led Friday afternoon by Carlo Maria Giulini, 55, principal guest conductor of the Chicago Symphony. He is the first of a series of guests here this season.

The most immediately remarkable feature of Friday's concert was how well the orchestra played for Giulini. It was spirited, rhithmic, mostly very decently in tune, more often suave than incisive. It was nicely varied, too, and refreshing after that self-serving, narcissistic, monotonous lushness and gloss that Ormandy and the Philadelphians unloaded here last week. There were occasional solo failures in the Boston Symphony's playing — with no surprises for the most part, as to where they came from — but what Giulini and the Symphony produced together was, most of it, orchestral playing of a high standard, both lively and cultivated.

Musically, the concert was slow to get going. Giulini handicapped himself by starting out with something he does not understand beans about, a Concerto Grosso by Francesco Bonporti, a harmless contemporary of Vivaldi's. He did the piece as a sort of blend of The Arkansas Traveler and the Barber Adagio for Strings.

In the first three movements of Schubert's "Tragic" Symphony, which came next, Giulini seemed rather tense still, so that the performance was hardly more than note-spinning, beautifully finished, but with everything rather washed out.

After intermission, everything was fine. Giulini began with the Prelude to Ildebrando Pizzetti's opera, "Fedra," written 1915. It is a seven- or eight-minute slow piece that tries to be austere and cannot always quite help getting juicy, a little Sibeliu.

Having done with that gelding, Giulini went on to something superbly potent and lively, Mussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," played in the beautiful Ravel orchestration. Giulini was splendid here — in particular, I have never heard 'Gnomus" and "Baba Yaga the Witch" done as such a threatening pair of ugly dreams, nor "The Market at Limoges" with such lightness and grace. In conception, and most of the way in execution as well, the performance was a worthy sequel to the fine one Vladimir Ashkenazy gave of the piano original two weeks ago.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
NOV 1 1969

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
NOV 1 1969

THE GUEST CONDUCTOR

CARLO MARIA GIULINI was born in 1914 at Barletta, a city on the Adriatic coast of southern Italy. At the Academy of Santa Cecilia in Rome he studied viola with Remy Principe and composition with Alessandro Bustini. After graduation he became a student of Alfredo Casella at the Chigi Academy in Siena, and won a diploma in a post-graduate conducting course under Bernardino Molinari. He was engaged in 1946 by the Radio Italiana Orchestra, and four years later became conductor of the Radio Milan Orchestra. His subsequent appointment to La Scala, in immediate succession to Victor de Sabata, kept him based in Milan for several years.

In the fall of 1955 Carlo Maria Giulini came to the United States for the first time to conduct the Chicago Symphony. The following summer he made the first of many appearances with the Israel Philharmonic. Since that time he has led the world's major orchestras, conducted in the major opera houses and appeared at the principal music festivals. He has recently relinquished the position of Musical Director of the Rome Opera, which he held for many years, to devote his attention to symphonic music. He has just taken up his position as Principal Guest Conductor of the Chicago Symphony. The majority of his many recordings are on the Angel and London labels. Carlo Maria Giulini most recently appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1962.

Giulini Conducts Mussorgsky's 'Pictures'

Symphony Second Rate

By GEORGE GELLES
MT Music Critic

Carlo Maria Giulini must be doing something right, for his performance with the Boston Symphony of "Pictures at an Exhibition" knocked them dead yesterday afternoon. Don't ask me what it is, though, for I found Guilini's Symphony Hall return a routine and disappointing event.

The 55-year-old Italian made his name in opera, for the most part at La Scala and Rome, and turned to a symphonic career fairly late, coming first to the States in 1955. Then he appeared with the Chicago Symphony, and now he's its Principal Guest. Conductor.

Giulini, who was last here in 1962, is an elegant looking man, which I don't doubt has had something to do with his success, and extremely active and aggressive at his work. There's lots of motion, most of it's angular and stiff, and although he holds a baton, he seems to do his actual conducting with his forearm.

HIS PROGRAM WAS pretty dreadful—two Italian works dredged up for the occassion, plus Mussorgsky's "Pictures" and the Schubert Fourth—and of these I expected the Mussorgsky to save the day. Well, it didn't.

We had a performance of "Pictures" just two weeks ago, though in its original keyboard version. The young Russian Ashkenazy played it, and for its freshness, delicacy, beauty of tone and structural awareness, it was first-rate.

Giulini's reading missed almost completely. First of all, the playing he got from the BSO was disgraceful. Intonation was wildly erratic all afternoon, and most every solo player was out of sorts but the saxophonist was truly embarrassing.

AS TO TIMING, Giulini didn't have it. One of the wonderful details of Ashkenazy's performance was the suddenness, the rightness, of the quick juxtaposition of the introductory 'Promenades with the highly rhetorical entrance of the 'Gnomes'. Giulini was casual about this, and gave no indication that this connection mattered, or that he had even thought about it. And ditto for several similar spots, the juncture between the 'Hut' and 'Great Gate,' or that connecting 'Limoges' and the 'Catacombs.'

If the reading had merit, and as I said, most everybody else thought it did, it was in Giulini's gift for getting gut-level reactions. Though most of the performances was technically drab, there were some few measures—the percussion punctuation in 'Gnomes,' for instance—that sparkled; though most of it was dynamically indifferent, sailing along at a serve-all mezzo-forte. There were some measures—notably those picturing the 'Great Gate' — that were impressively loud, and though out of context, effective in whipping up an audience. However, these are the easiest attainable of possitive virtues.

THE SCHUBERT WASN'T much fun, either, though it started in fine fashion. The piece itself, written when Schubert was 19, is deeply indebted to Mozart and Haydn. With Mozart, it's the "Dissonant" Quartet; this is really what Schubert's slow introduction is all about. It seems patterned quite literally on the Mozart, though it is a much more straight-forward affair, without the temporal displacements that make the Mozart so special.

And Haydn is particularly evident in the harmonic farsightedness of the opening bars, in the way the introduction moves from C to G-flat, and how the body of the symphony then keeps working its way through the flat side of keys until, in the Minuet, this G-flat is reached. And for all the forward-looking touches —Schubert's style of string writing, or the harmonic slowdown that points so clearly to Bruckner—the Fourth is still most fascinating for the lessons it shows so well absorbed.

THE INTRODUCTION, then, was understood by Giulini and performed very well, though the rest of the movement was without the same concentration or sense of purpose and had fuzzy, unclear string work as well. He was also fine at the start of the last movement's development —those measures that span E-flat and the distant A so gracefully. But the symphony was in most ways ordinary, phrased with no special charm, unthought-out in its formal articulation, poorly played.

The two Italian works were an 18th century string concerto by Francesco Bonporti and the Prelude to the opera "Fedra" by the post-Romantic Ildebrando Pizzetti. On historical grounds, the latter was interesting to hear, the former wasn't. On program-making grounds, both were witless choices. There's too much good music that lies unplayed—by Corelli, say, among the old, or Dallapiccol a of the new—to waste half a program with the second-rate.

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300
NOV 1 1969

1st Guest Conductor Of Boston Symphony

The distinguished Italian conductor, Carlo Maria Giulini will conduct the Boston Symphony's fifth pair of Friday-Saturday concerts, at 2 o'clock October 31 and 8.30 p. m. Nov. 1.

The program is an all-orchestral one, opening with the Concerto grosso in D by Francesco Bonporti, an Italian contemporary of 'Pictures at an exhibition,' in the Ravel orchestration, will close the program.

Carlo Maria Giu.ini recently assumed 'he post of principal guest conductor of the Chicago Symphony, the orchestra with which he made his United States debut in 1955. Born in Barletta, on the Adriatic coast of southern Italy, he studied at the St. Cecilia Academy in Rome, conducted the Radio Italiana and Radio Milan orchestras, conducted at La Scala, Milan, and was musical director of the Rome Opera for many years. Giulini last appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1962 and this season will conduct two Friday-Saturday pairs of concerts.

Open Rehearsal

Thursday at 7.30 p. m. Giulini will conduct the second of this season's open rehearsals, working with the orchestra on the following day's program.

Tuesday at 8.30 p. m., Michael Tilson Thomas, the Boston Symphony's new assistant conductor, will conduct the second concert of the Tuesday 'A' series. His program will be a repeat of the program with which he made his highly-acclaimed Boston Symphony debut on Oct. 10 and 11. Haydn's Symphony No. 98 and Debussy' La Mer are the principal works on a program which also includes Stravinsky's Huxley variations and Three Places in New England by Ives.

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(S) 112,754
OCT 26 1969

The Italian conductor Carlo Maria Giulini will conduct the Boston Symphony's fifth pair of Friday and Saturday concerts this week-end.

The program is an all-orchestral one, opening with the Concerto grosso in d by Francesco Bonporti, an Italian contemporary of Bach; Schubert's Symphony No. 4 in c minor, "Tragic;" Pizzetti's Overture to "Fedra;" and Mussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" in the Ravel orchestration. On Tuesday at 7:30 p.m. Giulini and the Orchestra will repeat the program as the second concert in the Tuesday series.

In the second of his two-week appearance, Nov. 7-8, Giulini will include on the all-orchestral program Haydn's Symphony No. 94, Casella's La giara and Brahms' Symphony No. 4.

* * *

Saturday, Nov. 8, marks the opening of the Youth Concert series at Symphony Hall, Boston. On Nov. 8 and 15, the program "Young Person's Guide to the Orchestra" will be narrated by Andrew Raeburn. The program will isolate each section of the orchestra, detailing its functions.

Tickets are available from Mrs. Manual Kurland, Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall, Boston.

* * *

Upcoming concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under a variety of conductors: November 7, 8, and 11, Carlo Maria Giulini conducting Haydn's Symphony no. 94 in G, the Surprise; La Giara by Casella; and Brahm's Symphony no. 4 in E minor. November 14, 15, 18, and 20, Seiji Ozawa leading Takemitsu's November Steps no. 1 and Orff's Carmina Burana with Evelyn Mandac, Stanley Kolk, Sherrill Milnes and the New England Conservatory Chorus. November 21, 22 and 25, Ozawa conducting, Joseph Silverstein soloist, in an all-Stravinsky program: Greetings Prelude, Petrushka, the Violin Concerto in D, and Suite from L'Oiseau de Feu. November 28, 29 and December 2, Erich Leinsdorf returns for a program of Haydn (Symphony no. 7 in C, Le Midi), Berg (Five Altenberg Songs and Excerpts from Wozzeck), and Tchaikovsky (Symphony no. 6 in B minor, the Pathetique). December 5, 6 and 16, Leinsdorf conducting, Mozart's Symphony no. 35 in D, the Haffner, and Bruckner's Symphony no. 8 in C minor. Open rehearsals are scheduled for November 13 (Ozawa) and December 4 (Leinsdorf). The program is usually that of the following Friday. For tickets call Symphony Hall box office: 266-1492.

ITEM
LYNN, MASS.
(E) 32,000
OCT 31 1969

BOSTON
BOSTON, MASS.
MONTHLY-CIRC. N. AVAIL.
NOV 1969

BSO Concert Best of Season

By L. DAVID HARRIS
Music Critic

Vitality, elegance, excellence: The words well describe yesterday's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, which was brilliantly led by Guest Conductor Carlo Maria Giulini. It was the best so far this season.

Giulani, former music director of the Rome Opera and now principal guest conductor of the Chicago Symphony, is obviously an inherently-gifted, deeply-involved interpreter of music and is intense in evoking the kinds of musical expressions he wishes from his musicians.

The cheers he won yesterday were in part because this intensity was so evident. It was seen immediately in the program's first number, a concerto grosso by Bonporti, as Giulani's outstretched left arm repeatedly reached to the orchestra, alternately dipping and waving, imploring with a fist—now open, now clenched —as if to physically pull the music from the musicians' instruments.

As the concert progressed, it became evident that to watch Giulani's right arm was to get the pace of the music—the left revealed its passion of the conductor himself.

Schubert's Fourth Symphony was a model of fervor and finesse. The pace of the second "andante" movement was particularly appreciated as was the excellence in phrasing which was prevalent throughout the entire work.

The symphony is difficult, phrase-wise, due to accent and dynamic markings and Giulani took all this in stride and seemed to hold climaxes for just the right amount of time.

The work's final movement also was appreciated, particularly passages of answering phrases between the violins and clarinets, with second vilin and viola accompaniment that was just loud enough to give strong harmonic effects.

Giulani caught the "tragic" mood of the symphony in an elegiac manner—he seemed to use musical sections marked "pp" (very soft) not as a dynamic level, but as a statement of the music's inner mood.

Giulani also won his audience with Mussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition." His antiphony and dynamic contrasts were sharp, often highly exaggerated, but not to the score's detriment.

The orchestra responded well to Giulani's conducting of the work. There were some fine brass sounds, solos were impressive and the unique musical surprises — trumpet flutter tonguing, gaudy percussion, etc. — were done with a flair. Special praise must go tothe percusionists and also to Chester Schmitz for his superlative tuba playing.

In Schubert an dMussorgsky, occasionally musical attacks didn't turn out too well — the instruments weren't totally together, some coming in just a fraction behind others or behind the beat.

However, this didn't happen often and since the program will be played several more times, this no doubt will be eliminated. The conductor and the orchestra will beter know each other.

Indeed, the particular beauty of this wonderful concert is that it will get even better as it is repeated to more audiences. And those audiences have a genuine treat in store for them.

ADVOCATE
ARLINGTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 9,000
OCT 30 1969

Giulini To Conduct

The distinguished Italian conductor, Carlo Maria Giulini, will conduct the Boston Symphony's fifth pair of Friday/Saturday concerts, at 2 o'clock Oct. 31 and 8:30 p.m. Nov. 1.

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Friday afternoon October 31 1969 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening November 1 1969 at 8.30
Tuesday evening November 4 1969 at 7.30

CARLO MARIA GIULINI conductor

BONPORTI — Concerto a quattro in D op. 11 no. 8
(transcribed by Guglielmo Barblan)
Allegro
Largo
Allegro vivace

first performance in Boston

SCHUBERT — Symphony no. 4 in C minor 'Tragic'
Adagio molto – allegro vivace
Andante
Menuetto: allegro vivace
Allegro assai

intermission

PIZZETTI — Prelude to 'Fedra'

first performance in Boston

MUSSORGSKY — Pictures at an exhibition, pieces for piano
(arranged for orchestra by Maurice Ravel)
Promenade – Gnomus (the gnome) – Promenade – Il vecchio castello (the old castle) – Promenade – Tuileries (children in the Tuileries gardens) – Bydlo (ox cart) – Promenade – Ballet of chicks in their shells – Samuel Goldenberg and Schmuyle – Limoges, the market – Catacombs – Con mortuis in lingua mortua (with the dead in a dead language) – The hut on hens' legs (Baba Yaga the witch) – The great gate of Kiev

1st Guest Conductor Of Boston Symphony

The distinguished Italian conductor, Carlo Maria Giulini will conduct the Boston Symphony's fifth pair of Friday-Saturday concerts, at 2 o'clock October 31 and 8.30 p. m. Nov. 1.

The program is an all-orchestral one, opening with the Concerto grosso in D by Francesco Bonporti, an Italian contemporary of 'Pictures at an exhibition,' in the Ravel orchestration, will close the program.

Carlo Maria Giu.ini recently assumed the post of principal guest conductor of the Chicago Symphony, the orchestra with which he made his United States debut in 1955. Born in Barletta, on the Adriatic coast of southern Italy, he studied at the St. Cecilia Academy in Rome, conducted the Radio Italiana and Radio Milan orchestras, conducted at La Scala, Milan, and was musical director of the Rome Opera for many years. Giulini last appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1962 and this season will conduct two Friday-Saturday pairs of concerts.

Open Rehearsal

Thursday at 7.30 p. m. Giulini will conduct the second of this season's open rehearsals, working with the orchestra on the following day's program.

Tuesday at 8.30 p. m., Michael Tilson Thomas, the Boston Symphony's new assistant conductor, will conduct the second concert of the Tuesday 'A' series. His program will be a repeat of the program with which he made his highly-acclaimed Boston Symphony debut on Oct. 10 and 11. Haydn's Symphony No. 98 and Debussy' La Mer are the principal works on a program which also includes Stravinsky's Huxley variations and Three Places in New England by Ives.

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(E) 222,764

OCT 26 1969

Guest conductor provides a decent BSO concert

15.

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Staff

The news from Pittsburgh is that William Steinberg is recovered from the illness that interrupted his New York concert 10 days ago, and that he was expected to conduct his scheduled concert with the Pittsburgh Symphony last night. As Steinberg looked after his other orchestra, the Boston Symphony was led Friday afternoon by Carlo Maria Giulini, 55, principal guest conductor of the Chicago Symphony. He is the first of a series of guests here this season.

The most immediately remarkable feature of Friday's concert was how well the orchestra played for Giulini. It was spirited, rhlthmic, mostly very decently in tune, more often suave than incisive. It was nicely varied, too, and refreshing after that self-serving, narcissistic, monotonous lushness and gloss that Ormandy and the Philadelphians unloaded here last week. There were occasional solo failures in the Boston Symphony's playing — with no surprises for the most part, as to where they came from — but what Giulini and the Symphony produced together was, most of it, orchestral playing of a high standard, both lively and cultivated.

Musically, the concert was slow to get going. Giulini handicapped himself by starting out with something he does not understand beans about, a Concerto Grosso by Francesco Bonporti, a harmless contemporary of Vivaldi's. He did the piece as a sort of blend of The Arkansas Traveler and the Barber Adagio for Strings.

In the first three movements of Schubert's "Tragic" Symphony, which came next, Giulini seemed rather tense still, so that the performance was hardly more than note-spinning, beautifully finished, but with everything rather washed out.

After intermission, everything was fine. Giulini began with the Prelude to Ildebrando Pizzetti's opera, "Fedra," written 1915. It is a seven- or eight-minute slow piece that tries to be austere and cannot always quite help getting juicy, a little Sibeliu.

Having done with that gelding, Giulini went on to something superbly potent and lively, Mussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," played in the beautiful Ravel orchestration. Giulini was splendid here — in particular, I have never heard 'Gnomus" and "Baba Yaga the Witch" done as such a threatening pair of ugly dreams, nor "The Market at Limoges" with such lightness and grace. In conception, and most of the way in execution as well, the performance was a worthy sequel to the fine one Vladimir Ashkenazy gave of the piano original two weeks ago.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

NOV 1 1969

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

NOV 1 1969

THE GUEST CONDUCTOR

CARLO MARIA GIULINI was born in 1914 at Barletta, a city on the Adriatic coast of southern Italy. At the Academy of Santa Cecilia in Rome he studied viola with Remy Principe and composition with Alessandro Bustini. After graduation he became a student of Alfredo Casella at the Chigi Academy in Siena, and won a diploma in a post-graduate conducting course under Bernardino Molinari. He was engaged in 1946 by the Radio Italiana Orchestra, and four years later became conductor of the Radio Milan Orchestra. His subsequent appointment to La Scala, in immediate succession to Victor de Sabata, kept him based in Milan for several years.

In the fall of 1955 Carlo Maria Giulini came to the United States for the first time to conduct the Chicago Symphony. The following summer he made the first of many appearances with the Israel Philharmonic. Since that time he has led the world's major orchestras, conducted in the major opera houses and appeared at the principal music festivals. He has recently relinquished the position of Musical Director of the Rome Opera, which he held for many years, to devote his attention to symphonic music. He has just taken up his position as Principal Guest Conductor of the Chicago Symphony. The majority of his many recordings are on the Angel and London labels. Carlo Maria Giulini most recently appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1962.

Giulini Conducts Mussorgsky's 'Pictures'

Symphony Second Rate

By GEORGE GELLES
MT Music Critic

Carlo Maria Giulini must be doing something right, for his performance with the Boston Symphony of "Pictures at an Exhibition" knocked them dead yesterday afternoon. Don't ask me what it is, though, for I found Guilini's Symphony Hall return a routine and disappointing event.

The 55-year-old Italian made his name in opera, for the most part at La Scala and Rome, and turned to a symphonic career fairly late, coming first to the States in 1955. Then he appeared with the Chicago Symphony, and now he's its Principal Guest. Conductor.

Giulini, who was last here in 1962, is an elegant looking man, which I don't doubt has had something to do with his success, and extremely active and aggressive at his work. There's lots of motion, most of it's angular and stiff, and although he holds a baton, he seems to do his actual conducting with his forearm.

HIS PROGRAM WAS pretty dreadful—two Italian works dredged up for the occassion, plus Mussorgsky's "Pictures" and the Schubert Fourth—and of these I expected the Mussorgsky to save the day. Well, it didn't.

We had a performance of "Pictures" just two weeks ago, though in its original keyboard version. The young Russian Ashkenazy played it, and for its freshness, delicacy, beauty of tone and structural awareness, it was first-rate.

Giulini's reading missed almost completely. First of all, the playing he got from the BSO was disgraceful. Intonation was wildly erratic all afternoon, and most every solo player was out of sorts but the saxophonist was truly embarrassing.

AS TO TIMING, Giulini didn't have it. One of the wonderful details of Ashkenazy's performance was the suddenness, the rightness, of the quick juxtaposition of the introductory 'Promenades with the highly rhetorical entrance of the 'Gnomes'. Giulini was casual about this, and gave no indication that this connection mattered, or that he had even thought about it. And ditto for several similar spots, the juncture between the 'Hut' and 'Great Gate,' or that connecting 'Limoges' and the 'Catacombs.'

If the reading had merit, and as I said, most everybody else thought it did, it was in Giulini's gift for getting gut-level reactions. Though most of the performances was technically drab, there were some few measures—the percussion punctuation in 'Gnomes,' for instance—that sparkled; though most of it was dynamically indifferent, sailing along at a serve-all mezzo-forte. There were some measures—notably those picturing the 'Great Gate' — that were impressively loud, and though out of context, effective in whipping up an audience. However, these are the easiest attainable of possitive virtues.

THE SCHUBERT WASN'T much fun, either, though it started in fine fashion. The piece itself, written when Schubert was 19, is deeply indebted to Mozart and Haydn. With Mozart, it's the "Dissonant" Quartet; this is really what Schubert's slow introduction is all about. It seems patterned quite literally on the Mozart, though it is a much more straight-forward affair, without the temporal displacements that make the Mozart so special.

And Haydn is particularly evident in the harmonic far-sightedness of the opening bars, in the way the introduction moves from C to G-flat, and how the body of the symphony then keeps working its way through the flat side of keys until, in the Minuet, this G-flat is reached. And for all the forward-looking touches —Schubert's style of string writing, or the harmonic slow-down that points so clearly to Bruckner—the Fourth is still most fascinating for the lessons it shows so well absorbed.

THE INTRODUCTION, then, was understood by Giulini and performed very well, though the rest of the movement was without the same concentration or sense of purpose and had fuzzy, unclear string work as well. He was also fine at the start of the last movement's development —those measures that span E-flat and the distant A so gracefully. But the symphony was in most ways ordinary, phrased with no special charm, unthought-out in its formal articulation, poorly played.

The two Italian works were an 18th century string concerto by Francesco Bonporti and the Prelude to the opera "Fedra" by the post-Romantic Ildebrando Pizzetti. On historical grounds, the latter was interesting to hear, the former wasn't. On program-making grounds, both were witless choices. There's too much good music that lies unplayed—by Corelli, say, among the old, or Dallapiccol a of the new—to waste half a program with the second-rate.

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300

NOV 1 1969

The Italian conductor Carlo Maria Giulini will conduct the Boston Symphony's fifth pair of Friday and Saturday concerts this week-end.

The program is an all-orchestral one, opening with the Concerto grosso in d by Francesco Bonporti, an Italian contemporary of Bach; Schubert's Symphony No. 4 in c minor, "Tragic;" Pizzetti's Overture to "Fedra;" and Mussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" in the Ravel orchestration. On Tuesday at 7:30 p.m. Giulini and the Orchestra will repeat the program as the second concert in the Tuesday series.

In the second of his two-week appearance, Nov. 7-8, Giulini will include on the all-orchestral program Haydn's Symphony No. 94, Casella's La giara and Brahms' Symphony No. 4.

* * *

Saturday, Nov. 8, marks the opening of the Youth Concert series at Symphony Hall, Boston. On Nov. 8 and 15, the program "Young Person's Guide to the Orchestra" will be narrated by Andrew Raeburn. The program will isolate each section of the orchestra, detailing its functions.

Tickets are available from Mrs. Manual Kurland, Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall, Boston.

* * *

Upcoming concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under a variety of conductors: November 7, 8, and 11, Carlo Maria Giulini conducting Haydn's Symphony no. 94 in G, the Surprise; La Giara by Casella; and Brahm's Symphony no. 4 in E minor. November 14, 15, 18, and 20, Seiji Ozawa leading Takemitsu's November Steps no. 1 and Orff's Carmina Burana with Evelyn Mandac, Stanley Kolk, Sherrill Milnes and the New England Conservatory Chorus. November 21, 22 and 25, Ozawa conducting, Joseph Silverstein soloist, in an all-Stravinsky program: Greetings Prelude, Petrushka, the Violin Concerto in D, and Suite from L'Oiseau de Feu. November 28, 29 and December 2, Erich Leinsdorf returns for a program of Haydn (Symphony no. 7 in C, Le Midi), Berg (Five Altenberg Songs and Excerpts from Wozzeck), and Tchaikovsky (Symphony no. 6 in B minor, the Pathetique). December 5, 6 and 16, Leinsdorf conducting, Mozart's Symphony no. 35 in D, the Haffner, and Bruckner's Symphony no. 8 in C minor. Open rehearsals are scheduled for November 13 (Ozawa) and December 4 (Leinsdorf). The program is usually that of the following Friday. For tickets call Symphony Hall box office: 266-1492.

ITEM
LYNN, MASS.
(E) 32,225

OCT 31 1969

BOSTON
BOSTON, MASS.
MONTHLY-CIRC. AVAIL.

NOV 1969

BSO Concert Best of Season

By L. DAVID HARRIS
Music Critic

Vitality, elegance, excellence: The words well describe yesterday's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, which was brilliantly led by Guest Conductor Carlo Maria Giulini. It was the best so far this season.

Giulani, former music director of the Rome Opera and now principal guest conductor of the Chicago Symphony, is obviously an inherently-gifted, deeply-involved interpreter of music and is intense in evoking the kinds of musical expressions he wishes from his musicians.

The cheers he won yesterday were in part because this intensity was so evident. It was seen immediately in the program's first number, a concerto grosso by Bonporti, as Giulani's outstretched left arm repeatedly reached to the orchestra, alternately dipping and waving, imploring with a fist—now open, now clenched —as if to physically pull the music from the musicians' instruments.

As the concert progressed, it became evident that to watch Giulani's right arm was to get the pace of the music—the left revealed its passion of the conductor himself.

Schubert's Fourth Symphony was a model of fervor and finesse. The pace of the second "andante" movement was particularly appreciated as was the excellence in phrasing which was prevalent throughout the entire work.

The symphony is difficult, phrase-wise, due to accent and dynamic markings and Giulani took all this in stride and seemed to hold climaxes for just the right amount of time.

The work's final movement also was appreciated, particularly passages of answering phrases between the violins and clarinets, with second violin and viola accompaniment that was just loud enough to give strong harmonic effects.

Giulani caught the "tragic" mood of the symphony in an elegiac manner—he seemed to use musical sections marked "pp" (very soft) not as a dynamic level, but as a statement of the music's inner mood.

Giulani also won his audience with Mussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition." His antiphony and dynamic contrasts were sharp, often highly exaggerated, but not to the score's detriment.

The orchestra responded well to Giulani's conducting of the work. There were some fine brass sounds, solos were impressive and the unique musical surprises — trumpet flutter tonguing, gaudy percussion, etc. — were done with a flair. Special praise must go tothe percusionists and also to Chester Schmitz for his superlative tuba playing.

In Schubert an dMussorgsky, occasionally musical attacks didn't turn out too well — the instruments weren't totally together, some coming in just a fraction behind others or behind the beat.

However, this didn't happen often and since the program will be played several more times, this no doubt will be eliminated. The conductor and the orchestra will beter know each other.

Indeed, the particular beauty of this wonderful concert is that it will get even better as it is repeated to more audiences. And those audiences have a genuine treat in store for them.

ADVOCATE
ARLINGTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 9,000

OCT 30 1969

Giulini To Conduct

The distinguished Italian conductor, Carlo Maria Giulini, will conduct the Boston Symphony's fifth pair of Friday/Saturday concerts, at 2 o'clock Oct. 31 and 8:30 p.m. Nov. 1.

16.

SYMPHONY REVIEW BOCKSPAN

VIDEO

WHAC-TV FILMED FOR AIR: FRIDAY, OCTOBER 31, 1969

AUDIO

Good evening, everyone. I'm speaking to you from my seat in Symphony Hall where this afternoon Carlo Maria Giulini began a two-week engagement as Guest Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. To say that Maestro Giulini scored a great personal triumph is really to understate the case. Rarely in my experience has a Guest Conductor so completely captured both the audience and the Orchestra. The remarkable thing is that Giulini has been here before - seven years ago; but he is now virtually a completely new conductor. His podium bearing is much more physical than it used to be, and he gives the impression of literally pulling out of each member of the orchestra an a shmaltzing totally committed involvement with every note of the score. His attention to shadings, nuance and dynamics is remarkable and, this afternoon at least, there was a vitality and a real visceral excitement to the performances that deserves the adjective "thrilling." Giulini is this season embarking upon a three-year contract as Principal Guest Conductor of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra; if today's concert was an index of what one may consistently expect from him, I can only say that Chicago is due for truly extraordinary music-making.

The two big works on his program this week-end are Schubert's so-called "Tragic" Symphony, and the Ravel orchestration of Mussorgsky's Pictures at an Exhibition. Both were given extraordinarily dramatic and thoroughly convincing performances, and many the musicians played as though they were possessed.

I suspect it will be some time before anyone here in Symphony Hall this afternoon will forget this concert conducted by the "new" Carlo Maria Giulini.

This is Martin Bockspan for Boston 7 News.

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR NOVEMBER 3 1969

Giulini conducts BSO

By Louis Snyder

Almost everyone in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon seemed delighted to hear and see Carlo Maria Giulini on the podium again. He has been away since 1962, conducting opera and major symphony orchestras all over the world, and returned to Boston to receive something like a cumulative ovation.

Mr. Giulini is one of the taller conductors, and although the BSO looks broad and high itself, he seemed at times to envelop it completely in his expansive molding of a phrase or progress toward a ringing crescendo. Not that Mr. Giulini is constantly all over the place—far from it. But in the music that he played, there were opportunities for large-scale structuring, and he certainly knows how to build that way.

Musical translation

A first Boston performance of Francesco Bonporti's Concerto a quattro in D opened the program. The work of a late 17th-early 18th-century composer-in-spite-of-himself, a Jesuit who sought preferment through composing, the concerto is an engaging piece, reminiscent of Vivaldi in style more than content. Bonporti wrote some particularly tricky music for violin solo, and it was polished off with his usual verve by Joseph Silverstein.

In the three numbers which followed, Mr. Giulini's essence was given free rein. Drama flows through his hands, and with the kind of magnificent instrument the BSO provides, he translated music as a director stages a play, into a succession of emotional depths and heights, full of theatrical imagery.

What better subject, in these circumstances, than the Fourth Symphony (C minor) of Schubert? Despite its "Tragic" label, it has no program—Mr. Giulini's interpretation, strong and singing, will do until an authentic one comes along. He conducted with great definition, practically dived in, in fact, to the business of music-making. And at the end, the musicians joined the audience in the loud reception.

Smashing

The overture to Ildebrando Pizzetti's "Fedra" opened the program's second half in its first performance here. Most 20th-century opera overtures were not meant to stand alone. This one, however, considering the period in which it was composed (1915), is sturdy and well-constructed enough to do so. But it will probably take some time before Pizzetti will be sorted out from his contemporaries with enough objectivity to receive a just assessment.

And last—the Mussorgsky-Ravel "Pictures at an Exhibition." Here Mr. Giulini had everything to do with to make this an exciting, living, breathing, theatrical experience. He was very much the participating director, explaining the paintings in sound, crisply, eerily, forebodingly, smashingly. The applause almost but not quite matched the decibel count of the climactic percussion, brass, wind (well, everybody) finale, which is something rather unusual on a Friday afternoon.

ARTS ENTERTAINMENT

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

NOV 3 1969

An additional review of the Oct. 31 concert is on page 18.

MINUTEMAN
BEDFORD, MASS.
WEEKLY 3,100

NOV 6 1969

BURLINGTON TIMES
UNION
BURLINGTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 6,200

NOV 6 1969

CITIZEN
BELMONT, MASS.
WEEKLY 4,200

NOV 6 1969

MINUTE MAN
LEXINGTON, MA
WEEKLY 7,975

NOV 6 1969

Guest Conductor

The sixth pair of Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday/Saturday concerts, Friday, Nov. 7, at 2 p.m. and Saturday, Nov. 8, at 8:30 p.m., will be conducted by the distinguished Italian conductor Carlo Maria Giulini, in the second of his two week appearance as guest conductor of the Orchestra.

STANDARD-TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
(E) 70,000 (S) 60,000

NOV 6 1969

E. J. Dias Review

Chicago Conductor Leads Boston Symphony

Carl Maria Giulini, former music director of the Rome Opera and currently permanent guest conductor of the Chicago Symphony, led the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the second concert of the season's Tuesday "B" Series.

Giulini is a personable, slim, wiry man who conducts with considerable flair and a good deal of intensity. His program included Francesco Bonporti's "Concerto a Quattro in D, Opus 11, No. 8," Schubert's "Symphony No. 4 in C Minor" (The Tragic), Ildebrando Pizzetti's "Prelude to 'Fedra,'" and Mussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" in Ravel's brilliant orchestration of the original piano pieces.

Bonporti was an 18th-Century composer who obviously owed much, in style and content, to Vivaldi. His concerto, performed with some excellent solo work by concertmaster Joseph Silverstein, is one of those typically Baroque selections — elegant, tuneful, easily assimilated, and sounding very much like the innumerable others of its type. In the first movement, the Allegro, the orchestra was somewhat ragged in its attacks, but matters improved as the performance progressed so that the concluding Allegro Vivace was done in excellent style.

The best aspect of Giulini's reading of the familiar Schubert symphony was his meticulous attention to dynamic contrasts. As a result, the interplay of instruments was always clear and always well-balanced, with a particular loveliness of sound in the haunting Andante and with some genuinely dramatic playing in the opening Adagio.

As for the Pizzetti Prelude, it is a pleasing though certainly not a great work, offering occasional evidence of the composer's lifelong interest in Greek and Gregorian modes. The orchestra responded well to Giulini's direction of the work for whose particular brand of music he obviously has an affinity.

However, the greatest impact of the program was made, not surprisingly, by the perennially popular "Pictures at an Exhibition." The Ravel orchestration provides a virtual field day for most of the orchestra's sections — particularly the percussion, the brass, and the woodwinds. For pure and lush sonority, there is perhaps nothing in the orchestral repertoire more thrilling than the rousing Finale, "The Great Gate of Kiev," and Giulini and his musicians did full justice to it.

In fact, Giulini (who last conducted the Boston group in 1962) won an audience ovation for his reading of the work — a reading notable for its clarity of phrasing, its skillful mounting to appropriate climaxes, its ability to convey the occasional humor and grotesquerie inherent in portions of the work.

The next concert of the Series will be performed on Dec. 2, with Erich Leinsdorf conducting.

STANDARD-TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
(E) 70,000 (S) 60,000

NOV 9 1969

Carlo Guilini and the Boston Symphony

At Tuesday night's concert in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's "B" Series, the Italian conductor, Carlo Maria Guilini was guest conductor in a program that included works by Bonporti, Schubert, Pizzetti, and Moussorgsky. Giulini, former conductor of the Rome Opera and now permanent guest conductor of the Chicago Symphony, is a striking looking figure—thin, highly energetic, black-haired, with facial features that resemble some of the emperors one sees on old Roman coins.

In his conducting, he is of the athletic school—with much motion of his right arm as though he were trying literally to draw out the music from the instrumentalists before him. His strength as a conductor lies, I think, in his ability to attain dynamic contrasts and in his ability, too (notably in the "Great Gate of Kiev" finale in Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition") to make his orchestra rise to great emotional climaxes with lush, rafter-shaking, but effectively integrated sonority.

His reading of Schubert's "Tragic Symphony" was effective in conveying both the melody and emotion of the work. In the Baroque "Concerto Grosso" by Bonporti both he and the orchestra seemed to experience some difficulty in achieving precision of attacks although this work improved as it progressed.

I would say, however, that Guilini was a decided hit, especially with the distaff side of the audience. It is certainly no detriment in a conductor to be romantic in appearance — and Guilini is certainly handsome and perhaps the youngest looking man of 55 that I have seen in some time.

While on the subject of the Boston Symphony, I should report its music director, William Steinberg, has been ailing —he is said not yet to be completely recovered from surgery he underwent last summer. As a result, two Boston Symphony concerts in New York last week were led by the youthful assistant conductor of the orchestra, Michael Tilson Thomas, who scored such a success in his Boston debut earlier in the season.

Steinberg is, of course, nearing 70; yet he still retains two major posts in music — as music director of both the Boston and Pittsburgh Orchestras. I should think that two such posts would be back-breaking — even for a younger man. And I suspect that the guest conductors who will appear with the Boston Symphony this season will be watched closely as possible candidates (when Steinberg concludes his present three-year contract) for the Boston position. These guest conductors, aside from Thomas and Guilini, include Colin Davis (once mentioned as a likely successor to Leinsdorf), Claudi Abbado, Seiji Ozawa, and Gunther Schuller, who is president of the New England Conservatory of Music.

In any event, Boston is fortunate to have Steinberg in his important role at present. He is a dedicated, widely-experienced musician, respected by the players and by all those who are knowledgeable about the world of music.

16.

SYMPHONY REVIEW BOOKSPAN

VIDEO

WNAC-TV FILMED FOR AIR: FRIDAY, OCTOBER 31, 1969

AUDIO

Good evening, everyone. I'm speaking to you from my seat in Symphony Hall where this afternoon Carlo Maria Giulini began a two-week engagement as Guest Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. To say that Maestro Giulini scored a great personal triumph is really to understate the case. Rarely in my experience has a Guest Conductor so completely captured both the audience and the Orchestra. The remarkable thing is that Giulini has been here before - seven years ago; but he is now virtually a completely new conductor. His podium bearing is much more physical than it used to be, and he gives the impression of literally pulling out of each member of the orchestra a totally committed involvement with every note of the score. His attention to shadings, nuance and dynamics is remarkable and, this afternoon at least, there was a vitality and a real visceral excitement to the performances that deserves the adjective "thrilling." Giulini is this season embarking upon a three-year contract as Principal Guest Conductor of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra; if today's concert was an index of what one may consistently expect from him, I can only say that Chicago is due for truly extraordinary music-making.

The two big works on his program this week-end are Schubert's so-called "Tragic" Symphony, and the Ravel orchestration of Moussorgsky's Pictures at an Exhibition. Both were given extraordinarily dramatic and thoroughly convincing performances, and the musicians played as though they were possessed.

I suspect it will be some time before anyone here in Symphony Hall this afternoon will forget this concert conducted by the "new" Carlo Maria Giulini.

This is Martin Bookspan for Boston 7 News.

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR NOVEMBER 3 1969

Giulini conducts BSO

By Louis Snyder

Almost everyone in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon seemed delighted to hear and see Carlo Maria Giulini on the podium again. He has been away since 1962, conducting opera and major symphony orchestras all over the world, and returned to Boston to receive something like a cumulative ovation.

Mr. Giulini is one of the taller conductors, and although the BSO looks broad and high itself, he seemed at times to envelop it completely in his expansive molding of a phrase or progress toward a ringing crescendo. Not that Mr. Giulini is constantly all over the place—far from it. But in the music that he played, there were opportunities for large-scale structuring, and he certainly knows how to build that way.

Musical translation

A first Boston performance of Francesco Bonporti's Concerto a quattro in D opened the program. The work of a late 17th-early 18th-century composer-in-spite-of-himself, a Jesuit who sought preferment through composing, the concerto is an engaging piece, reminiscent of Vivaldi in style more than content. Bonporti wrote some particularly tricky music for violin solo, and it was polished off with his usual verve by Joseph Silverstein.

In the three numbers which followed, Mr. Giulini's essence was given free rein. Drama flows through his hands, and with the kind of magnificent instrument the BSO provides, he translated music as a director stages a play, into a succession of emotional depths and heights, full of theatrical imagery.

What better subject, in these circumstances, than the Fourth Symphony (C minor) of Schubert? Despite its "Tragic" label, it has no program—Mr. Giulini's interpretation, strong and singing, will do until an authentic one comes along. He conducted with great definition, practically dived in, in fact, to the business of music-making. And at the end, the musicians joined the audience in the loud reception.

Smashing

The overture to Ildebrando Pizzetti's "Fedra" opened the program's second half in its first performance here. Most 20th-century opera overtures were not meant to stand alone. This one, however, considering the period in which it was composed (1915), is sturdy and well-constructed enough to do so. But it will probably take some time before Pizzetti will be sorted out from his contemporaries with enough objectivity to receive a just assessment.

And last—the Mussorgsky-Ravel "Pictures at an Exhibition." Here Mr. Giulini had everything to do with to make this an exciting, living, breathing, theatrical experience. He was very much the participating director, explaining the paintings in sound, crisply, eerily, forebodingly, smashingly. The applause almost but not quite matched the decibel count of the climactic percussion, brass, wind (well, everybody) finale, which is something rather unusual on a Friday afternoon.

ARTS ENTERTAINMENT

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,859

NOV 3 1969

An additional review of the Oct. 31 concert is on page 18.

MINUTEMAN
BEDFORD, MASS.
WEEKLY 3,100

NOV 6 1969

BURLINGTON TIMES
UNION
BURLINGTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 6,200

NOV 6 1969

CITIZEN
BELMONT, MASS.
WEEKLY 4,200

NOV 6 1969

MINUTE MAN
LEXINGTON, MA
WEEKLY 7,975

NOV 6 1969

Guest Conductor

The sixth pair of Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday/Saturday concerts, Friday, Nov. 7, at 2 p.m. and Saturday, Nov. 8, at 8:30 p.m., will be conducted by the distinguished Italian conductor Carlo Maria Giulini, in the second of his two week appearance as guest conductor of the Orchestra.

STANDARD-TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
(E) 70,000 (S) 60,000

NOV 6 1969

E. J. Dias Review

Chicago Conductor Leads Boston Symphony

Carl Maria Giulini, former music director of the Rome Opera and currently permanent guest conductor of the Chicago Symphony, led the Boston Symphony Orchestra in ~~the second concert of the~~ season's Tuesday "B" Series.

Giulini is a personable, slim, wiry man who conducts with considerable flair and a good deal of intensity. His program included Francesco Bonporti's "Concerto a Quattro in D, Opus 11, No. 8," Schubert's "Symphony No. 4 in C Minor" (The Tragic), Ildebrando Pizzetti's "Prelude to 'Fedra," and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" in Ravel's brilliant orchestration of the original piano pieces.

Bonporti was an 18th-Century composer who obviously owed much, in style and content, to Vivaldi. His concerto, performed with some excellent solo work by concertmaster Joseph Silverstein, is one of those typically Baroque selections — elegant, tuneful, easily assimilated, and sounding very much like the innumerable others of its type. In the first movement, the Allegro, the orchestra was somewhat ragged in its attacks, but matters improved as the performance progressed so that the concluding Allegro Vivace was done in excellent style.

The best aspect of Giulini's reading of the familiar Schubert symphony was his meticulous attention to dynamic contrasts. As a result, the interplay of instruments was always clear and always well-balanced, with a particular loveliness of sound in the haunting Andante and with some genuinely dramatic playing in the opening Adagio.

As for the Pizzetti Prelude, it is a pleasing though certainly not a great work, offering occasional evidence of the composer's lifelong interest in Greek and Gregorian modes. The orchestra responded well to Giulini's direction of the work for whose particular brand of music he obviously has an affinity.

However, the greatest impact of the program was made, not surprisingly, by the perennially popular "Pictures at an Exhibition." The Ravel orchestration provides a virtual field day for most of the orchestra's sections — particularly the percussion, the brass, and the woodwinds. For pure and lush sonority, there is perhaps nothing in the orchestral repertoire more thrilling than the rousing Finale, "The Great Gate of Kiev," and Giulini and his musicians did full justice to it.

In fact, Giulini (who last conducted the Boston group in 1962) won an audience ovation for his reading of the work — a reading notable for its clarity of phrasing, its skillful mounting to appropriate climaxes, its ability to convey the occasional humor and grotesquerie inherent in portions of the work.

The next concert of the Series will be performed on Dec. 2, with Erich Leinsdorf conducting.

STANDARD-TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
(E) 70,000 (S) 60,000

NOV 9 1969

Carlo Guilini and the Boston Symphony

At Tuesday night's concert in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's "B" Series, the Italian conductor, Carlo Maria Guilini was guest conductor in a program that included works by Bonporti, Schubert, Pizzetti, and Moussorgsky. Giulini, former conductor of the Rome Opera and now permanent guest conductor of the Chicago Symphony, is a striking looking figure—thin, highly energetic, black-haired, with facial features that resemble some of the emperors one sees on old Roman coins.

In his conducting, he is of the athletic school—with much motion of his right arm as though he were trying literally to draw out the music from the instrumentalists before him. His strength as a conductor lies, I think, in his ability to attain dynamic contrasts and in his ability, too (notably in the "Great Gate of Kiev" finale in Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition") to make his orchestra rise to great emotional climaxes with lush, rafter-shaking, but effectively integrated sonority.

His reading of Schubert's "Tragic Symphony" was effective in conveying both the melody and emotion of the work. In the Baroque "Concerto Grosso" by Bonporti both he and the orchestra seemed to experience some difficulty in achieving precision of attacks although this work improved as it progressed.

I would say, however, that Guilini was a decided hit, especially with the distaff side of the audience. It is certainly no detriment in a conductor to be romantic in appearance — and Guilini is certainly handsome and perhaps the youngest looking man of 55 that I have seen in some time.

While on the subject of the Boston Symphony, I should report its music director, William Steinberg, has been ailing —he is said not yet to be completely recovered from surgery he underwent last summer. As a result, two Boston Symphony concerts in New York last week were led by the youthful assistant conductor of the orchestra, Michael Tilson Thomas, who scored such a success in his Boston debut earlier in the season.

Steinberg is, of course, nearing 70; yet he still retains two major posts in music — as music director of both the Boston and Pittsburgh Orchestras. I should think that two such posts would be back-breaking — even for a younger man. And I suspect that the guest conductors who will appear with the Boston Symphony this season will be watched closely as possible candidates (when Steinberg concludes his present three-year contract) for the Boston position. These guest conductors, aside from Thomas and Guilini, include Colin Davis (once mentioned as a likely successor to Leinsdorf), Claudi Abbado, Seiji Ozawa, and Gunther Schuller, who is president of the New England Conservatory of Music.

In any event, Boston is fortunate to have Steinberg in his important role at present. He is a dedicated, widely-experienced musician, respected by the players and by all those who are knowledgeable about the world of music.

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Friday afternoon November 7 1969 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening November 8 1969 at 8.30
Tuesday evening November 11 1969 at 8.30

CARLO MARIA GIULINI conductor

HAYDN — Symphony no. 94 in G 'Surprise'
Adagio cantabile – vivace assai
Andante
Menuetto & trio: allegro molto
Allegro di molto

CASELLA — Symphonic suite from 'La giara' (The jar)
Prelude – Sicilian dance
The story of the girl kidnapped by pirates – Nela's dance – Entrance of the peasants – Brindisi (drinking song of the peasants) – General dance – Finale
ROBERT JOHNSON tenor

Intermission

BRAHMS — Symphony no. 4 in E minor op. 98*
Allegro non troppo
Andante moderato
Allegro giocoso
Allegro energico e passionato

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
NOV 8 1969

BOSTON HERALD TRAVELER, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 8, 1969

Orchestra Applauds Giulini at Symphony

By GEORGE GELLES

Carlo Maria Giulini followed what I found a feeble concert last week with a fine one yesterday afternoon.

It was the last of his two Symphony Hall guest appearances with the Boston Symphony, and at the concert's close the men in the orchestra applauded and stamped their feet with a fervor I'd not previously seen.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
NOV 8 1969

WITH SYMPHONIES of Haydn and Brahms, Giulini's program was musically far more demanding than he played last week, even though between the symphonies he sandwiched Casella's ballet suite "La Giara," which is strictly Pops fare. The reading it got was fittingly flashy, but with only twenty-four weeks of Symphony, it seemed a shame to spend even twenty-four minutes with so trivial a work.

The orchestra obviously liked Giulini, and for him they did fine work. Playing throughout the afternoon was alert and lively and intonation usually good. The string sound Giulini got still seemed thin, a bit lacking in body, and though most often everybody played together, there were still some problems of ensemble, for instance, at the unison start of the slow movement of the Brahms Fourth, where the two horns refused to play as one.

Giulini is exhausting to watch, for his conducting not only tells the players what to do, but shows the audience the desired effect at the same time. It's a style of showmanship that's hyper-active and perhaps unneeded, but it makes one point with utmost clarity—that Giulini understands the orchestra and knows how to play on it most effectively.

THE HAYDN SYMPHONY of the afternoon was the 94th, the 'Surprise.' Aside from the the first movement, which seemd a shade slow, tempi were right. Phrases were clearly shaped, if always in the expected manner, things were rhythmically brisk, and each of the movements had character.

My reservations about the reading come from the feeling I had that we were being carried along from phrase to phrase, that the overall shape of the piece was never as important as the smaller section, that the trees, so to speak, were more important than the forest. And also, as I mentioned, that phrases, though well molded, were never shown in a special light.

Which doesn't mean that the performance was without its pleasures. The minuet, for example, was effective for its rhythmic impetus and for the gutsiness with which Giulini dug into the very fabric of the score, and the start of the slow movement was held back just enough and clearly differentiated dynamically so that the 'surprise,' an old joke by now, made its proper effect.

AND BECAUSE of the curious snobbism that's found in every orchestra — that a Haydn symphony is less worthy of the first chair player's time than a Brahms symphony—we got to hear Messrs. Pappoutsakis and Matheny doing clean and tasteful work in the flute and oboe solos, respectively.

The Brahms Fourth also got a good reading, one that shared the qualities of the Haydn—admirable orchestral work and energetic conducting —but the same faults, as well, most noticeably, a conventionality in matters of phrasing, and textures that could have been considerably cleaner.

The most striking thing about Giulini's concerts here has been the orchestra's enthusiasm. The men were responsive to him and gave of themselves in their playing. This is the same quality that distinguished those concerts last season by Pierre Boulez and this year fy Michael Tilson Thomas.

If Giulini's music-making was less distinguished than that of the other two men, it's because his ideas about music are less compelling. But the performances he led reminded us again of a standard of orchestral execution that is too often unmet.

A Different Opinion Of Symphony Concert

To the Herald Traveler Editor:

As a long time admirer of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, I am writing a few words to present an opinion contrary to that of Mr. Gelles in a recent review.

It seems to me that Mr. Gelles is so overly concerned with the mechanics of the performance that he misses the true beauty, pleasure and joy which this great orchestra and its various conductors (some better than others, especially Michael Thomas, about whom the New Yorker critic, Mr. Sargent, wrote "It could be that another Leonard Bernstein is in the making), bring us every week.

At a concert, Mr. Carlo Giulini conducted Mussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition." At the conclusion of the performance the audience expressed its pleasure and appreciation with spontaneous and prolonged applause—even a standing ovation. In his review the next day, Mr. Gelles acknowledged the audience's pleasure and appreciation but said, in effect, that he could not understand the reason for it.

One can only conclude that the business of being a music critic has deprived Mr. Gelles of the pleasure of being a music lover.

ANNA B. MILLAR

Dedham

HERALD 11/8/69

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR
Monday, November 10, 1969 7

Farewell surprises by Giulini

By Louis Snyder

Carlo Maria Giulini presented the second and final program of his present guest conducting stint with the Boston Symphony on Friday afternoon at Symphony Hall.

All of the surprises of the afternoon were not written into the score of Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony (No. 94 in G), which opened the program. The unexpected fortissimo crash in the Andante after a pianissimo lull, (Haydn never admitted it was purposely inserted to arouse nodders), was perhaps less startling than some fuzzy string entrances that preceded and followed it on Friday. Things did right themselves, but for a while, it took some maneuvering by Mr. Giulini and his men to keep from surprising one another.

Understandably, Mr. Giulini has used his two opportunities here to play works by Italian composers who don't find their way two often into the orchestral repertory in the United States. Last week's man was Pizzetti, and this time he chose the symphonic suite from "La Giara" by Alfredo Casella, who conducted the only previous BSO performances here in 1927. Composed as a ballet, "La Giara" has a built-in story which can be envisioned, if one wishes, while the suite's eight numbers are played.

However, preferably, instead of concentrating on grotesque doings among Italian peasantry, it might be better to pay attention to the rather solidly orchestrated period score (no doubt rather daring in the late 1920's), and appreciate it for its craftsmanship, lyricism, and general fulfillment of purpose as a "typically Italian" balletic comedy.

Incorporated in the Casella suite is a Sicilian folk song, sung offstage by a tenor, which is certainly being about as "typically Italian" as possible. On Friday, the short but melodic "Story of the Girl Kidnapped by Pirates" was performed out of sight by a Chicago singer, Robert Johnson, who had the warm vocal quality, clear diction, and projection for this personally inglorious task.

After intermission, Mr. Giulini conducted Brahms's Fourth Symphony, and did some surprising things with it.

Mr. Giulini's approach was super-romantic, with any sharp edges rounded off as by a sculptor. It had plenty of vigor, but of a more Latin cast. Exercising the conductor's right to say it in his own way, Mr. Giulini made the Fourth sound quite intriguingly different: Tempi in the Andante were much slower then usual, and in the third and fourth movements, new patterns of sound emerged through startling rhythmic and tonal contrasts.

This performance required and received everyone's rapt concentration, onstage and in the audience. At its end, Mr. Giulini received loud approval of his unique interpretation, both from patrons in the hall and from a stageful of applauding colleagues.

Giulini and BSO with Brahms more like Borge

By MICHAEL STEINBERG

If Danny Kaye or Victor Borge were to conduct a performance of the Brahms 4th just like the one Carlo Maria Giulini conducted Friday afternoon in Symphony Hall, one so raging and overwrought, one with its upbeats so stretched, with such crazzed dislocation of tempo and accompanied by a similar visual production with such prodigality in expressions of tragic suffering and deep knee-bends, the audience would have been in stitches.

In the solemn context of a Friday afternoon Boston Syphony concert, the audience instead took it seriously.

Perhaps Giulini's tempest-tossed performance can be read as proceeding from a man of original and humorous spirit, loathing Brahms and the institution of the symphony concert, and inspired to deliver a devastating put-on in the most elegant deadpan style. I fear, though, that what actually happened is less interesting. The performance, instead of being the first ever fully to explore the comic possibilities of the Brahms 4th, proceeded from nothing more uncommon than opportunism and meretricious vulgarity.

To warm up for wringing Brahms's withers, Giulini conducted Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony and a suite from Alfredo Casella's Pirandello ballet, "La Giara." The Haydn performance was rather too harmless, very legato and under-articulated and all but a couple of bars kept between mezzopiano and mezzoforte, if he did not bring the symphony to life as Michael Tilson Thomas did No. 98 weeks ago, he did not suffocate it either (the way William Steinberg suffocated No. 55 in the second week of the season). Still, he reduced it to an amiable, pretty piece of no special character and no genius, and it really seemed rather wasted on him.

Casella, who died in 1947 at 63, was a revered father-figure to many Italian musicians now themselves in their 60's. He was concerned with liberating Italian music from the confines of the opera house, one who spoke for the new in the face of the conservatism of men like Pizzetti (exhumed by Giulini last week) and Respighi (never given decent burial), a conductor whose career included three seasons of running the Boston Pops just before Fiedler, a pianist, a Romantically extravagant and rather irresponsible editor of piano classics like Mozart and Beethoven Sonatas.

He was, of course, a composer as well, one with discipline, craft, and experience, but with little spontaneous gift. His pieces sound still-born and the best to be said about "La Giara," written in 1924, is that it at least offers a gaily and brightly surfaced music synthetic. It goes rather like Tchaikovsky's "Capriccio Italien," but with wrong notes to make it sound modern. Giulini gave it a bouncy, thoroughly effective performance, and an off-stage tenor solo — a good tune with an overdone Firestone Hour sort of accompaniment — was attractively sung by Robert Johnson.

The orchestral playing was pleasantly relaxed and warm in the first two movements of the Haydn, but relaxed to the point of sloppiness in the other two; snappy in the Casella; tending toward the wild in the Brahms and madly out of tune. In the Danse Sacrale of the Brahms, Mrs. Dwyer's flute solo was a welcome oasis of musical sanity and technical competence.

But Lacks Fire

RECORD AMERICAN, BOSTON, SATURDAY, NOV. 8, 1969

Giulini Excellent Listening

By L. DAVID HARRIS
Music Critic

Guest Conductor Carlo Maria Giulini returned to the podium of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday for his second program, which consisted of Haydn, Casella and Brahms. It didn't have the fire of last week's performance, but it was excellent symphonic listing.

Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony (No. 94) was handled competently and with a certain reserve unexpected from Giulini. The "andante" section held its "surprises" (effective contrasts of "forte" and "piano" and major and minor) in such a manner that didn't "make the ladies scream"—a charge once leveled at the composer. There was excellent handling of small figurations and harmonies that enriched the movement's tiny melody.

Casella's "Symphonic Suite from 'La Giara' (The Jar)" was best enjoyed when one followed the program notes which described the folk tale the music portrayed. A superlative "plus" point was the singing of a guest tenor, who took bows and did not have his name announced.

Finally Brahms' Fourth Symphony. There was trouble in the first movement; indeed, throughout the symphony Giulini seemed to get more from the strings than he did from brass and woodwinds. Brass chord work was occasionally excellent, occasionally spotty.

Also, the many moods of the symphony weren't that evident although the great intensity that one expects in a Brahms' symphony finale certainly was present — ever tightening, increasing in drama. Guilini also gave the finale a good rhythmic sense.

Technically, much of the orchestra was superb—triplets were precise, three-against-two sections beautifully integrated. The solo flute and clarinet were enjoyable, the timpanist was excellent.

It was as if much of the symphony found its well-spring within the timpanist's marked, dramatic rhythmic explosions.

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Friday afternoon November 7 1969 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening November 8 1969 at 8.30
Tuesday evening November 11 1969 at 8.30

CARLO MARIA GIULINI conductor

HAYDN — Symphony no. 94 in G 'Surprise'
Adagio cantabile – vivace assai
Andante
Menuetto & trio: allegro molto
Allegro di molto

CASELLA — Symphonic suite from 'La giara' (The jar)
Prelude – Sicilian dance
The story of the girl kidnapped by pirates – Nela's dance – Entrance of the peasants – Brindisi (drinking song of the peasants) – General dance – Finale
ROBERT JOHNSON tenor

Intermission

BRAHMS — Symphony no. 4 in E minor op. 98*
Allegro non troppo
Andante moderato
Allegro giocoso
Allegro energico e passionato

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

NOV 8 1969

BOSTON HERALD TRAVELER, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 8, 1969

Orchestra Applauds Giulini at Symphony

By GEORGE GELLES

Carlo Maria Giulini followed what I found a feeble concert last week with a fine one yesterday afternoon.

It was the last of his two Symphony Hall guest appearances with the Boston Symphony, and at the concert's close the men in the orchestra applauded and stamped their feet with a fervor I'd not previously seen.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

NOV 8 1969

WITH SYMPHONIES of Haydn and Brahms, Giulini's program was musically far more demanding than he played last week, even though between the symphonies he sandwiched Casella's ballet suite "La Giara," which is strictly Pops fare. The reading it got was fittingly flashy, but with only twenty-four weeks of Symphony, it seemed a shame to spend even twenty-four minutes with so trivial a work.

The orchestra obviously liked Giulini, and for him they did fine work. Playing throughout the afternoon was alert and lively and intonation usually good. The string sound Giulini got still seemed thin, a bit lacking in body, and though most often everybody played together, there were still some problems of ensemble, for instance, at the unison start of the slow movement of the Brahms Fourth, where the two horns refused to play as one.

Giulini is exhausting to watch, for his conducting not only tells the players what to do, but shows the audience the desired effect at the same time. It's a style of showmanship that's hyper-active and perhaps unneeded, but it makes one point with utmost clarity—that Giulini understands the orchestra and knows how to play on it most effectively.

THE HAYDN SYMPHONY of the afternoon was the 94th, the 'Surprise.' Aside from the the first movement, which seemd a shade slow, tempi were right. Phrases were clearly shaped, if always in the expected manner, things were rhythmically brisk, and each of the movements had character.

My reservations about the reading come from the feeling I had that we were being carried along from phrase to phrase, that the overall shape of the piece was never as important as the smaller section, that the trees, so to speak, were more important than the forest. And also, as I mentioned, that phrases, though well molded, were never shown in a special light.

Which doesn't mean that the performance was without its pleasures. The minuet, for example, was effective for its rhythmic impetus and for the gutsiness with which Giulini dug into the very fabric of the score, and the start of the slow movement was held back just enough and clearly differentiated dynamically so that the 'surprise,' an old joke by now, made its proper effect.

AND BECAUSE of the curious snobbism that's found in every orchestra — that a Haydn symphony is less worthy of the first chair player's time than a Brahms symphony—we got to hear Messrs. Pappoutsakis and Matheny doing clean and tasteful work in the flute and oboe solos, respectively.

The Brahms Fourth also got a good reading, one that shared the qualities of the Haydn—admirable orchestral work and energetic conducting —but the same faults, as well, most noticeably, a conventionality in matters of phrasing, and textures that could have been considerably cleaner.

The most striking thing about Giulini's concerts here has been the orchestra's enthusiasm. The men were responsive to him and gave of themselves in their playing. This is the same quality that distinguished those concerts last season by Pierre Boulez and this year fy Michael Tilson Thomas.

If Giulini's music-making was less distinguished than that of the other two men, it's because his ideas about music are less compelling. But the performances he led reminded us again of a standard of orchestral execution that is too often unmet.

A Different Opinion Of Symphony Concert

To the Herald Traveler Editor:

As a long time admirer of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, I am writing a few words to present an opinion contrary to that of Mr. Gelles in a recent review.

It seems to me that Mr. Gelles is so overly concerned with the mechanics of the performance that he misses the true beauty, pleasure and joy which this great orchestra and its various conductors (some better than others, especially Michael Thomas, about whom the New Yorker critic, Mr. Sargent, wrote "It could be that another Leonard Bernstein is in the making), bring us every week.

At a concert, Mr. Carlo Giulini conducted Mussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition." At the conclusion of the performance the audience expressed its pleasure and appreciation with spontaneous and prolonged applause—even a standing ovation. In his review the next day, Mr. Gelles acknowledged the audience's pleasure and appreciation but said, in effect, that he could not understand the reason for it.

One can only conclude that the business of being a music critic has deprived Mr. Gelles of the pleasure of being a music lover.

ANNA B. MILLAR

Dedham

HERALD 11/8/69

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR
Monday, November 10, 1969 ▲ 7

Farewell surprises by Giulini

By Louis Snyder

Carlo Maria Giulini presented the second and final program of his present guest conducting stint with the Boston Symphony on Friday afternoon at Symphony Hall.

All of the surprises of the afternoon were not written into the score of Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony (No. 94 in G), which opened the program. The unexpected fortissimo crash in the Andante after a pianissimo lull, (Haydn never admitted it was purposely inserted to arouse nodders), was perhaps less startling than some fuzzy string entrances that preceded and followed it on Friday. Things did right themselves, but for a while, it took some maneuvering by Mr. Giulini and his men to keep from surprising one another.

Understandably, Mr. Giulini has used his two opportunities here to play works by Italian composers who don't find their way two often into the orchestral repertory in the United States. Last week's man was Pizzetti, and this time he chose the symphonic suite from "La Giara" by Alfredo Casella, who conducted the only previous BSO performances here in 1927. Composed as a ballet, "La Giara" has a built-in story which can be envisioned, if one wishes, while the suite's eight numbers are played.

However, preferably, instead of concentrating on grotesque doings among Italian peasantry, it might be better to pay attention to the rather solidly orchestrated period score (no doubt rather daring in the late 1920's), and appreciate it for its craftsmanship, lyricism, and general fulfillment of purpose as a "typically Italian" balletic comedy.

Incorporated in the Casella suite is a Sicilian folk song, sung offstage by a tenor, which is certainly being about as "typically Italian" as possible. On Friday, the short but melodic "Story of the Girl Kidnapped by Pirates" was performed out of sight by a Chicago singer, Robert Johnson, who had the warm vocal quality, clear diction, and projection for this personally inglorious task.

After intermission, Mr. Giulini conducted Brahms's Fourth Symphony, and did some surprising things with it.

Mr. Giulini's approach was super-romantic, with any sharp edges rounded off as by a sculptor. It had plenty of vigor, but of a more Latin cast. Exercising the conductor's right to say it in his own way, Mr. Giulini made the Fourth sound quite intriguingly different: Tempi in the Andante were much slower then usual, and in the third and fourth movements, new patterns of sound emerged through startling rhythmic and tonal contrasts.

This performance required and received everyone's rapt concentration, onstage and in the audience. At its end, Mr. Giulini received loud approval of his unique interpretation, both from patrons in the hall and from a stageful of applauding colleagues.

Giulini and BSO with Brahms more like Borge

By MICHAEL STEINBERG

If Danny Kaye or Victor Borge were to conduct a performance of the Brahms 4th just like the one Carlo Maria Giulini conducted Friday afternoon in Symphony Hall, one so raging and overwrought, one with its upbeats so stretched, with such crazzed dislocation of tempo and accompanied by a similar visual production with such prodigality in expressions of tragic suffering and deep knee-bends, the audience would have been in stitches.

In the solemn context of a Friday afternoon Boston Syphony concert, the audience instead took it seriously.

Perhaps Giulini's tempest-tossed performance can be read as proceeding from a man of original and humorous spirit, loathing Brahms and the institution of the symphony concert, and inspired to deliver a devastating put-on in the most elegant deadpan style. I fear, though, that what actually happened is less interesting. The performance, instead of being the first ever fully to explore the comic possibilities of the Brahms 4th, proceeded from nothing more uncommon than opportunism and meretricious vulgarity.

To warm up for wringing Brahms's withers, Giulini conducted Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony and a suite from Alfredo Casella's Pirandello ballet, "La Giara." The Haydn performance was rather too harmless, very legato and under-articulated and all but a couple of bars kept between mezzopiano and mezzoforte, if he did not bring the symphony to life as Michael Tilson Thomas did No. 98 weeks ago, he did not suffocate it either (the way William Steinberg suffocated No. 55 in the second week of the season). Still, he reduced it to an amiable, pretty piece of no special character and no genius, and it really seemed rather wasted on him.

Casella, who died in 1947 at 63, was a revered father-figure to many Italian musicians now themselves in their 60's. He was concerned with liberating Italian music from the confines of the opera house, one who spoke for the new in the face of the conservatism of men like Pizzetti (exhumed by Giulini last week) and Respighi (never given decent burial), a conductor whose career included three seasons of running the Boston Pops just before Fiedler, a pianist, a Romantically extravagant and rather irresponsible editor of piano classics like Mozart and Beethoven Sonatas.

He was, of course, a composer as well, one with discipline, craft, and experience, but with little spontaneous gift. His pieces sound still-born and the best to be said about "La Giara," written in 1924, is that it at least offers a gaily and brightly surfaced music synthetic. It goes rather like Tchaikovsky's "Capriccio Italien," but with wrong notes to make it sound modern. Giulini gave it a bouncy, thoroughly effective performance, and an off-stage tenor solo — a good tune with an overdone Firestone Hour sort of accompaniment — was attractively sung by Robert Johnson.

The orchestral playing was pleasantly relaxed and warm in the first two movements of the Haydn, but relaxed to the point of sloppiness in the other two; snappy in the Casella; tending toward the wild in the Brahms and madly out of tune. In the Danse Sacrale of the Brahms, Mrs. Dwyer's flute solo was a welcome oasis of musical sanity and technical competence.

But Lacks Fire

RECORD AMERICAN, BOSTON, SATURDAY, NOV. 8, 1969

Giulini Excellent Listening

By L. DAVID HARRIS
Music Critic

Guest Conductor Carlo Maria Giulini returned to the podium of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday for his second program, which consisted of Haydn, Casella and Brahms. It didn't have the fire of last week's performance, but it was excellent symphonic listing.

Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony (No. 94) was handled competently and with a certain reserve unexpected from Giulini. The "andante" section held its "surprises" (effective contrasts of "forte" and "piano" and major and minor) in such a manner that didn't "make the ladies scream"—a charge once leveled at the composer. There was excellent handling of small figurations and harmonies that enriched the movement's tiny melody.

Casella's "Symphonic Suite from 'La Giara' (The Jar)" was best enjoyed when one followed the program notes which described the folk tale the music portrayed. A superlative "plus" point was the singing of a guest tenor, who took bows and did not have his name announced.

Finally Brahms' Fourth Symphony. There was trouble in the first movement; indeed, throughout the symphony Giulini seemed to get more from the strings than he did from brass and woodwinds. Brass chord work was occasionally excellent, occasionally spotty.

Also, the many moods of the symphony weren't that evident although the great intensity that one expects in a Brahms' symphony finale certainly was present — ever tightening, increasing in drama. Guilini also gave the finale a good rhythmic sense.

Technically, much of the orchestra was superb—triplets were precise, three-against-two sections beautifully integrated. The solo flute and clarinet were enjoyable, the timpanist was excellent.

It was as if much of the symphony found its well-spring within the timpanist's marked, dramatic rhythmic explosions.

18.

MUSIC IN REVIEW

Oct 31 & By GERALD A. BERLIN
Nov 7 revised: GIULINI BSO GUEST

Editor's Note: Due to technical difficulties, this column was left out of last week's issue. The Advocate regrets this occurrence.

Just what is that elusive quality in a visiting conductor that separates the real article from passing space fillers? This marks my twentieth year in this space and during that time I must have pondered the question in print on at least a dozen or more occasions.

One ticks off the requisite high tsandards of achievement in clarity, precision of attack, balance of tone, demonstrated knowledge of the score, a sense of style and proportion, but these do not provide the answer. The truly distinguished men with the stick add to these mandatory categories an elan that sets up a visible tension in the players and expectancy in the audience. Even as the prose of a really good writer jumps out from the pages to the reader, so the music under a really good conductor jumps out at the listener.

All of which is by the way of saying that Carlo Maria Giulini, who was the guest of the orchestra last week, confirmed in strongest terms the impression that he left in 1962 that he stands among the best of them. And he did it more or less in spite of rather than on account of the program he chose. As is so often the case with a foreign visitor, Mr. Giulini felt constrained to give a sampling of his national product. As is also often the case, the sampling in question shed no particular lustre on the national emblem. The pieces in point here were Bonporti's Concerto a quattro in D op. 11 No. 8 and Pizzetti's Prelude to "Fedra," both first performances in Boston.

Bonporti is an 18th century Baroque eclectic, a rather lesser Vivaldi, which is not saying very much. This three-movement work is one among ten concerti grossi bearing this opus number. First and last movements are virtually solos for the violin and Joseph Silverstein performed in a fittingly silken way. A null set here, as the mathematicians say. The Pizzetti work was post-romantic eclectic admixed with a huge helping of the ilk of Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite, which is also not saying very much. The average cinema sound track background drivel of the thirties gives you the idea. Pizzetti has composed some rewarding scores in the smaller forms and the wonder is that Mr. Giulini picked upon this 'Fedra' excerpt to discharge the requirements of his obeisance.

The concert did turn out to be an occasion of some satisfaction, and what made it so was the remaining two works on the program, namely Schubert's Symphony No. 4 in C minor, the "Tragic" and the Ravel transcription of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition." The "Tragic Symphony" and the "Pictures" are not the stuff of which programs are ordinarily "made." True, the introduction of the first movement of the Schubert is marvelously premonitory of the ineffable melancholy of the mature Schubert. The rest of this work, though, for all of its mellifluousness and grace can very quickly sound thin and repetitious—the efforts, after all, of a 19-year-old boy putting something together for his father's Friday evening chamber group to spiel.

In this reading, which was very deliberate and where the details were meticulously defined but the line kept strong and supple, the innocent little work glowed as a minor masterpiece.

As for the "Pictures" there can be no doubt about its claim as a masterpiece, and no minor one at that. It is a unique and splendid and immensely popular creation, indeed, so popular that someone takes a whack at it just about every other year. Whereat one man's splendor becomes another man's chestnut, and in this stage of my life it requires virtually an incandescent performance of the piece to send me. Had the brasses been wholly equal to it incandescent would have been the word. The brasses weren't however, and even the magnificent tuba playing of Chester Schmitz was insufficient to make them otherwise Still, the great score really communicated, and the prolonged stomping and applause that rang out as the last chords from the Great Gates of Kiev died away was evident tribute to the genius of the original composer and of the transcriber and to a conductor with control, ears and imagination.

GIULINI: THE SECOND ROUND

Suffice it that the second week's program continued to show the hand of a sensitive, responsive musician in more than ordinary rapport with the orchestra.

Others among the critics here have evaluated his credentials otherwise. Indeed, on successive weeks the man has been subjected to two quite uncommonly savage reviews from major sources. This, in turn, seems to have provoked an unusual response from players and audience. At the second concert Mr. Giulini received a standing, stomping ovation when he first stepped out to conduct the Haydn—something that ordinarily occurs only at the final concert of a resident conductor's retirement, if then. At the conclusion of the performance he was additionally applauded rhythmically, in the Russian manner, and recalled four times. The demonstration was as incisive a putdown as you are apt to encounter.

The response of the orchestra is particularly significant. Individually, to be sure, the members are not Hanslicks or Ernest Newmans to the last man. Collectively, they've heard everything and seen everybody and know the score. In my book a veteran orchestra is no mean measuring stick of the man standing before it.

The issues raised by all of this call for the most sober sort of consideration. The BSO is patently in search of a permanent conductor. By definition, a musician with Mr. Giulini's talents is in the running. But what conductor in full command of his wits would want to put up with a situation such as this? One gathers that this is more than a rhetorical question.

The freedom of a critic is almost unlimited and his power can be awesome. But with freedom and power go responsibility, and that is a term which, among other qualities, imparts compassion, humility and Socratic ignorance.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000
NOV 13 1969

The Patriot Ledger Wed., Nov. 12, 1969 Page 64

The Sound of Music

Brahms A La Giulini

By Peter M. Knapp

Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony began last night's Boston Symphony concert directed by Carlo Maria Giulini, the slim, elegant-looking Italian conductor with the musical name. But the real surprises came at the end in Brahms' Symphony No. 4.

Or was it Brahmsini? It was an astonishing performance, once of histrionic ardor on the podium, near-desperation among the musicians. It was wild, woolly and wrong.

Extremes

While Giulini emoted, clutched and swayed, almost caricaturing the super-charged maestro lost in his sound-world, the music was dragged into eccentric fits and starts, attacks were ragged, and intonation at times hair-raising. With little coherency, the symphony was conducted in epigrams; lyrical passages doused with dolce, allegros feverishly driven.

The audience loved it. It was good theater, but dismal Brahms — a performance so curiously overwrought as to be memorable for its extremes.

Fortunately, Giulini also brought along some Italian music, and here it was another story. Alfredo Casella (1883-1947) was hardly a Monteverdi, a Verdi or even a Respighi. He was one of Giulini's teachers, a composer and conductor, and director of the Boston Pops, pre-Fiedler 1926-1929.

Energetic Direction

Casella's ballet, "La Giara" (The Jar), is a light-hearted, light-weight pictorial score of a certain charm and accessibility. It is neither a masterpiece nor potboiler, colorful in its orchestration, rather pretty in its opening pastoral mood and Sicilian folk song, sung by tenor Robert Johnson with a rather tremulous vibrato.

Casella himself directed the BSO in the first performance in Boston of the symphonic suite from the ballet, and Giulini's presentation of it last night was stylish, orderly and energetic.

The Haydn held few surprises, Giulini conducting in a restrained manner, tucking himself into his characteristic "S" podium position and using few gestures to get well-proportioned sound (though not always in balance, favoring strings over winds). The accents were neat and crisp and the playing tidy in this reasonable Haydn reading which had the right scale if not particularly illuminating subtleties.

Symphony Programs

Seiji Ozawa conducts the second of his programs with the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season on Friday, Nov. 21, at 2 p.m. and Saturday, Nov. 22, at 8:30 p.m. He has chosen an all-Stravinsky program including two of Stravinsky's most famous ballet suites and the violin concerto. The Boston Symphony's concertmaster, Joseph Silverstein, is soloist in the violin concerto.

On Tuesday evening, Nov. 18, at 8:30, Ozawa will conduct the orchestra in the second of this season's 'Cambridge' series concerts.

On Thursday evening, Nov. 20, he will lead the second of the Thursday A series.

Both programs will consist of Takemitsu's November Steps no. 1 and Orff's Carmina Burana, with soloists Evelyn Mandac, Stanley Kolk, and Sherrill Milnes. The New England Conservatory Chorus, under the direction of Miss Lorna Cooke DeVaon, will also be heard in this selection.

MINUTEMAN
BEDFORD, MASS.
WEEKLY 3,100
NOV 13 1969

BURLINGTON TIMES UNION
BURLINGTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 6,200
NOV 13 1969

CITIZEN
BELMONT, MASS.
WEEKLY 4,200
NOV 13 1969

JOURNAL
CONCORD, MASS.
WEEKLY 5,000
NOV 13 1969

FENCE VIEWER
SUDBURY, MASS.
WEEKLY 3,516
NOV 13 1969

Ozawa Leads BSO In TV Concert

Seiji Ozawa will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carl Orffff's "Carmina Burana" in a live color telecast Tuesday, Nov. 18 at 8:30 p.m. on Channel 2. Also participating will be soprano Evelyn Mandac, tenor Stanley Kolk, baritone Sherrill Milnes and the New England Conservatory Chorus.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000
NOV 6 1969

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Friday afternoon November 14 1969 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening November 15 1969 at 8.30

SEIJI OZAWA conductor

ELGAR	'Nimrod' from Variations on an original theme op. 36 'Enigma'
TAKEMITSU	November steps no. 1 KINSHI TSURUTA biwa KATSUYA YOKOYAMA shakuhachi

first performance in Boston

intermission

ORFF	Carmina Burana Fortuna imperatrix mundi (Luck, empress of the world) Primo vere (In springtime) Uf dem Anger (On the green) In taberna (In the tavern) Cour d'amours (Court of love) Blanziflor et Helena (Blanchefleur and Helen) Fortuna imperatrix mundi (Luck, empress of the world)

EVELYN MANDAC soprano
STANLEY KOLK tenor
SHERRILL MILNES baritone

ERVATORY CHORUS
n conductor
OF THE NEW ENGLAND

usztai conductor
rchestra

USTEES OF

force in all our lives. The hony Orchestra is to offer and widely as lies within mpathetic with the cause

t the Orchestra will make y giving its concerts on uty of music rather than lives to a peaceful profes-eelings of sadness for the r lives in this struggle and families. We dedicate the ful solution to this tragic the bloodshed, bring unity

r world.'

THE SOLOISTS

photo by Dick Loek

KINSHI TSURUTA, born in Ebeotsu Asahikawa in the Hokkaido Prefecture, is a player of the traditional Japanese instrument, the biwa. In November 1961 she appeared on stage for the first time since World War II in a joint recital. On film she has been heard in the music of Takemitsu for Kwaidan. She and Katsuya Yokoyama created the music for a series of television dramas, Yoshitsune, broadcast by NHK. Takemitsu wrote a new work for Kinshi Tsuruta and Mr Yokoyama called Eclipse, played at the Nissei Theater in May 1966.

photo by Dick Loek

KATSUYA YOKOYAMA, a leading player of the shakuhachi, was born in Kohnuki Numazu, Shizuoka Prefecture. He is known for his interpretation of almost all the new music written for his instrument in Japan. He is also a member of 'Sanbonkai', a trio of Japanese instrumentalists. His playing has been heard in the film scores by Takemitsu for Seppuku and Kwaidan as well as in the television series Yoshitsune. His traditional instrument is a bamboo flute, and his technique has been inherited from his teacher, Watazumi. Both Kinshi Tsuruta and Katsuya Yokoyama have taken part in the recording of November steps no. 1 with the Toronto Symphony, conducted by Seiji Ozawa, for RCA.

EVELYN MANDAC, born in the Philippines, took her degree in music at the University of the Philippines. She then studied for several years at Oberlin College and the Juilliard School of Music. Last season she appeared with the Orchestras of Honolulu and Phoenix, with the Oratorio Society of New York and the Dallas and San Antonio Symphonies. In opera she sang leading roles with the San Antonio and Santa Fe Opera Companies.

During the 1969-1970 season Evelyn Mandac, who makes her first appearances with the Boston Symphony at these concerts, will sing with the San Francisco Opera, the Minnesota Orchestra and the Philadelphia Orchestra. She will also join the Juilliard Quartet on a coast to coast tour. Her repertoire includes Liù in Turandot, Pamina in Die Zauberflöte, Susanna in Le nozze di Figaro, Salud in La vida breve and Mimi in La Bohème. Equally at home with contemporary music, she appeared in the American première of Berio's Passaggio and, more recently, in Henze's The Bassarids.

Cont'd. on next page →

'The New England Conservatory chorus wishes to dedicate its part of this performance to the cause of PEACE in the world.'

INFORMATION OBSCURED

18.

MUSIC IN REVIEW

Oct 31 & Nov 7 concerts

By GERALD A. BERLIN

GIULINI BSO GUEST

Editor's Note: Due to technical difficulties, this column was left out of last week's issue. The Advocate regrets this occurrence.

Just what is that elusive quality in a visiting conductor that separates the real article from passing space fillers? This marks my twentieth year in this space and during that time I must have pondered the question in print on at least a dozen or more occasions.

One ticks off the requisite high tsandards of achievement in clarity, precision of attack, balance of tone, demonstrated knowledge of the score, a sense of style and proportion, but these do not provide the answer. The truly distinguished men with the stick add to these mandatory categories an elan that sets up a visible tension in the players and expectancy in the audience. Even as the prose of a really good writer jumps out from the pages to the reader, so the music under a really good conductor jumps out at the listener.

All of which is by the way of saying that Carlo Maria Giulini, who was the guest of the orchestra last week, confirmed in strongest terms the impression that he left in 1962 that he stands among the best of them. And he did it more or less in spite of rather than on account of the program he chose. As is so often the case with a foreign visitor, Mr. Giulini felt constrained to give a sampling of his national product. As is also often the case, the sampling in question shed no particular lustre on the national emblem. The pieces in point here were Bonporti's Concerto a quattro in D op. 11 No. 8 and Pizzetti's Prelude to "Fedra," both first performances in Boston.

Bonporti is an 18th century Baroque eclectic, a rather lesser Vivaldi, which is not saying very much. This three-movement work is one among ten concerti grossi bearing this opus number. First and last movements are virtually solos for the violin and Joseph Silverstein performed in a fittingly silken way. A null set here, as the mathematicians say. The Pizzetti work was post-romantic eclectic admixed with a huge helping of the ilk of Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite, which is also not saying very much. The average cinema sound track background drivel of the thirties gives you the idea. Pizzetti has composed some rewarding scores in the smaller forms and the wonder is that Mr. Giulini picked upon this 'Fedra' excerpt to discharge the requirements of his obeisance.

The concert did turn out to be an occasion of some satisfaction, and what made it so was the remaining two works on the program, namely Schubert's Symphony No. 4 in C minor, the "Tragic" and the Ravel transcription of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition." The "Tragic Symphony" and the "Pictures" are not the stuff of which programs are ordinarily "made." True, the introduction of the first movement of the Schubert is marvelously premonitory of the ineffable melancholy of the mature Schubert. The rest of this work, though, for all of its mellifluousness and grace can very quickly sound thin and repetitious—the efforts, after all, of a 19-year-old boy putting something together for his father's Friday evening chamber group to spiel.

In this reading, which was very deliberate and where the details were meticulously defined but the line kept strong and supple, the innocent little work glowed as a minor masterpiece.

As for the "Pictures" there can be no doubt about its claim as a masterpiece, and no minor one at that. It is a unique and splendid and immensely popular creation, indeed, so popular that someone takes a whack at it just about every other year. Whereat one man's splendor becomes another man's chestnut, and in this stage of my life it requires virtually an incandescent performance of the piece to send me. Had the brasses been wholly equal to it incandescent would have been the word. The brasses weren't however, and even the magnificent tuba playing of Chester Schmitz was insufficient to make them otherwise Still, the great score really communicated, and the prolonged stomping and applause that rang out as the last chords from the Great Gates of Kiev died away was evident tribute to the genius of the original composer and of the transcriber and to a conductor with control, ears and imagination.

GIULINI: THE SECOND ROUND

Suffice it that the second week's program continued to show the hand of a sensitive, responsive musician in more than ordinary rapport with the orchestra.

Others among the critics here have evaluated his credentials otherwise. Indeed, on successive weeks the man has been subjected to two quite uncommonly savage reviews from major sources. This, in turn, seems to have provoked an unusual response from players and audience. At the second concert Mr. Giulini received a standing, stomping ovation when he first stepped out to conduct the Haydn—something that ordinarily occurs only at the final concert of a resident conductor's retirement, if then. At the conclusion of the performance he was additionally applauded rhythmically, in the Russian manner, and recalled four times. The demonstration was as incisive a putdown as you are apt to encounter.

The response of the orchestra is particularly significant. Individually, to be sure, the members are not Hanslicks or Ernest Newmans to the last man. Collectively, they've heard everything and seen everybody and know the score. In my book, a veteran orchestra is no mean measuring stick of the man standing before it.

The issues raised by all of this call for the most sober sort of consideration. The BSO is patently in search of a permanent conductor. By definition, a musician with Mr. Giulini's talents is in the running. But what conductor in full command of his wits would want to put up with a situation such as this? One gathers that this is more than a rhetorical question.

The freedom of a critic is almost unlimited and his power can be awesome. But with freedom and power go responsibility, and that is a term which, among other qualities, imparts compassion, humility and Socratic ignorance.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000
NOV 13 1969

The Patriot Ledger Wed., Nov. 12, 1969 Page 64

The Sound of Music

Brahms A La Giulini

By Peter M. Knapp

Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony began last night's Boston Symphony concert directed by Carlo Maria Giulini, the slim, elegant-looking Italian conductor with the musical name. But the real surprises came at the end in Brahms' Symphony No. 4.

Or was it Brahmsini? It was an astonishing performance, once of histrionic ardor on the podium, near-desperation among the musicians. It was wild, woolly and wrong.

Extremes

While Giulini emoted, clutched and swayed, almost caricaturing the super-charged maestro lost in his sound-world, the music was dragged into eccentric fits and starts, attacks were ragged, and intonation at times hair-raising. With littl coherency, the symphony was conducted in epigrams; lyrical passages doused wit dolce, allegros feverishly driven.

The audience loved it. It was goo theater, but dismal Brahms — a per formance so curiously overwrought as t be memorable for its extremes.

Fortunately, Giulini also brought alon some Italian music, and here it wa another story. Alfredo Casella (1883-1947 was hardly a Monteverdi, a Verdi or eve a Respighi. He was one of Giulini' teachers, a composer and conductor, an director of the Boston Pops, pre-Fiedle 1926-1929.

Energetic Direction

Casella's ballet, "La Giara" (The Jar is a light-hearted, light-weight pictori score of a certain charm and accessibility It is neither a masterpiece nor potboile colorful in its orchestration, rather pret in its opening pastoral mood and Sicilia folk song, sung by tenor Robert Johnso with a rather tremulous vibrato.

Casella himself directed the BSO in t first performance in Boston of the sym phonic suite from the ballet, and Giulini presentation of it last night was stylis orderly and energetic.

The Haydn held few surprises, Giuli conducting in a restrained manner, tuckin himself into his characteristic "S" podium position and using few gestures to get well-proportioned sound (though not always in balance, favoring strings over winds). The accents were neat and crisp and the playing tidy in this reasonable Haydn reading which had the right scale if not particularly illuminating subtleties.

Symphony Programs

Seiji Ozawa conducts the second of his programs with the Boston

Ozawa Le In TV C

Seiji Ozawa Boston Symph in Carl Orff Burana" in telecast Tuesda 8:30 p.m. on C participating prano Evelyn Stanley K Sherrill Milne England Cons rus.

JEWISH BOSTO
WEEKL
NOV 6 1969

THE GUEST CONDUCTOR

SEIJI OZAWA, who becomes, with Gu Schuller, Artistic Director of Tangle in 1970, made his first appearance wit Boston Symphony Orchestra during 1964 Berkshire Festival. He has app with the Orchestra at Tanglewood, B and New York on several occasions Born in Hoten, Manchuria, in 193 graduated from the Toho School of in Tokyo, where he won first priz composition and conducting. He we Europe in 1959 and won the first prize at the International Compe of conductors at Besançon; one of the judges was Charles Munch, invited him to Tanglewood to be a conducting student. The follo year Seiji Ozawa received the Koussevitzky Memorial Scholarsh the outstanding young conductor at the Berkshire Music Center pointed one of the New York Philharmonic's assistant conducto 1961, he directed the orchestra in several concerts. The same sur he conducted twenty-five concerts in Japan with the NHK and Jap Philharmonic Orchestras.

Since that time he has appeared extensively in Europe and Am with many of the greatest orchestras, among them the London phony, the Concertgebouw, the Vienna Symphony, the Philadel Chicago Symphony, San Francisco Symphony and Pittsburgh Symp Orchestras.

At the end of the 1968-1969 season Seiji Ozawa resigned his po Music Director of the Toronto Symphony, and is devoting the pr season to guest conducting. During the summer he conducted for the first time, Così fan tutte at Salzburg, and was principal conductor of the Ravinia Festival. He has opened the 1969-1970 se of the New York Philharmonic, and later this season will be conductor with L'Orchestre de Paris, the Philadelphia and Cleve Orchestras, and the Berlin Philharmonic. He becomes Music Dir of the San Francisco Symphony next fall. Seiji Ozawa has made recordings for RCA.

FROM THE PROGRAM BOOKS OF THE ROYAL FESTIVAL HALL, LONDON

During a recent test in the Hall, a note played mezzoforte on th horn measured approximately 65 decibels (dB(A)) of sound. single 'uncovered' cough gave the same reading. A handkerchie placed over the mouth when coughing assists in obtaining pianissimo.

NOV 13 1969

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Friday afternoon November 14 1969 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening November 15 1969 at 8.30

SEIJI OZAWA conductor

ELGAR — 'Nimrod' from Variations on an original theme op. 36 'Enigma'

TAKEMITSU — November steps no. 1
KINSHI TSURUTA biwa
KATSUYA YOKOYAMA shakuhachi

first performance in Boston

intermission

ORFF — Carmina Burana
Fortuna imperatrix mundi (Luck, empress of the world)
Primo vere (In springtime)
Uf dem Anger (On the green)
In taberna (In the tavern)
Cour d'amours (Court of love)
Blanziflor et Helena (Blanchefleur and Helen)
Fortuna imperatrix mundi (Luck, empress of the world)

EVELYN MANDAC soprano
STANLEY KOLK tenor
SHERRILL MILNES baritone
NEW ENGLAND CONSERVATORY CHORUS
Lorna Cooke de Varon conductor
CHILDREN S CHORUS OF THE NEW ENGLAND CONSERVATORY
Katherine Edmonds Pusztai conductor

first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

NOVEMBER 14 & 15 1969

A STATEMENT BY THE BOARD OF TRUSTEES OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

'Great music is an inspiration and a healing force in all our lives. The high and single purpose of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to offer the finest in music to the world as often and widely as lies within its power.

'For these reasons the Trustees, all deeply sympathetic with the cause of peace, are unanimous in the conviction that the Orchestra will make its best contribution to the community by giving its concerts on November 14 and 15, by giving us the beauty of music rather than by withholding it.'

A STATEMENT BY MUSICIANS OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

'We, as musicians, have always devoted our lives to a peaceful profession. On this day we wish to express our feelings of sadness for the thousands of young Americans who gave their lives in this struggle and our heartfelt sympathies to their bereaved families. We dedicate the piece by Elgar in their memory.

'We all have the fervent hope that a peaceful solution to this tragic problem will soon be achieved that will stop the bloodshed, bring unity to our nation and peace to all the nations of our world.'

A STATEMENT BY THE NEW ENGLAND CONSERVATORY CHORUS

'The New England Conservatory chorus wishes to dedicate its part of this performance to the cause of PEACE in the world.'

INFORMATION OBSCURED

18.

MUSIC IN REVIEW

Oct 31 & Nov 7 concerts

By GERALD A. BERLIN

GIULINI BSO GUEST

Editor's Note: Due to technical difficulties, this column was left out of last week's issue. The Advocate regrets this occurrence.

Just what is that elusive quality in a visiting conductor that separates the real article from passing space fillers? This marks my twentieth year in this space and during that time I must have pondered the question in print on at least a dozen or more occasions.

One ticks off the requisite high tsandards of achievement in clarity, precision of attack, balance of tone, demonstrated knowledge of the score, a sense of style and proportion, but these do not provide the answer. The truly distinguished men with the stick add to these mandatory categories an elan that sets up a visible tension in the players and expectancy in the audience. Even as the prose of a really good writer jumps out from the pages to the reader, so the music under a really good conductor jumps out at the listener.

All of which is by the way of saying that Carlo Maria Giulini, who was the guest of the orchestra last week, confirmed in strongest terms the impression that he left in 1962 that he stands among the best of them. And he did it more or less in spite of rather than on account of the program he chose. As is so often the case with a foreign visitor, Mr. Giulini felt constrained to give a sampling of his national product. As is also often the case, the sampling in question shed no particular lustre on the national emblem. The pieces in point here were Bonporti's Concerto a quattro in D op. 11 No. 8 and Pizzetti's Prelude to "Fedra," both first performances in Boston.

Bonporti is an 18th century Baroque eclectic, a rather lesser Vivaldi, which is not saying very much. This three-movement work is one among ten concerti grossi bearing this opus number. First and last movements are virtually solos for the violin and Joseph Silverstein performed in a fittingly silken way. A null set here, as the mathematicians say. The Pizzetti work was post-romantic eclectic admixed with a huge helping of the ilk of Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite, which is also not saying very much. The average cinema sound track background drivel of the thirties gives you the idea. Pizzetti has composed some rewarding scores in the smaller forms and the wonder is that Mr. Giulini picked upon this 'Fedra' excerpt to discharge the requirements of his obeisance.

Yet the concert did turn out to be an occasion of some satisfaction, and what made it so was the remaining two works on the program, namely Schubert's Symphony No. 4 in C minor, the "Tragic" and the Ravel transcription of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition." The "Tragic Symphony" and the "Pictures" are not the stuff of which programs are ordinarily "made." True, the introduction of the first movement of the Schubert is marvelously premonitory of the ineffable melancholy of the mature Schubert. The rest of this work, though, for all of its mellifluousness and grace can very quickly sound thin and repetitious—the efforts, after all, of a 19-year-old boy putting something together for his father's Friday evening chamber group to spiel.

In this reading, which was very deliberate and where the details were meticulously defined but the line kept strong and supple, the innocent little work glowed as a minor masterpiece.

As for the "Pictures" there can be no doubt about its claim as a masterpiece, and no minor one at that. It is a unique and splendid and immensely popular creation, indeed, so popular that someone takes a whack at it just about every other year. Whereat one man's splendor becomes another man's chestnut, and in this stage of my life it requires virtually an incandescent performance of the piece to send me. Had the brasses been wholly equal to it incandescent would have been the word. The brasses weren't however, and even the magnificent tuba playing of Chester Schmitz was insufficient to make them otherwise Still, the great score really communicated, and the prolonged stomping and applause that rang out as the last chords from the Great Gates of Kiev died away was evident tribute to the genius of the original composer and of the transcriber and to a conductor with control, ears and imagination.

GIULINI: THE SECOND ROUND

Suffice it that the second week's program continued to show the hand of a sensitive, responsive musician in more than ordinary rapport with the orchestra.

Others among the critics here have evaluated his credentials otherwise. Indeed, on successive weeks the man has been subjected to two quite uncommonly savage reviews from major sources. This, in turn, seems to have provoked an unusual response from players and audience. At the second concert Mr. Giulini received a standing, stomping ovation when he first stepped out to conduct the Haydn—something that ordinarily occurs only at the final concert of a resident conductor's retirement, if then. At the conclusion of the performance he was additionally applauded rhythmically, in the Russian manner, and recalled four times. The demonstration was as incisive a putdown as you are apt to encounter.

The response of the orchestra is particularly significant. Individually, to be sure, the members are not Hanslicks or Ernest Newmans to the last man. Collectively, they've heard everything and seen everybody and know the score. In my book a veteran orchestra is no mean measuring stick of the man standing before it.

The issues raised by all of this call for the most sober sort of consideration. The BSO is patently in search of a permanent conductor. By definition, a musician with Mr. Giulini's talents is in the running. But what conductor in full command of his wits would want to put up with a situation such as this? One gathers that this is more than a rhetorical question.

The freedom of a critic is almost unlimited and his power can be awesome. But with freedom and power go responsibility, and that is a term which, among other qualities, imparts compassion, humility and Socratic ignorance.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

NOV 13 1969

The Patriot Ledger Wed., Nov. 12, 1969 Page 64

The Sound of Music

Brahms A La Giulini

By Peter M. Knapp

Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony began last night's Boston Symphony concert directed by Carlo Maria Giulini, the slim, elegant-looking Italian conductor with the musical name. But the real surprises came at the end in Brahms' Symphony No. 4.

Or was it Brahmsini? It was an astonishing performance, once of histrionic ardor on the podium, near-desperation among the musicians. It was wild, woolly and wrong.

Extremes

While Giulini emoted, clutched and swayed, almost caricaturing the supercharged maestro lost in his sound-world, the music was dragged into eccentric fits and starts, attacks were ragged, and intonation at times hair-raising. With little coherency, the symphony was conducted in epigrams; lyrical passages doused with dolce, allegros feverishly driven.

The audience loved it. It was good theater, but dismal Brahms — a performance so curiously overwrought as to be memorable for its extremes.

Fortunately, Giulini also brought along some Italian music, and here it was another story. Alfredo Casella (1883-1947) was hardly a Monteverdi, a Verdi or even a Respighi. He was one of Giulini's teachers, a composer and conductor, and director of the Boston Pops, pre-Fiedler 1926-1929.

Energetic Direction

Casella's ballet, "La Giara" (The Jar) is a light-hearted, light-weight pictorial score of a certain charm and accessibility. It is neither a masterpiece nor potboiler, colorful in its orchestration, rather pretty in its opening pastoral mood and Sicilian folk song, sung by tenor Robert Johnson with a rather tremulous vibrato.

Casella himself directed the BSO in the first performance in Boston of the symphonic suite from the ballet, and Giulini's presentation of it last night was stylish, orderly and energetic.

The Haydn held few surprises, Giulini conducting in a restrained manner, tucking himself into his characteristic "S" podium position and using few gestures to get well-proportioned sound (though not always in balance, favoring strings over winds). The accents were neat and crisp and the playing tidy in this reasonable Haydn reading which [illegible] scale if not particularly [illegible] subtleties.

Ozawa Le
In TV C

Seiji Ozawa
Boston Symphc
in Carl Orff Burana" in a telecast Tuesda
8:30 p.m. on Cl participating prano Evelyn
Stanley Ko
Sherrill Milnes England Cons
rus.

Symphony Programs

Seiji Ozawa conducts the second of his programs with the Boston [illegible]

THE GUEST CONDUCTOR

SEIJI OZAWA, who becomes, with [illegible] Schuller, Artistic Director of Tan[illegible] in 1970, made his first appearance w[illegible] Boston Symphony Orchestra dur[illegible] 1964 Berkshire Festival. He has ap[illegible] with the Orchestra at Tanglewood [illegible] and New York on several occasion[illegible] Born in Hoten, Manchuria, in 1[illegible] graduated from the Toho School of [illegible] in Tokyo, where he won first pr[illegible] composition and conducting. He w[illegible] Europe in 1959 and won the first prize at the International Comp[illegible] of conductors at Besancon; one of the judges was Charles Munch [illegible] invited him to Tanglewood to be a conducting student. The follo[illegible] year Seiji Ozawa received the Koussevitzky Memorial Scholars[illegible] the outstanding young conductor at the Berkshire Music Center [illegible] pointed one of the New York Philharmonic's assistant conduct[illegible] 1961, he directed the orchestra in several concerts. The same su[illegible] he conducted twenty-five concerts in Japan with the NHK and Jap[illegible] Philharmonic Orchestras.

Since that time he has appeared extensively in Europe and As[illegible] with many of the greatest orchestras, among them the London [illegible] phony, the Concertgebouw, the Vienna Symphony, the Philad[illegible] Chicago Symphony, San Francisco Symphony and Pittsburgh Sym[illegible] Orchestras.

At the end of the 1968-1969 season Seiji Ozawa resigned his p[illegible] Music Director of the Toronto Symphony, and is devoting the pr[illegible] season to guest conducting. During the summer he conducted [illegible] for the first time, Cosi fan tutte at Salzburg, and was principal [illegible] conductor of the Ravinia Festival. He has opened the 1969-1970 s[illegible] of the New York Philharmonic, and later this season will be [illegible] conductor with L'Orchestre de Paris, the Philadelphia and Cle[illegible] Orchestras, and the Berlin Philharmonic. He becomes Music Di[illegible] of the San Francisco Symphony next fall. Seiji Ozawa has made [illegible] recordings for RCA.

FROM THE PROGRAM BOOKS OF THE ROYAL FESTIVAL HALL, LONDON

During a recent test in the Hall, a note played mezzoforte on th[illegible] horn measured approximately 65 decibels (dB(A)) of sound. [illegible] single 'uncovered' cough gave the same reading. A handkerchi[illegible] placed over the mouth when coughing assists in obtaining [illegible] pianissimo.

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Friday afternoon November 14 1969 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening November 15 1969 at 8.30

SEIJI OZAWA conductor

ELGAR — 'Nimrod' from Variations on an original theme op. 36 'Enigma'

TAKEMITSU — November steps no. 1
KINSHI TSURUTA biwa
KATSUYA YOKOYAMA shakuhachi
first performance in Boston

intermission

ORFF — Carmina Burana
Fortuna imperatrix mundi (Luck, empress of the world)
Primo vere (In springtime)
Uf dem Anger (On the green)
In taberna (In the tavern)
Cour d'amours (Court of love)
Blanziflor et Helena (Blanchefleur and Helen)
Fortuna imperatrix mundi (Luck, empress of the world)
EVELYN MANDAC soprano
STANLEY KOLK tenor
SHERRILL MILNES baritone
NEW ENGLAND CONSERVATORY CHORUS
Lorna Cooke de Varon conductor
CHILDREN'S CHORUS OF THE NEW ENGLAND CONSERVATORY
Katherine Edmonds Pusztai conductor
first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

NOVEMBER 14 & 15 1969

A STATEMENT BY THE BOARD OF TRUSTEES OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

'Great music is an inspiration and a healing force in all our lives. The high and single purpose of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to offer the finest in music to the world as often and widely as lies within its power.

'For these reasons the Trustees, all deeply sympathetic with the cause of peace, are unanimous in the conviction that the Orchestra will make its best contribution to the community by giving its concerts on November 14 and 15, by giving us the beauty of music rather than by withholding it.'

A STATEMENT BY MUSICIANS OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

'We, as musicians, have always devoted our lives to a peaceful profession. On this day we wish to express our feelings of sadness for the thousands of young Americans who gave their lives in this struggle and our heartfelt sympathies to their bereaved families. We dedicate the piece by Elgar in their memory.

'We all have the fervent hope that a peaceful solution to this tragic problem will soon be achieved that will stop the bloodshed, bring unity to our nation and peace to all the nations of our world.'

A STATEMENT BY THE NEW ENGLAND CONSERVATORY CHORUS

'The New England Conservatory chorus wishes to dedicate its part of this performance to the cause of PEACE in the world.'

18.

MUSIC IN REVIEW

Oct 31 & Nov 7 concerts

By GERALD A. BERLIN

GIULINI BSO GUEST

Editor's Note: Due to technical difficulties, this column was left out of last week's issue. The Advocate regrets this occurrence.

Just what is that elusive quality in a visiting conductor that separates the real article from passing space fillers? This marks my twentieth year in this space and during that time I must have pondered the question in print on at least a dozen or more occasions.

One ticks off the requisite high tsandards of achievement in clarity, precision of attack, balance of tone, demonstrated knowledge of the score, a sense of style and proportion, but these do not provide the answer. The truly distinguished men with the stick add to these mandatory categories an elan that sets up a visible tension in the players and expectancy in the audience. Even as the prose of a really good writer jumps out from the pages to the reader, so the music under a really good conductor jumps out at the listener.

All of which is by the way of saying that Carlo Maria Giulini, who was the guest of the orchestra last week, confirmed in strongest terms the impression that he left in 1962 that he stands among the best of them. And he did it more or less in spite of rather than on account of the program he chose. As is so often the case with a foreign visitor, Mr. Giulini felt constrained to give a sampling of his national product. As is also often the case, the sampling in question shed no particular lustre on the national emblem. The pieces in point here were Bonporti's Concerto a quattro in D op. 11 No. 8 and Pizzetti's Prelude to "Fedra," both first performances in Boston.

Bonporti is an 18th century Baroque eclectic, a rather lesser Vivaldi, which is not saying very much. This three-movement work is one among ten concerti grossi bearing this opus number. First and last movements are virtually solos for the violin and Joseph Silverstein performed in a fittingly silken way. A null set here, as the mathematicians say. The Pizzetti work was post-romantic eclectic admixed with a huge helping of the ilk of Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite, which is also not saying very much. The average cinema sound track background drivel of the thirties gives you the idea. Pizzetti has composed some rewarding scores in the smaller forms and the wonder is that Mr. Giulini picked upon this 'Fedra' excerpt to discharge the requirements of his obeisance.

Yet the concert did turn out to be an occasion of some satisfaction, and what made it so was the remaining two works on the program, namely Schubert's Symphony No. 4 in C minor, the "Tragic" and the Ravel transcription of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition." The "Tragic Symphony" and the "Pictures" are not the stuff of which programs are ordinarily "made." True, the introduction of the first movement of the Schubert is marvelously premonitory of the ineffable melancholy of the mature Schubert. The rest of this work, though, for all of its mellifluousness and grace can very quickly sound thin and repetitious—the efforts, after all, of a 19-year-old boy putting something together for his father's Friday evening chamber group to spiel.

In this reading, which was very deliberate and where the details were meticulously defined but the line kept strong and supple, the innocent little work glowed as a minor masterpiece.

As for the "Pictures" there can be no doubt about its claim as a masterpiece, and no minor one at that. It is a unique and splendid and immensely popular creation, indeed, so popular that someone takes a whack at it just about every other year. Whereat one man's splendor becomes another man's chestnut, and in this stage of my life it requires virtually an incandescent performance of the piece to send me. Had the brasses been wholly equal to it incandescent would have been the word. The brasses weren't however, and even the magnificent tuba playing of Chester Schmitz was insufficient to make them otherwise Still, the great score really communicated, and the prolonged stomping and applause that rang out as the last chords from the Great Gates of Kiev died away was evident tribute to the genius of the original composer and of the transcriber and to a conductor with control, ears and imagination.

GIULINI: THE SECOND ROUND

Suffice it that the second week's program continued to show the hand of a sensitive, responsive musician in more than ordinary rapport with the orchestra.

Others among the critics here have evaluated his credentials otherwise. Indeed, on successive weeks the man has been subjected to two quite uncommonly savage reviews from major sources. This, in turn, seems to have provoked an unusual response from players and audience. At the second concert Mr. Giulini received a standing, stomping ovation when he first stepped out to conduct the Haydn—something that ordinarily occurs only at the final concert of a resident conductor's retirement, if then. At the conclusion of the performance he was additionally applauded rhythmically, in the Russian manner, and recalled four times. The demonstration was as incisive a putdown as you are apt to encounter.

The response of the orchestra is particularly significant. Individually, to be sure, the members are not Hanslicks or Ernest Newmans to the last man. Collectively, they've heard everything and seen everybody and know the score. In my book a veteran orchestra is no mean measuring stick of the man standing before it.

The issues raised by all of this call for the most sober sort of consideration. The BSO is patently in search of a permanent conductor. By definition, a musician with Mr. Giulini's talents is in the running. But what conductor in full command of his wits would want to put up with a situation such as this? One gathers that this is more than a rhetorical question.

The freedom of a critic is almost unlimited and his power can be awesome. But with freedom and power go responsibility, and that is a term which, among other qualities, imparts compassion, humility and Socratic ignorance.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

NOV 13 1969

The Sound of Music

Brahms A La Giulini

By Peter M. Knapp

Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony began last night's Boston Symphony concert directed by Carlo Maria Giulini, the slim, elegant-looking Italian conductor with the musical name. But the real surprises came at the end in Brahms' Symphony No. 4.

Or was it Brahmsini? It was an astonishing performance, once of histrionic ardor on the podium, near-desperation among the musicians. It was wild, woolly and wrong.

Extremes

While Giulini emoted, clutched and swayed, almost caricaturing the supercharged maestro lost in his sound-world, the music was dragged into eccentric fits and starts, attacks were ragged, and intonation at times hair-raising. With little coherency, the symphony was conducted in epigrams; lyrical passages doused with dolce, allegros feverishly driven.

The audience loved it. It was good theater, but dismal Brahms — a performance so curiously overwrought as to be memorable for its extremes.

Fortunately, Giulini also brought along some Italian music, and here it was another story. Alfredo Casella (1883-1947) was hardly a Monteverdi, a Verdi or even a Respighi. He was one of Giulini's teachers, a composer and conductor, and director of the Boston Pops, pre-Fiedler 1926-1929.

Energetic Direction

Casella's ballet, "La Giara" (The Jar), is a light-hearted, light-weight pictorial score of a certain charm and accessibility. It is neither a masterpiece nor potboiler, colorful in its orchestration, rather pretty in its opening pastoral mood and Sicilian folk song, sung by tenor Robert Johnson with a rather tremulous vibrato.

Casella himself directed the BSO in the first performance in Boston of the symphonic suite from the ballet, and Giulini's presentation of it last night was stylish, orderly and energetic.

The Haydn held few surprises, Giulini conducting in a restrained manner, tucking himself into his characteristic "S" podium position and using few gestures to get well-proportioned sound (though not always in balance, favoring strings over winds). The accents were neat and crisp and the playing tidy in this reasonable Haydn reading which had the right scale if not particularly illuminating subtleties.

Symphony Programs

Seiji Ozawa conducts the second of his programs with the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season on Friday, Nov. 21, at 2 p.m. and Saturday, Nov. 22, at 8:30 p.m. He has chosen an All-Stravinsky program including two of Stravinsky's most famous ballet suites and the violin concerto. The Boston Symphony's concertmaster, Joseph Silverstein, is soloist in the violin concerto.

On Tuesday evening, Nov. 18, at 8:30, Ozawa will conduct the orchestra in the second of this season's 'Cambridge' series concerts.

On Thursday evening, Nov. 20, he will lead the second of the Thursday 'A' series.

Both programs will consist of Takemitsu's November Steps no. 1 and Orff's Carmina Burana, with soloists Evelyn Mandac, Stanley Kolk, and Sherrill Milnes. The New England Conservatory Chorus, under the direction of Miss Lorna Cooke DeVaon, will also be heard in this selection.

MINUTEMAN
BEDFORD, MASS.
WEEKLY 3,100

NOV 13 1969

BURLINGTON TIMES UNION
BURLINGTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 6,200

NOV 13 1969

CITIZEN
BELMONT, MASS.
WEEKLY 4,200

NOV 13 1969

JOURNAL
CONCORD, MASS.
WEEKLY 5,000

NOV 13 1969

FENCE VIEWER
SUDBURY, MASS.
WEEKLY 3,516

NOV 13 1969

Ozawa Leads BSO In TV Concert

Seiji Ozawa will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carl Orffff's "Carmina Burana" in a live color telecast Tuesday, Nov. 18 at 8:30 p.m. on Channel 2. Also participating will be soprano Evelyn Mandac, tenor Stanley Kolk, baritone Sherrill Milnes and the New England Conservatory Chorus.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

NOV 6 1969

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Friday afternoon November 14 1969 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening November 15 1969 at 8.30

SEIJI OZAWA conductor

ELGAR — 'Nimrod' from Variations on an original theme op. 36 'Enigma'

TAKEMITSU — November steps no. 1
KINSHI TSURUTA biwa
KATSUYA YOKOYAMA shakuhachi
first performance in Boston

intermission

ORFF — Carmina Burana
Fortuna imperatrix mundi (Luck, empress of the world)
Primo vere (In springtime)
Uf dem Anger (On the green)
In taberna (In the tavern)
Cour d'amours (Court of love)
Blanziflor et Helena (Blanchefleur and Helen)
Fortuna imperatrix mundi (Luck, empress of the world)
EVELYN MANDAC soprano
STANLEY KOLK tenor
SHERRILL MILNES baritone

RVATORY CHORUS
ı conductor
OF THE NEW ENGLAND
ısztai conductor chestra

STEES OF

orce in all our lives. The ıony Orchestra is to offer nd widely as lies within mpathetic with the cause

t the Orchestra will make giving its concerts on uty of music rather than ives to a peaceful profeselings of sadness for the r lives in this struggle and amilies. We dedicate the ful solution to this tragic he bloodshed, bring unity

r world.'

THE SOLOISTS

photo by Dick Loek

KINSHI TSURUTA, born in Ebeotsu Asahikawa in the Hokkaido Prefecture, is a player of the traditional Japanese instrument, the biwa. In November 1961 she appeared on stage for the first time since World War II in a joint recital. On film she has been heard in the music of Takemitsu for Kwaidan. She and Katsuya Yokoyama created the music for a series of television dramas, Yoshitsune, broadcast by NHK. Takemitsu wrote a new work for Kinshi Tsuruta and Mr Yokoyama called Eclipse, played at the Nissei Theater in May 1966.

photo by Dick Loek

KATSUYA YOKOYAMA, a leading player of the shakuhachi, was born in Kohnuki Numazu, Shizuoka Prefecture. He is known for his interpretation of almost all the new music written for his instrument in Japan. He is also a member of 'Sanbonkai', a trio of Japanese instrumentalists. His playing has been heard in the film scores by Takemitsu for Seppuku and Kwaidan as well as in the television series Yoshitsune. His traditional instrument is a bamboo flute, and his technique has been inherited from his teacher, Watazumi. Both Kinshi Tsuruta and Katsuya Yokoyama have taken part in the recording of November steps no. 1 with the Toronto Symphony, conducted by Seiji Ozawa, for RCA.

EVELYN MANDAC, born in the Philippines, took her degree in music at the University of the Philippines. She then studied for several years at Oberlin College and the Juilliard School of Music. Last season she appeared with the Orchestras of Honolulu and Phoenix, with the Oratorio Society of New York and the Dallas and San Antonio Symphonies. In opera she sang leading roles with the San Antonio and Santa Fe Opera Companies.

During the 1969-1970 season Evelyn Mandac, who makes her first appearances with the Boston Symphony at these concerts, will sing with the San Francisco Opera, the Minnesota Orchestra and the Philadelphia Orchestra. She will also join the Juilliard Quartet on a coast to coast tour. Her repertoire includes Liù in Turandot, Pamina in Die Zauberflöte, Susanna in Le nozze di Figaro, Salud in La vida breve and Mimi in La Bohème. Equally at home with contemporary music, she appeared in the American première of Berio's Passaggio and, more recently, in Henze's The Bassarids.

Cont'd. on next page →

'The New England Conservatory chorus wishes to dedicate its part of this performance to the cause of PEACE in the world.'

THE GUEST CONDUCTOR

SEIJI OZAWA, who becomes, with Gunther Schuller, Artistic Director of Tanglewood in 1970, made his first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the 1964 Berkshire Festival. He has appeared with the Orchestra at Tanglewood, Boston and New York on several occasions since. Born in Hoten, Manchuria, in 1935, he graduated from the Toho School of Music in Tokyo, where he won first prizes in composition and conducting. He went to Europe in 1959 and won the first prize at the International Competition of conductors at Besançon; one of the judges was Charles Munch, who invited him to Tanglewood to be a conducting student. The following year Seiji Ozawa received the Koussevitzky Memorial Scholarship as the outstanding young conductor at the Berkshire Music Center. Appointed one of the New York Philharmonic's assistant conductors in 1961, he directed the orchestra in several concerts. The same summer he conducted twenty-five concerts in Japan with the NHK and Japanese Philharmonic Orchestras.

Since that time he has appeared extensively in Europe and America with many of the greatest orchestras, among them the London Symphony, the Concertgebouw, the Vienna Symphony, the Philadelphia, Chicago Symphony, San Francisco Symphony and Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestras.

At the end of the 1968-1969 season Seiji Ozawa resigned his post as Music Director of the Toronto Symphony, and is devoting the present season to guest conducting. During the summer he conducted opera for the first time, Così fan tutte at Salzburg, and was principal guest conductor of the Ravinia Festival. He has opened the 1969-1970 season of the New York Philharmonic, and later this season will be guest conductor with L'Orchestre de Paris, the Philadelphia and Cleveland Orchestras, and the Berlin Philharmonic. He becomes Music Director of the San Francisco Symphony next fall. Seiji Ozawa has made many recordings for RCA.

Ozawa's wide-awake BSO pr

By Louis Snyder

ARTS
ENTERTAINMENT

Seiji Ozawa, exotically black-maned, returned to conduct the Boston Symphony on Friday afternoon in two works, oriented in antiquity, by contemporary composers. Both were first performances by the orchestra, and both had the collaboration of highly qualified guest artists to help make the rather different, but profound, impressions they indubitably did.

The first, Toru Takemitsu's "November Steps No. 1," is essentially grounded in the techniques of Western orchestral composition, with inevitable trimmings of sound and color native to the composer. Two ancient Japanese instruments, the biwa and the shakuhachi, are counterposed (as Takemitsu's helpful RCA album quotes explain) to the orchestra—the aim is contrast and revelation of their separate unique qualities, rather than incorporation in a Western body of sound.

Thus, the lutelike biwa and the shakuhachi, resembling a recorder, go their own ways, sometimes together, sometimes against the orchestra, and occasionally alone. To quote the composer: "Eleven 'steps' with no particular melodic unity. Like the music of the No Theater, the rhythm endlessly oscillates."

Adventurous idiom

It was a fascinating trip into a completely different (for most) aural world, and Mr. Ozawa shepherded musicians and audience through it with loving care. The orchestra played expertly in this adventurous idiom, and the two soloists, Miss Kinshi Tsuruta (biwa), and Mr. Katsuya Yokoyama (shakuhachi) transcended any barriers posed by the unfamiliarity of their instruments to reveal themselves as superior and dedicated artists.

Eye-opener

Carl Orff's "Carmina Burana" filled the second half of the program, with Evelyn Mandac (soprano), Stanley Kolk (tenor), and Sherrill Milnes (baritone) as soloists, and the New England Conservatory Chorus, directed by Lorna Cooke de Varon, and Conservatory Children's Chorus, directed by Katherine E. Pusztai, as the orchestra's all-important partners.

The work, despair of many critical analysts, and delight of the public at large, is that rarity, a contemporary (1937) popular success—some say masterpiece—which has made it without subscribing to any particular progressive trends. Its melodic, rhythmic, and harmonic attributes make themselves known the first time (and several hearings after), and the Latin words are skillfully set, very often to further the mesmeric rhythmic pattern. Profane as are the sources and songs of these middle-ages clerical with the for an Ozawa's

The l
Mr. Mi accomp of the Mandac also te specto tions o and of spit. As and fu the wo day, a gram, s usually
Friday

STANLEY KOLK, who makes his first appearance with the Boston Symphony at these concerts, has recently joined the Frankfurt Opera as leading tenor. During the present season he will play, among other roles, Belmonte in Die Entführung aus dem Serail, Tamino in Die Zauberflöte, Rodolfo in La Bohème, Pinkerton in Madama Butterfly, the Duke in Rigoletto and Alwa in Lulu. In past seasons he has sung with many of the leading opera companies in the United States, and was heard in the historic performance of Così fan tutte at the White House. He has also appeared with many of the major orchestras, including the New York Philharmonic, the Philadelphia Orchestra, the Pittsburgh Symphony, the Los Angeles Philharmonic and Chicago Symphony. Stanley Kolk has taken part in many performances of contemporary music, and sang in the American premières of Panfilo and Lauretta by Chavez and Berg's Lulu. He has made several recordings on the Columbia and Vanguard labels.

SHERRILL MILNES, who appeared most recently at Symphony Hall with the Boston Symphony as narrator in Schoenberg's A survivor from Warsaw and soloist in Beethoven's Ninth symphony, is leading baritone of the Metropolitan Opera. He started his professional career as a member of Margaret Hillis's Chicago Choir, and was soon taking solo parts when the chorus appeared with the Chicago Symphony. He won scholarships to the opera department of the Berkshire Music Center for two consecutive summers, then joined Boris Goldovsky's company for several tours. After winning a Ford Foundation award in 1962, he sang with the Pittsburgh, San Antonio, Houston, Central City and Cincinnati Opera companies.

At the Metropolitan he has sung leading roles in Faust, Pique Dame, Fidelio, Aida, Un ballo in maschera, Lohengrin and Mourning becomes Electra. He has appeared abroad in Venice, Florence, Milan and Mexico City. Sherrill Milnes has made many records for RCA. With the Orchestra he has recorded Brahms' German Requiem, A survivor from Warsaw by Schoenberg and Beethoven's Ninth symphony.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
NOV 15 1969

Two Japanese Virtuosos Provide Uplift at Symphony Concert

By GEORGE GELLES
HT Music Critic

The most entertaining moments on Friday afternoon at Symphony Hall came when the Boston Symphony was si- Seiji Ozawa sat among his players, when the stage was held by Kenshi Tsuruta and lent, when guest conductor Katsuya Yokoyama, virtuosos on the biwa and shakuhachi, respectively.

The biwa is a Japanese version of the lute, the shakuhachi a bamboo flute. Both instruments are capable of the most subtle gradations of attack, tone and timbre, the repertories of both creatively make much use of silence as well as sound, and the techniques of both get musical mileage from noise as well as fixed pitches.

YOKOYAMA and Mme. Tsuruta are virtuosos of the highest order. They exploit complete techniques with phenomenal control and distinguished musicianship, and their performances of traditional music were moving.

TORU TAKEMITSU used both instruments in his "November Steps No. 1," with which Ozawa opened the afternoon (after, that is, a movement from Elgar's "Enigma Variations," being played this weekend in the name of Peace). This sets sections of orchestra writing, Polish-inspired, it seems to me, against solo interludes. But while the piece is a viable marriage of two sound worlds, the music for conventional instruments seemed faceless, and robbed Takemitsu's piece of much profile.

Most of the concert was given to "Carmina Burana," Carl Orff's setting of two dozen medieval poems, most of which are bawdy. I can't see that Orff will rate more than a footnote in years hence, and his score seems empty on any of several levels.

Harmonically it is for the most part sterile; rhythmically it is monotonous; melodically it is profoundly unoriginal, the best ideas in it having been borrowed from Stravinsky. Orff had, however, an admirable way with words — the verses are always knowingly set — and his orchestration is expert. "Carmina" can, I'm sure, be played to fine effect, but under Ozawa it wasn't.

CONDUCTING, first of all, was lacking a tautness and tight control and precise pacing that are needed to give the pieces shape and coherence. Rhythmic figures were never articulated sharply enough, never given enough bite. Dynamics were underplayed, though the loud parts were uncontrolled and vulgar. And orchestral work was only routine.

The New England Conservatory Chorus gave a drab and lackluster performance. I can't believe the students had any idea what the words in their mouths meant, for their work was completely sexless, lacking guts and lustiness. (If they relied on the Program Book translation they were in trouble, as was the audience, for we got a version both expurgated and wrong in many details. For example: in the choral Round Dance, the German states baldly that all summer long the girls want men, but the translation negates this sentence. Or later in the same piece, we hear the girls in the semi-chorus panting for a "mistress," which is not what "gessell'" means. In sum, a sloppy, wrong-headed job.)

Soloists were for the most part good. Sherrill Milnes has a commanding baritone that he used with his customary taste and intelligence. Soprano Evelyn Mandac sang with a rich, well-focused sound, and in the "Stetit puella' miraculously managed to keep her pitch while in unison with madly out of tune clarinets.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
NOV 15 1969

A Symphony premiere for Japanese work

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

This week and next, the Boston Symphony concerts are being conducted by Seiji Ozawa, who becomes, with Gunther Schuler, Artistic Director of Tanglewood in 1970, and who will also take over the San Francisco Symphony next Fall. He began his engagement there yesterday afternoon with a program that included "November Steps No. 1" by the 38-year-old Japanese composer Toru Takemitsu (not previously performed in Boston), and Carl Orff's "Carmina burana" (done by several choral societies here, but never at Symphony).

"November Steps No. 1" — Ozawa performed No. 2, a smaller work, here with the Toronto Symphony a year ago — is sectional, static, exquisitiely scored, and of rather low compositional density. It has solo parts for two Japanese instruments, the Biwa a lute, whose strings are struck, picked, or rubbed with a large, triangular wooden plectron, and the shakuhachi, an end-blown bamboo flute.

The program note described the work as a series of "miniatures, many of them linked by brief solos for shakuhachi and biwa"; I must say, though, that I hear it inside out, that is, as a series of solos joined by a rather neutral connective tissue provided by the Western orchestra.

TWO VIRTUOSI

Seven substantial works of Takemitsu's of the last dozen years are available on records, and my impression is that the virtues of his music are more than anything cosmetic, with the most recent "Asterisms" to be read as a promissory note for something more substantial.

"November Steps" certainly strikes me as being most of all about making beautiful sounds. If you stop to examine what that delicious, sensuous experience is all in honor of, you may well discover that not much is happening, really.

It is music, then, of limited, special, and rather superficial appeal, and not something to hear often, but, played as beautifully as it was on Friday, it gives real delight to the sense of hearing. The delicacy of its sound invites a kind of concentration that is an exciting pleasure in itself.

Ozawa and the orchestra did their job beautifully, but the real heroes of the occasion were the two visiting Japanese virtuosi, Kinshi Tsuruta on the biwa, and Katsuya Yokoyama on the shakuhachi.

The playing of both, but especially that of Mr. Yokoyama, whose instrument has the more interesting range of expressive and technical possibilities, was astonishingly beautiful in its subtle inflections of line, color, pitch, and volume, and for the quiet intensity with which it was projected.

Takemitsu's use of the two instruments being contemporary and to some extent therefore idiosyncratic, Ozawa asked each of the players to play a solo in traditional style. This they did, Miss Tsuruta also using the biwa as accompaniment to her own powerfully phrased singing, and it was a welcome way of extending our acquaintance with two of the finest instrumentalists and greatest artists ever to appear before a Boston audience.

'TEDIOUS'

"Carmina burana" is one of the few surviving items in the cultural legacy of the 12 years of the 1000-year Reich. Immensely popular, it remains controversial. Orff's career from 1933 to 1945 does not make his work more endearing; neither, on quite another level, does his exploitation in "Carmina burana," of Stravinsky's "Les Noces" and "Oedipus Rex."

I would add that some of "Carmina burana" is tedious: most of the many strophic numbers wilt because their music is too impoverished harmonically and rhythmically to withstand so much literal repetition.

There is no escaping, though, that "Carmina burana" is the work of a lively and thoroughly professional composer. The Goliard song texts in German, Latin, and French, have been masterfully chosen and ordered. The orchestral writing is varied.

The writing for the vocal soloists is interestingly virtuosic and exploratory, particularly in its use of extremes of register.

And, with all that is obvious and that becomes quickly tiresome, there are many kinds of pieces in "Carmina burana" and many that really work, one's as different as the roistering baritone recitative "Ego sum abbas," that riskily primitive drinking chorus "In taberna quando sumus," or that lovely song of wavering virginity, "In trutina."

HIGH LEVEL

Friday's performance had tremendous energy and spirit, and Ozawa paced it superbly, not only within pieces but across the gaps between pieces as well. The solo singing of soprano Evelyn Mandac, Tenor Stanley Kolk, and baritone Sherrill Milnes was flavorless in this or that detail (Mandac's "Siqua sine socio," which was cool and lively, but without catching the bitchiness masquerading as innocence Orff asks for; Kolk's lament of the roasted charred, and still vain swan: "Dies nox et omnia," which Milnes delivered in a drab falsetto instead of a suggestive, seductive half-voice).

Most of it, though, was on a high level, and some of it was first-rate (everything else of Mandac's, and also Milnes's "Ego sum abbas" and "Tempus est iocundum."

On the other hand, the singing of choruses from the New England Conservatory — the grownups prepared by Lorna Cooke de Varon and the children by Katherine Edmonds Pusztai — was particularly strong on flavor, character, word sense, and articulation, and it was a great pleasure altogether. Excellent orchestral playing, too.

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300
NOV 15 1969

Ozawa Guest Conductor

BSO Features Peace, Music

By L. DAVID HARRIS
Music Critic

It was 0th century music for 20th century troubles yesterday as the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave recognition to November's Moratorium peace-observance day with a superlative concert.

The program was a brilliant demonstration of the directing skills of Guest Conductor Seiji Oawa as he led the orchestra through Takemitsu's "November Steps" and then the orchestra, the New England Conservatory Chorus, soloists and the conservatory's children's chorus in Oriff's "Carmina Burana" opera music.

The concert began, however, with a piece by Sir Edward Elgar, dedicated by the orchestra to the memory of Americans killed in the Vietnam War.

A program statement read: "We, as musicians, have always devoted our lives to a peaceful profession. On this day we wish to express our feelings of sadness for the thousands of young Americans who gave their lives in this struggle and our heartfelt sympathies to their bereaved families. We dedicate the piece by Elgar in their memory.

"We have the fervent hope that a peaceful solution to this tragic problem will soon be achieved that will stop the bloodshed, bring unity to uor nation and peace to all the nations of our world."

A statment by the New England Conservatory Chorus read:

"The New England Conservatory chorus wishes to dedicate its part of this performance to the cause of PEACE in the world."

Musically, Takemitsu's "November Steps" was a fascinating exercise in sound — playing the western orchestra against the music of ancient Japanese instruments — the "shakuhachi" (a bamboo flute) and the "biwa' (a lute-like instrument played with a wooden plectrum).

Kinshi Tsuruta and Katsuya Yokoyama were the black-and-gray-robed soloists and both did encores, receiving enthusiastic applause.

The music was vastly interesting—the orchestra whirred, shimmered, clattered while the shakuhachi mourned breathy ethereal sounds. The biwi had a dry, crunching quality about it. To listen was to appreciate and to learn.

The choir was animated, full, excellent in diction, but occasionally slow in following the conductor (most evident in beginning attacks of phrases or verses).

It seems evident that Selji Ozawa, the guest conductor, is well on his way to being a conductor of world-wide renown.

The concert revealed several factors in his favor—his appearance (youthful, modest, self-effacing, his willingness to emphasize contemporary music and his conducting, which is marked by directness, clarity and an excellent sense of balance.

Ozawa, future music director of the San Francisco Symphony, also begins (with Gunther Schuller) as artistic director of Tanglewood in in 1970. And this is certainly a factor in Tanglewood's favor.

THE GUEST CONDUCTOR

SEIJI OZAWA, who becomes, with Gunther Schuller, Artistic Director of Tanglewood in 1970, made his first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the 1964 Berkshire Festival. He has appeared with the Orchestra at Tanglewood, Boston and New York on several occasions since. Born in Hoten, Manchuria, in 1935, he graduated from the Toho School of Music in Tokyo, where he won first prizes in composition and conducting. He went to Europe in 1959 and won the first prize at the International Competition of conductors at Besançon; one of the judges was Charles Munch, who invited him to Tanglewood to be a conducting student. The following year Seiji Ozawa received the Koussevitzky Memorial Scholarship as the outstanding young conductor at the Berkshire Music Center. Appointed one of the New York Philharmonic's assistant conductors in 1961, he directed the orchestra in several concerts. The same summer he conducted twenty-five concerts in Japan with the NHK and Japanese Philharmonic Orchestras.

Since that time he has appeared extensively in Europe and America with many of the greatest orchestras, among them the London Symphony, the Concertgebouw, the Vienna Symphony, the Philadelphia, Chicago Symphony, San Francisco Symphony and Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestras.

At the end of the 1968-1969 season Seiji Ozawa resigned his post as Music Director of the Toronto Symphony, and is devoting the present season to guest conducting. During the summer he conducted opera for the first time, Così fan tutte at Salzburg, and was principal guest conductor of the Ravinia Festival. He has opened the 1969-1970 season of the New York Philharmonic, and later this season will be guest conductor with L'Orchestre de Paris, the Philadelphia and Cleveland Orchestras, and the Berlin Philharmonic. He becomes Music Director of the San Francisco Symphony next fall. Seiji Ozawa has made many recordings for RCA.

Ozawa's wide-awake BSO program

By Louis Snyder

ARTS
ENTERTAINMENT

Seiji Ozawa, exotically black-maned, returned to conduct the Boston Symphony on Friday afternoon in two works, oriented in antiquity, by contemporary composers. Both were first performances by the orchestra, and both had the collaboration of highly qualified guest artists to help make the rather different, but profound, impressions they indubitably did.

The first, Toru Takemitsu's "November Steps No. 1," is essentially grounded in the techniques of Western orchestral composition, with inevitable trimmings of sound and color native to the composer. Two ancient Japanese instruments, the biwa and the shakuhachi, are counterposed (as Takemitsu's helpful RCA album quotes explain) to the orchestra—the aim is contrast and revelation of their separate unique qualities, rather than incorporation in a Western body of sound.

Thus, the lutelike biwa and the shakuhachi, resembling a recorder, go their own ways, sometimes together, sometimes against the orchestra, and occasionally alone. To quote the composer: "Eleven 'steps' with no particular melodic unity. Like the music of the No Theater, the rhythm endlessly oscillates."

Adventurous idiom

It was a fascinating trip into a completely different (for most) aural world, and Mr. Ozawa shepherded musicians and audience through it with loving care. The orchestra played expertly in this adventurous idiom, and the two soloists, Miss Kinshi Tsuruta (biwa), and Mr. Katsuya Yokoyama (shakuhachi) transcended any barriers posed by the unfamiliarity of their instruments to reveal themselves as superior and dedicated artists.

Eye-opener

Carl Orff's "Carmina Burana" filled the second half of the program, with Evelyn Mandac (soprano), Stanley Kolk (tenor), and Sherrill Milnes (baritone) as soloists, and the New England Conservatory Chorus, directed by Lorna Cooke de Varon, and Conservatory Children's Chorus, directed by Katherine E. Pusztai, as the orchestra's all-important partners.

The work, despair of many critical analysts, and delight of the public at large, is that rarity, a contemporary (1937) popular success—some say masterpiece—which has made it without subscribing to any particular progressive trends. Its melodic, rhythmic, and harmonic attributes make themselves known the first time (and several hearings after), and the Latin words are skillfully set, very often to further the mesmeric rhythmic pattern. Profane as are the sources and songs of these middle-ages clerical dropouts, Orff has clothed them with the kind of sound that certainly made for an eye-opening performance under Mr. Ozawa's sculptured direction.

The lion's share of the solo work fell to Mr. Milnes, and it is no surprise that he accomplished magnificent things with one of the richest baritones of our time. Miss Mandac and Mr. Kolk, in their BSO debuts, also left nothing to be desired in their respective assignments — the tremulous emotions of a maiden in the "court of love," and of a swan "roasting fiercely" on the spit. As for the choruses, their wholehearted and full-voiced involvement in the spirit of the work made this a memorable musical day, and contributed to a wide-awake program and its complementary response not usually encountered in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoons.

flip up to read

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

NOV 17 1969

a full and varied program each season. emières, including works by Irving Fine oduced several others to America, Bern- 's E minor Mass among them. Gunther d Aaron Copland are some of the com- the chorus.

Tour Chorus has travelled extensively in oncert tour in Spain and the Soviet Union e State Department. On their return Mrs on Medal for Distinguished Achievement. each season with the Boston Symphony ecordings with the orchestra for RCA.

performances of the German Requiem hony of Beethoven and later took part s for RCA. Recently they gave a benefit xodus', and further plans for this season Webern's Das Augenlicht and the world ory's Extension Division, and the Director uctor, Katherine Edmonds Pusztai, is a i Sisters, Inc.

Jewelry
18K finely detailed elet with marquis cut emeralds

Two Japanese Virtuosos Provide Uplift at Symphony Concert

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

NOV 15 1969

By GEORGE GELLES
HT Music Critic

The most entertaining moments on Friday afternoon at Symphony Hall came when the Boston Symphony was si- Seiji Ozawa sat among his players, when the stage was held by Kenshi Tsuruta and lent, when guest conductor Katsuya Yokoyama, virtuosos on the biwa and shakuhachi, respectively.

The biwa is a Japanese version of the lute, the shakuhachi a bamboo flute. Both instruments are capable of the most subtle gradations of attack, tone and timbre, the repertories of both creatively make much use of silence as well as sound, and the techniques of both get musical mileage from noise as well as fixed pitches.

YOKOYAMA and Mme. Tsuruta are virtuosos of the highest order. They exploit complete techniques with phenomenal control and distinguished musicianship, and their performances of traditional music were moving.

TORU TAKEMITSU used both instruments in his "November Steps No. 1," with which Ozawa opened the afternoon (after, that is, a movement from Elgar's "Enigma Variations," being played this weekend in the name of Peace). This sets sections of orchestra writing, Polish-inspired, it seems to me, against solo interludes. But while the piece is a viable marriage of two sound worlds, the music for conventional instruments seemed faceless, and robbed Takemitsu's piece of much profile.

Most of the concert was given to "Carmina Burana," Carl Orff's setting of two dozen medieval poems, most of which are bawdy. I can't see that Orff will rate more than a footnote in years hence, and his score seems empty on any of several levels.

Harmonically it is for the most part sterile; rhythmically it is monotonous; melodically it is profoundly unoriginal, the best ideas in it having been borrowed from Stravinsky. Orff had, however, an admirable way with words — the verses are always knowingly set — and his orchestration is expert. "Carmina" can, I'm sure, be played to fine effect, but under Ozawa it wasn't.

CONDUCTING, first of all, was lacking a tautness and tight control and precise pacing that are needed to give the pieces shape and coherence. Rhythmic figures were never articulated sharply enough, never given enough bite. Dynamics were underplayed, though the loud parts were uncontrolled and vulgar. And orchestral work was only routine.

The New England Conservatory Chorus gave a drab and lackluster performance. I can't believe the students had any idea what the words in their mouths meant, for their work was completely sexless, lacking guts and lustiness. (If they relied on the Program Book translation they were in trouble, as was the audience, for we got a version both expurgated and wrong in many details. For example: in the choral Round Dance, the German states baldly that all summer long the girls want men, but the translation negates this sentence. Or later in the same piece, we hear the girls in the semi-chorus panting for a "mistress," which is not what "gessell'" means. In sum, a sloppy, wrong-headed job.)

Soloists were for the most part good. Sherrill Milnes has a commanding baritone that he used with his customary taste and intelligence. Soprano Evelyn Mandac sang with a rich, well-focused sound, and in the "Stetit puella' miraculously managed to keep her pitch while in unison with madly out of tune clarinets.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

NOV 15 1969

A Symphony premiere for Japanese work

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

This week and next, the Boston Symphony concerts are being conducted by Seiji Ozawa, who becomes, with Gunther Schuler, Artistic Director of Tanglewood in 1970, and who will also take over the San Francisco Symphony next Fall. He began his engagement there yesterday afternoon with a program that included "November Steps No. 1" by the 38-year-old Japanese composer Toru Takemitsu (not previously performed in Boston), and Carl Orff's "Carmina burana" (done by several choral societies here, but never at Symphony).

"November Steps No. 1" — Ozawa performed No. 2, a smaller work, here with the Toronto Symphony a year ago — is sectional, static, exquisitiely scored, and of rather low compositional density. It has solo parts for two Japanese instruments, the Biwa a lute, whose strings are struck, picked, or rubbed with a large, triangular wooden plectron, and the shakuhachi, an end-blown bamboo flute.

The program note described the work as a series of "miniatures, many of them linked by brief solos for shakuhachi and biwa"; I must say, though, that I hear it inside out, that is, as a series of solos joined by a rather neutral connective tissue provided by the Western orchestra.

TWO VIRTUOSI

Seven substantial works of Takemitsu's of the last dozen years are available on records, and my impression is that the virtues of his music are more than anything cosmetic, with the most recent "Asterisms" to be read as a promissory note for something more substantial.

"November Steps" certainly strikes me as being most of all about making beautiful sounds. If you stop to examine what that delicious, sensuous experience is all in honor of, you may well discover that not much is happening, really.

It is music, then, of limited, special, and rather superficial appeal, and not something to hear often, but, played as beautifully as it was on Friday, it gives real delight to the sense of hearing. The delicacy of its sound invites a kind of concentration that is an exciting pleasure in itself.

Ozawa and the orchestra did their job beautifully, but the real heroes of the occasion were the two visiting Japanese virtuosi, Kinshi Tsuruta on the biwa, and Katsuya Yokoyama on the shakuhachi.

The playing of both, but especially that of Mr. Yokoyama, whose instrument has the more interesting range of expressive and technical possibilities, was astonishingly beautiful in its subtle inflections of line, color, pitch, and volume, and for the quiet intensity with which it was projected.

Takemitsu's use of the two instruments being contemporary and to some extent therefore idiosyncratic, Ozawa asked each of the players to play a solo in traditional style. This they did, Miss Tsuruta also using the biwa as accompaniment to her own powerfully phrased singing, and it was a welcome way of extending our acquaintance with two of the finest instrumentalists and greatest artists ever to appear before a Boston audience.

'TEDIOUS'

"Carmina burana" is one of the few surviving items in the cultural legacy of the 12 years of the 1000-year Reich. Immensely popular, it remains controversial. Orff's career from 1933 to 1945 does not make his work more endearing; neither, on quite another level, does his exploitation in "Carmina burana," of Stravinsky's "Les Noces" and "Oedipus Rex."

I would add that some of "Carmina burana" is tedious: most of the many strophic numbers wilt because their music is too impoverished harmonically and rhythmically to withstand so much literal repetition.

There is no escaping, though, that "Carmina burana" is the work of a lively and thoroughly professional composer. The Goliard song texts in German, Latin, and French, have been masterfully chosen and ordered. The orchestral writing is varied.

The writing for the vocal soloists is interestingly virtuosic and exploratory, particularly in its use of extremes of register.

And, with all that is obvious and that becomes quickly tiresome, there are many kinds of pieces in "Carmina burana" and many that really work, one's as different as the roistering baritone recitative "Ego sum abbas," that riskily primitive drinking chorus "In taberna quando sumus," or that lovely song of wavering virginity, "In trutina."

HIGH LEVEL

Friday's performance had tremendous energy and spirit, and Ozawa paced it superbly, not only within pieces but across the gaps between pieces as well. The solo singing of soprano Evelyn Mandac. Tenor Stanley Kolk, and baritone Sherrill Milnes was flavorless in this or that detail (Mandac's "Siqua sine socio," which was cool and lively, but without catching the bitchiness masquerading as innocence Orff asks for; Kolk's lament of the roasted charred, and still vain swan: "Dies nox et omnia," which Milnes delivered in a drab falsetto instead of a suggestive, seductive half-voice).

Most of it, though, was on a high level, and some of it was first-rate (everything else of Mandac's, and also Milnes's "Ego sum abbas" and "Tempus est iocundum."

On the other hand, the singing of choruses from the New England Conservatory — the grownups prepared by Lorna Cooke de Varon and the children by Katherine Edmonds Pusztai — was particularly strong on flavor, character, word sense, and articulation, and it was a great pleasure altogether. Excellent orchestral playing, too.

Ozawa Guest Conductor

BSO Features Peace, Music

By L. DAVID HARRIS
Music Critic

It was 0th century music for 20th century troubles yesterday as the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave recognition to November's Moratorium peace-observance day with a superlative concert.

The program was a brilliant demonstration of the directing skills of Guest Conductor Seiji Oawa as he led the orchestra through Takemitsu's "November Steps" and then the orchestra, the New England Conservatory Chorus, soloists and the conservatory's children's chorus in Oriff's "Carmina Burana" opera music.

The concert began, however, with a piece by Sir Edward Elgar, dedicated by the orchestra to the memory of Americans killed in the Vietnam War.

A program statement read: "We, as musicians, have always devoted our lives to a peaceful profession. On this day we wish to express our feelings of sadness for the thousands of young Americans who gave their lives in this struggle and our heartfelt sympathies to their bereaved families. We dedicate the piece by Elgar in their memory.

"We have the fervent hope that a peaceful solution to this tragic problem will soon be achieved that will stop the bloodshed, bring unity to our nation and peace to all the nations of our world."

A statment by the New England Conservatory Chorus read:

"The New England Conservatory chorus wishes to dedicate its part of this performance to the cause of PEACE in the world."

Musically, Takemitsu's "November Steps" was a fascinating exercise in sound — playing the western orchestra against the music of ancient Japanese instruments — the "shakuhachi" (a bamboo flute) and the "biwa' (a lute-like instrument played with a wooden plectrum).

Kinshi Tsuruta and Katsuya Yokoyama were the black-and-gray-robed soloists and both did encores, receiving enthusiastic applause.

The music was vastly interesting—the orchestra whirred, shimmered, clattered while the shakuhachi mourned breathy ethereal sounds. The biwi had a dry, crunching quality about it. To listen was to appreciate and to learn.

The choir was animated, full, excellent in diction, but occasionally slow in following the conductor (most evident in beginning attacks of phrases or verses).

It seems evident that Selji Ozawa, the guest conductor, is well on his way to being a conductor of world-wide renown.

The concert revealed several factors in his favor—his appearance (youthful, modest, self-effacing, his willingness to emphasize contemporary music and his conducting, which is marked by directness, clarity and an excellent sense of balance.

Ozawa, future music director of the San Francisco Symphony, also begins (with Gunther Schuller) as artistic director of Tanglewood in 1970. And this is certainly a factor in Tanglewood's favor.

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300

NOV 15 1969

Marty Bookspan's review
as delivered on Channel 7
Friday 11pm news.

20.

11 PM NEWS FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 14, 1969 (ON FILM)
WNAC-TV

AUDIO

Good evening, everyone. There has been a lot of anguished hand-wringing of late concerning the future of the symphony orchestra and its relevance to our musical present. The Boston Symphony concerts this week-end offer the most positive answer possible to all this soul-searching. In the first place, the conductor this week and next is Seiji Ozawa, the young Japanese-born musician who is one of the most dynamic and interesting conductors now before the public. In the second place, the program: two 20th century works that have never before been played by the Boston Symphony: November Steps Number 1 by the Japanese composer, Toru Takemitsu; and Carmina Burana by the German, Carl Orff. And taking note that the programs this week-end are being given on the dates when many Americans are dedicating themselves to an active pursuit of peace, the concerts open with a section from the "Enigma" Variations of Elgar, dedicated by the musicians of the orchestra to the memory of those thousands of young Americans who have given their lives in the struggle.

The Takemitsu work is scored for a large orchestra and two exotic solo Japanese instruments, the biwa and the shakuhachi, the former a large lute-like instrument that is strummed with a large triangular sized pick - the latter a form of bamboo flute. It is an extremely atmospheric score, with long sections for the two solo instruments alternating with music for the orchestra. It was played brilliantly by all concerned, and after the performance Mr. Ozawa had both soloists perform more traditional Japanese music on their instruments so we could hear them in a more normal sound spectrum.

As to Carmina Burana, that hymn to the profane joys of wine, women and song - Mr. Ozawa conducted an absolutely electric performance. Assisting were the New England Conservatory Chorus and Children's Chorus and the three vocal soloists were Evelyn Mandac, soprano; Stanley Kolk, tenor; and Sherrill Milnes, baritone. All covered themselves with glory.

Yes indeed, there still is plenty of vitality in the Symphony Orchestra medium and in the Symphony concert. This is Martin Bookspan for Boston 7 News.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000
NOV 20 1969

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

OZAWA GUEST CONDUCTS BSO

Seiji Ozawa is guest at the Symphony for two weeks. His first offering last weekend was rather a pungent collation that saw the introduction here of the work of one of his better known contemporary countrymen composers, Toru Takemitsu, and, at last, the first Symphony performance of Carl Orff's "Carmina Burana".

Takemitsu's work is entitled "November Steps No. 1". It is an exercise in admixing of traditional western instrumentation with antique oriental instruments, in this instance a Japanese bamboo flute called a shakuhachi and a large lute-like string instrument called the biwa. The orchestra was small and treated in chamber music style, and in fact provided a somewhat unrelated context for a series of solos and duets by the two instruments.

Takemitsu's music is avant garde in the manner of one of his masters, John Cage, but still well this side of electronic. It has the brilliantly brought off tonal effects and the utter lack of profile so characteristic of composers writing in that vein. Though the result might not have been intentional, the interruption of the two solo instruments gave off at times a distinctly electronic music effect.

The soloists were Kinshi Tsuruta on the biwa and Katsuya Yokoyama on the shakuhachi, said to be in the great line of artists of their instruments. They appeared in formal Japanese costumes with ultimate amenity. Mr. Ozawa had each perform solo numbers as encores. Certainly the incredible series of sounds and manipulations on their instruments were something rare and genuinely excited the audience. How anyone not deeply immersed in Japanese music making tradition, however, could adjudge the true quality of their performance or undergo a meaningful aesthetic experience from their playing is another matter. The sharp crossing of cultures can be a difficult thing, and here is one listener, at least, who had some trouble in suspending his disbelief in making Symphony Hall into a Teahouse of the August Moon.

Orff's "Carmina Burana" is one of those works that has had immense popularity in Europe, particularly Germany, and is now making considerable headway in this country since it was first introduced in San Francisco fifteen years ago. The piece consists of settings of "secular" poems of the thirteenth century taken from scores discovered in a Benedictine monastery in South Bavaria. Orff calls it a scenic cantata. It is in three sections called "Spring", "The Tavern" and "Love" and sung by a chorus and three soloists to a text written in low Latin and low German. Quite often it is accompanied by mime and dances. I have put quotes around the word "secular" because the doings celebrated in the text are thoroughly erotic, and one wonders what kind of life those old Benedictines must have lived.

Orff, as many people uncomfortably know, composed straight through Hitler's Germany and was one of the more celebrated musical figures of the Third Reich. In all fairness to him, there is very little information about his ideological prepossession other than he did not leave the country. However, his work in no small part reflects a cultural barrenness of the era. Thus, in a sort of a perverse way it is a tribute to the man's capacities that his compositions, particularly "Carmina Burana", have managed to keep being played to this day.

The music is abrupt, totalling lacking in counterpoint and harmonically tepid. Through it runs the idea that if a theme, however banal, is repeated with sufficient insistency, that theme may acquire some sort of musical credibility. There is an improbable union of Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex" and almost any Puccini you could name. Notably the drinking songs have a certain roistering vitality, and I must confess that on balance the piece held my attention. Having experienced it once, though, I would not easily exert myself to hear it again.

The soloists were Evelyn Mandac, soprano, Stanley Kolk, tenor, and Sherrill Milnes, baritone, and the choruses were from the New England Conservatory, with Lorna Cooke de Varon director, with a special children's chorus prepared by Katherine Edmonds Pusztai. The soloists were rather an uneven trio. Miss Mandac's voice was sweet and clear but lacking in strength and color. Mr. Kolk's tenor was less than first rate, while Sherrill Milnes' baritone had a great deal of force and authority in the middle registers but fell off in tone and authority in the upper ones. He was, though, the most commanding figure among the three. The choruses were absolutely great—full of vim, sharp articulation and a fervor and conviction that was more than the music deserved. The same can be said for the efforts of Mr. Ozawa.

The concert opened with the haunting "Nimrod" from Elgar's "Enigma Variations", as the acknowledgement of the management and players to the November 14, 15 demonstrations for peace. There was in the doing courage, nobility and sensitivity, and all concerned deserved the highest commendations.

This week Mr. Ozawa conducts an all Stravinsky program, which works include "Greeting Prelude", 1911 version of "Petrushka", violin concerto, and the "Firebird" Suite. Joseph Silverstein will be the violin soloist.

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Tuesday evening November 18 1969 at 8.30
Thursday evening November 20 1969 at 8.30

SEIJI OZAWA conductor

TAKEMITSU — November steps no. 1
KINSHI TSURUTA biwa
KATSUYA YOKOYAMA shakuhachi

intermission

ORFF — Carmina Burana
Fortuna imperatrix mundi
(Luck, empress of the world)
Primo vere (In springtime)
Uf dem Anger (On the green)
In taberna (In the tavern)
Cour d'amours (Court of love)
Blanziflor et Helena (Blanchefleur and Helen)
Fortuna imperatrix mundi
(Luck, empress of the world)

EVELYN MANDAC soprano
STANLEY KOLK tenor
SHERRILL MILNES baritone
NEW ENGLAND CONSERVATORY CHORUS
Lorna Cooke de Varon conductor
CHILDREN'S CHORUS OF THE NEW ENGLAND CONSERVATORY
Katherine Edmonds Pusztai conductor

B.S.O. CARMINA 11/20/69
WHRB REVIEW BY JOHN ZUSSMAN

Last Thursday evening at Symphony Hall, Seiji Ozawa conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra---and numerous others---in a program consisting of just two works. The first was called "November Steps No. 1," by Japanese composer Toru Takemitsu, and it featured as solo instruments the biwa, somewhat akin to a lute, and the shakuhachi, a sort of recorder-flute. The piece is written atonally for solos and orchestra, which seems to be the main problem. Kinshi Tsuruta, the biwa player, and Katsuya Yokoyama, the shakuhachi artist, both played virtuoso Japanese solos after "November Steps," and it was evident from them that these are extremely modal instruments. To use them in an atonal setting as Takemitsu did, robbed them of their beauty and made the work uninspiring, if still well-played.

But the Takemitsu was really only a prelude to the main work of the evening, Carl Orff's "Carmina Burana." This is Orff's best-known and most popular work, and it is a collection of midieval Latin and German poems in the secular---indeed, sometimes almost obscene---tradition. The assemblage on stage was massive---the full orchestra; soprano, tenor, and baritone soloists; the New England Conservatory Chorus; and the NEC Children's Chorus. The work began unimpressively. I got the feeling that the orchestra, chorus, and baritone were struggling to make the piece beautiful, when it would have been so much better to just relax into its inherent beauty, and perform for the sheer joy of performing a beautiful work. The artists, certainly technically able, seemed unable to become part of the work. Parts dragged noticeably, were too heavy, too tied down---the work just did not take off like it should have. the rule rather than the exception.

For WHRB, this is John Zussman.

Marty Bookspan's review
as delivered on Channel 7
Friday 11pm news.

20.

11 PM NEWS FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 14, 1969 (ON FILM)
WNAC-TV

AUDIO

Good evening, everyone. There has been a lot of anguished hand-wringing of late concerning the future of the symphony orchestra and its relevance to our musical present. The Boston Symphony concerts this week-end offer the most positive answer possible to all this soul-searching. In the first place, the conductor this week and next is Seiji Ozawa, the young Japanese-born musician who is one of the most dynamic and interesting conductors now before the public. In the second place, the program: two 20th century works that have never before been played by the Boston Symphony: November Steps Number 1 by the Japanese composer, Toru Takemitsu; and Carmina Burana by the German, Carl Orff. And taking note that the programs this week-end are being given on the dates when many Americans are dedicating themselves to an active pursuit of peace, the concerts open with a section from the "Enigma" Variations of Elgar, dedicated by the musicians of the orchestra to the memory of those thousands of young Americans who have given their lives in the struggle.

The Takemitsu work is scored for a large orchestra and two exotic solo Japanese instruments, the biwa and the shakuhachi, the former a large lute-like instrument that is strummed with a large triangular sized pick - the latter a form of bamboo flute. It is an extremely atmospheric score, with long sections for the two solo instruments alternating with music for the orchestra. It was played brilliantly by all concerned, and after the performance Mr. Ozawa had both soloists perform more traditional Japanese music on their instruments so we could hear them in a more normal sound spectrum.

As to Carmina Burana, that hymn to the profane joys of wine, women and song - Mr. Ozawa conducted an absolutely electric performance. Assisting were the New England Conservatory Chorus and Children's Chorus and the three vocal soloists were Evelyn Mandac, soprano; Stanley Kolk, tenor; and Sherrill Milnes, baritone. All covered themselves with glory.

Yes indeed, there still is plenty of vitality in the Symphony Orchestra medium and in the Symphony concert. This is Martin Bookspan for Boston 7 News.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000
NOV 20 1969

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

OZAWA GUEST CONDUCTS BSO

Seiji Ozawa is guest at the Symphony for two weeks. His first offering last weekend was rather a pungent collation that saw the introduction here of the work of one of his better known contemporary countrymen composers, Toru Takemitsu, and, at last, the first Symphony performance of Carl Orff's "Carmina Burana".

Takemitsu's work is entitled "November Steps No. 1". It is an exercise in admixing of traditional western instrumentation with antique oriental instruments, in this instance a Japanese bamboo flute called a shakuhachi and a large lute-like string instrument called the biwa. The orchestra was small and treated in chamber music style, and in fact provided a somewhat unrelated context for a series of solos and duets by the two instruments.

Takemitsu's music is avant garde in the manner of one of his masters, John Cage, but still well this side of electronic. It has the brilliantly brought off tonal effects and the utter lack of profile so characteristic of composers writing in that vein. Though the result might not have been intentional, the interruption of the two solo instruments gave off at times a distinctly electronic music effect.

The soloists were Kinshi Tsuruta on the biwa and Katsuya Yokoyama on the shakuhachi, said to be in the great line of artists of their instruments. They appeared in formal Japanese costumes with ultimate amenity. Mr. Ozawa had each perform solo numbers as encores. Certainly the incredible series of sounds and manipulations on their instruments were something rare and genuinely excited the audience. How anyone not deeply immersed in Japanese music making tradition, however, could adjudge the true quality of their performance or undergo a meaningful aesthetic experience from their playing is another matter. The sharp crossing of cultures can be a difficult thing, and here is one listener, at least, who had some trouble in suspending his disbelief in making Symphony Hall into a Teahouse of the August Moon.

Orff's "Carmina Burana" is one of those works that has had immense popularity in Europe, particularly Germany, and is now making considerable headway in this country since it was first introduced in San Francisco fifteen years ago. The piece consists of settings of "secular" poems of the thirteenth century taken from scores discovered in a Benedictine monastery in South Bavaria. Orff calls it a scenic cantata. It is in three sections called "Spring", "The Tavern" and "Love" and sung by a chorus and three soloists to a text written in low Latin and low German. Quite often it is accompanied by mime and dances. I have put quotes around the word "secular" because the doings celebrated in the text are thoroughly erotic, and one wonders what kind of life those old Benedictines must have lived.

Orff, as many people uncomfortably know, composed straight through Hitler's Germany and was one of the more celebrated musical figures of the Third Reich. In all fairness to him, there is very little information about his ideological prepossession other than he did not leave the country. However, his work in no small part reflects a cultural barrenness of the era. Thus, in a sort of a perverse way it is a tribute to the man's capacities that his compositions, particularly "Carmina Burana", have managed to keep being played to this day.

The music is abrupt, totalling lacking in counterpoint and harmonically tepid. Through it runs the idea that if a theme, however banal, is repeated with sufficient insistency, that theme may acquire some sort of musical credibility. There is an improbable union of Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex" and almost any Puccini you could name. Notably the drinking songs have a certain roistering vitality, and I must confess that on balance the piece held my attention. Having experienced it once, though, I would not easily exert myself to hear it again.

The soloists were Evelyn Mandac, soprano, Stanley Kolk, tenor, and Sherrill Milnes, baritone, and the choruses were from the New England Conservatory, with Lorna Cooke de Varon director, with a special children's chorus prepared by Katherine Edmonds Pusztai. The soloists were rather an uneven trio. Miss Mandac's voice was sweet and clear but lacking in strength and color. Mr. Kolk's tenor was less than first rate, while Sherrill Milnes' baritone had a great deal of force and authority in the middle registers but fell off in tone and authority in the upper ones. He was, though, the most commanding figure among the three. The choruses were absolutely great—full of vim, sharp articulation and a fervor and conviction that was more than the music deserved. The same can be said for the efforts of Mr. Ozawa.

The concert opened with the haunting "Nimrod" from Elgar's "Enigma Variations", as the acknowledgement of the management and players to the November 14, 15 demonstrations for peace. There was in the doing courage, nobility and sensitivity, and all concerned deserved the highest commendations.

This week Mr. Ozawa conducts an all Stravinsky program, which works include "Greeting Prelude", 1911 version of "Petrushka", violin concerto, and the "Firebird" Suite. Joseph Silverstein will be the violin soloist.

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Then came "Olim lacus colueram," a brilliantly written solo in which the tenor sings the part of a swan who is being roasted on a spit and served at a banquet. Stanley Kolk, the tenor soloist, sang it not as a virtuoso solo but as the miserable swan, and it was not only haunting and beautiful but it inspired the chorus and orchestra to also get into the spirit of the work. From that moment on, an electric atmosphere began to build in the hall. The artists finally got into the work, made it the joyous homage to life, love, and art that "Carmina" is in its finest moments. The Conservatory Chorus came to life, although it was weak in certain parts; the orchestra played as if they were enjoying it. Evelyn Mandac, the soprano soloist, sang with a relish for the part she was playing; and Mr. Ozawa brought the whole thing together into a unified well-communicated conception of the work as a whole. It was amazing how much more powerful the "Fortuna" section was at the end of the work than at the beginning. Only the baritone, Sherrill Milnes, failed to get into the spirit of the work; he sang solos and not "Carmina."

The audience walked out Thursday night knowing that they had witnessed thirty minutes of a remarkable performance---not, of course, without giving a standing ovation to Seiji Ozawa, who is certainly one of the outstanding young conductors of this decade. One wishes that this type of joy in performing and communicating might become the rule rather than the exception.

For WHRB, this is John Zussman.

Marty Bookspan's review

as delivered on Channel 7

Friday 11pm news.

20.

11 PM NEWS FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 14, 1969 (ON FILM)

WNAC-TV

AUDIO

Good evening, everyone. There has been a lot of anguished hand-wringing of late concerning the future of the symphony orchestra and its relevance to our musical present. The Boston Symphony concerts this week-end offer the most positive answer possible to all this soul-searching. In the first place, the conductor this week and next is Seiji Ozawa, the young Japanese-born musician who is one of the most dynamic and interesting conductors now before the public. In the second place, the program: two 20th century works that have never before been played by the Boston Symphony: November Steps Number 1 by the Japanese composer, Toru Takemitsu; and Carmina Burana by the German, Carl Orff. And taking note that the programs this week-end are being given on the dates when many Americans are dedicating thmselves to an active pursuit of peace, the concerts open with a section from the "Enigma" Variations of Elgar, dedicated by the musicians of the orchestra to the memory of those thousands of young Americans who have given their lives in the struggle.

The Takemitsu work is scored for a large orchestra and two exotic solo Japanese instruments, the biwa and the shakuhachi, the former a large lute-like instrument that is strummed with a large triangular sized pick - the latter a form of bamboo flute. It is an extremely atmospheric score, with long sections for the two solo instruments alternating with music for the orchestra. It was played brilliantly by all concerned, and after the performance Mr. Ozawa had both soloists perform more traditional Japanese music on their instruments so we could hear them in a more normal sound spectrum.

As to Carmina Burana, that hymn to the profane joys of wine, women and song - Mr. Ozawa conducted an absolutely electric performance. Assisting were the New England Conservatory Chorus and Children's Chorus and the three vocal soloists were Evelyn Mandac, soprano; Stanley Kolk, tenor; and Sherrill Milnes, baritone. All covered themselves with glory.

Yes indeed, there still is plenty of vitality in the Symphony Orchestra medium and in the Symphony concert This is Martin Bookspan for Boston 7 News.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

NOV 20 1969

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

OZAWA GUEST CONDUCTS BSO

Seiji Ozawa is guest at the Symphony for two weeks. His first offering last weekend was rather a pungent collation that saw the introduction here of the work of one of his better known contemporary countrymen composers, Toru Takemitsu, and, at last, the first Symphony performance of Carl Orff's "Carmina Burana".

Takemitsu's work is entitled "November Steps No. 1". It is an exercise in admixing of traditional western instrumentation with antique oriental instruments, in this instance a Japanese bamboo flute called a shakuhachi and a large lute-like string instrument called the biwa. The orchestra was small and treated in chamber music style, and in fact provided a somewhat unrelated context for a series of solos and duets by the two instruments.

Takemitsu's music is avant garde in the manner of one of his masters, John Cage, but still well this side of electronic. It has the brilliantly brought off tonal effects and the utter lack of profile so characteristic of composers writing in that vein. Though the result might not have been intentional, the interruption of the two solo instruments gave off at times a distinctly electronic music effect.

The soloists were Kinshi Tsuruta on the biwa and Katsuya Yokoyama on the shakuhachi, said to be in the great line of artists of their instruments. They appeared in formal Japanese costumes with ultimate amenity. Mr. Ozawa had each perform solo numbers as encores. Certainly the incredible series of sounds and manipulations on their instruments were something rare and genuinely excited the audience. How anyone not deeply immersed in Japanese music making tradition, however, could adjudge the true quality of their performance or undergo a meaningful aesthetic experience from their playing is another matter. The sharp crossing of cultures can be a difficult thing, and here is one listener, at least, who had some trouble in suspending his disbelief in making Symphony Hall into a Teahouse of the August Moon.

Orff's "Carmina Burana" is one of those works that has had immense popularity in Europe, particularly Germany, and is now making considerable headway in this country since it was first introduced in San Francisco fifteen years ago. The piece consists of settings of "secular" poems of the thirteenth century taken from scores discovered in a Benedictine monastery in South Bavaria. Orff calls it a scenic cantata. It is in three sections called "Spring", "The Tavern" and "Love" and sung by a chorus and three soloists to a text written in low Latin and low German. Quite often it is accompanied by mime and dances. I have put quotes around the word "secular" because the doings celebrated in the text are thoroughly erotic, and one wonders what kind of life those old Benedictines must have lived.

Orff, as many people uncomfortably know, composed straight through Hitler's Germany and was one of the more celebrated musical figures of the Third Reich. In all fairness to him, there is very little information about his ideological prepossession other than he did not leave the country. However, his work in no small part reflects a cultural barrenness of the era. Thus, in a sort of a perverse way it is a tribute to the man's capacities that his compositions, particularly "Carmina Burana", have managed to keep being played to this day.

The music is abrupt, totalling lacking in counterpoint and harmonically tepid. Through it runs the idea that if a theme, however banal, is repeated with sufficient insistency, that theme may acquire some sort of musical credibility. There is an improbable union of Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex" and almost any Puccini you could name. Notably the drinking songs have a certain roistering vitality, and I must confess that on balance the piece held my attention. Having experienced it once, though, I would not easily exert myself to hear it again.

The soloists were Evelyn Mandac, soprano, Stanley Kolk, tenor, and Sherrill Milnes, baritone, and the choruses were from the New England Conservatory, with Lorna Cooke de Varon director, with a special children's chorus prepared by Katherine Edmonds Pusztai. The soloists were rather an uneven trio. Miss Mandac's voice was sweet and clear but lacking in strength and color. Mr. Kolk's tenor was less than first rate, while Sherrill Milnes' baritone had a great deal of force and authority in the middle registers but fell off in tone and authority in the upper ones. He was, though, the most commanding figure among the three. The choruses were absolutely great—full of vim, sharp articulation and a fervor and conviction that was more than the music deserved. The same can be said for the efforts of Mr. Ozawa.

The concert opened with the haunting "Nimrod" from Elgar's "Enigma Variations", as the acknowledgement of the management and players to the November 14, 15 demonstrations for peace. There was in the doing courage, nobility and sensitivity, and all concerned deserved the highest commendations.

This week Mr. Ozawa conducts an all Stravinsky program, which works include "Greeting Prelude", 1911 version of "Petrushka", violin concerto, and the "Firebird" Suite. Joseph Silverstein will be the violin soloist.

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Tuesday evening November 18 1969 at 8.30
Thursday evening November 20 1969 at 8.30

SEIJI OZAWA conductor

TAKEMITSU — November steps no. 1
KINSHI TSURUTA biwa
KATSUYA YOKOYAMA shakuhachi

intermission

ORFF — Carmina Burana
Fortuna imperatrix mundi
(Luck, empress of the world)
Primo vere (In springtime)
Uf dem Anger (On the green)
In taberna (In the tavern)
Cour d'amours (Court of love)
Blanziflor et Helena (Blanchefleur and Helen)
Fortuna imperatrix mundi
(Luck, empress of the world)

EVELYN MANDAC soprano
STANLEY KOLK tenor
SHERRILL MILNES baritone
NEW ENGLAND CONSERVATORY CHORUS
Lorna Cooke de Varon conductor
CHILDREN'S CHORUS OF THE NEW ENGLAND CONSERVATORY
Katherine Edmonds Pusztai conductor

B.S.O. CARMINA 11/20/69
WHRB REVIEW BY JOHN ZUSSMAN

Last Thursday evening at Symphony Hall, Seiji Ozawa conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra---and numerous others---in a program consisting of just two works. The first was called "November Steps No. 1," by Japanese composer Toru Takemitsu, and it featured as solo instruments the biwa, somewhat akin to a lute, and the shakuhachi, a sort of recorder-flute. The piece is written atonally for solos and orchestra, which seems to be the main problem. Kinshi Tsuruta, the biwa player, and Katsuya Yokoyama, the shakuhachi artist, both played virtuoso Japanese solos after "November Steps," and it was evident from them that these are extremely modal instruments. To use them in an atonal setting as Takemitsu did, robbed them of their beauty and made the work uninspiring, if still well-played.

But the Takemitsu was really only a prelude to the main work of the evening, Carl Orff's "Carmina Burana." This is Orff's best-known and most popular work, and it is a collection of midieval Latin and German poems in the secular---indeed, sometimes almost obscene---tradition. The assemblage on stage was massive---the full orchestra; soprano, tenor, and baritone soloists; the New England Conservatory Chorus; and the NEC Children's Chorus. The work began unimpressively. I got the feeling that the orchestra, chorus, and baritone were struggling to make the piece beautiful, when it would have been so much better to just relax into its inherent beauty, and perform for the sheer joy of performing a beautiful work. The artists, certainly technically able, seemed unable to become part of the work. Parts dragged noticeably, were too heavy, too tied down---the work just did not take off like it should have, the rule rather than the exception.

For WHRB, this is John Zussman.

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Friday afternoon November 21 1969 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening November 22 1969 at 8.30
Tuesday evening November 25 1969 at 8.30

SEIJI OZAWA conductor

STRAVINSKY

Greeting prelude (for the eightieth birthday of Pierre Monteux)

Petrushka (revised version of 1947)*
- The Shrove – tide fair
- Petrushka's cell
- The Moor's cell
- The fair (towards evening)

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS piano

intermission

Violin concerto in D (1931)*
- Toccata
- Aria 1
- Aria 2
- Capriccio

JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN

Suite from the ballet 'L'oiseau de feu' (The firebird) (1919)*
- Introduction – the Firebird and its dance – variation of the Firebird
- The round of the Princesses
- Infernal dance of King Kashchei
- Lullaby
- Finale

BSO conductor Steinberg ill

047

William Steinberg, music director of the Boston and Pittsburgh symphony orchestras, has been hospitalized for the second time this season. The 70-year-old conductor is in Presbyterian Hospital, Pittsburgh, having been taking ill in New York city during a series of Pittsburgh Symphony concerts there.

Last Oct. 22, Steinberg became ill while in New York with the Boston Symphony, was unable to finish one concert, and cancelled three others.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has guest conductors at the moment, and Steinberg is not scheduled to conduct here until Dec. 19. The Pittsburgh Symphony is now on a mid-Western tour, which has been taken over by Assistant Condutcor Henry Mazer.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

NOV 20 1969 New Engla

Stravinsky Concert A Bit Too Lengthy

11-22-69

By L. DAVID HARRIS
Music Critic

It was Stravinsky all the way in yesterday's Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert. However, it's one thing to get a comfortable amount of Stravinsky, quite another to be inundated with him.

But inundated it was. Guest Conductor Seiji Ozawa led the program and as in last week's concert his conducting was distinguished in its clarity and directness — and he was distinguished in his personal charm.

A few comments:

Stravinsky's "Greeting Prelude": Stravinsky called it a "ridiculously gay little tune." The gaiety wasn't that apparent and as the program notes warned, it is "too short to make much effect."

Stravinsky's "Petrushka": Assistant Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas was the piano soloist. The music's performance was distinguished by excellent work by percussionists, solo bassoon, trumpet, flute-piccolo. The "Petrushka chord" (a C-major arpeggio over a F-sharp major arpeggio) wasn't always as vivid as it might have been although Thomas' cascades of piano arpeggios seemed quite in order — in good style.

Perhaps "Petrushka" was most appreciated because of its strong tonal qualities which a large orchestra such as the BSO can make so meaningful. However, at the same time, the music didn't seem to have as much fire and imagination as one might have expected.

Stravinsky's "Violin Concerto in D": Violin soloist Joseph Silverstein brilliantly performed the concerto — and it sounded quite difficult.

Indeed, it was as if a piano concerto had been lifted and placed upon the shoulders of a violinist — determined to overwork him. This seemed the case with Silverstein as he diligently made the most of the work — lyrically and technically.

It had the style of a Bach sonata, but it wasn't the listening expereince of Bach — or any other of the masters.

Stravinsky's "Fire Bird" music: It seemed a bit disappointing, but probably only because it was preceded by "Petrushka," the violin concerto, etc. "Fire Bird" is a work where things are continually moving and has a tremendous rhythmic vitality. These qualities often were apparent (particularly at the end) but not always.

Summarizing: It was a fine concert, but too much of Stravinsky wore thin on this reviewer.

And it seemed that way for much of the audience. For instance at the concert's midpoint after "Petrushka," the audience was enthusiastic, cheering.

At the concert's end, after "Fire Bird," the audience applauded politely, apparently ready to go home.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

NOV 22 1969 New Engla

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

NOV 24 1969 New Engla

21.

Stravinsky concerto right for Silverstein

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

Stravinsky's Violin Concerto, which Joseph Silverstein played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday afternoon, is surely, among concertos, the most winning and lovely piece of high comedy since Mozart.

It is a fascinating package likenesses and contrasts. All four movements use the same three-note chord D-E-A, in a very special, Stravinskian spacing, as a point of departure. The Toccata and Capriccio, both with busy 16ths in a bright D major, make a frame for the two Arias which are so different from that frame and from each other, the first of them elegant with a touch of something that is playful and almost parodistic, the other one of those gravely eloquent, highly embellished songs we find in the Concertos of Bach.

The very sonority of Stravinsky's Concerto is a constant source of delight. It is curious, too, in that an unusually large orchestra is used to produce a sound of uncommon delicacy. Moreover, Stravinsky develops a most wittily concevied set of relationships between solo and orchestra with the latter constantly producing offers from this or that source to play Double Concerto. Not least, a page like the second aria is a particularly keen reminder that its composer is the most inspired melodist our century has produced.

Silverstein is an ideal soloist for the work. His playing is elegantly effortless, and he has the phenomenal bow arm that Stravinsky's perhaps unconventional but beautifully violinist writing demands. He has the intelligence and the humor, and, for its greater economy and stylishness, his performance Friday was even more impressive altogether than the fine ones he played under Erich Leinsdorf in 1963 and 1965.

Altogether, though, the piece went less well this time because there was not that crispness in the orchestral playing nor that close ensemble operation that I still remember vividly from a broadcast in 1963 and which you can hear on the RCA record that was made two years later. Seiji Ozawa, who conducted Friday, produced an accompaniment that was sometimes too heavy for a soloist with so delicate a tone as Silverstein's, and, to still more damaging effect, the orchestral context lacked bite and was generally diffuse.

It was disappointing, and so was the whole concert really. The program was all Stravinsky, and, with his record of "The Rite of Spring," Ozawa has demonstrated his specific gifts as a Stravinsky conductor. This time, he just seemed not to have things in hand. Except in the Lullaby and part of the finale of the 1919 "Firebird" Suite, when the playing came alive and was shapely, everything tended to be slack, unfocussed, vague in rhythm and orchestral ensemble. Performances drifted, and rather than ending they just stopped, to the point where the audience found it hard to be persuaded that "Petrushka" was really over and that it was time to applaud, even though Ozawa had used the concert finish with the bang.

Besides "Petrushka," which Ozawa played in the 1947 revision and complete (except for the concert ending, which omits the most touching music in the score), the "Firebird" Suite, and the Violin Concerto, the program included the Greeting Prelude, the charming and ingenious 45-second exploration of "Happy Birthday" that Stravinsky concocted for Pierre Monteux's 80th birthday.

Michael Tilson Thomas contributed some distinguished piano playing to "Petrushka," and Doriot Anthony Dwyer played the "charlatan" flute solo beautifully. The delicacy of Roger Voisin's incidental trumpet solos in the Violin Concerto was a pleasure, but otherwise the playing was generally undistinguished and dispirited sounding.

Audience reception, unlike at the ends of the two Giulini programs for throughout Ozawa's first, was, though not unfriendly, definitely on the calm side.

Ozawa's Conducting 'Inaccurate and Indifferent'

By GEORGE GELLES
HT Music Critc

Seiji Ozawa, who started his second week at Symphony Hall with the Boston Symphony yesterday, has shrunk from a lightweight with carm and a real elegance to a conductor whose performances are technically inaccurate and emotionally indifferent.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216.305 (S) 298,557

NOV 22 1969

Last week, the sheer bustle of Carl Orff's "Carmina Burana" managed to conceal Ozawa considerably, but the current all-Stravinsky program is shameless in exposing his faults.

Even more than the music-making, Ozawa's engagement here has been notably undistinguished in its programs. Orff is a composer with footnote significance, and even if "Carmina" can be made entertaining, it is essentially empty.

THIS WEEK Ozawa's choice of Stravinsky is almost entirely lacking in substance — we got both the "Firebird" and "Petrushka" suites, the Violin Concerto, and the "Greeting Prelude," an arrangement of "Happy Birthday" written in honor of Pierre Monteux. The picture this program gives of Stravinsky is seriously distorted, for there's obviously far more to our foremost composer than the early ballets, the Bach-modeled Concerto and the inconsequential birthday piece.

Incidentally, both ballet suites are being recorded, as was "Carmina." Questions suggest themselves. Who is making the BSO programs. RCA or the management, and since it seems that RCA obviously had a say, is it fair to Symphony subscribers if the orchestra refuses its responsibility of raising the level of public taste, and instead spends its time and energies in pursuit of LP best sellers?

Whatever distinction yesterday's concert had was given it by concertmaster Joseph Silverstein's playing of the Concerto. Even though I would have preffered a solo part more vivid and highly characterized, Silverstein's work was technically expert, highly musical throughout, and in the Second Aria really beautiful and touching.

BUT IT WASN'T MUCH of a performance because of Azawa's tepid direction. I found it fascinating that in this piece, and in "Petrushka" and the "Greeting Prelude" as well, the audience was hard put to sense when the work had ended. In every case, Ozawa had to step from the podium and shake some hands before the applause would start. And this is terribly indicative of the conducting, of its structural naivete, its lack of musical focus and sense of purpose.

The orchestral accompaniment in the Concerto sounded not only under-rehearsed, but unthought-out. It was monochromatic, weak in inflection and nuance, without personality. And I'm sure the BSO men reflected Ozawa's ordinary leadership, for playing was in general spiritless, intonation faulty and far too many notes were missed.

Neither of the ballets went very well. Phrases were turned in routine fashion, dynamics smoothed out, the texture flaccid, and timing and pacing — which when sensitively done would have presented the pieces as structures in sound — nonexistent.

IN "FIREBIRD," for instance, at the close of the "Ronde de Princesses,' the piccolo, oboe, clarinet and horn exchange phrases with one another in brief and tender conversation. But the talk was made meaningless, for Ozawa dropped beats, cheating measures of their due, and always rushed in the ensuing entrance.

Or in the 'Danse Infernale' of "Firebird;" here we find low brasses and winds ripping rudely through the orchestral fabric with syncopations marked "fff.' Like so much else, this passage was underplayed dynamically and rhythmically unstable. If record collectors are hunting for yet another "Firebird," unlikely as it seems, I can't see that Ozawa's will be the answer, for the performance showed him uncommitted, unconvincing, far less good than he once was.

Stravinsky and Ozawa

A 'singing telegram' delivered at Symphony Hall, with Silverstein as a soloist 'to the manner born'

By Louis Snyder

It was a weekend of Stravinsky for the Boston Symphony with Seiji Ozawa directing a program that concentrated on some of the composer's less startling works among the orchestra's past performances.

First of all on Friday afternoon was the Greeting prelude, a minipiece which must have taken a few nonreaders of program notes by surprise. It was the composer's "singing telegram" to Pierre Monteux on the occasion of his 80th birthday in 1955, celebrated by a pension concert conducted by Monteux—that is, except for Stravinsky's musical wishes and some from Darius Milhaud, conducted by Charles Munch. Stravinsky has some fun with the "Happy Birthday" tune, but it's over almost faster than you can say—happy birthday.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

NOV 24 1969

The rafters ring

Then came "Petrushka," 1947 version, which means that the composer reworked the instrumentation of his 1911 ballet score without changing the music itself. It is, of course, a wonderfully colorful and vigorous musical inspiration, full of images for the mind to supply if none had previously been put there by a stage performance. Mr. Ozawa made the Symphony Hall rafters ring with it in the Fair passages particularly. Michael Tilson Thomas's piano contributions were neatly etched, as were those of the several solo instrumentalists.

In the Violin Concerto in D, Joseph Silverstein was the soloist as he had been in the last previous performances by the orchestra to his style and tone, and he played it to the to his style and tone, and the played it to the manner born.

To conclude, Mr. Ozawa chose the second of three suites that Stravinsky made (in 1919) from his earlier ballet score, "The Firebird." Although time has made it sound practically traditional in comparison to the progressive composer's later output, this music must have set the ears tingling in 1910. The orchestra played it beautifully for Mr. Ozawa, who had designed a soaring, declarative reading.

THE SOLOIST

JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1962, joined the Orchestra seven years earlier at the age of twenty-three, the youngest member at that time. Born in Detroit, he studied at the Curtis Institute in Philadelphia, and later with Joseph Gingold and Mischa Mischakoff. He was a prize winner in the 1959 Queen Elisabeth of Belgium International Competition, and a year later won the Naumberg Foundation Award. Before coming to Boston he played in the orchestras of Houston, Denver and Philadelphia.

Joseph Silverstein has established an international reputation as soloist and as first violin of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players. In 1967 he led their tour to the Soviet Union, Germany and England, and last spring a tour to the Virgin Islands and Florida. During past seasons he has performed with the Orchestra concertos by Bartók and Stravinsky (which he has recorded for RCA), and by Bach, Beethoven, Brahms, Bruch, Schoenberg and Sibelius; the Brahms he also played with Leopold Stokowski and the American Symphony Orchestra in New York. During the 1969 Berkshire Festival he played the solo violin part in works by Bach, Bartók and Haydn, and conducted a concert at Tanglewood by the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra. Earlier this season he played the solo violin part in performances of Robert Starer's Concerto for violin, cello and orchestra.

Violinist of the Boston Symphony String Trio, Joseph Silverstein is also organizer of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, a faculty member of the New England Conservatory and Chairman of the Faculty of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood. He recently received an honorary Doctorate of Music from Tufts University.

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Friday afternoon November 21 1969 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening November 22 1969 at 8.30
Tuesday evening November 25 1969 at 8.30

SEIJI OZAWA conductor

STRAVINSKY

Greeting prelude (for the eightieth birthday of Pierre Monteux)

Petrushka (revised version of 1947)*
- The Shrove – tide fair
- Petrushka's cell
- The Moor's cell
- The fair (towards evening)

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS piano

intermission

Violin concerto in D (1931)*
- Toccata
- Aria 1
- Aria 2
- Capriccio

JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN

Suite from the ballet 'L'oiseau de feu' (The firebird) (1919)*
- Introduction – the Firebird and its dance – variation of the Firebird
- The round of the Princesses
- Infernal dance of King Kashchei
- Lullaby
- Finale

BSO conductor Steinberg ill

William Steinberg, music director of the Boston and Pittsburgh symphony orchestras, has been hospitalized for the second time this season. The 70-year-old conductor is in Presbyterian Hospital, Pittsburgh, having been taking ill in New York city during a series of Pittsburgh Symphony concerts there.

Last Oct. 22, Steinberg became ill while in New York with the Boston Symphony, was unable to finish one concert, and cancelled three others.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has guest conductors at the moment, and Steinberg is not scheduled to conduct here until Dec 19. The Pittsburgh Symphony is now on a mid-Western tour, which has been taken over by Assistant Conductor Henry Mazer.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,7
(S) 566,377

NOV 20 1969

Stravinsky Concert A Bit Too Lengthy

By L. DAVID HARRIS
Music Critic

It was Stravinsky all the way in yesterday's Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert. However, it's one thing to get a comfortable amount of Stravinsky, quite another to be inundated with him.

But inundated it was. Guest Conductor Seiji Ozawa led the program and as in last week's concert his conducting was distinguished in its clarity and directness — and he was distinguished in his personal charm.

A few comments:

Stravinsky's "Greeting Prelude": Stravinsky called it a "ridiculously gay little tune." The gaiety wasn't that apparent and as the program notes warned, it is "too short to make much effect."

Stravinsky's "Petrushka": Assistant Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas was the piano soloist. The music's performance was distinguished by excellent work by percussionists, solo bassoon, trumpet, flute-piccolo. The "Petrushka chord" (a C-major arpeggio over a F-sharp major arpeggio) wasn't always as vivid as it might have been although Thomas' cascades of piano arpeggios seemed quite in order — in good style.

Perhaps "Petrushka" was most appreciated because of its strong tonal qualities which a large orchestra such as the BSO can make so meaningful. However, at the same time, the music didn't seem to have as much fire and imagination as one might have expected.

Stravinsky's "Violin Concerto in D": Violin soloist Joseph Silverstein brilliantly performed the concerto — and it sounded quite difficult.

Indeed, it was as if a piano concerto had been lifted and placed upon the shoulders of a violinist — determined to overwork him. This seemed the case with Silverstein as he diligently made the most of the work — lyrically and technically.

It had the style of a Bach sonata, but it wasn't the listening expereince of Bach — or any other of the masters.

Stravinsky's "Fire Bird" music: It seemed a bit disappointing, but probably only because it was preceded by "Petrushka," the violin concerto, etc. "Fire Bird" is a work where things are continually moving and has a tremendous rhythmic vitality. These qualities often were apparent (particularly at the end) but not always.

Summarizing: It was a fine concert, but too much of Stravinsky wore thin on this reviewer.

And it seemed that way for much of the audience. For instance at the concert's midpoint after "Petrushka," the audience was enthusiastic, cheering.

At the concert's end, after "Fire Bird," the audience applauded politely, apparently ready to go home.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,7
(S) 566,377

NOV 22 1969

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,7
(S) 566,377

NOV 24 1969

Stravinsky concerto right for Silverstein

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

Stravinsky's Violin Concerto, which Joseph Silverstein played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday afternoon, is surely, among concertos, the most winning and lovely piece of high comedy since Mozart.

It is a fascinating package likenesses and contrasts. All four movements use the same three-note chord D-E-A, in a very special, Stravinskian spacing, as a point of departure. The Toccata and Capriccio, both with busy 16ths in a bright D major, make a frame for the two Arias which are so different from that frame and from each other, the first of them elegant with a touch of something that is playful and almost parodistic, the other one of those gravely eloquent, highly embellished songs we find in the Concertos of Bach.

The very sonority of Stravinsky's Concerto is a constant source of delight. It is curious, too, in that an unusually large orchestra is used to produce a sound of uncommon delicacy. Moreover, Stravinsky develops a most wittily concevied set of relationships between solo and orchestra with the latter constantly producing offers from this or that source to play Double Concerto. Not least, a page like the second aria is a particularly keen reminder that its composer is the most inspired melodist our century has produced.

Silverstein is an ideal soloist for the work. His playing is elegantly effortless, and he has the phenomenal bow arm that Stravinsky's perhaps unconventional but beautifully violinist writing demands. He has the intelligence and the humor, and, for its greater economy and stylishness, his performance Friday was even more impressive altogether than the fine ones he played under Erich Leinsdorf in 1963 and 1965.

Altogether, though, the piece went less well this time because there was not that crispness in the orchestral playing nor that close ensemble operation that I still remember vividly from a broadcast in 1963 and which you can hear on the RCA record that was made two years later. Seiji Ozawa, who conducted Friday, produced an accompaniment that was sometimes too heavy for a soloist with so delicate a tone as Silverstein's, and, to still more damaging effect, the orchestral context lacked bite and was generally diffuse.

It was disappointing, and so was the whole concert really. The program was all Stravinsky, and, with his record of "The Rite of Spring," Ozawa has demonstrated his specific gifts as a Stravinsky conductor. This time, he just seemed not to have things in hand. Except in the Lullaby and part of the finale of the 1919 "Firebird" Suite, when the playing came alive and was shapely, everything tended to be slack, unfocussed, vague in rhythm and orchestral ensemble. Performances drifted, and rather than ending they just stopped, to the point where the audience found it hard to be persuaded that "Petrushka" was really over and that it was time to applaud, even though Ozawa had used the concert finish with the bang.

Besides "Petrushka," which Ozawa played in the 1947 revision and complete (except for the concert ending, which omits the most touching music in the score), the "Firebird" Suite, and the Violin Concerto, the program included the Greeting Prelude, the charming and ingenious 45-second exploration of "Happy Birthday" that Stravinsky concocted for Pierre Monteux's 80th birthday.

Michael Tilson Thomas contributed some distinguished piano playing to "Petrushka," and Doriot Anthony Dwyer played the "charlatan" flute solo beautifully. The delicacy of Roger Voisin's incidental trumpet solos in the Violin Concerto was a pleasure, but otherwise the playing was generally undistinguished and dispirited sounding.

Audience reception, unlike at the ends of the two Giulini programs for throughout Ozawa's first, was, though not unfriendly, definitely on the calm side.

Ozawa's Conducting 'Inaccurate and Indifferent'

By GEORGE GELLES
HT Music Critc

Seiji Ozawa, who started his second week at Symphony Hall with the Boston Symphony yesterday, has shrunk from a lightweight with carm and a real elegance to a conductor whose performances are technically inaccurate and emotionally indifferent.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

NOV 22 1969

Last week, the sheer bustle of Carl Orff's "Carmina Burana" managed to conceal Ozawa considerably, but the current all-Stravinsky program is shameless in exposing his faults.

Even more than the music-making, Ozawa's engagement here has been notably undistinguished in its programs. Orff is a composer with footnote significance, and even if "Carmina" can be made entertaining, it is essentially empty.

THIS WEEK Ozawa's choice of Stravinsky is almost entirely lacking in substance — we got both the "Firebird" and "Petrushka" suites, the Violin Concerto, and the "Greeting Prelude," an arrangement of "Happy Birthday" written in honor of Pierre Monteux. The picture this program gives of Stravinsky is seriously distorted, for there's obviously far more to our foremost composer than the early ballets, the Bach-modeled Concerto and the inconsequential birthday piece.

Incidentally, both ballet suites are being recorded, as was "Carmina." Questions suggest themselves. Who is making the BSO programs. RCA or the management, and since it seems that RCA obviously had a say, is it fair to Symphony subscribers if the orchestra refuses its responsibility of raising the level of public taste, and instead spends its time and energies in pursuit of LP best sellers?

Whatever distinction yesterday's concert had was given it by concertmaster Joseph Silverstein's playing of the Concerto. Even though I would have preffered a solo part more vivid and highly characterized, Silverstein's work was technically expert, highly musical throughout, and in the Second Aria really beautiful and touching.

BUT IT WASN'T MUCH of a performance because of Azawa's tepid direction. I found it fascinating that in this piece, and in "Petrushka" and the "Greeting Prelude" as well, the audience was hard put to sense when the work had ended. In every case, Ozawa had to step from the podium and shake some hands before the applause would start. And this is terribly indicative of the conducting, of its structural naivete, its lack of musical focus and sense of purpose.

The orchestral accompaniment in the Concerto sounded not only under-rehearsed, but unthought-out. It was monochromatic, weak in inflection and nuance, without personality. And I'm sure the BSO men reflected Ozawa's ordinary leadership, for playing was in general spiritless, intonation faulty and far too many notes were missed.

Neither of the ballets went very well. Phrases were turned in routine fashion, dynamics smoothed out, the texture flaccid, and timing and pacing — which when sensitively done would have presented the pieces as structures in sound — nonexistent.

IN "FIREBIRD," for instance, at the close of the "Ronde de Princesses,' the piccolo, oboe, clarinet and horn exchange phrases with one another in brief and tender conversation. But the talk was made meaningless, for Ozawa dropped beats, cheating measures of their due, and always rushed in the ensuing entrance.

Or in the 'Danse Infernale' of "Firebird;" here we find low brasses and winds ripping rudely through the orchestral fabric with syncopations marked 'fff.' Like so much else, this passage was underplayed dynamically and rhythmically unstable. If record collectors are hunting for yet another "Firebird," unlikely as it seems, I can't see that Ozawa's will be the answer, for the performance showed him uncommitted, unconvincing, far less good than he once was.

Stravinsky and Ozawa

A 'singing telegram' delivered at Symphony Hall, with Silverstein as a soloist 'to the manner born'

By Louis Snyder

It was a weekend of Stravinsky for the Boston Symphony with Seiji Ozawa directing a program that concentrated on some of the composer's less startling works among the orchestra's past performances.

First of all on Friday afternoon was the Greeting prelude, a minipiece which must have taken a few nonreaders of program notes by surprise. It was the composer's "singing telegram" to Pierre Monteux on the occasion of his 80th birthday in 1955, celebrated by a pension concert conducted by Monteux—that is, except for Stravinsky's musical wishes and some from Darius Milhaud, conducted by Charles Munch. Stravinsky has some fun with the "Happy Birthday" tune, but it's over almost faster than you can say—happy birthday.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

NOV 24 1969

The rafters ring

Then came "Petrushka," 1947 version, which means that the composer reworked the instrumentation of his 1911 ballet score without changing the music itself. It is, of course, a wonderfully colorful and vigorous musical inspiration, full of images for the mind to supply if none had previously been put there by a stage performance. Mr. Ozawa made the Symphony Hall rafters ring with it in the Fair passages particularly. Michael Tilson Thomas's piano contributions were neatly etched, as were those of the several solo instrumentalists.

In the Violin Concerto in D, Joseph Silverstein was the soloist as he had been in the last previous performances by the orchestra to his style and tone, and he played it to the to his style and tone, and the played it to the manner born.

To conclude, Mr. Ozawa chose the second of three suites that Stravinsky made (in 1919) from his earlier ballet score, "The Firebird." Although time has made it sound practically traditional in comparison to the progressive composer's later output, this music must have set the ears tingling in 1910. The orchestra played it beautifully for Mr. Ozawa, who had designed a soaring, declarative reading.

THE SOLOIST

JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1962, joined the Orchestra seven years earlier at the age of twenty-three, the youngest member at that time. Born in Detroit, he studied at the Curtis Institute in Philadelphia, and later with Joseph Gingold and Mischa Mischakoff. He was a prize winner in the 1959 Queen Elisabeth of Belgium International Competition, and a year later won the Naumberg Foundation Award. Before coming to Boston he played in the orchestras of Houston, Denver and Philadelphia.

Joseph Silverstein has established an international reputation as soloist and as first violin of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players. In 1967 he led their tour to the Soviet Union, Germany and England, and last spring a tour to the Virgin Islands and Florida. During past seasons he has performed with the Orchestra concertos by Bartók and Stravinsky (which he has recorded for RCA), and by Bach, Beethoven, Brahms, Bruch, Schoenberg and Sibelius; the Brahms he also played with Leopold Stokowski and the American Symphony Orchestra in New York. During the 1969 Berkshire Festival he played the solo violin part in works by Bach, Bartók and Haydn, and conducted a concert at Tanglewood by the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra. Earlier this season he played the solo violin part in performances of Robert Starer's Concerto for violin, cello and orchestra.

Violinist of the Boston Symphony String Trio, Joseph Silverstein is also organizer of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, a faculty member of the New England Conservatory and Chairman of the Faculty of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood. He recently received an honorary Doctorate of Music from Tufts University.

22.

Concert Features Stravinsky

By JOHN F. KYES
Gazette Music Critic

Gazette Review

BOSTON — Seiji Ozawa conducted an all-Stravinsky program last night in Symphony Hall, with Joseph Silverstein as soloist in the "Violin Concerto in D" (1931). The near-capacity audience was warm in its recalls for soloist and conductor.

Ozawa had the Boston Symphony Orchestra ~~producing its colorful best.~~ Two fairly familiar ballet scores gave the evening a friendly tinge which it might have lacked if loaded with more abstruse examples of Stravinsky's art.

Silverstein, never fazed by the intricacies of his solo task, played skillfully rather than sensationally. Interest was almost equally divided between the soloist and the orchestral score.

Unusual Titles

The four movements had unusual titles. "Toccata" was rhythmic, dancelike, but tossing and unsatisfied. "Aria 1" made me think the instruments were "weeping," in a rather noble way. "Aria 2" was more quiet and sustained, with interesting dovetailing between the soloist and ensemble. "Capriccio" was full of provocative tricks of rhythm.

The concert opened with 45 seconds of "Greeting Prelude," written in 1951 for Pierre Monteux's 80th birthday. It was a tossing around of the "Happy Birthday" tune, and meant very little last night, without the rotund and beloved maestro (who died five years ago) there to give it humanity and meaning.

Visual Element

"Petrushka" (Revised version of 1947) fairly screamed for the visual element of ballet. Its many dance themes needed personal form and color and identity. The characters of the puppets, Petrushka, the Moor and the Ballerina, offered programmatic opportunities, which Ozawa capitalized adroitly.

The suite from "The Firebird" (1919) got along much better without the aid of eye. Its themes seem more important individually than those of "Petrushka," and there is splendid contrast between the characters of the ballet.

Ozawa captured completely the exotic colorings and motions of the Firebird, and the sleek charm of the Princesses. The infernal dance of King Kashchei jumped us right out of our seat.

The final scene of the ballet found Stravinsky in a happy mood amid the pealing of joyous bells.

This was an evening of easy-to-take Stravinsky.

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901

NOV 26 1969

Ozawa conducts Stravinsky at BSO

by Ralph Locke

For years it was considered poor form in many circles to criticize any of Igor Stravinsky's works or, worse, to question the esteem of his music in general. But now there are indications that a re-evaluation of his work is in progress. Many musicians and students of music are becoming aware that, after working successfully within the framework of late Romanticism, Stravinsky created a style – often called neo-classicism – which emphasizes the outward aspects of a piece (the orchestration, the formal balance, the stylistic allusions at the expense of an inner emotional logic.

The difference between the spirit of early- and middle-period Stravinsky was demonstrated this weekend by Seiji Ozawa and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a concert at Symphony Hall. The main works on the program were the Violin Concerto (1931), with concert-master Joseph Silverstein as soloist, the 1947 version of the 1911 ballet Petrushka, and the Suite from the ballet The Firebird (1910, adapted in 1919).

The Violin Concerto inherently sounds pale in comparison to the more vrilliant and dynamic music written for Diaghilev's Russian Ballet, but the contrast was even more striking because of Ozawa's somewhat heavy-handed direction of the Concerto. Despite Silverstein's clear and subtle reading of the solo part, the conductor did not seem to be in sympathy with the dry, ultra-refined (over-refined?) wit of the concerto's end movements. Only in the expressive second Aria, did Ozawa's romantic temperament coincide with the composer's aims.

What was inappropriate for the Violin Concerto worked wonders in the two early ballets. The traditional sections of Petrushka – the First Tableau and the opening of the Fourth – plus the entire Firebird Suite showed that Ozawa understands the highly perfumed world of early Stravinsky. He communicated the shifting moods with such directness that the audience responded with a nearly unanimous full-throated cheer at the end of both works. The success Ozawa had with Firebird and Petrushka reminds us that, whatever Stravinsky's place in music was to become in future years, for one short decade – from 1910 to 1920 – he was one of the world's greatest living composers.

BOSTON AFTER DARK
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 7,500

NOV 26 1969

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

NOV 26 1969

BSO to perform long-deferred Berg work

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

"Did you see the wood after the thundershower?

All is in repose, gleams, and is more beautiful than before.

See, woman, you, too, need thundershowers!"

The poem is by the Viennese writer, Peter Altenberg, and it is the second of five that Alban Berg used for a set of songs with orchestra that he wrote in in 1912. The Altenberg Songs, though, had to wait till 1953 for their first complete performance.

They were introduced to Boston three years ago at a New England Conservatory concert (Carolyn Friguglietti, Frederik Prausnitz conducting), and this week-end they will be heard for the first time at concerts by the Boston Symphony (Evelyn Lear, Erich Leinsdorf conducting).

Their partial and aborted premiere in 1913 was the occasion of a famous scandal. The concert in Vienna included Webern's Six Pieces for Orchestra, Op. 6 (heard earlier this season at the BSO), Schoenberg's Chamber Symphony, some songs by Alexander von Zemlinsky, and it was to continue with two of the Berg songs and with Mahler's "Kindertotenlieder."

Schoenberg, who organized the concert, wanted just two pieces of the Berg cycle because there would not have been time to rehearse more, and he chose the second and third songs, not the pair Berg would have chosen.

Nobody seems to know just what happened. Perhaps the audience was already overwrought by what had been performed in the first half of the concert, perhaps it was the distinctly flavorful, if subtle, eroticism of the verse that offended (combined with Altenberg's generally scandalous reputation as a philanderer).

At any rate the audience went haywire, fistfights broke out, the police had to restore order, and neither the Berg, nor on that occasion the Mahler, was heard.

But what happened between 1913 and 1953? There is internal evidence in other Altenberg's poems that he and the future Mrs. Alban Berg had been lovers, and that the rather prudish lady, who was and remains scandalized by her husband's unfinished operatic masterpiece, "Lulu," was long reluctant to permit their performance.

Donald Harris, a composer who is Gunther Schuller's assitsant at the New England Conservatory and who is about to finish a biography of Berg, suggests another, and perhaps still more interesting, reason. The composition of the Altenberg songs was a real crisis in Berg's relationship with his teacher, Schoenberg. They were the first work Berg wrote away from Schoenberg, and not merely his first writing for orchestra, but his first attempt at any combination larger than string quartet and piano.

Schoenberg thought the songs excellent, but he was also infuriated by them and gave his then 27-year-old ex-pupil a terrific dressing down. Part of Schoenberg's genius as a teacher was his realization that Berg's powers as a composer would be fully realized only when he began working in large forms, and to him the Altenberg Songs were still another evasion by Berg of his true responsibilities.

Berg's subsequent development, of course, proved Schoenberg right.

Harris surmises that Berg's sensitiveness particularly about anything pertaining to Schoenberg, and his persistent self-doubts, made the Altenberg songs a work with unpleasant associations for him, and that he therefore chose not to have them sung. There was no question, says Harris, of not being able to get a performance; after the success of "Wozzeck" he could have had a performance pretty nearly anywhere, any time for the asking.

The Harris biography will use much material inaccessible to previous writers. This includes a set of letters — that are more informative than anything else we have about Berg's lessons with Schoenberg — which were addressed to "Miss Frida."

"Miss Frida" was Frida Semler, a Wellesley undergraduate, who spent a summer in Europe as a boarder at Berg's parents' house (Dr. Freud was another summer boarder), and who later became Mrs. Mortimer Seabury of Louisburg Square, now living in retirement in Antigua.

Why did the letters to Miss Frida stop? Mrs. Berg, says Harris.

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,387

NOV 26 1969

Ozawa's Stravinsky

By Peter Knapp

For his second series of guest appearances with the Boston Symphony, Seiji Ozawa fashioned an all-Stravinsky program.

"Safe" Stravinsky, built around the two early ballet scores, "The Firebird" (1910, with the performance of the 1919 suite), and "Petrushka" (1911, in the revised version of 1947). The slight, Beatle-locked Japanese conductor also programmed the Violin Concerto (1931) and the clever 45-second variations on "Happy Birthday" known as the "Greeting Prelude" composed for the occasion of Pierre Monteux' 80th birthday in 1955. While the name Igor Stravinsky may still be greeted with shudders among some BSO concert-goers, Ozawa stuck with established classics rather than Stravinsky's spikier later works.

Coarse 'Petrushka'

The ballet scores remain invigorating for their brilliant orchestrations, imagination, rhythmic invention (though nothing on the order of "Rite of Spring" and beyond), and melodic content. Yet they are not without their performance problems, and last night Ozawa seemed to encounter plenty in "Petrushka."

The first section, Shrovetide fair, was quite messy with some coarse playing, unhomogenized instrumental blend and strains of poor balance, mostly over-loud woodwinds. The middle two sections were more settled down, but when Ozawa returned to the fair there was malaise again and awkward rhythmic linkages. There were, however, excellent individual solos — Armando Ghitalla's trumpet, Doriot Anthony Dwyer's flute, Michael Tilson Thomas' piano work.

"Firebird" fortunately went better. It has not so many of the abrupt metrical changes, or touches of the grotesque, and Ozawa kept better order, delivered more rhythmic thrust and drew a lean, brilliant sound from an orchestra usually producing a weightier, richer blend.

Brilliant Violinist

But the real feature of the evening was Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein's playing of the Violin Concerto. It is a radiant work, fresh in treatment of the solo instrument and of the accompanying orchestra, structurally-cohesive and rich in melody and display work.

Essentially a soloist's work, it pares down a rather large orchestra — on the order of forces for a late Haydn symphony — to chamber-scaled comments in ingenious combinations of voicings. And the "motto" chords which Stravinsky introduces at the beginning of each movement, provides a strong unifying force.

SEIJI OZAWA
. . . youthful visitor

Silverstein played brilliantly — not only in technique, with the unusual demands Stravinsky makes on the soloist, but also in the sense and style of the piece. The outer movements were light and spry, and Silverstein's playing managed to be consistently more pungent than the accompaniment's encouraging banter.

In the two Arias forming the slow middle movements, Silverstein displayed perceptive phrasing and unfailingly beautiful line (Aria II has a transcendent Bach-like melody and the kind of delicious embellishments Stravinsky was to use later in "The Rake's Progress").

ERICH LEINSDORF returns to the Boston Symphony orchestra for the ~~first time~~ since he retired as music director, when he will guest conduct on Nov. 28 at 2 p.m. and Nov. 29 at 8:30 p.m. The first half of the program will be devoted to works of Alban Berg. American soprano Evelyn Lear will be guest soloist in the Five Altenberg sons, Op. 24, and excerpts from "Wozzeck." The concert will conclude with Tchaikovsky's Symphony, No. 6, the "Pathetique."

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS
(E) 94,901

NOV 18 1969

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52,185 (S) 108,376

NOV 23 1969

ERICH LEINSDORF returns to conduct the Boston Symphony on Friday afternoon, Nov. 28, and Saturday evening, Nov. 29. These will be his first appearances as guest conductor since he retired last summer as regular music director of the BSO.

First half of the program will not cater to the traditionally-geared members of Leinsdorf's audience. It is all music of Alban Berg opening with three movements from the "Lyric Suite" for string orchestra, and American soprano Evelyn Lear in Five Altenberg songs, Opus 4.

Leinsdorf will then apply a soothing balm with Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 6, the "Pathetique."

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

NOV 29 1969 New England

Leinsdorf returns to BSO to conduct works by Alban Berg

23.

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

Herbert von Kerejan has spoken of "the luxury of ending a concert pianissimo," one that he says is reserved for conductors who are not in search of a contract. That would describe the situation of Erich Leinsdorf. Leinsdorf returned Friday afternoon as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony whose music directorship he gave up last Summer. He led a concert on which not merely the last piece, Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique," but every other as well, ended in pianissimo.

One of Leinsdorf's strengths as music director was his willingness to be explorative about reperatory, and in a season that has been undistinguished in that department, he brought a program of unusually solid, concentrated, and absorbing musical content. Its first half was devoted to the work of Alan Berg, including the setting for string orchestra of the second, third, and fourth movements of the Lyric Suite, the Five Songs on texts by Peter Altenberg, and the three concert fragments from the opera "Wozzeck." The dates of the first Boston Symphony performances of the three works are, respectively, 1955, 1969, and 1958 (Berg having died in 1935) Leinsdorf's concentrated attention to this music was therefore most appropriate.

The Altenberg songs, composed in 1912, given a partial peformance that ended in an audience riot in 1913 and then not given their first complete hearing until 1953, fill 10 sensuously magical minutes with a marvelous erotic and pathetic imagery. Their design and facture is intricate, yet they come to the ear as something so atmospheric, so sensitive, that they seem to be spontaneous and inevitable extensions of the exquisite and suggestive verses. They are the utterance of a profoundly original voice, a wonderful confluence of fantasy and elaboration, and though quickly over, they are one of the richest and most beautiful of song cycles.

Berg's teacher, Schoenberg, gave his pupil hell over these songs, though he thought them excellent, because he was convinced Berg's real genius lay in the writing of large works — if Berg, notoriously lacking in self-confidence, could ever bring himself to face the problem of composing on a large scale.

In the event, Schoenberg was right, and beginning with "Wozzeck," which was completed in 1921, it is characteristic of Berg's music that the total impact of any of his works resides in a wholeness that is far greater than the sum of parts. That is one reason the extracts from the Lyric Suite and from "Wozzeck," for all their proselytizing usefulness, are disappointing once one knows the music and its effect in context. In addition, the Lyric Suite produces frightening technical problems which the original quartet scoring is multiplied by 15 or so, and they tend to neutralize some of the character of the music.

Evelyn Lear, wearing an orange dress that Altenberg might have enjoyed but that had nothing to do with Wozzeck's Marie, was the soloist. She was vocally good, and, except in a few details that were a shade coarse — for example, ignoring the important distinction of color and dynamics in the first two notes of the first song, or the exaggeratedly dramatic "Ploetzlich ist alles aus" in the third — she was excellent at dealing with the poetic and musical matter as well.

Leinsdorf and the orchestra did some exquisite work in the songs, and, in the "Wozzeck" excerpts, some that was powerfully inflected and some that was rather too smoothed out. Though Leinsdorf did the first of the Lyric Suite movements with a lovely grace, that performance as a whole went less well than the rest of the Berg, being somehow too careful to be expressive, yet not sharply enough defined wither.

Apropos of following an hour of Berg with Tchaikovsky I think of Leonard Bernstein who said that you can play anything you like in the first half provided you give them the "Pathetique" afterwards, but also of Schoenberg, who in a wrily humorous mood once wrote: "There is nothing I long for more intensely (if for anything) than to be taken for a better sort of Tchaikovsky — for heaven's sake: A bit better, but really that's all." The "Pathetique" is powerful and original, a great symphony, but Leinsdorf's performance, tensionless in the first three movements and eloquent only in the finale, was not good enough to answer the question whether it is an appropriate sequel to Berg or not.

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Friday afternoon November 28 1969 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening November 29 1969 at 8.30
Tuesday evening December 2 1969 at 7.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

BERG — Three movements from the 'Lyric suite' arranged for string orchestra

Andante amoroso
Allegro misterioso
Adagio appassionato

BERG — Five Altenberg songs op. 4

Seele, wie bist du schöner
(Soul, you are more beautiful)

Sahst du nach dem Gewitterregen
(After the summer rain did you see the forest?)

Über die Grenzen des All
(Over the brink of beyond)

Nichts ist gekommen
(Nothing is come)

Hier ist Friede
(Here is Lethe)

EVELYN LEAR soprano

first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

BERG — Three excerpts from the opera 'Wozzeck' op. 7*

1. Marie's room – evening. Military march and cradle song.
2. Marie's room – night. She talks to her child.
3. Drowning of Wozzeck. Children in front of Marie's house.

EVELYN LEAR soprano
WILLIAM WRIGHT boy soprano

intermission

TCHAIKOVSKY — Symphony no. 6 in B minor op. 74 'Pathétique'*

Adagio – allegro non troppo
Allegro con grazia
Allegro molto vivace
Finale: adagio lamentoso

THE GUEST CONDUCTOR

Milton Feinberg

ERICH LEINSDORF, whose tenure as Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra ended last August when he conducted a performance of Beethoven's Ninth symphony to close the Berkshire Festival, made a significant contribution to American musical life during his seven years with the Orchestra. Under his leadership the Orchestra presented many premières and revived many forgotten works. Among the latter were the complete Schumann Faust, the original versions of Beethoven's Fidelio and Strauss' Ariadne auf Naxos, and the Piano concerto no. 1 of Xaver Scharwenka, while among the numerous world and American premières were works like Britten's War requiem and Cello symphony, the piano concertos of Barber and Carter, Schuller's Diptych for brass quintet and orchestra, and Piston's Symphony no. 8. Despite his heavy schedule during the winter season and at Tanglewood, where he not only led the majority of the Festival concerts but also headed the activities of the Berkshire Music Center, Erich Leinsdorf found time to make several guest conducting tours with European orchestras, and to record full-length operas for RCA Records, the most recent of which were Mozart's Così fan tutte, a Grammy award winner, Verdi's Masked ball and Salome by Strauss. Immediately after his final concert at Tanglewood, Erich Leinsdorf flew to Buenos Aires, and conducted five performances each of Berg's Wozzeck, Strauss' Der Rosenkavalier and Wagner's Parsifal, all in new productions, at the Teatro Colon. He recently returned to this country to conduct the Chicago Symphony, and after his appearances with the Boston Symphony here and on tour, Erich Leinsdorf goes to Amsterdam, where he will conduct the Concertgebouw Orchestra for two months. Later plans include appearances in Milan, Warsaw and London. Erich Leinsdorf has made many recordings not only for RCA but for the Capitol, London, Westminster and Pickwick labels.

THE SOLOIST

EVELYN LEAR spent her early years in New York City. After formal musical training as a child – she learnt to play the piano and french horn – she began serious vocal study at the age of seventeen. She joined the opera workshop of the Juilliard School, and in 1957 she and her singer-husband Thomas Stewart went to Berlin on Fulbright scholarships. Two years later she took the place of an ill colleague and at very short notice sang Strauss' Four last songs with the London Symphony and Sir Adrian Boult. The same year she was engaged by the Deutsche Oper and in 1960 sang the title role in Berg's Lulu. Her career was then assured. She was soon making records – she is now a DGG recording artist – and has performed in major opera houses and at music festivals in all parts of the world. Vienna, Salzburg, Buenos Aires, Frankfurt, Kansas City, Brussels, San Francisco, London, Stuttgart, Edinburgh, Prague and New York are among the cities where she has sung in opera, given recitals or appeared in concert with orchestras. Her enormous operatic repertoire includes Lavinia in Mourning becomes Electra, Marie in Wozzeck, Pamina in Die Zauberflöte, Senta in Der fliegende Holländer, Fiordiligi in Così fan tutte and Poppea in L'incoronazione di Poppea. Evelyn Lear makes her first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at these concerts.

Leinsdorf Lends Force to Tchaikovsky's 'Pathetique'

By L. DAVID HARRIS
Music Critic

Perhaps it's a sign of the times that Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique" symphony seemed more contemporary and meaningful yesterday than did the music of the great 20th century composer Alban Berg.

The occasion was a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra led by Erich Leinsdorf, former music director. He was a sentimental favorite and during more dramatic moments of the "Pathetique" Leinsdorf's rhythmic movements and windmill conducting gestures were elements of true nostalgia for many a concert goer.

Leinsdorf and the orchestra were at their best in the more electric, explosive sections of the symphony. Violins swept furiously up and down scales, brusque booming chords were everywhere. These effects (and so many other impressive ones) were most evident in the middle of the first section and the tremendous finale of the third.

However, Leinsdorf had problems with the more subtle sections of the symphony. The dramatic "pianissimo" end of the first movement seemed too fragile and shaky, some phrasings in the last movement were overdone and seemed artificial. At times, there were problems with brass intonations, breath control and attacks.

But basically, "Pathetique" was a competent well-performed symphony. It seems hardly the kind of music that would appeal to a country and society which have supposedly conquered all—even putting men on the moon.

But conversely, "Pathetique" seems to mirror an insecurity in the society which in some ways seems similar to the temper of the late 19th century when the symphony was written. It completely captures an anguish built of "futile regret, impotent fury . . . torturing doubt."

Yesterday's concert began with three movements from Berg's "Lyric Suite." They were nicely performed, but the music's romantic imagery seemed to be limited to ethereal shimmerings. Occasionally, the music seemed heavy and more like technical exercises than lyric pieces. Also, too often the musicians seemed behind the beat or not totally together.

Evelyn Lear was soprano soloist for Berg's five "Altenberg" songs. Since she was holding her music, her efforts at expression and emotion too often seemed exaggerated, unreal — even directed at the sheets of music themselves. She clutched them, held them at arms' length, almost emoted to them.

The program notes admonished listeners to "never forget" the music represents a "spontaneous uncontrived outburst of feeling and emotion." That spontaneous quality simply wasn't present—at least in "outburst" form.

Far better (perhaps the best musically of the afternoon) were excerpts from Berg's opera "Wozzeck." Miss Lear sang dramatically, movingly, even melodically in the most difficult of passages. Her diction was superb, her voice strong and forceful, yet sweetly mellow.

A boy soprano, William Wright, had a pleasing voice, but he was not easily heard as the orchestral accompaniment was too loud (and occasionally was too loud for Miss Lear also.)

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300

NOV 29 1969 En

Leinsdorf introduces Miss Lear

By Louis Snyder

Erich Leinsdorf began his two-week return visit to the Boston Symphony with a weekend program which paired a musical odd couple, Alban Berg and Peter Ilyich Tchaikovsky. The Berg half comprised three sets of numbers, with soprano Evelyn Lear making her BSO debut as soloist in two of them. Tchaikovsky's turn came after the intermission with his Symphony No. 6 in B minor, the "Pathetique."

If Mr. Leinsdorf contrived this bitter-to-sweet order with subscribers' sensitivities in mind, he needn't have worried. His performances of Berg's arrangement for string orchestra of three movements from his "Lyric Suite," and (with Miss Lear's valuable cooperation), of the Five Altenberg Songs and three "Wozzeck" excerpts, was musicmaking of the highest order.

For Mr. Leinsdorf's disciplined musicianship is what is essential to make audiences in general sit up and take notice of Berg. His authority as well as his intellectual penetration to the core of the music was continually evident, with the result that this was a kind of Berg retrospective—a most successful introduction for those who still had their guards up.

Miss Lear and the orchestra were sterling allies in this Bergfest. From the crystalline clarity of their playing in the "Lyric Suite," (the gossamer Allegro was something to wonder at), to the tremendous textures of "Wozzeck" sound, the BSO musicians were at their superb best on Friday afternoon.

Miss Lear's young but extensive reputation has been founded largely on her success in the contemporary repertory, both operatic and concert. This has been known to denote singers with a quick intelligence but not much voice. Not so Miss Lear vocally. Hers is a warm lyric voice of wide range and of good size (if indeed it was swamped in a few instances by heavy orchestral sound), and in her use of it there is continuous evidence of the skilled interpreter at work.

The Altenberg Songs, each of which contains a message of postcard length (in fact Berg used the very "in" texts which poet Peter Altenberg wrote on cards to knowing friends), demand much of the singer, who must establish mood, sing an extremely complex line, and adjust to a surrounding jungle of alien sound. Miss Lear managed to do all of this, and to impart what Berg would have been surprised to know was possible (after a disastrous first performance) —the desire to hear them often again.

In Marie's three scenes from "Wozzeck" Miss Lear was as impressive as it is possible to be when portions are out of context. This is not an earthy, passionate portrayal, on the concert platform, at least. Mr. Leinsdorf and the orchestra gave her magnificent support. There was another soloist, too — William Wright of the Berkshire Boy Choir effectively sang the few words of Marie's child which make the final scene of "Wozzeck" one of the most poignantly gripping in opera.

The afternoon concluded with a virtuoso performance of the "Pathetique" which stirred up a salvo of applause after the third movement and otherwise seemed like old times.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

DEC 1 1969

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

NOV 29 1969 New Engla

Leinsdorf returns to BSO to conduct works by Alban Berg

23

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

Herbert von Kerejan has spoken of "the luxury of ending a concert pianissimo," one that he says is reserved for conductors who are not in search of a contract. That would describe the situation of Erich Leinsdorf. Leinsdorf returned Friday afternoon as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony whose music directorship he gave up last Summer. He led a concert on which not merely the last piece, Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique," but every other as well, ended in pianissimo.

One of Leinsdorf's strengths as music director was his willingness to be explorative about reperatory, and in a season that has been undistinguished in that department, he brought a program of unusually solid, concentrated, and absorbing musical content. Its first half was devoted to the work of Alan Berg, including the setting for string orchestra of the second, third, and fourth movements of the Lyric Suite, the Five Songs on texts by Peter Altenberg, and the three concert fragments from the opera "Wozzeck." The dates of the first Boston Symphony performances of the three works are, respectively, 1955, 1969, and 1958 (Berg having died in 1935) · Leinsdorf's concentrated attention to this music was therefore most appropriate.

The Altenberg songs, composed in 1912, given a partial peformance that ended in an audience riot in 1913 and then not given their first complete hearing until 1953, fill 10 sensuously magical minutes with a marvelous erotic and pathetic imagery. Their design and facture is intricate, yet they come to the ear as something so atmospheric, so sensitive, that they seem to be spontaneous and inevitable extensions of the exquisite and suggestive verses. They are the utterance of a profoundly original voice, a wonderful confluence of fantasy and elaboration, and though quickly over, they are one of the richest and most beautiful of song cycles.

Berg's teacher, Schoenberg, gave his pupil hell over these songs, though he thought them excellent, because he was convinced Berg's real genius lay in the writing of large works — if Berg, notoriously lacking in self-confidence, could ever bring himself to face the problem of composing on a large scale.

In the event, Schoenberg was right, and beginning with "Wozzeck," which was completed in 1921, it is characteristic of Berg's music that the total impact of any of his works resides in a wholeness that is far greater than the sum of parts. That is one reason the extracts from the Lyric Suite and from "Wozzeck," for all their proselytizing usefulness, are disappointing once one knows the music and its effect in context. In addition, the Lyric Suite produces frightening technical problems which the original quartet scoring is multiplied by 15 or so, and they tend to neutralize some of the character of the music.

Evelyn Lear, wearing an orange dress that Altenberg might have enjoyed but that had nothing to do with Wozzeck's Marie, was the soloist. She was vocally good, and, except in a few details that were a shade coarse — for example, ignoring the important distinction of color and dynamics in the first two notes of the first song, or the exaggeratedly dramatic "Ploetzlich ist alles aus" in the third — she was excellent at dealing with the poetic and musical matter as well.

Leinsdorf and the orchestra did some exquisite work in the songs, and, in the "Wozzeck" excerpts, some that was powerfully inflected and some that was rather too smoothed out. Though Leinsdorf did the first of the Lyric Suite movements with a lovely grace, that performance as a whole went less well than the rest of the Berg, being somehow too careful to be expressive, yet not sharply enough defined either.

Apropos of following an hour of Berg with Tchaikovsky I think of Leonard Bernstein who said that you can play anything you like in the first half provided you give them the "Pathetique" afterwards, but also of Schoenberg, who in a wrily humorous mood once wrote: "There is nothing I long for more intensely (if for anything) than to be taken for a better sort of Tchaikovsky — for heaven's sake: A bit better, but really that's all." The "Pathetique" is powerful and original, a great symphony, but Leinsdorf's performance, tensionless in the first three movements and eloquent only in the finale, was not good enough to answer the question whether it is an appropriate sequel to Berg or not.

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Friday afternoon November 28 1969 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening November 29 1969 at 8.30
Tuesday evening December 2 1969 at 7.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

BERG — Three movements from the 'Lyric suite' arranged for string orchestra

Andante amoroso
Allegro misterioso
Adagio appassionato

BERG — Five Altenberg songs op. 4

Seele, wie bist du schöner
(Soul, you are more beautiful)

Sahst du nach dem Gewitterregen
(After the summer rain did you see the forest?)

Über die Grenzen des All
(Over the brink of beyond)

Nichts ist gekommen
(Nothing is come)

Hier ist Friede
(Here is Lethe)

EVELYN LEAR soprano

first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

BERG — Three excerpts from the opera 'Wozzeck' op. 7*

1. Marie's room – evening. Military march and cradle song.
2. Marie's room – night. She talks to her child.
3. Drowning of Wozzeck. Children in front of Marie's house.

EVELYN LEAR soprano
WILLIAM WRIGHT boy soprano

intermission

TCHAIKOVSKY — Symphony no. 6 in B minor op. 74 'Pathétique'*

Adagio – allegro non troppo
Allegro con grazia
Allegro molto vivace
Finale: adagio lamentoso

THE SOLOIST

EVELYN LEAR spent her early years in New York City. After formal musical training as a child – she learnt to play the piano and french horn – she began serious vocal study at the age of seventeen. She joined the opera workshop of the Juilliard School, and in 1957 she and her singer-husband Thomas Stewart went to Berlin on Fulbright scholarships. Two years later she took the place of an ill colleague and at very short notice sang Strauss' Four last songs with the London Symphony and Sir Adrian Boult. The same year she was engaged by the Deutsche Oper and in 1960 sang the title role in Berg's Lulu. Her career was then assured. She was soon making records – she is now a DGG recording artist – and has performed in major opera houses and at music festivals in all parts of the world. Vienna, Salzburg, Buenos Aires, Frankfurt, Kansas City, Brussels, San Francisco, London, Stuttgart, Edinburgh, Prague and New York are among the cities where she has sung in opera, given recitals or appeared in concert with orchestras. Her enormous operatic repertoire includes Lavinia in Mourning becomes Electra, Marie in Wozzeck, Pamina in Die Zauberflöte, Senta in Der fliegende Holländer, Fiordiligi in Così fan tutte and Poppea in L'incoronazione di Poppea. Evelyn Lear makes her first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at these concerts.

THE GUEST CONDUCTOR

Milton Feinberg

ERICH LEINSDORF, whose tenure as Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra ended last August when he conducted a performance of Beethoven's Ninth symphony to close the Berkshire Festival, made a significant contribution to American musical life during his seven years with the Orchestra. Under his leadership the Orchestra presented many premières and revived many forgotten works. Among the latter were the complete Schumann Faust, the original versions of Beethoven's Fidelio and Strauss' Ariadne auf Naxos, and the Piano concerto no. 1 of Xaver Scharwenka, while among the numerous world and American premières were works like Britten's War requiem and Cello symphony, the piano concertos of Barber and Carter, Schuller's Diptych for brass quintet and orchestra, and Piston's Symphony no. 8. Despite his heavy schedule during the winter season and at Tanglewood, where he not only led the majority of the Festival concerts but also headed the activities of the Berkshire Music Center, Erich Leinsdorf found time to make several guest conducting tours with European orchestras, and to record full-length operas for RCA Records, the most recent of which were Mozart's Così fan tutte, a Grammy award winner, Verdi's Masked ball and Salome by Strauss. Immediately after his final concert at Tanglewood, Erich Leinsdorf flew to Buenos Aires, and conducted five performances each of Berg's Wozzeck, Strauss' Der Rosenkavalier and Wagner's Parsifal, all in new productions, at the Teatro Colon. He recently returned to this country to conduct the Chicago Symphony, and after his appearances with the Boston Symphony here and on tour, Erich Leinsdorf goes to Amsterdam, where he will conduct the Concertgebouw Orchestra for two months. Later plans include appearances in Milan, Warsaw and London. Erich Leinsdorf has made many recordings not only for RCA but for the Capitol, London, Westminster and Pickwick labels.

Leinsdorf Lends Force to Tchaikovsky's 'Pathetique'

By L. DAVID HARRIS
Music Critic

Perhaps it's a sign of the times that Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique" symphony seemed more contemporary and meaningful yesterday than did the music of the great 20th century composer Alban Berg.

The occasion was a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra led by Erich Leinsdorf, former music director. He was a sentimental favorite and during more dramatic moments of the "Pathetique" Leinsdorf's rhythmic movements and windmill conducting gestures were elements of true nostalgia for many a concert goer.

Leinsdorf and the orchestra were at their best in the more electric, explosive sections of the symphony. Violins swept furiously up and down scales, brusque booming chords were everywhere. These effects (and so many other impressive ones) were most evident in the middle of the first section and the tremendous finale of the third.

However, Leinsdorf had problems with the more subtle sections of the symphony. The dramatic "pianissimo" end of the first movement seemed too fragile and shaky, some phrasings in the last movement were overdone and seemed artificial. At times, there were problems with brass intonations, breath control and attacks.

But basically, "Pathetique" was a competent well-performed symphony. It seems hardly the kind of music that would appeal to a country and society which have supposedly conquered all—even putting men on the moon.

But conversely, "Pathetique" seems to mirror an insecurity in the society which in some ways seems similar to the temper of the late 19th century when the symphony was written. It completely captures an anguish built of "futile regret, impotent fury . . . torturing doubt."

Yesterday's concert began with three movements from Berg's "Lyric Suite." They were nicely performed, but the music's romantic imagery seemed to be limited to ethereal shimmerings. Occasionally, the music seemed heavy and more like technical exercises than lyric pieces. Also, too often the musicians seemed behind the beat or not totally together.

Evelyn Lear was soprano soloist for Berg's five "Altenberg" songs. Since she was holding her music, her efforts at expression and emotion too often seemed exaggerated, unreal — even directed at the sheets of music themselves. She clutched them, held them at arms' length, almost emoted to them.

The program notes admonished listeners to "never forget" the music represents a "spontaneous uncontrived outburst of feeling and emotion." That spontaneous quality simply wasn't present—at least in "outburst" form.

Far better (perhaps the best musically of the afternoon) were excerpts from Berg's opera "Wozzeck." Miss Lear sang dramatically, movingly, even melodically in the most difficult of passages. Her diction was superb, her voice strong and forceful, yet sweetly mellow.

A boy soprano, William Wright, had a pleasing voice, but he was not easily heard as the orchestral accompaniment was too loud (and occasionally was too loud for Miss Lear also.)

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300

NOV 29 1969 En

Leinsdorf introduces Miss Lear

By Louis Snyder

Erich Leinsdorf began his two-week return visit to the Boston Symphony with a weekend program which paired a musical odd couple, Alban Berg and Peter Ilyich Tchaikovsky. The Berg half comprised three sets of numbers, with soprano Evelyn Lear making her BSO debut as soloist in two of them. Tchaikovsky's turn came after the intermission with his Symphony No. 6 in B minor, the "Pathetique."

If Mr. Leinsdorf contrived this bitter-to-sweet order with subscribers' sensitivities in mind, he needn't have worried. His performances of Berg's arrangement for string orchestra of three movements from his "Lyric Suite," and (with Miss Lear's valuable cooperation), of the Five Altenberg Songs and three "Wozzeck" excerpts, was musicmaking of the highest order.

For Mr. Leinsdorf's disciplined musicianship is what is essential to make audiences in general sit up and take notice of Berg. His authority as well as his intellectual penetration to the core of the music was continually evident, with the result that this was a kind of Berg retrospective—a most successful introduction for those who still had their guards up.

Miss Lear and the orchestra were sterling allies in this Bergfest. From the crystalline clarity of their playing in the "Lyric Suite," (the gossamer Allegro was something to wonder at), to the tremendous textures of "Wozzeck" sound, the BSO musicians were at their superb best on Friday afternoon.

Miss Lear's young but extensive reputation has been founded largely on her success in the contemporary repertory, both operatic and concert. This has been known to denote singers with a quick intelligence but not much voice. Not so Miss Lear — vocally. Hers is a warm lyric voice of wide range and of good size (if indeed it was swamped in a few instances by heavy orchestral sound), and in her use of it there is continuous evidence of the skilled interpreter at work.

The Altenberg Songs, each of which contains a message of postcard length (in fact Berg used the very "in" texts which poet Peter Altenberg wrote on cards to knowing friends), demand much of the singer, who must establish mood, sing an extremely complex line, and adjust to a surrounding jungle of alien sound. Miss Lear managed to do all of this, and to impart what Berg would have been surprised to know was possible (after a disastrous first performance) —the desire to hear them often again.

In Marie's three scenes from "Wozzeck," Miss Lear was as impressive as it is possible to be when portions are out of context. This is not an earthy, passionate portrayal, on the concert platform, at least. Mr. Leinsdorf and the orchestra gave her magnificent support. There was another soloist too — William Wright of the Berkshire Boy Choir effectively sang the few words of Marie's child which make the final scene of "Wozzeck" one of the most poignantly gripping in opera.

The afternoon concluded with a virtuoso performance of the "Pathetique" which stirred up a salvo of applause after the third movement, and otherwise seemed like old times.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

DEC 1 1969

24.

STANDARD-TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
(E) 70,000 (S) 60,000
DEC 3 1969

Earl J. Dias Review

Leinsdorf Return Visit Thrilling Performance

Erich Leinsdorf returned to the Boston Symphony podium last night ~~as guest~~ conductor (he will be on hand for two weeks) in the third program of the Tuesday "B" Series. His choice of Alban Berg and Tschaikovsky as the only two composers featured in the concert may have seemed, at first, to be an example of strange musical bedfellows.

After all, Berg is hardly a conventional or traditional composer, whereas Tschaikovsky obviously is. Yet the pairing of these two men is actually not so strange or incongrous. Berg is, for example, regarded as the romanticist of the 12 tone school inasmuch as he succeeded in infusing expressiveness and emotion into the harsh, austere sounds of atonality.

And emotion was the keynote of the entire concert in Berg's "Lyric Suite" (for strings), in his "Five Altenberg Songs" and in three excerpts from his opera, "Wozzeck," and, of course, in Tschaikovsky's "Symphony No. 6," the perennially popular "Pathetique," with its conveying of sorrow and perhaps of alienation.

Moveover, and Leinsdorf may have had this fact in mind, too, all the works on the program gave the orchestra welcome opportunity to demonstrate its remarkable virtuosity.

That Mr. Leinsdorf can conduct Berg with clarity and understanding and that the orchestra can rise nobly to the complexities of Berg's scoring was at once evident in the three movements from "The Lyric Suite." Especially impressive was the beautifully controlled manner in which the ensemble played the inordine delicate Allegro.

Soprano Evelyn Lear, who has made a considerable reputation in contemporary works, was soloist in "Five Altenberg Songs" and in two of the excerpts from "Wozzeck."

Miss Lear has a lyric voice of much warmth and commendable range; she managed well the intricate line of the Altenberg songs (their cryptic texts were written by the poet Altenberg on postcards to understanding friends). In two of Marie's arias from "Wozzeck," she managed, too, to convey the emotion and the passion inherent in Marie's troubled mind — although, at times, her voice was somewhat smothered by loud orchestral accompaniment.

A boy soprano, William Wright, of the Berkshire Boys' choir, sand his short contribution to the program well; his song is the words of Marie's child in the devastatingly effective final scene of the opera. "Wozzek" is, of course, one of the masterpieces of 20th Century music. Even in brief excerpts from it, taken really out of context and so perhaps losing some effect, I am convinced that not since "Pelleas and Leisande" has there been an opera in which text and music are so cohesively one.

As for Tschaikovsky's "Patpetique," Leinsdorf and the orchestra gave it a glowing and thrilling performance. And, surprisingly enough, the tragic implications of the work, its soul-searching, its air of malaise seem to have as much as, if not more contemporary relevance than the more modern works by Berg.

The next concert in the Series will be performed on Jan. 13, with Michael Tilson Thomas as conductor.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000
DEC 4 1969

- PHOTOGRAPH -
ORIGINAL STORED
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Leinsdorf Returns

To BSO for Berg and Tchaikovsky

By HAROLD C. SPROUL

The Boston Symphony under Erich Leinsdorf last Saturday presented three works of Alban Berg with a sensitivity to form and color that made them an inescapable revelation. The three movements from the "Lyric Suite", originally for string quartet, had been arranged for string orchestra by the composer himself. While the clean definition of four strings is missing, Berg must have felt that these movements could do with discrete amplification of tonal mass and perspective, and indeed they can if performed as they were in Symphony Hall.

One could forget all the mumbo-jumbo of 12-tone technique and hear that the Andante was really 'amoroso', melting and surging; the Allegro really 'misterioso', a muted squiggle of instrumental pattern veiled in a mist shot through with color; and the Adagio really appasionato, urgent lines of force emerging from impressionistic wash of sound. Technique of composer and performers disappeared in a projection of immediate and rare experience. Nothing in Wagner or Debussy was ever so convincingly now. Verbally, e. e. cummings, to a degree, and Paul Klee, visually, but neither with a comparable continuum of tone and atmosphere. Two minutes of music is, with Berg, an eternity.

Along with the dominating drive of his teacher, Schonberg, Berg had a private inspiration that transcended the teaching.

The five Altenberg songs, opus four, are the first independent product of the growing composer and can only be matched by Mahler's songs with orchestra. But with Berg there is no folk song derivation for the vocal line which speaks its romantic longing within the orchestra geography of situation and feeling according to Wagnerian idea, only more sensitively—so directly expressive that, as with Schubert or Mozart, the music speaks more directly than the words. Evelyn Lear, the soprano for the songs, as also for the following Three Excerpts from the opera Wozzek was ideal in voice and style, collaborating with instrumental sounds with vibrant intensity or clear open tone and a reserve of power when needed—chamber music musicianship and imagination.

method of wallowing in melody also picked by Berg, before the opera could be performed and by themselves bypass the neurotic convolutions of the plot. Marie's room in the evening is not necessarily a whore's but the down-dropping of shadow for anyone along; the raucous military march a fracture and lift to loneliness, and the cradle song a return to the love of a child, not necessarily a bastard by poor tormented Wozzek, the cannon-fodder soldier. And so on, the music for the suicide drowning of Wozzek is a masterpiece of watery sound that is frighteningly engulfing.

Berg died in Vienna in 1935 at the age of fifty. Once and for all he proved that any technical scheme for music is valid if one has an ear and a sensitivity to human predicaments. But is it understood by the present technically overtrained graduates of the best conservatories?

After the revelation, the indulgence. Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique" for Leinsdorf is a challenge to out-Tchaikovsky Tchaikovsky. This great somber symphony has become the sport of conductors. It certainly lends itself to exaggeration but, as Toscannini once demonstrated, owes much to the composer's admiration for the fine control of Mozart. Leinsdorf chooses the crowd-pleasing method of wallowing melody and hectic speed. Well, why not? It's a thrill for the lethargic listener and more so than listening to television drivel. But still, there is a deeper thrill when Allegro con grazia has really some grace in its tempo and molto vivace isn't scrambled eggs. Well maybe so, but the final Adagio lamentoso, after a furor that signaled all hell and hurrah—with press-button applause—the symphony that began in darkness ended in darkness—a shocking but valid statement of tragic intuition.

You can't kill Tchaikovsky, but he can kill you.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000
NOV 20 1969

LEINSDORF RETURNS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's former music director Erich Leinsdorf returns to direct the orchestra Friday and Saturday, Dec. 5 and 6, on WGBH-FM. He will conduct the same program Friday at 2 p.m. and Saturday at 8:30 p.m. Symphony No. 35 in D, the "Haffner" by Mozart and Bruckner's Symphony No. 8.

A Report on Two Symphony Concerts

I heard two concerts last week, the opening program of the New Bedford Symphony Orchestra's 12th season, and the third concert in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's current Tuesday "B" Series.

Under the baton of John R. Pandolfi, the New Bedford group was in exceptionally good form, particularly in the two substantial pieces of music on the program—Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" Overture and Schubert's youthful and lilting "Symphony No. 5 in B Flat Major." I thought that the orchestra performed with precision, with a well-integrated sonority, with nice attention to phrasing — the only defect being some limitation in its dynamic range. All in all, it was a concert that merited an audience much larger than the 150 listeners present on the occasion.

At Symphony Hall, Erich Leinsdorf returned to his old podium, this time in the role of guest conductor. The two composers featured on the program — Alban Berg and Tschaikovsky — would appear to be strange musical companions, indeed. But Mr. Leinsdorf is a canny man. He knows, for example, that Berg is the most romantic of the 12-tone composers — indeed one of the few who has been able to infuse his atonal works with both expressiveness and emotion.

These qualities were much in evidence in the orchestra's virtuoso playing of "The Lyric Suite," "Five Altenberg Songs" and three excerpts from the opera, "Wozzek," with soprano Evelyn Lear as soloist in the latter two works. The hearing of the three "Wozzek" excerpts supported by conviction that this opera is one of the few genuine masterpieces of 20th-Century music.

As for Tschaikovsky — well, we all know how romantic he is. Mr. Leinsdorf and his musicians pulled out all the stops in their playing of the "Pathetique" symphony — a glowing, moving, highly emotional rendition that had me limp at the end.

STANDARD-TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
(E) 70,000 (S) 60,000
DEC 7 1969

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Friday afternoon December 5 1969 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening December 6 1969 at 8.30
Tuesday evening December 16 1969 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

MOZART — Symphony no. 35 in D K. 385 'Haffner'
Allegro con spirito
Andante
Menuetto & trio
Finale: presto

intermission

BRUCKNER — Symphony no. 8 in C minor
Allegro moderato
Scherzo: allegro moderato – trio: langsam
Adagio (feierlich langsam; doch nicht schleppend)
Finale: feierlich, nicht schnell

Leinsdorf in 2d BSO Appearance

By L. DAVID HARRIS
Music Critic

Erich Leinsdorf made his second appearance of the season as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday. The occasion called for Mozart and Bruckner symphonies and it was all pleasant listening — but there was too little of Mozart and too much of Bruckner.

Leinsdorf began by fairly zipping through Mozart's admittedly short "Symphony No. 35 in D (Haffner)," barely pausing in between movements.

The music was crisp, clean —the strings seemed far more responsive to Leinsdorf than they were in last week's opening Alban Berg's pieces.

Contrasts in dynamics were appreciated and if there is any substantial negative criticism to give, it might only be that the symphony seemed more like exercise runs than a full-blown orchestral work. It was almost as if Leinsdorf was running through it as a warm-up for Bruckner.

Bruckner's eighth symphony followed the intermission. Many good things can be said about it—mainly clear conducting, excellent string work, good solo horn, strong trumpets, coolly efficient tympani work. The tuba was dramatically forceful.

Negatively, it seemed the overall effect of the entire work was that of ponderous, heavy music. Contrasts in dynamics could have been more effective and occasionally it seemed to drag. In the third movement, several persons in the audience (around the reviewer) went to sleep.

There were some intonation problems. Woodwinds had difficulties in the third movement, the finale found trombones and horns occasionally off pitch.

The symphony's final two minutes were excellent, dramatic. There were plenty of good times before them too, but all the positive aspects of the performance didn't quite make the symphony that memorable for concertgoers.

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300
DEC 6 1969

Erich Leinsdorf and William Steinberg conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra next week and their concerts will be broadcast live from Symphony Hall by Albany FM station WAMC (90.3 mc.)

Leinsdorf will conduct Tuesday, Dec. 16, at 8:30 p.m. when his program will be Symphony No. 35, the "Haffner," by Mozart and Bruckner's Symphony No. 8.

The Friday (Dec. 19 at 2 p.m.) concert will be directed by Mr. Steinberg, who has chosen the overture to Sinigaglia's "Le Buffe Chiozotte," Elgar's Cello Concerto in E Minor, Op. 85 (Zara Nelsova, soloist); and Tchaikovsky's "Manfred" Symphony.

Schenectady Gazette
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 55,934
DEC 8 1969

Patriot Ledger 12-6-69

MUSIC

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Symphony Hall, Boston—
Tonight at 8:30 p.m.
Erich Leinsdorf conducting Mozart, Symphony no. 35 in D K. 385 "Haffner." Bruckner, Symphony no. 8 in C minor.
Rest of the week as usual.

24

STANDARD-TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
(E) 70,000 (S) 60,000

DEC 3 1969

Earl J. Dias Review

Leinsdorf Return Visit Thrilling Performance

Erich Leinsdorf returned to the Boston Symphony podium last night ~~as guest conductor~~ (he will be on hand for two weeks) in the third program of the Tuesday "B" Series. His choice of Alban Berg and Tschaikovsky as the only two composers featured in the concert may have seemed, at first, to be an example of strange musical bedfellows.

After all, Berg is hardly a conventional or traditional composer, whereas Tschaikovsky obviously is. Yet the pairing of these two men is actually not so strange or incongrous. Berg is, for example, regarded as the romanticist of the 12 tone school inasmuch as he succeeded in infusing expressiveness and emotion into the harsh, austere sounds of atonality.

And emotion was the keynote of the entire concert in Berg's "Lyric Suite" (for strings), in his "Five Altenberg Songs" and in three excerpts from his opera, "Wozzeck," and, of course, in Tschaikovsky's "Symphony No. 6," the perennially popular "Pathetique," with its conveying of sorrow and perhaps of alienation.

Moveover, and Leinsdorf may have had this fact in mind, too, all the works on the program gave the orchestra welcome opportunity to demonstrate its remarkable virtuosity.

That Mr. Leinsdorf can conduct Berg with clarity and understanding and that the orchestra can rise nobly to the complexities of Berg's scoring was at once evident in the three movements from "The Lyric Suite." Especially impressive was the beautifully controlled manner in which the ensemble played the inordine delicate Allegro.

Soprano Evelyn Lear, who has made a considerable reputation in contemporary works, was soloist in "Five Altenberg Songs" and in two of the excerpts from "Wozzeck."

Miss Lear has a lyric voice of much warmth and commendable range; she managed well the intricate line of the Altenberg songs (their cryptic texts were written by the poet Altenberg on postcards to understanding friends). In two of Marie's arias from "Wozzeck," she managed, too, to convey the emotion and the passion inherent in Marie's troubled mind — although, at times, her voice was somewhat smothered by loud orchestral accompaniment.

A boy soprano, William Wright, of the Berkshire Boys' choir, sand his short contribution to the program well; his song is the words of Marie's child in the devastatingly effective final scene of the opera. "Wozzek" is, of course, one of the masterpieces of 20th Century music. Even in brief excerpts from it, taken really out of context and so perhaps losing some effect, I am convinced that not since "Pelleas and Leisande" has there been an opera in which text and music are so cohesively one.

As for Tschaikovsky's "Patnetique," Leinsdorf and the orchestra gave it a glowing and thrilling performance. And, surprisingly enough, the tragic implications of the work, its soul-searching, its air of malaise seem to have as much as, if not more contemporary relevance than the more modern works by Berg.

The next concert in the Series will be performed on Jan. 13, with Michael Tilson Thomas as conductor.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

DEC 4 1969

Leinsdorf Returns

To BSO for Berg and Tchaikovsky

By HAROLD C. SPROUL

The Boston Symphony under Erich Leinsdorf last Saturday presented ~~three works of~~ Alban Berg with a sensitivity to form and color that made them an inescapable revelation. The three movements from the "Lyric Suite", originally for string quartet, had been arranged for string orchestra by the composer himself. While the clean definition of four strings is missing, Berg must have felt that these movements could do with discrete amplification of tonal mass and perspective, and indeed they can if performed as they were in Symphony Hall.

One could forget all the mumbo-jumbo of 12-tone technique and hear that the Andante was really 'amoroso', melting and surging; the Allegro really 'misterioso', a muted squiggle of instrumental pattern veiled in a mist shot through with color; and the Adagio really appasionato, urgent lines of force emerging from impressionistic wash of sound. Technique of composer and performers disappeared in a projection of immediate and rare experience. Nothing in Wagner or Debussy was ever so convincingly now. Verbally, e. e. cummings, to a degree, and Paul Klee, visually, but neither with a comparable continuum of tone and atmosphere. Two minutes of music is, with Berg, an eternity.

Along with the dominating drive of his teacher, Schonberg, Berg had a private inspiration that transcended the teaching.

The five Altenberg songs, opus four, are the first independent product of the growing composer and can only be matched by Mahler's songs with orchestra. But with Berg there is no folk song derivation for the vocal line which speaks its romantic longing within the orchestra geography of situation and feeling according to Wagnerian idea, only more sensitively—so directly expressive that, as with Schubert or Mozart, the music speaks more directly than the words. Evelyn Lear, the soprano for the songs, as also for the following Three Excerpts from the opera Wozzek was ideal in voice and style, collaborating with instrumental sounds with vibrant intensity or clear open tone and a reserve of power when needed—chamber music musicianship and imagination.

method of wallowing in melody also picked by Berg, before the opera could be performed and by themselves bypass the neurotic convolutions of the plot. Marie's room in the evening is not necessarily a whore's but the down-dropping of shadow for anyone along; the raucous military march a fracture and lift to loneliness, and the cradle song a return to the love of a child, not necessarily a bastard by poor tormented Wozzek, the cannon-fodder soldier. And so on, the music for the suicide drowning of Wozzek is a masterpiece of watery sound that is frighteningly engulfing.

Berg died in Vienna in 1935 at the age of fifty. Once and for all he proved that any technical scheme for music is valid if one has an ear and a sensitivity to human predicaments. But is it understood by the present technically overtrained graduates of the best conservatories?

After the revelation, the indulgence. Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique" for Leinsdorf is a challenge to out-Tchaikovsky Tchaikovsky. This great somber symphony has become the sport of conductors. It certainly lends itself to exaggeration but, as Toscannini once demonstrated, owes much to the composer's admiration for the fine control of Mozart. Leinsdorf chooses the crowd-pleasing method of wallowing melody and hectic speed. Well, why not? It's a thrill for the lethargic listener and more so than listening to television drivel. But still, there is a deeper thrill when Allegro con grazia has really some grace in its tempo and molto vivace isn't scrambled eggs. Well maybe so, but the final Adagio lamentoso, after a furor that signaled all hell and hurrah—with press-button applause—the symphony that began in darkness ended in darkness—a shocking but valid statement of tragic intuition.

You can't kill Tchaikovsky, but he can kill you.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

NOV 20 1969

LEINSDORF RETURNS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's former music director Erich Leinsdorf returns to direct the orchestra Friday and Saturday, Dec. 5 and 6, on WGBH-FM. He will conduct the same program Friday at 2 p.m. and Saturday at 8:30 p.m. Symphony No. 35 in D, the "Haffner" by Mozart and Bruckner's Symphony No. 8.

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Friday afternoon December 5 1969 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening December 6 1969 at 8.30
Tuesday evening December 16 1969 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

MOZART — Symphony no. 35 in D K. 385 'Haffner'
Allegro con spirito
Andante
Menuetto & trio
Finale: presto

intermission

BRUCKNER — Symphony no. 8 in C minor
Allegro moderato
Scherzo: allegro moderato – trio: langsam
Adagio (feierlich langsam; doch nicht schleppend)
Finale: feierlich, nicht schnell

A Report on Two Symphony Concerts

I heard two concerts last week, the opening program of the New Bedford Symphony Orchestra's 12th season, and the third concert in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's current Tuesday "B" Series.

Under the baton of John R. Pandolfi, the New Bedford group was in exceptionally good form, particularly in the two substantial pieces of music on the program—Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" Overture and Schubert's youthful and lilting "Symphony No. 5 in B Flat Major." I thought that the orchestra performed with precision, with a well-integrated sonority, with nice attention to phrasing — the only defect being some limitation in its dynamic range. All in all, it was a concert that merited an audience much larger than the 150 listeners present on the occasion.

At Symphony Hall, Erich Leinsdorf returned to his old podium, this time in the role of guest conductor. The two composers featured on the program — Alban Berg and Tschaikovsky — would appear to be strange musical companions, indeed. But Mr. Leinsdorf is a canny man. He knows, for example, that Berg is the most romantic of the 12-tone composers — indeed one of the few who has been able to infuse his atonal works with both expressiveness and emotion.

These qualities were much in evidence in the orchestra's virtuoso playing of "The Lyric Suite," "Five Altenberg Songs" and three excerpts from the opera, "Wozzek," with soprano Evelyn Lear as soloist in the latter two works. The hearing of the three "Wozzek" excerpts supported by conviction that this opera is one of the few genuine masterpieces of 20th-Century music.

As for Tschaikovsky — well, we all know how romantic he is. Mr. Leinsdorf and his musicians pulled out all the stops in their playing of the "Pathetique" symphony — a glowing, moving, highly emotional rendition that had me limp at the end.

STANDARD-TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
(E) 70,000 (S) 60,000

DEC 7 1969

Leinsdorf in 2d BSO Appearance

By L. DAVID HARRIS
Music Critic

Erich Leinsdorf made his second appearance of the season as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday. The occasion called for Mozart and Bruckner symphonies and it was all pleasant listening — but there was too little of Mozart and too much of Bruckner.

Leinsdorf began by fairly zipping through Mozart's admittedly short "Symphony No. 35 in D (Haffner)," barely pausing in between movements.

The music was crisp, clean —the strings seemed far more responsive to Leinsdorf than they were in last week's opening Alban Berg's pieces.

Contrasts in dynamics were appreciated and if there is any substantial negative criticism to give, it might only be that the symphony seemed more like exercise runs than a full-blown orchestral work. It was almost as if Leinsdorf was running through it as a warm-up for Bruckner.

Bruckner's eighth symphony followed the intermission. Many good things can be said about it—mainly clear conducting, excellent string work, good solo horn, strong trumpets, coolly efficient tympani work. The tuba was dramatically forceful.

Negatively, it seemed the overall-effect of the entire work was that of ponderous, heavy music. Contrasts in dynamics could have been more effective and occasionally it seemed to drag. In the third movement, several persons in the audience (around the reviewer) went to sleep.

There were some intonation problems. Woodwinds had difficulties in the third movement, the finale found trombones and horns occasionally off pitch.

The symphony's final two minutes were excellent, dramatic. There were plenty of good times before them too, but all the positive aspects of the performance didn't quite make the symphony that memorable for concertgoers.

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300

DEC 6 1969

Erich Leinsdorf and William Steinberg conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra next week and their concerts will be broadcast live from Symphony Hall by Albany FM station WAMC (90.3 mc.)

Leinsdorf will conduct Tuesday, Dec. 16, at 8:30 p.m. when his program will be Symphony No. 35, the "Haffner," by Mozart and Bruckner's Symphony No. 8.

The Friday (Dec. 19 at 2 p.m.) concert will be directed by Mr. Steinberg, who has chosen the overture to Sinigaglia's "Le Buffe Chiozotte," Elgar's Cello Concerto in E Minor, Op. 85 (Zara Nelsova, soloist); and Tchaikovsky's "Manfred" Symphony.

Schenectady Gazette
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 55,931

DEC 8 1969

Patriot Ledger 12-6-69

MUSIC

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Symphony Hall, Boston—
Tonight at 8:30 p.m.
Erich Leinsdorf conducting Mozart, Symphony no. 35 in D.K. 385 "Haffner;" Bruckner, Symphony no. 8 in C minor.
Rest of the week on tour.

24

- PHOTOGRAPH -
ORIGINAL STORED
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Earl J. Dias Review

Leinsdorf Return Visit Thrilling Performance

Erich Leinsdorf returned to the Boston Symphony podium last night ~~as guest conductor~~ (he will be on hand for two weeks) in the third program of the Tuesday "B" Series. His choice of Alban Berg and Tschaikovsky as the only two composers featured in the concert may have seemed, at first, to be an example of strange musical bedfellows.

After all, Berg is hardly a conventional or traditional composer, whereas Tschaikovsky obviously is. Yet the pairing of these two men is actually not so strange or incongrous. Berg is, for example, regarded as the romanticist of the 12 tone school inasmuch as he succeeded in infusing expressiveness and emotion into the harsh, austere sounds of atonality.

And emotion was the keynote of the entire concert in Berg's "Lyric Suite" (for strings), in his "Five Altenberg Songs" and in three excerpts from his opera, "Wozzeck," and, of course, in Tschaikovsky's "Symphony No. 6," the perennially popular "Pathetique," with its conveying of sorrow and perhaps of alienation.

Moreover, and Leinsdorf may have had this fact in mind, too, all the works on the program gave the orchestra welcome opportunity to demonstrate its remarkable virtuosity.

That Mr. Leinsdorf can conduct Berg with clarity and understanding and that the orchestra can rise nobly to the complexities of Berg's scoring was at once evident in the three movements from "The Lyric Suite." Especially impressive was the beautifully controlled manner in which the ensemble played the inordine delicate Allegro.

Soprano Evelyn Lear, who has made a considerable reputation in contemporary works, was soloist in "Five Altenberg Songs" and in two of the excerpts from "Wozzeck."

Miss Lear has a lyric voice of much warmth and commendable range; she managed well the intricate line of the Altenberg songs (their cryptic texts were written by the poet Altenberg on postcards to understanding friends). In two of Marie's arias from "Wozzeck," she managed, too, to convey the emotion and the passion inherent in Marie's troubled mind — although, at times, her voice was somewhat smothered by loud orchestral accompaniment.

A boy soprano, William Wright, of the Berkshire Boys' choir, sand his short contribution to the program well; his song is the words of Marie's child in the devastatingly effective final scene of the opera. "Wozzek" is, of course, one of the masterpieces of 20th Century music. Even in brief excerpts from it, taken really out of context and so perhaps losing some effect, I am convinced that not since "Pelleas and Leisande" has there been an opera in which text and music are so cohesively one.

As for Tschaikovsky's "Pathetique," Leinsdorf and the orchestra gave it a glowing and moving performance. And surprisingly enough, the tragic implications of the work, its searching, its air of disease seem to have as much, if not more contemporary relevance than the more modern works by Berg.

The next concert in the Series will be performed on Jan. 18, with Michael Tilson Thomas as conductor.

Leinsdorf Returns

To BSO for Berg and Tchaikovsky

By HAROLD C. SPROUL

The Boston Symphony under Erich Leinsdorf last Saturday presented the ~~two works of~~ Alban Berg with a sensitivity to form and color that made them an inescapable revelation. The three movements from the "Lyric Suite," originally for string quartet, had been arranged for string orchestra by the composer himself. While the clear definition of four strings is missing, Berg must have felt that these movements could do with discrete amplification of tonal mass and perspective, and indeed they can it performed as they were in Symphony Hall.

One could forget all the mumbo jumbo of 12 tone technique and hear that the Andante was really amorososo, melting and singing, the Allegro really "misterioso", a muted squiggle of instrumental pattern veiled in a hush shot through with color; and the Adagio really appassionato, urgent lines of force emerging from impressionistic wash of sound. Technique of composer and performers disappeared in a projection of immediate and rare experience. Nothing in Wagner or Debussy was ever so convincingly now. Verbally, e. e. cummings, to a degree, and Paul Klee, visually, but neither with a comparable continuum of tone and atmosphere. Two minutes of music is, with Berg, an eternity.

Along with the dominating drive of his teacher, Schonberg, Berg had a private inspiration that transcended the teaching.

The five Alterberg songs, opus four, are the first independent product of the growing composer and can only be matched by Mahler's songs with orchestra. But with Berg there is no folk song derivation for the vocal line which speaks its romantic longing within the orchestra, geography of situation and feeling according to Wagnerian idea, only more sensitively—so directly expressive that, as with Schubert or Mozart, the music speaks more directly than the words. Evelyn Lear, the soprano for the songs, as also for the following Three Excerpts from the opera Wozzek was ideal in voice and style, collaborating with instrumental sounds with vibrant intensity or clear open tone and a reserve of power when needed, chamber music musicianship and imagination.

method of wallowing in melody also picked by Berg, before the opera could be performed and by themselves bypass the neurotic convolutions of the plot. Marie's room in the evening is not necessarily a whore's out the down dropping of shadow for anyone along the raucous military march a fracture and lift to loneliness, and the cradle song a return to the love of a child, not necessarily a bastard by poor tormented Wozzek, the cannon-fodder soldier. And so on, the music for the suicide drowning of Wozzek is a masterpiece of watery sound that is frighteningly engulfing.

Berg died in Vienna in 1935 at the age of fifty. Once and for all he proved that any technical scheme for music is valid if one has an ear and a sensitivity to human predicaments. But is it understood by the present technically overtrained graduates of the best conservatories?

After the revelation, the indulgence. Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique" for Leinsdorf is a challenge to out Tchaikovsky Tchaikovsky. This great symphony has become the sport of conductors. It certainly lends itself to exaggeration but, as Toscannini once demonstrated, owes much to the composer's admiration for the fine control of Mozart. Leinsdorf chooses the crowd-pleasing method of wallowing melody and heavy speed. Well, why not? It is a thrill for the lethargic listener and more so for the listening to television drama. But still, there is a deeper thrill when Allegro con grazia has really some grace in its tempo and molto vivace isn't scrambled eggs. Well maybe so, but the final Adagio lamentoso after a furor that signaled all hell and hurrah—with prescribed button applause—the symphony that began in darkness ended in darkness—a shocking but, but he can tell you.

LEINSDORF STYLE

The Boston Symphony under Erich Leinsdorf returned to Symphony Hall last weekend for two concerts with the orchestra. Friday afternoon Dec. 5 and 6 on Saturday. He will conduct the Berg Kammerkonzert at 2 p.m. and Saturday at 8:30 p.m. Symphony No. 35 in D, the "Haffner," by Mozart, and Bruckner's Symphony No. 8.

A Report on Two Symphony Concerts

I heard two concerts last week, the opening program of the New Bedford Symphony Orchestra's 12th season, and the third concert in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's current Tuesday "B" Series.

Under the baton of John R. Pandolfi, the New Bedford group was in exceptionally good form, particularly in the two substantial pieces of music on the program—Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" Overture and Schubert's youthful and lilting "Symphony No. 5 in B Flat Major." I thought that the orchestra performed with precision, with a well-integrated sonority, with nice attention to phrasing — the only defect being some limitation in its dynamic range. All in all, it was a concert that merited an audience much larger than the 150 listeners present on the occasion.

At Symphony Hall, Erich Leinsdorf returned to his old podium, this time in the role of guest conductor. The two composers featured on the program — Alban Berg and Tschaikovsky — would appear to be strange musical companions, indeed. But Mr. Leinsdorf is a canny man. He knows, for example, that Berg is the most romantic of the 12-tone composers — indeed one of the few who has been able to infuse his atonal works with both expressiveness and emotion.

These qualities were much in evidence in the orchestra's virtuoso playing of "The Lyric Suite," "Five Altenberg Songs" and three excerpts from the opera, "Wozzek," with soprano Evelyn Lear as soloist in the latter two works. The hearing of the three "Wozzek" excerpts supported by conviction that this opera is one of the few genuine masterpieces of 20th-Century music.

As for Tschaikovsky — well, we all know how romantic he is. Mr. Leinsdorf and his musicians pulled out all the stops in their playing of the "Pathetique" symphony — a glowing, moving, highly emotional rendition that had me limp at the end.

Erich Leinsdorf and William Steinberg conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra next week and their concerts will be broadcast live from Symphony Hall by Albany FM station WAMC (90.3 mc).

Leinsdorf will conduct Tuesday, Dec. 16, at 8:30 p.m. when his program will be Symphony No. 35, the "Haffner," by Mozart and Bruckner's Symphony No. 8.

The Friday (Dec. 19) at 2 p.m. concert will be directed by Mr. Steinberg, who has chosen the overture to Sauguet's "Le Baiser Chuozotte," Elgar's Cello Concerto in E Minor, Op. 85 (Zara Nelsova, soloist); and Tchaikovsky's "Manfred" Symphony.

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Friday afternoon December 5 1969 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening December 6 1969 at 8.30
Tuesday evening December 16 1969 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

MOZART — Symphony no. 35 in D K. 385 'Haffner'
Allegro con spirito
Andante
Menuetto & trio
Finale: presto

intermission

BRUCKNER — Symphony no. 8 in C minor
Allegro moderato
Scherzo: allegro moderato – trio: langsam
Adagio (feierlich langsam; doch nicht schleppend)
Finale: feierlich, nicht schnell

Leinsdorf in 2d BSO Appearance

By E. DAVID HARRIS
Staff Critic

Erich Leinsdorf made his second appearance as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last Saturday afternoon and Berg's "Kammerkonzert" and Mozart's Symphony No. 35 in D, the "Haffner," by Mozart, and Bruckner's Symphony No. 8.

Patriot Ledger 12-6-69

MUSIC

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Symphony Hall, Boston—
Tonight at 8:30 p.m.
Erich Leinsdorf conducting Mozart, Symphony no. 35 in D.K. 385 "Haffner;" Bruckner, Symphony no. 8 in C minor.
Rest of the week on tour.

25

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

DEC 6 1969

Brucker 8th given impressive reading

By Craig Smith
Contibuting Critic

The juxtaposition of Mozart and Bruckner at the Boston Symphony concert yesterday afternoon was both informative as to the orchestra's strengths and the progress of the symphonic form from the 1780's to the 1880's.

What sufficed for Mozart (in the case of the Haffner Symphony) was four movements culled from an earlier serenade. By the 1880's a symphony was a much more complex project and the eigth of Bruckner occupied his thoughts for about seven years.

Some sort of historical perspective such as this is necessary, at least for this listener, in order to make the 100 odd minutes of the Bruckner work even tolerable. For certainly in times such as ours, gestures of such expansiveness and pomposity that are Bruckner's tools are difficult to take except on their own terms.

In the case of the concert yesterday, Erich Leinsdorf and the orchestra served Bruckner better than Mozart. Indeed one could scarcely imagine a better performance of the Eighth Symphony. The most minute details of Bruckner's complex orchestration were beautifully clarified by Leinsdorf's understanding direction.

There was some particularly outstanding wind playing in the scherzo. Most impressive also was the expansive Adagio which was movingly done by Leinsdorf with beautiful playing from the horn section in the "Valhalla" music near the end of the movement.

Mozart's wonderful Haffner Symphony, which opened the program, seemed less carefully prepared. Although the performance contained many beautiful moments such as the beginning of the Adagio and the development of the first movement, there were also moments of bumpy graceless playing such as the trio of the minuet.

It also seems strange that Leinsdorf would choose to make an unmarked repeat of the exposition of the first movement while omitting both repeats in the Andante.

Mozart and Bruckner by Leinsdorf and BSO

By Louis Snyder

ARTS
ENTERTAINMENT

Erich Leinsdorf conducted the second of two programs of his current visit to the Boston Symphony on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. It will be repeated in the Cambridge series at Symphony Hall on Dec. 16. Tonight in Philadelphia, he will begin a week of tour appearances with the orchestra, which will include a concert each in New Haven and Brooklyn, and three in New York.

Two symphonies—Mozart's "Haffner" (No. 35 in D), and Anton Bruckner's Eighth (in C minor)—comprised the weekend program. Neither of the works can be said to have been too long absent from the repertory—the Mozart was played last year, the Bruckner in 1965.

Hurried 'Haffner'

Perhaps pre-performance emphasis had been placed on the mammoth Eighth, but somehow (on Friday, at least), the Haffner was tossed off like an exercise, with a minimum of loving care. It seemed rushed, with resultant scrambling in the first violins on two occasions, and through that intangible network that operates from performer to audience, one had the impression that all hearts weren't in it. Too bad—such heavenly music, to play and to hear.

How heavenly the music of Bruckner is lies in the ear of the listener. Certainly there is nothing startling enough in it nowadays to send one scuttling prematurely from the hall, as it did the Viennese critic Eduard Hanslick in 1892. We are indebted to John N. Burk's program notes for the information that Bruckner's only request of the Emperor of Austria, to whom he had dedicated his symphony, was that "Your Majesty be kind enough to tell Mr. Hanslick not to write such bad criticisms of my work." Yes, even then.

Lend an ear

It would be hard not to think well of Bruckner in general, and his Eighth Symphony in particular, as Mr. Leinsdorf and the orchestra played it on Friday. Merely as sound, it was a stimulating experience, if indeed the content alternates between the beautiful and the pedestrian (for non-Bruckner buffs), and some of the repetitiveness (in the Adagio, for instance) seems more to be pitied then censured. The success of the work at its first performance in Vienna, at its Boston introduction 60 years ago, and as part of the current best-of-Bruckner revival campaign, would indicate that there are many who don't mind its length and the occasional sparseness of its musical ideas.

Whatever one may think, he must lend an ear to Bruckner, especially when there are performances of the caliber of those given by Mr. Leinsdorf and the BSO. Special mention for fine playing should go to the brass and the winds (an extra bow for Mrs. Dwyer and Mr. Matheny), whom the composer has kept busiest to the best effect.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

DEC 8 1969

MERCURY
MEDFORD, MASS.
(E) 8,900

DEC 15 1969

Eric Leinsdorf will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra Tuesday at 8:30 p.m when his program will be Symphony No. 35, the "Haffner" by Mozart and Bruckner's Symphony No. 8. The concert will be broadcast live from Symphony Hall in Boston by Albany FM station WAMC (90.3 mc.).

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

DEC 6 1969

Symphony Points Up Paradox of Bruckner's Music

By McLAREN HARRIS

The Munch era brought lean years for Anton Bruckner at Symphony Hall, and it fell to Erich Leinsdorf to restore to the Austrian symphonist a degree of stature in BSO programs. That Mr. Leinsdorf continues the effort during guest engagements (Bruckner's Eighth Symphony is this week's principal work) is worthy of note, for he may be one of a diminishing breed.

Hanslick's acid admission that Bruckner's music may belong to the future was no more true than it is now, and it may be observed that the composer's popularity continues to follow a gradual, downward trend.

THE RANKS of conductors who incorporate Bruckner's symphonies into their repertories become even thinner; making them musically viable requires somewhat uncommon perseverance, abiding love and devotion and a keen, scholarly instinct to descern the most valid and artistically rewanding score among the many Bruckner editions available. And when all is said and done, someone may question whether the experience has been worth the expenditure.

There was grandeur in the Symphony's performance of Bruckner's Eighth, but it served mostly to point up the overwhelming paradox between the composer's fertile imagination for distinctive motives, orchestral coloring and wide-spanned contrasts and the futility of his endeavors to carry his ideas to fruition.

The characteristic triplet rhythm which John Burk, in some rather apologetic program notes, called Bruckner's "fingerprint" threatens to become a footprint before the opening movement is concluded, even in the company of other themes.

And the ensuing, lumbering Scherzo, which is as rich in flashes of poignancy and orchestral effect as any other Bruckner, sinks into a tragic whirlpool of endless repetition — varied in weight and register and interspersed with tonal shifts, to be sure, but repetition nonetheless.

SOONER OR LATER one must ask where the composer's responsibility ends and the conductor's begins — whether, for instance, the arrested see-saw image of the Adagio was due to Bruckner's overextension of the rondo-variation form or to Mr. Leinsdorf's seemingly ill-defined dynamic scheme. Anything like total impressions were lost in continuous wave-motion swells and declines which, striking enough individually, took on a dulling sameness in succession; this is undeniably in the conductor's camp, but to be charitable, Mr. Leinsdorf was up against formidable odds.

One may question if such a thing exists as a definitive performance of Bruckner's Eighth, or even if listeners would recognize it. Friday's reading — in the first pair of movements, anyway — contained passages of compelling power and tenderness, but they began to give way to a kind of motionless, pause-and-ponder beauty which paled, unfortunately, before Bruckner was finished.

The orchestra's work, however, was admirably durable and cohesive; seams in the brass never showed except when incisiveness was the order, and strings laid an ethereal backdrop of tremolo to highlight thematic work.

Bruckner's companion-piece, Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony, was also the weak sister in performance. Nothing was done to compensate for a certain tonal heaviness, centering about those thumping Paukenschlage, which may pit the violins in a losing battle against low strings and winds. The Symphony violins fought the battle Friday with the usual result, complicated by generally loose joints and lack of precision in the quick movements. The obvious cause was neglect; Bruckner may not have minded, but Mozart must be furious.

FILMED FOR AIR: FRIDAY, DECEMBER 5, 1969

BOOKSPAN - WNAC-TV 11 PM NEWS

AUDIO

Good evening everyone. Erich Leinsdorf, the former Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, this afternoon conducted the second of his two programs here this season as a guest conductor. Staying comfortably within the range of where his most instinctive sympathies lie, Mr. Leinsdorf has unyielding Teutonic solidity about the concert, and Mr. Leinsdorf's rigid and metronomic approach did not allow either score to take wing. And the playing of the orchestra sounded labored - as though the musicians had just returned from a tiring trip. Mr.

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Thursday evening December 18 1969 at 8.30

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS conductor

HAYDN	Symphony no: 98 in B flat Adagio – allegro Adagio cantabile Menuetto & trio Presto
IVES	'Three places in New England', an orchestral set The 'St Gaudens' in Boston Common (Colonel Shaw and his colored regiment) Putnam's camp, Redding, Connecticut From The Housatonic at Stockbridge
intermission
BRAHMS	Symphony no. 2 in D op. 73* Allegro non troppo Adagio non troppo Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino Allegro con spirito

BOOKSPAN WNAC-TV 11 PM NEWS THURSDAY, DECEMBER 18, 1969

AUDIO

Good evening, everyone. It is just two months since Michael Tilson Thomas, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's brilliant new Assistant Conductor, stood [illegible] on the stage of Symphony Hall to conduct the orchestra for the first time. You may remember that in reviewing that concert, I said that young Mr. Thomas is the genuine article, a "born conductor" with tremendous authority, a powerful musical intellect, and a persuasive communicative ability that is immediately transmitted to the musicians and the audience. Well, in the two months since I said those words, Mr. Thomas has made quite a name for himself. On the Orchestra's first visit to New York, he was called upon literally with no advance notice whatsoever in the middle of a concert to substitute for William Steinberg who was taken suddenly ill. Mr. Thomas conducted the concluding work on that Philharmonic Hall concert and then three subsequent full concert [illegible] in the New York area, and he covered himself with glory, winning accolades from the New [illegible] NEWS.

25

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
DEC 6 1969

Brucker 8th given impressive reading

By Craig Smith
Contibuting Critic

The juxtaposition of Mozart and Bruckner at the Boston Symphony concert yesterday afternoon was both informative as to the orchestra's strengths and the progress of the symphonic form from the 1780's to the 1880's.

What sufficed for Mozart (in the case of the Haffner Symphony) was four movements culled from an earlier serenade. By the 1880's a symphony was a much more complex project and the eigth of Bruckner occupied his thoughts for about seven years.

Some sort of historical perspective such as this is necessary, at least for this listener, in order to make the 100 odd minutes of the Bruckner work even tolerable. For certainly in times such as ours, gestures of such expansiveness and pomposity that are Bruckner's tools are difficult to take except on their own terms.

In the case of the concert yesterday, Erich Leinsdorf and the orchestra served Bruckner better than Mozart. Indeed one could scarcely imagine a better performance of the Eighth Symphony. The most minute details of Bruckner's complex orchestration were beautifully clarified by Leinsdorf's understanding direction.

There was some particularly outstanding wind playing in the scherzo. Most impressive also was the expansive Adagio which was movingly done by Leinsdorf with beautiful playing from the horn section in the "Valhalla" music near the end of the movement.

Mozart's wonderful Haffner Symphony, which opened the program, seemed less carefully prepared. Although the performance contained many beautiful moments such as the beginning of the Adagio and the development of the first movement, there were also moments of bumpy graceless playing such as the trio of the minuet.

It also seems strange that Leinsdorf would choose to make an unmarked repeat of the exposition of the first movement while omitting both repeats in the Andante.

Mozart and Bruckner by Leinsdorf and BSO

By Louis Snyder

ARTS
ENTERTAINMENT

Erich Leinsdorf conducted the second of two programs of his current visit to the Boston Symphony on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. It will be repeated in the Cambridge series at Symphony Hall on Dec. 16. Tonight in Philadelphia, he will begin a week of tour appearances with the orchestra, which will include a concert each in New Haven and Brooklyn, and three in New York.

Two symphonies—Mozart's "Haffner" (No. 35 in D), and Anton Bruckner's Eighth (in C minor)—comprised the weekend program. Neither of the works can be said to have been too long absent from the repertory—the Mozart was played last year, the Bruckner in 1965.

Hurried 'Haffner'

Perhaps pre-performance emphasis had been placed on the mammoth Eighth, but somehow (on Friday, at least), the Haffner was tossed off like an exercise, with a minimum of loving care. It seemed rushed, with resultant scrambling in the first violins on two occasions, and through that intangible network that operates from performer to audience, one had the impression that all hearts weren't in it. Too bad—such heavenly music, to play and to hear.

How heavenly the music of Bruckner is lies in the ear of the listener. Certainly there is nothing startling enough in it nowadays to send one scuttling prematurely from the hall, as it did the Viennese critic Eduard Hanslick in 1892. We are indebted to John N. Burk's program notes for the information that Bruckner's only request of the Emperor of Austria, to whom he had dedicated his symphony, was that "Your Majesty be kind enough to tell Mr. Hanslick not to write such bad criticisms of my work." Yes, even then.

Lend an ear

It would be hard not to think well of Bruckner in general, and his Eighth Symphony in particular, as Mr. Leinsdorf and the orchestra played it on Friday. Merely as sound, it was a stimulating experience, if indeed the content alternates between the beautiful and the pedestrian (for non-Bruckner buffs), and some of the repetitiveness (in the Adagio, for instance) seems more to be pitied then censured. The success of the work at its first performance in Vienna, at its Boston introduction 60 years ago, and as part of the current best-of-Bruckner revival campaign, would indicate that there are many who don't mind its length and the occasional sparseness of its musical ideas.

Whatever one may think, he must lend an ear to Bruckner, especially when there are performances of the caliber of those given by Mr. Leinsdorf and the BSO. Special mention for fine playing should go to the brass and the winds (an extra bow for Mrs. Dwyer and Mr. Matheny), whom the composer has kept busiest to the best effect.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850
DEC 8 1969

MERCURY
MEDFORD, MASS.
(E) 8,900
DEC 15 1969

Eric Leinsdorf will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra Tuesday at 8:30 p.m when his program will be Symphony No. 35, the "Haffner" by Mozart and Bruckner's Symphony No. 8. The concert will be broadcast live from Symphony Hall in Boston by Albany FM station WAMC (90.3 mc.).

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Thursday evening December 18 1969 at 8.30

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS conductor

HAYDN	Symphony no: 98 in B flat Adagio – allegro Adagio cantabile Menuetto & trio Presto
IVES	'Three places in New England', an orchestral set The 'St Gaudens' in Boston Common (Colonel Shaw and his colored regiment) Putnam's camp, Redding, Connecticut From The Housatonic at Stockbridge
intermission
BRAHMS	Symphony no. 2 in D op. 73* Allegro non troppo Adagio non troppo Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino Allegro con spirito

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
DEC 6 1969

Symphony Points Up Paradox of Bruckner's Music

By McLAREN HARRIS

The Munch era brought lean years for Anton Bruckner at Symphony Hall, and it fell to Erich Leinsdorf to restore to the Austrian symphonist a degree of stature in BSO programs. That Mr. Leinsdorf continues the effort during guest engagements (Bruckner's Eighth Symphony is this week's principal work) is worthy of note, for he may be one of a diminishing breed.

Hanslick's acid admission that Bruckner's music may belong to the future was no more true than it is now, and it may be observed that the composer's popularity continues to follow a gradual, downward trend.

THE RANKS of conductors who incorporate Bruckner's symphonies into their repertories become even thinner; making them musically viable requires somewhat uncommon perseverance, abiding love and devotion and a keen, scholarly instinct to descern the most valid and artistically rewarding score among the many Bruckner editions available. And when all is said and done, someone may question whether the experience has been worth the expenditure.

There was grandeur in the Symphony's performance of Bruckner's Eighth, but it served mostly to point up the overwhelming paradox between the composer's fertile imagination for distinctive motives, orchestral coloring and wide-spanned contrasts and the futility of his endeavors to carry his ideas to fruition.

The characteristic triplet rhythm which John Burk, in some rather apologetic program notes, called Bruckner's "fingerprint" threatens to become a footprint before the opening movement is concluded, even in the company of other themes.

And the ensuing, lumbering Scherzo, which is as rich in flashes of poignancy and orchestral effect as any other Bruckner, sinks into a tragic whirlpool of endless repetition — varied in weight and register and interspersed with tonal shifts, to be sure, but repetition nonetheless.

SOONER OR LATER one must ask where the composer's responsibility ends and the conductor's begins — whether, for instance, the arrested see-saw image of the Adagio was due to Bruckner's overextension of the rondo-variation form or to Mr. Leinsdorf's seemingly ill-defined dynamic scheme. Anything like total impressions were lost in continuous wave-motion swells and declines which, striking enough individually, took on a dulling sameness in succession; this is undeniably in the conductor's camp, but to be charitable, Mr. Leinsdorf was up against formidable odds.

One may question if such a thing exists as a definitive performance of Bruckner's Eighth, or even if listeners would recognize it. Friday's reading — in the first pair of movements, anyway — contained passages of compelling power and tenderness, but they began to give way to a kind of motionless, pause-and-ponder beauty which paled, unfortunately, before Bruckner was finished.

The orchestra's work, however, was admirably durable and cohesive; seams in the brass never showed except when incisiveness was the order, and strings laid an ethereal backdrop of tremolo to highlight thematic work.

Bruckner's companion-piece, Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony, was also the weak sister in performance. Nothing was done to compensate for a certain tonal heaviness, centering about those thumping Paukenschlage, which may pit the violins in a losing battle against low strings and winds. The Symphony violins fought the battle Friday with the usual result, complicated by generally loose joints and lack of precision in the quick movements. The obvious cause was neglect; Bruckner may not have minded, but Mozart must be furious.

BOOKSPAN WNAC-TV 11 PM NEWS THURSDAY, DECEMBER 18, 1969

AUDIO

Good evening, everyone. It is just two months since Michael Tilson Thomas, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's brilliant new Assistant Conductor, stood [illegible] on the stage of Symphony Hall to conduct the orchestra for the first time. You may remember [illegible] York press and public.

This evening, Michael Tilson Thomas conducted another Boston Symphony concert in Symphony Hall, including on his program a work that he had not previously led in Boston - the Second Symphony of Brahms. I've just come from the concert, and again, Michael Tilson Thomas proved to be a most interesting and satisfying conductor. I was chiefly interested in his Brahms performance, since the other two works had figured on Thomas, we have an extraordinary young conductor in Boston.

And now, back to Bill Brooks and more news.

FILMED FOR AIR: FRIDAY, DECEMBER 5, 1969
BOOKSPAN - WNAC-TV 11 PM NEWS

programmed two symphonies by two standard masters of the Viennese tradition - Mozart and Bruckner: the "Haffner" Symphony, No. 35, by Mozart, and the Eighth in C Minor by Bruckner.

It was not one of the more memorable afternoons in Symphony Hall this season: there was a heavy air of unyielding Teutonic solidity about the concert, and Mr. Leinsdorf's rigid and metronomic approach did not allow either score to take wing. And the playing of the orchestra sounded labored - as though the musicians had just returned from a tiring trip.

Mr.

25

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
DEC 6 1969

Brucker 8th given impressive reading

By Craig Smith
Contibuting Critic

The juxtaposition of Mozart and Bruckner at the Boston Symphony concert yesterday afternoon was both informative as to the orchestra's strengths and the progress of the symphonic form from the 1780's to the 1880's.

What sufficed for Mozart (in the case of the Haffner Symphony) was four movements culled from an earlier serenade. By the 1880's a symphony was a much more complex project and the eigth of Bruckner occupied his thoughts for about seven years.

Some sort of historical perspective such as this is necessary, at least for this listener, in order to make the 100 odd minutes of the Bruckner work even tolerable. For certainly in times such as ours, gestures of such expansiveness and pomposity that are Bruckner's tools are difficult to take except on their own terms.

In the case of the concert yesterday, Erich Leinsdorf and the orchestra served Bruckner better than Mozart. Indeed one could scarcely imagine a better performance of the Eighth Symphony. The most minute details of Bruckner's complex orchestration were beautifully clarified by Leinsdorf's understanding direction.

There was some particularly outstanding wind playing in the scherzo. Most impressive also was the expansive Adagio which was movingly done by Leinsdorf with beautiful playing from the horn section in the "Valhalla" music near the end of the movement.

Mozart's wonderful Haffner Symphony, which opened the program, seemed less carefully prepared. Although the performance contained many beautiful moments such as the beginning of the Adagio and the development of the first movement, there were also moments of bumpy graceless playing such as the trio of the minuet.

It also seems strange that Leinsdorf would choose to make an unmarked repeat of the exposition of the first movement while omitting both repeats in the Andante.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
DEC 6 1969

Mozart and Bruckner by Leinsdorf and BSO

By Louis Snyder

ARTS
ENTERTAINMENT

Erich Leinsdorf conducted the second of two programs of his current visit to the Boston Symphony on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. It will be repeated in the Cambridge series at Symphony Hall on Dec. 16. Tonight in Philadelphia, he will begin a week of tour appearances with the orchestra, which will include a concert each in New Haven and Brooklyn, and three in New York.

Two symphonies—Mozart's "Haffner" (No. 35 in D), and Anton Bruckner's Eighth (in C minor)—comprised the weekend program. Neither of the works can be said to have been too long absent from the repertory—the Mozart was played last year, the Bruckner in 1965.

Hurried 'Haffner'

Perhaps pre-performance emphasis had been placed on the mammoth Eighth, but somehow (on Friday, at least), the Haffner was tossed off like an exercise, with a minimum of loving care. It seemed rushed, with resultant scrambling in the first violins on two occasions, and through that intangible network that operates from performer to audience, one had the impression that all hearts weren't in it. Too bad—such heavenly music, to play and to hear.

How heavenly the music of Bruckner is lies in the ear of the listener. Certainly there is nothing startling enough in it nowadays to send one scuttling prematurely from the hall, as it did the Viennese critic Eduard Hanslick in 1892. We are indebted to John N. Burk's program notes for the information that Bruckner's only request of the Emperor of Austria, to whom he had dedicated his symphony, was that "Your Majesty be kind enough to tell Mr. Hanslick not to write such bad criticisms of my work." Yes, even then.

Lend an ear

It would be hard not to think well of Bruckner in general, and his Eighth Symphony in particular, as Mr. Leinsdorf and the orchestra played it on Friday. Merely as sound, it was a stimulating experience, if indeed the content alternates between the beautiful and the pedestrian (for non-Bruckner buffs), and some of the repetitiveness (in the Adagio, for instance) seems more to be pitied then censured. The success of the work at its first performance in Vienna, at its Boston introduction 60 years ago, and as part of the current best-of-Bruckner revival campaign, would indicate that there are many who don't mind its length and the occasional sparseness of its musical ideas.

Whatever one may think, he must lend an ear to Bruckner, especially when there are performances of the caliber of those given by Mr. Leinsdorf and the BSO. Special mention for fine playing should go to the brass and the winds (an extra bow for Mrs. Dwyer and Mr. Matheny), whom the composer has kept busiest to the best effect.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850
DEC 8 1969

MERCURY
MEDFORD, MASS.
(E) 8,900
DEC 15 1969

Eric Leinsdorf will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra Tuesday at 8:30 p.m when his program will be Symphony No. 35, the "Haffner" by Mozart and Bruckner's Symphony No. 8. The concert will be broadcast live from Symphony Hall in Boston by Albany FM station WAMC (90.3 mc.).

Symphony Points Up Paradox of Bruckner's Music

By McLAREN HARRIS

The Munch era brought lean years for Anton Bruckner at Symphony Hall, and it fell to Erich Leinsdorf to restore to the Austrian symphonist a degree of stature in BSO programs. That Mr. Leinsdorf continues the effort during guest engagements (Bruckner's Eighth Symphony is this week's principal work) is worthy of note, for he may be one of a diminishing breed.

Hanslick's acid admission that Bruckner's music may belong to the future was no more true than it is now, and it may be observed that the composer's popularity continues to follow a gradual, downward trend.

THE RANKS of conductors who incorporate Bruckner's symphonies into their repertories become even thinner; making them musically viable requires somewhat uncommon perseverance, abiding love and devotion and a keen, scholarly instinct to descern the most valid and artistically rewarding score among the many Bruckner editions available. And when all is said and done, someone may question whether the experience has been worth the expenditure.

There was grandeur in the Symphony's performance of Bruckner's Eighth, but it served mostly to point up the overwhelming paradox between the composer's fertile imagination for distinctive motives, orchestral coloring and wide-spanned contrasts and the futility of his endeavors to carry his ideas to fruition.

The characteristic triplet rhythm which John Burk, in some rather apologetic program notes, called Bruckner's "fingerprint" threatens to become a footprint before the opening movement is concluded, even in the company of other themes.

And the ensuing, lumbering Scherzo, which is as rich in flashes of poignancy and orchestral effect as any other Bruckner, sinks into a tragic whirlpool of endless repetition — varied in weight and register and interspersed with tonal shifts, to be sure, but repetition nonetheless.

SOONER OR LATER one must ask where the composer's responsibility ends and the conductor's begins — whether, for instance, the arrested see-saw image of the Adagio was due to Bruckner's overextension of the rondo-variation form or to Mr. Leinsdorf's seemingly ill-defined dynamic scheme. Anything like total impressions were lost in continuous wave-motion swells and declines which, striking enough individually, took on a dulling sameness in succession; this is undeniably in the conductor's camp, but to be charitable, Mr. Leinsdorf was up against formidable odds.

One may question if such a thing exists as a definitive performance of Bruckner's Eighth, or even if listeners would recognize it. Friday's reading — in the first pair of movements, anyway — contained passages of compelling power and tenderness, but they began to give way to a kind of motionless, pause-and-ponder beauty which paled, unfortunately, before Bruckner was finished.

The orchestra's work, how-

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Thursday evening December 18 1969 at 8.30

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS conductor

HAYDN	Symphony no: 98 in B flat
	Adagio – allegro
	Adagio cantabile
	Menuetto & trio
	Presto
IVES	'Three places in New England', an orchestral set
	The 'St Gaudens' in Boston Common (Colonel Shaw and his colored regiment)
	Putnam's camp, Redding, Connecticut
	From The Housatonic at Stockbridge
intermission
BRAHMS	Symphony no. 2 in D op. 73*
	Allegro non troppo
	Adagio non troppo
	Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino
	Allegro con spirito

BOOKSPAN WHAC-TV 11 PM NEWS THURSDAY, DECEMBER 18, 1969

AUDIO

[illegible] Leinsdorf's choice of program last week and this [illegible] has been strange indeed. Last week we had music by Berg and Tchaikovsky- in the one instance, music hardly calculated to rouse an audience's enthusiasm, in the other, a score so overplayed that only a performance with positively electric qualities can produce anything but a ho-hum reaction. This week's Mozart and Bruckner might have had a better chance, but the generally-suppressing approach cancelled out any such possibilities.

There has been considerable talk in the public prints of late concerning the situation of newspaper music criticism in Boston vis-a-vis the public. On our 10:30 PM news broadcast tomorrow evening, I'll have something to say about the situation myself.

This is Martin Bookspan for Boston 7 News.

York press and public.

This evening, Michael Tilson Thomas conducted another Boston Symphony concert in Symphony [illegible] his previous program here. He conducted a beautifully sculptured performance of the Brahms, by which I mean that the seams of the work's structure were all closely-knit together and there was a natural ebb and flow to it all. I wish he had been less indulgent of the desire of the principal horn to dominate the ensemble sound, but otherwise it was a performance that reflected credit on everyone concerned.

I shall say it again: in Michael Tilson Thomas, we have an extraordinary young conductor in Boston.

And now, back to Bill Brooks and more news.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
DEC 6 1969

Brucker 8th given impressive reading

By Craig Smith
Contibuting Critic

The juxtaposition of Mozart and Bruckner at the Boston Symphony concert yesterday afternoon was both informative as to the orchestra's strengths and the progress of the symphonic form from the 1780's to the 1880's.

What sufficed for Mozart (in the case of the Haffner Symphony) was four movements culled from an earlier serenade. By the 1880's a symphony was a much more complex project and the eigth of Bruckner occupied his thoughts for about seven years.

Some sort of historical perspective such as this is necessary, at least for this listener, in order to make the 100 odd minutes of the Bruckner work even tolerable. For certainly in times such as ours, gestures of such expansiveness and pomposity that are Bruckner's tools are difficult to take except on their own terms.

In the case of the concert yesterday, Erich Leinsdorf and the orchestra served Bruckner better than Mozart. Indeed one could scarcely imagine a better performance of the Eighth Symphony. The most minute details of Bruckner's complex orchestration were beautifully clarified by Leinsdorf's understanding direction.

There was some particularly outstanding wind playing in the scherzo. Most impressive also was the expansive Adagio which was movingly done by Leinsdorf with beautiful playing from the horn section in the "Valhalla" music near the end of the movement.

Mozart's wonderful Haffner Symphony, which opened the program, seemed less carefully prepared. Although the performance contained many beautiful moments such as the beginning of the Adagio and the development of the first movement, there were also moments of bumpy graceless playing such as the trio of the minuet.

It also seems strange that Leinsdorf would choose to make an unmarked repeat of the exposition of the first movement while omitting both repeats in the Andante.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
DEC 6 1969

Mozart and Bruckner by Leinsdorf and BSO

By Louis Snyder

Erich Leinsdorf conducted the second of two programs of his current visit to the Boston Symphony on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. It will be repeated in the Cambridge series at Symphony Hall on Dec. 16. Tonight in Philadelphia, he will begin a week of tour appearances with the orchestra, which will include a concert each in New Haven and Brooklyn, and three in New York.

Two symphonies—Mozart's "Haffner" (No. 35 in D), and Anton Bruckner's Eighth (in C minor)—comprised the weekend program. Neither of the works can be said to have been too long absent from the repertory—the Mozart was played last year, the Bruckner in 1965.

Hurried 'Haffner'

Perhaps pre-performance emphasis had been placed on the mammoth Eighth, but somehow (on Friday, at least), the Haffner was tossed off like an exercise, with a minimum of loving care. It seemed rushed, with resultant scrambling in the first violins on two occasions, and through that intangible network that operates from performer to audience, one had the impression that all hearts weren't in it. Too bad—such heavenly music, to play and to hear.

How heavenly the music of Bruckner is lies in the ear of the listener. Certainly there is nothing startling enough in it nowadays to send one scuttling prematurely from the hall, as it did the Viennese critic Eduard Hanslick in 1892. We are indebted to John N. Burk's program notes for the information that Bruckner's only request of the Emperor of Austria, to whom he had dedicated his symphony, was that "Your Majesty be kind enough to tell Mr. Hanslick not to write such bad criticisms of my work." Yes, even then.

Lend an ear

It would be hard not to think well of Bruckner in general, and his Eighth Symphony in particular, as Mr. Leinsdorf and the orchestra played it on Friday. Merely as sound, it was a stimulating experience, if indeed the content alternates between the beautiful and the pedestrian (for non-Bruckner buffs), and some of the repetitiveness (in the Adagio, for instance) seems more to be pitied then censured. The success of the work at its first performance in Vienna, at its Boston introduction 60 years ago, and as part of the current best-of-Bruckner revival campaign, would indicate that there are many who don't mind its length and the occasional sparseness of its musical ideas.

Whatever one may think, he must lend an ear to Bruckner, especially when there are performances of the caliber of those given by Mr. Leinsdorf and the BSO. Special mention for fine playing should go to the brass and the winds (an extra bow for Mrs. Dwyer and Mr. Matheny), whom the composer has kept busiest to the best effect.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850
DEC 8 1969

ARTS
ENTERTAINMENT

MERCURY
MEDFORD, MASS.
(E) 8,900
DEC 15 1969

Eric Leinsdorf will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra Tuesday at 8:30 p.m when his program will be Symphony No. 35, the "Haffner" by Mozart and Bruckner's Symphony No. 8. The concert will be broadcast live from Symphony Hall in Boston by Albany FM station WAMC (90.3 mc.).

25

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Thursday evening December 18 1969 at 8.30

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS conductor

HAYDN	Symphony no. 98 in B flat
	Adagio – allegro
	Adagio cantabile
	Menuetto & trio
	Presto
IVES	'Three places in New England', an orchestral set
	The 'St Gaudens' in Boston Common (Colonel Shaw and his colored regiment)
	Putnam's camp, Redding, Connecticut
	From The Housatonic at Stockbridge
intermission
BRAHMS	Symphony no. 2 in D op. 73*
	Allegro non troppo
	Adagio non troppo
	Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino
	Allegro con spirito

Symphony Points Up Paradox of Bruckner's Music

By McLAREN HARRIS

The Munch era brought lean years for Anton Bruckner at Symphony Hall, and it fell to Erich Leinsdorf to restore to the Austrian symphonist a degree of stature in BSO programs. That Mr. Leinsdorf continues the effort during guest engagements (Bruckner's Eighth Symphony is this week's principal work) is worthy of note, for he may be one of a diminishing breed.

Hanslick's acid admission that Bruckner's music may belong to the future was no more true than it is now, and it may be observed that the composer's popularity continues to follow a gradual, downward trend.

THE RANKS of conductors who incorporate Bruckner's symphonies into their repertories become even thinner; making them musically viable requires somewhat uncommon perseverance, abiding love and devotion and a keen, scholarly instinct to descern the most valid and artistically rewarding score among the many Bruckner editions available. And when all is said and done, someone may question whether the experience has been worth the expenditure.

There was grandeur in the Symphony's performance of Bruckner's Eighth, but it served mostly to point up the overwhelming paradox between the composer's fertile imagination for distinctive motives, orchestral coloring and wide-spanned contrasts and the futility of his endeavors to carry his ideas to fruition.

The characteristic triplet rhythm which John Burk, in some rather apologetic program notes, called Bruckner's "fingerprint" threatens to become a footprint before the opening movement is concluded, even in the company of other themes.

And the ensuing, lumbering Scherzo, which is as rich in flashes of poignancy and orchestral effect as any other Bruckner, sinks into a tragic whirlpool of endless repetition — varied in weight and register and interspersed with tonal shifts, to be sure, but repetition nonetheless.

SOONER OR LATER one must ask where the composer's responsibility ends and the conductor's begins — whether, for instance, the arrested see-saw image of the Adagio was due to Bruckner's overextension of the rondo-variation form or to Mr. Leinsdorf's seemingly ill-defined dynamic scheme. Anything like total impressions were lost in continuous wave-motion swells and declines which, striking enough individually, took on a dulling sameness in succession; this is undeniably in the conductor's camp, but to be charitable, Mr. Leinsdorf was up against formidable odds.

One may question if such a thing exists as a definitive performance of Bruckner's Eighth, or even if listeners would recognize it. Friday's reading — in the first pair of movements, anyway — contained passages of compelling power and tenderness, but they began to give way to a kind of motionless, pause-and-ponder beauty which paled, unfortunately, before Bruckner was finished.

The orchestra's work, however, was admirably durable and cohesive; seams in the brass never showed except when incisiveness was the order, and strings laid an ethereal backdrop of tremolo to highlight thematic work.

Bruckner's companion-piece, Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony, was also the weak sister in performance. Nothing was done to compensate for a certain tonal heaviness, centering about those thumping Paukenschlage, which may pit the violins in a losing battle against low strings and winds. The Symphony violins fought the battle Friday with the usual result, complicated by generally loose joints and lack of precision in the quick movements. The obvious cause was neglect; Bruckner may not have minded, but Mozart must be furious.

FILMED FOR AIR: FRIDAY, DECEMBER 5, 1969

BOOKSPAN - WNAC-TV 11 PM NEWS

AUDIO

Good evening everyone. Erich Leinsdorf, the former Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, this afternoon conducted the second of his two programs here this season as a guest conductor. Staying comfortably within the range of where his most instinctive sympathies lie, Mr. Leinsdorf has Symphony Hall this season: there was a heavy air of unyielding Teutonic solidity about the concert, and Mr. Leinsdorf's rigid and metronomic approach did not allow either score to take wing. And the playing of the orchestra sounded labored - as though the musicians had just returned from a tiring trip. Mr.

BOOKSPAN WNAC-TV 11 PM NEWS THURSDAY, DECEMBER 18, 1969

AUDIO

Good evening, everyone. It is just two months since Michael Tilson Thomas, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's brilliant new Assistant Conductor, stood on the stage of Symphony Hall to conduct the orchestra for the first time. You may remember that in reviewing that concert, I said that young Mr. Thomas is the genuine article, a "born conductor" with tremendous authority, a powerful musical intellect, and a persuasive communicative ability that is immediately transmitted to the musicians and the audience. Well, in the two months since I said those words, Mr. Thomas has made quite a name for himself. On the Orchestra's first visit to New York, he was called upon literally with no advance notice whatsoever in the middle of a concert to substitute for William Steinberg who was taken suddenly ill. Mr. Thomas conducted the concluding work on that Philharmonic Hall concert and then three subsequent full concert in the New York area, and he covered himself with glory, winning accolades from the New news.

26.

THE SOLOIST

ZARA NELSOVA, wife of pianist Grant Johannesen, comes from a distinguished Russian musical family. Born in Canada and educated in England, she is now a citizen of the United States. She made her debut with the London Symphony at the age of twelve and since that time has toured regularly in Europe and the Americas. She has appeared as soloist with many of the world's major orchestras, the New York Philharmonic, the Chicago Symphony, the Pittsburgh Symphony, the Los Angeles Philharmonic, the Berlin Philharmonic and L'Orchestre de la Suisse Romande among them. She has played at the Festival Casals, the Prague Festival and in the United States at Aspen, Tanglewood, Flagstaff and Stanford. A distinguished recitalist, she has made several coast-to-coast tours during recent seasons. Zara Nelsova has recorded for the London and Vanguard labels.

BANNER
BENNINGTON, VERMONT
(E) 6,200

DEC 18 1969

William Steinberg will direct the Friday afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at 2 p.m. at Symphony Hall in Boston. The concert will be broadcast live and can be heard here over Albany FM station WAMC (90.3 mc.). He has chosen the overture to Sinigaglia's "Le Buffe Chiozotte," Elgar's Cello Concerto in E Minor, Op. 85 (Zara Nelsova, soloist); and Tchaikovsky's "Manfred" Symphony.

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Friday afternoon December 19 1969 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening December 20 1969 at 8.30
Tuesday evening December 30 1969 at 8.30

WILLIAM STEINBERG conductor

MOZART — Overture to 'Don Giovanni' K. 527

ELGAR — Cello concerto in E minor op. 85
Adagio – moderato
Lento – allegro molto
Adagio
Allegro – moderato – allegro, ma non troppo
ZARA NELSOVA

first performance in the Friday-Saturday series

intermission

TCHAIKOVSKY — Manfred – symphony in four scenes, after the dramatic poem by Byron, op. 58

Manfred's wanderings and despair
Lento lugubre – moderato con moto – andante – andante con duolo

The witch of the Alps
Vivace con spirito – trio: l'istesso tempo

Pastorale
Andante con moto

The palace of Arimanes – invocation to Astarte – Manfred's death
Allegro con fuoco – andante con duolo – tempo primo – largo

Symphony

The Mozart left one wanting more; the 'Manfred' was more than enough

By Louis Snyder

The Boston Symphony gave its two pre-Christmas concerts on the weekend, with William Steinberg returning to conduct, and Zara Nelsova as cello soloist. The program —Mozart's "Don Giovanni" Overture, Elgar's Cello Concerto, and Tchaikovsky's symphonic "Manfred"—will be repeated on Dec. 30 in the Symphony Hall Cambridge series.

The orchestra's performance of the Mozart overture was a reminder of the tonal excellence that can be achieved (and in the opera house so often isn't) when musicians treat it as the great piece of music it is rather than as the beginning of a long operatic evening. Mr. Steinberg's tempi, in their progressive buildup from the Commendatore's ominous theme to the Busoni concert ending, shaped a small wordless opera in itself, and left one wanting more—Mozart, that is.

Ladies take over

The latest BSO performances of Sir Edward Elgar's Cello Concerto have had ladies as soloists—Miss Nelsova the past weekend, and Jacqueline du Pré at Tanglewood last summer. However, in 1918 when it was composed, its demands could hardly have envisioned the elevated state of today's cello playing. Then, there weren't that many ladies who could match men in technical facility on the instrument.

That's changed now. Miss Nelsova, blond, statuesque in flaring red satin, and glowing like the brightest ornament on a Christmas tree, soon showed that the complexities of the work held no terrors for her. She played with a warm, large tone, sensitive to the richness of the instrumental writing as well as the unusual effects the cello produces over the orchestral sound. Mr. Steinberg and the orchestra complemented her effectively in the piece which remains a solid and viable addition to the concerto repertoire.

Tchaikovskian slip

Tchaikovsky's "Manfred," described as a symphony in four scenes, hadn't been played by the orchestra since 1938, except for a single Tanglewood performance, in 1967, under Mr. Steinberg's direction. It impresses as an overly rich sugar plum—one capable of evoking the kind of over-wrought dreams inherent in the Byron poem on which it is based, accompanied by sensations of musical queasiness.

The symphony's program (a choreographic natural), about Manfred, an evil genius, who just can't help being bad, despite his longings to the contrary, may have a contemporary ring, subject-wise. However, musically it's all Tchaikovsky, who, as we know, is very, very good when he's good—but in "Manfred" he more often is not. Why this is not a staple of the ballet repertory is inexplicable, with its emotional score and story to match.

The orchestra made "Manfred" sound like a masterpiece, and Mr. Steinberg kept its nightmarish overtones within respectable bounds, but by the time the tortured anti-hero had finally expired on a pianissimo, one could only wonder if it had been worth all that hard work, even as a Tchaikovskian curiosity.

Zara Nelsova

". . . soon showed that the complexities of the work [Elgar's Cello Concerto] held no terrors for her."

Steinberg conducts Symphony in Mozart, Elgar, Tchaikovsky

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

William Steinberg returned to the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday afternoon and conducted an interesting program: the Overture to Mozart's "Don Giovanni" with the concert ending by Busoni, Elgar's Cello Concerto with Zara Nelsova as soloist, and Tchaikovsky's "Manfred" Symphony.

In "Don Giovanni," as in "Idomeneo" and "Die Entfuehrung," Mozart has the Overture proceed without break into the first scene. He effects it here by a marvelous diversion of what seem to be the conventional final cadences. Instead of the D we expect, he gives us C natural: it is the throwing of a switch that inevitably propels the music to the doorstep of F major where Leporello will grumble about his sentry duty. Though it happens before the curtain goes up, that C is one of Mozart's most exciting theatrical strokes.

There is a wretched concert version of the "Don Giovanni" Overture that merely gives us the D at that point. Bussoni, however, understood that to make the Overture tolerable as a concert piece to those who know and love the opera, he would have to provide some surprise of his own at that point. What he actually does is to introduce the diminished chord, trombones and all, on which the statue enters in the supper scene; then, after some measures of the statue music, he goes forward to the last part of the epilogue ("Questo e il fin di chi fa mal!") and so to the end of the opera.

One could object that Busoni's interruption, being so much more drastic than Mozart's, introduces contrast that violates Mozart's sense of scale; nevertheless, I think it a solution that is sensitive in many other, and important ways, as well as being both ingenious and effective. The performance of the Introduction (and its return' was lacking in musical tension, and thus in grandeur and atmosphere; the quick movements, on the other hand, went very well.

Elgar wrote his Cello Concerto in 1919, and though he lived until 1934, he had, after the Concerto, little music left in him. It is a touchingly autumnal piece, the most intimate of his major orchestral works. It is uneven, with a Scherzo that, charming though it is, could be the work of a lesser man, and with a finale that is not greatly inventive through much of its course. But there are very beautiful things in it, too: the splendid recitative that begins it and the gently swaying nine-eight viola melody just after; the deeply felt but restrained Adagio; most of all perhaps the last pages, when the music becomes slower until it returns to the Adagio's most characteristic phrase, experienced now from the strange and new perspective of A flat major, and leading miraculously to the home key of E minor and one last reminiscence of the opening recitative.

I was grateful to Miss Nelsova for resisting the temptation to overstate the piece. She played with good style and, except for difficulty with pitch at extreme heights, with good technique. The collaboration of Steinberg and the orchestra was considerate and sensitive. It was not an exciting performance, but honest, certainly, and fair representation of the piece.

"Manfred," loosely after Byron, alarms at first when Tchaikovsky seems to have trouble getting what is clearly going to be an immense hulk moving. Eventually, though, when he does get unglued from his series of introductions to introductions, the first movement unfolds grandly and rises at last to a magnificent tragic climax. There is an enchanting scherzo, then a fine movement in the pastoral style, and after that a bacchanale that leads to the music of the first movement climax and from there into the somber measures of Manfred's death.

Often more balletic than symphonic, "Manfred" is an uncommonly interesting score, one of Tchaikovsky's most fascinating from point of view of writing for orchestra, with something of Berlioz about it. There is rather much of "Manfred," but it is both expressive and fanciful. Though not always quite elegant as orchestral execution, the performance was well sustained and shaped.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

DEC 20 1969

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300

DEC 20 1969

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

DEC 22 1969

L. David Harris — Concerto Is Masterfully Performed

Concertgoers received guest cellist Zara Nelsova as their holiday present yesterday and the gift was thoroughly appreciated.

The presentation came in a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as Miss Nelsova masterfully performed Elgar's "Cello Concerto in E Minor." It was a joy to hear.

Indeed, the concert was one of the best of the season. Conductor William Steinberg began with the spirited "Overture to 'Don Giovanni' " by Mozart. Then it was Miss Nelsova and the cello concerto: Tchaikovsky's "Manfred" symphony concluded the program.

William Steinberg conducting

The program also marked a reappearance of Steinberg after several weeks' absence from Boston. Recent concerts have featured guest conductors—last week the orchestra was on tour.

Steinberg seemed more commanding than in some previous performances. His conducting gestures were more expansive — although they didn't enhance his stage presence. However, he got good attention from the musicians; they followed him well. It seemed as if there were occasions of intonation problems — particularly brass and woodwinds — but they weren't all that noticeable.

Elgar's cello concerto is a masterpiece — on a par with the great Dvorak cello concerto — and it's to the credit of the symphony and Miss Nelsova that it was performed.

The concerto's first movement was a triumph. Miss Nelsova handled its immense, soaring theme with verve — her phrasing was excellent. The slow movement was passionate, stirring, played with a kind of incandescence which was most impressive.

At times, there was excellent interaction between the orchestra and Miss Neslova. There were occasions when the first theme could have been shaped and re-shaped with respect to answering passages from the orchestra. These occasions weren't observed, although it must be added there seemed to be an emphasis on using the orchestra as an accompanying device, rather than emphasizing contrasts and oppositions between the cello and orchestra.

But Miss Nelsova aas magnificent. Her cello fairly sang, she masterfully handled passages that called for dexterity and technical skills for beyond the scope of ordinary playing.

Zara Nelsova, "Queen of Cellists"

Indeed, at the end of the first movement, Miss Nelsova had brilliantly played passage after passage of runs and arpeggios with fantastic speed.

With a final quick sweep of the bow she finished the movement, then quickly flicked a triumphant smile at Conductor Steinberg, as if to say, "Well, I did it, did't I?"

She certainly did. Yes, she did.

Music Critic

Nelsova joins BSO in concert

Zara Nelsova, the distinguished Canadian-born cellist, joins Music Director William Steinberg and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the eleventh pair of this season's Friday/Saturday Concerts, Friday, Dec. 19 at 2 p.m. and Saturday Dec. 20 at 8:30 p.m. They will play Elgar's Cello Concerto in E minor. Steinberg opens the program with Mozart's Overture to 'Don Giovanni' and closes with Tchaikovsky's 'Manfred' Symphony.

Zara Nelsova in 1966 had the honor of becoming one of the first American cellists to be invited to tour the Soviet Union. She has played with all the major orchestras under many of the great conductors of our time including the New York Philharmonic under Bernstein and the Boston Symphony under Ansermet, and throughout the world with such maestros as Solti, Schmidt-Isserstedt, Dorati, Sawallisch, Ozawa, and Abravanel.

On Thursday, Dec. 18 at 8:30 p.m. Michael Tilson Thomas, the Boston Symphony's assistant conductor, will conduct the third concert of the Thursday 'A' Series. Haydn's Symphony No. 98 and Ive's "Three Places in New England" the principal works in a program which also includes Brahm's Symphony No. 4. Haydn's Symphony No. 98 and Debussy's ("La Mer" are the principle works in a program which also includes Stravinsky's Huxley Variations and "Three Places in New England" by Ives.

BACK BAY LEDGER
BROOKLINE, MASS.
WEEKLY 10,000

DEC 18 1969

CHRONICLE-CITIZEN
BROOKLINE, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 8,450

DEC 18 1969

26.

THE SOLOIST

ZARA NELSOVA, wife of pianist Grant Johannesen, comes from a distinguished Russian musical family. Born in Canada and educated in England, she is now a citizen of the United States. She made her debut with the London Symphony at the age of twelve and since that time has toured regularly in Europe and the Americas. She has appeared as soloist with many of the world's major orchestras, the New York Philharmonic, the Chicago Symphony, the Pittsburgh Symphony, the Los Angeles Philharmonic, the Berlin Philharmonic and L'Orchestre de la Suisse Romande among them. She has played at the Festival Casals, the Prague Festival and in the United States at Aspen, Tanglewood, Flagstaff and Stanford. A distinguished recitalist, she has made several coast-to-coast tours during recent seasons. Zara Nelsova has recorded for the London and Vanguard labels.

Steinberg conducts Symphony in Mozart, Elgar, Tchaikovsky

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

William Steinberg returned to the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday afternoon and conducted an interesting program: the Overture to Mozart's "Don Giovanni" with the concert ending by Busoni, Elgar's Cello Concerto with Zara Nelsova as soloist, and Tchaikovsky's "Manfred" Symphony.

In "Don Giovanni," as in "Idomeneo" and "Die Entfuehrung," Mozart has the Overture proceed without break into the first scene. He effects it here by a marvelous diversion of what seem to be the conventional final cadences. Instead of the D we expect, he gives us C natural: it is the throwing of a switch that inevitably propels the music to the doorstep of F major where Leporello will grumble about his sentry duty. Though it happens before the curtain goes up, that C is one of Mozart's most exciting theatrical strokes.

There is a wretched concert version of the "Don Giovanni" Overture that merely gives us the D at that point. Bussoni, however, understood that to make the Overture tolerable as a concert piece to those who know and love the opera, he would have to provide some surprise of his own at that point. What he actually does is to introduce the diminished chord, trombones and all, on which the statue enters in the supper scene; then, after some measures of the statue music, he goes forward to the last part of the epilogue ("Questo e il fin di chi fa mal!") and so to the end of the opera.

One could object that Busoni's interruption, being so much more drastic than Mozart's, introduces contrast that violates Mozart's sense of scale; nevertheless, I think it a solution that is sensitive in many other, and important ways, as well as being both ingenious and effective. The performance of the Introduction (and its return' was lacking in musical tension, and thus in grandeur and atmosphere; the quick movements, on the other hand, went very well.

Elgar wrote his Cello Concerto in 1919, and though he lived until 1934, he had, after the Concerto, little music left in him. It is a touchingly autumnal piece, the most intimate of his major orchestral works. It is uneven, with a Scherzo that, charming though it is, could be the work of a lesser man, and with a finale that is not greatly inventive through much of its course. But there are very beautiful things in it, too: the splendid recitative that begins it and the gently swaying nine-eight viola melody just after; the deeply felt but restrained Adagio; most of all perhaps the last pages, when the music becomes slower until it returns to the Adagio's most characteristic phrase, experienced now from the strange and new perspective of A flat major, and leading miraculously to the home key of E minor and one last reminiscence of the opening recitative.

I was grateful to Miss Nelsova for resisting the temptation to overstate the piece. She played with good style and, except for difficulty with pitch at extreme heights, with good technique. The collaboration of Steinberg and the orchestra was considerate and sensitive. It was not an exciting performance, but honest, certainly, and fair representation of the piece.

"Manfred," loosely after Byron, alarms at first when Tchaikovsky seems to have trouble getting what is clearly going to be an immense hulk moving. Eventually, though, when he does get unglued from his series of introductions to introductions, the first movement unfolds grandly and rises at last to a magnificent tragic climax. There is an enchanting scherzo, then a fine movement in the pastoral style, and after that a bacchanale that leads to the music of the first movement climax and from there into the somber measures of Manfred's death.

Often more balletic than symphonic, "Manfred" is an uncommonly interesting score, one of Tchaikovsky's most fascinating from point of view of writing for orchestra, with something of Berlioz about it. There is rather much of "Manfred," but it is both expressive and fanciful. Though not always quite elegant as orchestral execution, the performance was well sustained and shaped.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 466,377
DEC 20 1969

BANNER
BENNINGTON, VERMONT
(E) 6,200
DEC 18 1969

William Steinberg will direct the Friday afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at ~~2 p.m. at Symphony~~ Hall in Boston. The concert will be broadcast live and can be heard here over Albany FM station WAMC (90.3 mc.). He has chosen the overture to Sinigaglia's "Le Buffe Chiozotte," Elgar's Cello Concerto in E Minor, Op. 85 (Zara Nelsova, soloist); and Tchaikovsky's "Manfred" Symphony.

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Friday afternoon December 19 1969 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening December 20 1969 at 8.30
Tuesday evening December 30 1969 at 8.30

WILLIAM STEINBERG conductor

MOZART — Overture to 'Don Giovanni' K. 527

ELGAR — Cello concerto in E minor op. 85
Adagio – moderato
Lento – allegro molto
Adagio
Allegro – moderato – allegro, ma non troppo
ZARA NELSOVA

first performance in the Friday-Saturday series

intermission

TCHAIKOVSKY — Manfred – symphony in four scenes, after the dramatic poem by Byron, op. 58

Manfred's wanderings and despair
Lento lugubre – moderato con moto – andante – andante con duolo

The witch of the Alps
Vivace con spirito – trio: l'istesso tempo

Pastorale
Andante con moto

The palace of Arimanes – invocation to Astarte – Manfred's death
Allegro con fuoco – andante con duolo – tempo primo – largo

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300
DEC 20 1969

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850
DEC 22 1969

Symphony

The Mozart left one wanting more; the 'Manfred' was more than enough

By Louis Snyder

The Boston Symphony gave its two pre-Christmas concerts on the weekend, with William Steinberg returning to conduct, and Zara Nelsova as cello soloist. The program —Mozart's "Don Giovanni" Overture, Elgar's Cello Concerto, and Tchaikovsky's symphonic "Manfred"—will be repeated on Dec. 30 in the Symphony Hall Cambridge series.

The orchestra's performance of the Mozart overture was a reminder of the tonal excellence that can be achieved (and in the opera house so often isn't) when musicians treat it as the great piece of music it is rather than as the beginning of a long operatic evening. Mr. Steinberg's tempi, in their progressive buildup from the Commendatore's ominous theme to the Busoni concert ending, shaped a small wordless opera in itself, and left one wanting more—Mozart, that is.

Ladies take over

The latest BSO performances of Sir Edward Elgar's Cello Concerto have had ladies as soloists—Miss Nelsova the past weekend, and Jacqueline du Pré at Tanglewood last summer. However, in 1918 when it was composed, its demands could hardly have envisioned the elevated state of today's cello-playing. Then, there weren't that many ladies who could match men in technical facility on the instrument.

That's changed now. Miss Nelsova, blond, statuesque in flaring red satin, and glowing like the brightest ornament on a Christmas tree, soon showed that the complexities of the work held no terrors for her. She played with a warm, large tone, sensitive to the richness of the instrumental writing as well as the unusual effects the cello produces over the orchestral sound. Mr. Steinberg and the orchestra complemented her effectively in the piece which remains a solid and viable addition to the concerto repertoire.

Tchaikovskian slip

Tchaikovsky's "Manfred," described as a symphony in four scenes, hadn't been played by the orchestra since 1938, except for a single Tanglewood performance, in 1967, under Mr. Steinberg's direction. It impresses as an overly rich sugar plum—one capable of evoking the kind of overwrought dreams inherent in the Byron poem on which it is based, accompanied by sensations of musical queasiness.

Zara Nelsova

". . . soon showed that the complexities of the work [Elgar's Cello Concerto] held no terrors for her."

The symphony's program (a choreographic natural), about Manfred, an evil genius, who just can't help being bad, despite his longings to the contrary, may have a contemporary ring, subject-wise. However, musically it's all Tchaikovsky, who, as we know, is very, very good when he's good—but in "Manfred" he more often is not. Why this is not a staple of the ballet repertory is inexplicable, with its emotional score and story to match.

The orchestra made "Manfred" sound like a masterpiece, and Mr. Steinberg kept its nightmarish overtones within respectable bounds, but by the time the tortured anti-hero had finally expired on a pianissimo, one could only wonder if it had been worth all that hard work, even as a Tchaikovskian curiosity.

L. David Harris — Concerto Is Masterfully Performed

Concertgoers received guest cellist Zara Nelsova as their holiday present yesterday and the gift was thoroughly appreciated.

The presentation came in a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as Miss Nelsova masterfully performed Elgar's "Cello Concerto in E Minor." It was a joy to hear.

Indeed, the concert was one of the best of the season. Conductor William Steinberg began with the spirited "Overture to 'Don Giovanni' " by Mozart. Then it was Miss Nelsova and the cello concerto: Tchaikovsky's "Manfred" symphony concluded the program.

William Steinberg conducting

The program also marked a reappearance of Steinberg after several weeks' absence from Boston. Recent concerts have featured guest conductors—last week the orchestra was on tour.

Steinberg seemed more commanding than in some previous performances. His conducting gestures were more expansive — although they didn't enhance his stage presence. However, he got good attention from the musicians; they followed him well. It seemed as if there were occasions of intonation problems — particularly brass and woodwinds — but they weren't all that noticeable.

Elgar's cello concerto is a masterpiece — on a par with the great Dvorak cello concerto — and it's to the credit of the symphony and Miss Nelsova that it was performed.

The concerto's first movement was a triumph. Miss Nelsova handled its intense, soaring theme with verve — her phrasing was excellent. The slow movement was passionate, stirring, played with a kind of incandescence which was most impressive.

At times, there was excellent interaction between the orchestra and Miss Neslova. There were occasions when the first theme could have been shaped and re-shaped with respect to answering passages from the orchestra. These occasions weren't observed, although it must be added there seemed to be an emphasis on using the orchestra as an accompanying device, rather than emphasizing contrasts and oppositions between the cello and orchestra.

But Miss Nelsova aas magnificent. Her cello fairly sang, she masterfully handled passages that called for dexterity and technical skills for beyond the scope of ordinary playing.

Zara Nelsova, "Queen of Cellists"

Indeed, at the end of the first movement, Miss Nelsova had brilliantly played passage after passage of runs and arpeggios with fantastic speed.

With a final quick sweep of the bow she finished the movement, then quickly flicked a triumphant smile at Conductor Steinberg, as if to say, "Well, I did it, did't I?"

She certainly did. Yes, she did.

Music Critic

Nelsova joins BSO in concert

Zara Nelsova, the distinguished Canadian-born cellist, joins Music Director William Steinberg and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the eleventh pair of this season's Friday/Saturday Concerts, Friday, Dec. 19 at 2 p.m. and Saturday Dec. 20 at 8:30 p.m. They will play Elgar's Cello Concerto in E minor. Steinberg opens the program with Mozart's Overture to 'Don Giovanni' and closes with Tchaikovsky's 'Manfred' Symphony.

Zara Nelsova in 1966 had the honor of becoming one of the first American cellists to be invited to tour the Soviet Union. She has played with all the major orchestras under many of the great conductors of our time including the New York Philharmonic under Bernstein and the Boston Symphony under Ansermet, and throughout the world with such maestros as Solti, Schmidt-Isserstedt, Dorati, Sawallisch, Ozawa, and Abravanel.

On Thursday, Dec. 18 at 8:30 p.m. Michael Tilson Thomas, the Boston Symphony's assistant conductor, will conduct the third concert of the Thursday 'A' Series. Haydn's Symphony No. 98 and Ive's "Three Places in New England" the principal works in a program which also includes Brahm's Symphony No. 4. Haydn's Symphony No. 98 and Debussy's "La Mer" are the principle works in a program which also includes Stravinsky's Huxley Variations and "Three Places in New England" by Ives.

BACK BAY LEDGER
BROOKLINE, MASS.
DEC 18 1969

CHRONICLE-CITIZEN
BROOKLINE, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 8,450
DEC 18 1969

The Symphony

Two 'Novelties' Welcome Fare

By RICHARD D. FREED
Special to the HT

William Steinberg opened yesterday afternoon's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with a performance of the Overture to Mozart's "Don Giovanni" that did exactly what an overture ought to do: it drew the listener in and made him eager for the opera to follow. The opera did not follow, of course, but the two orchestral novelties that did were no less welcome.

"Novelties" is certainly the word, for Tchaikovsky's "Manfred" had not been heard in Symphony Hall since 1938, when Eugene Goossens conducted it (although Mr. Steinberg and the BSO performed it at Tanglewood in 1967), and the Elgar Cello Concerto had never been presented at these concerts before.

ZARA NELSONA was the soloist in the Elgar. She strode on stage Christmas-wrapped in a striking gown of iridescent red and sailed into the work without fuss. Though Elgar's symphonies, with their labored "nobilmente" posturing can hardly fail to put one off, the Cello Concerto —relatively concise, straightforward, on an intimate rather than a grade scale—is a work one can believe in, and Miss Nelsova obviously does.

This was in every way a dedicated performance on the part of both soloist and conductor, who collaborated with the unanimity of spirit one hopes for in the best chamber music performances. Miss Nelsova's technical ease was an element of assurance instead of display, which is to say her playing was so consistently secure as to project the music as convincingly as possible without calling attention to itself.

Elgar wrote the Concerto in his sixties, one of his last major works. Yesterday's performance recalled Haydn's remark about "the mellowness of old age honorably won" (a remark one would associate with Elgar more readily than with Haydn), and even left one willing to agree with James Lyons' reference to the Concerto as a "grotesquely undervalued masterwork."

Mr. Steinberg seems to be the only conductor in America who bothers to perform Tchaikovsky's longest symphony. That is what "Manfred" happens to be, although not included among the composer's numbered symphonies. The work was suggested to Tachaikovsky by Balakirev, a great admirer of Berlioz, and it has much in common with Berlioz's "Harold in Italy."

THERE IS NO solo instrument in "Manfred," but otherwise the two works have great similarities structurally and, of course, both are based on Byronic themes. In each work the long opening movement reflects the brooding nature of the hero and each ends with an orgiastic bacchanal (though the Tchaikovsky orgy is succeeded by a quiet coda).

The second movement of "Manfred" shows a certain indebtedness to "The Damnation of Faust" and the third combines features of both inner movements of "Harold." That said, it must be added that if Tchaikovsky borrowed some of Berlioz's devices (consciously or otherwise) he nevertheless produced a work of great originality and substance, which happens to contain more than a few unforgettably fine tunes.

Mr. Steinberg gave the work without cuts, and not only managed to keep up the steam for the entire 55 minutes and to make the most of the melodic opportunities in the inner movements, but also brought off the episodic outer ones with precisely the sort of dramatic conviction needed to knit the episodes into a persuasive musical whole. Everyone in the orchestra seemed to share his enthusiasm for "Manfred;" Ralph Gomberg's oboe solo in the third movement was a joy in itself, but the winds in the preceding scherzo, the brasses in the finale, and the strings throughout the work were no less impressive.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
DEC 20 1969

Steinberg to conduct Friday/Saturday concerts

Music Director William Steinberg returns to conduct the twelfth pair of Friday/Saturday Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, Friday, Jan. 2 at 2 p.m. and Saturday, Jan.3 at 8:30 p.m. Contralto Maureen Forrester and tenor Jon Vickers will be soloists in the program's principle work, Mahler's "Das Lied von der Erde." Steinberg opens the program with Barber's "Die Natali."

Maureen Forrester last appeared with the Boston Symphony in 1958 performing in songs by Mahler and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony which she also recorded with the Orchestra for RCA. In recent seasons she has sung with the New York Philharmonic, the New York City and San Francisco Opera Companies, the Cleveland Orchestra, the Los Angeles Philharmonic, the Philadelphia Orchestra, and many others.

Canadian Jon Vickers makes his first appearance with the Boston Symphony with these concerts. He performs with the Metropolitan Opera company, and Covent Garden in London, where he is resident tenor. Mr. Vickers has appeared with Herbert von Karajan in recordings and performances at Salzburg, La Scala and in New York.

On Tuesday Dec. 30 at 8:30 p.m. William Steinberg conducts the fourth of this season's 'Cambridge' series concerts. The Candian-born cellist Zara Nelsova joins Mr. Steinberg and the Orchestra in Elgar's Cello Concerto. Mr. Steinberg opens the program with Mozart's Overture to 'Don Giovanni' and closes with Tchaikovsky's 'Manfred' Symphony.

CHRONICLE-CITIZEN
BROOKLINE, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 8,450
DEC 25 1969

CITIZEN ITEM
ALLSTON-BRIGHTON
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 7,600
DEC 25 1969

BACK BAY LEDGER
BROOKLINE, MASS.
WEEKLY 10,000
DEC 25 1969

BSO ON FM

Contralto Maureen Forrester, tenor Jon Vickers and the Framingham Choral Society join the Boston Symphony Orchestra in concerts to be broadcast live and in stereo by WGBH radio, Tuesday, Jan. 6 at 8:30 p.m., William Steinberg will be joined by Miss Forrester and Vickers for a concert whichc includes "Die Natali" by Barber and "Das Lied von der Erde" by Mahler. The Friday-Saturday program (Jan. 9 at 2 p.m. and Jan. 10 at 8:30 p.m.) will feature Mozart's Eine Kleine Nachtmusik, Stravinsky's Scherzo Fantastique (Philip Cho, tenor, Framingham Choral Society) and "A Faust Symphony" by Liszt.

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,387
DEC 26 1969

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000
DEC 25 1969

27.

New Year Pair

Music Director William Steinberg will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the season's 12th pair of Friday-Saturday concerts Jan. 2 at 2:30 p.m. and Jan. 3 at 8:30 p.m. Contralto Maureen Forrester and tenor Jon Vickers will be soloists in the principal work, Mahler's "Das Lied von der Erde." The program will open with Barber's "Die Natali".

Dec. 30 at 8:30 p.m., the Canadian-born cellist Zara Nelsova joins Mr. Steinberg and the orchestra in Elgar's Cello Concerto. Also on the Tuesday program are Mozart's overture to "Don Giovanni" and Tchaikovsky's "Manfred" symphony.

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Friday afternoon January 2 1970 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening January 3 1970 at 8.30
Tuesday evening January 6 1970 at 8.30

WILLIAM STEINBERG conductor

BARBER — Die natali, chorale preludes for Christmas op. 37

intermission

MAHLER — Das Lied von der Erde (The song of the earth) for tenor, contralto and orchestra

Das Trinklied vom Jammer der Erde
(The drinking song of earth's sorrow)

Der Einsame im Herbst
(The lonely one in autumn)

Von der Jugend (Of youth)

Von der Schönheit (Of beauty)

Der Trunkene im Frühling
(The drunken one in springtime)

Der Abschied (The farewell)

JON VICKERS tenor

MAUREEN FORRESTER contralto

THE SOLOISTS

JON VICKERS, who makes his first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at these concerts, was born in Prince Albert, Saskatchewan. He joined the company of the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, twelve years ago as a resident tenor. Shortly afterwards he was engaged to sing regularly in Vienna, Bayreuth, San Francisco, Milan, New York and other of the world's major opera centers. Today his time is divided mainly between the Metropolitan in New York, Covent Garden in London, and work with Herbert von Karajan in recordings and performances at Salzburg, La Scala and in New York. He has appeared in two films of opera, the Salzburg production of Carmen and the production at La Scala of Pagliacci. Jon Vickers has already been engaged for performances in 1972, and during the coming seasons he will appear in new productions of Otello, Fidelio and Tristan at Salzburg, performances of Parsifal and Peter Grimes at Covent Garden, of Fidelio and Samson in Dallas and Pagliacci at La Scala. He has recorded for DGG, Angel and RCA. When he is not singing Jon Vickers pursues a second career as a cattle farmer.

Boris Goldenberg

MAUREEN FORRESTER appeared most recently with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1958, performing song cycles by Mahler and Beethoven's Ninth symphony; she also took part in the Orchestra's recordings of those works for RCA. Born in Montreal, she showed musical talent very early, and made her formal recital debut at the age of 23. She was soon engaged to sing orchestral concerts with Otto Klemperer and Josef Krips, and began a series of recital tours in Canada. She made her debut in Europe two years later, and in the United States the following year, 1956. Since that time she has been heard in opera houses and concert halls throughout the United States, Canada, South America, Europe, the Soviet Union, Israel, Australia and New Zealand. She will appear in the Orient for the first time in 1970. In recent seasons she has sung with the New York Philharmonic, the Chicago Symphony, the New York City Opera, the Handel Opera Festival, the Cleveland Orchestra, the Concertgebouw Orchestra, the San Francisco Opera, the Pittsburgh Symphony, the Los Angeles Philharmonic, the Philadelphia Orchestra and many other of the world's leading orchestras. Before going to Japan next June, she will take part in a tour with the Israel Philharmonic. She has often appeared with the Bach Aria Group, and will make a fifth tour with the Group this season. Maureen Forrester has recorded for the RCA, Columbia, Westminster and Vanguard labels.

Drama Missing in BSO Playing of Mahler Symphony

By McLAREN HARRIS

Yesterday's Symphony program brought a juxta position of joy and sorrow, simplicity and sublimity in pairing the seasonal "Die natali" of Samuel Barber with Mahler's epic "Song of the Earth." The performances under William Steinberg lay somewhere in between the same extremes.

Barber's work, a brief, uninterrupted succession of chorale preludes based on Christmas carols, was composed in 1960 and first performed by the BSO before Christmas of that year. It was last done here nearly eight years ago; its carol-quotations are too literal for enduring musical interest and not literal enough for incorporation into the popular Christmas repertory.

Some early sections contain engaging passages — especially the variations on "Lo how a rose" — while the mystical English horn countermelody to "We Three Kings" and the trumpet-and-tabor setting of "God Rest You Merry, Gentlemen" smack of contrivance. Seams throughout are sewn with rather heavy thread, giving the whole the character of a medley, albeit a cleverly-harmonized, nicely-orchestrated one.

THE CONTRAST between "Die natali" and Mahler's six-movement symphony, even over the span of an intermission, should have been searing and cataclysmic, as the festive joy of fellowship gave way to the bitter despair of loneliness, lost youth, unattained triumphs and a final retirement from life. That such feelings never fully materialized was not the fault of either contralto Maureen Forrester or tenor Jon Vickers, but because both orchestra and conductor seemed unmindful of the enormity of emotional power in Mahler's pages.

There is not a passage in "Das Lied" which is not in some degree touchingly, even grippingly, dramatic. Unfortunately, drama was a missing or unconvincing element in much of yesterday's performance. The tempo which Mr. Steinberg set for the first tenor solo was on the stodgy side, but, more important, the great reaches of color and dynamics of which a hundred-plus musicians are capable — and which Mahler explored very thoroughly in this work — lay unfulfilled.

ORCHESTRALLY, from the opening oboe lines on, "The Lonely One in Autumn" reflected more apathy than piercing isolation; the concluding "farewell" was strung out along an inadequately-directioned path toward expiration. Only the inner "Of Beauty" and "The Drunken One in Spring" built plausible examples of innocense, or carefree abandon, and even here the latter's abrupt, mercuric moods failed to take hold.

Miss Forrester and Mr. Vickers were securely in command of their solos, both displaying tonal consistency and excellent control. Miss Forrester scaled her vocal intensity closely, though more eloquently, with the orchestral substance, from the peak of passion in "Of Beauty" to the final, fading "ewig" of the "Farewell." Mr. Vickers was equally strong in voice and spirit, although his option for delicacy in "Of Youth" left him barely audible.

The merits, of course, were not entirely on the vocal side; the orchestral work was individually accurate, if not wholly precise in ensemble, and some sticky rhythmic configurations were delivered with relative aplomb. But the emotional impact of "Das Lied" was at best partially realized. It should sting the listener with its poignance; instead, it tended to itch with frustration.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
JAN 3 1970

The Symphony

Two 'Novelties' Welcome Fare

By RICHARD D. FREED
Special to the HT

William Steinberg opened yesterday afternoon's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with a performance of the Overture to Mozart's "Don Giovanni" that did exactly what an overture ought to do: it drew the listener in and made him eager for the opera to follow. The opera did not follow, of course, but the two orchestral novelties that did were no less welcome.

"Novelties" is certainly the word, for Tchaikovsky's "Manfred" had not been heard in Symphony Hall since 1938, when Eugene Goossens conducted it (although Mr. Steinberg and the BSO performed it at Tanglewood in 1967), and the Elgar Cello Concerto had never been presented at these concerts before.

ZARA NELSONA was the soloist in the Elgar. She strode on stage Christmas-wrapped in a striking gown of irridescent red and sailed into the work without fuss. Though Elgar's symphonies, with their labored "nobilmente" posturing can hardly fail to put one off, the Cello Concerto —relatively concise, straightforward, on an intimate rather than a grade scale—is a work one can believe in, and Miss Nelsova obviously does.

This was in every way a dedicated performance on the part of both soloist and conductor, who collaborated with the unanimity of spirit one hopes for in the best chamber music performances. Miss Nelsova's technical ease was an element of assurance instead of display, which is to say her playing was so consistently secure as to project the music as convincingly as possible without calling attention to itself.

Elgar wrote the Concerto in his sixties, one of his last major works. Yesterday's performance recalled Haydn's remark about "the mellowness of old age honorably won" (a remark one would associate with Elgar more readily than with Haydn), and even left one willing to agree with James Lyons' reference to the Concerto as a "grotesquely undervalued masterwork."

Mr. Steinberg seems to be the only conductor in America who bothers to perform Tchaikovsky's longest symphony. That is what "Manfred" happens to be, although not included among the composer's numbered symphonies. The work was suggested to Tachaikovsky by Balakirev, a great admirer of Berlioz, and it has much in common with Berlioz's "Harold in Italy."

THERE IS NO solo instrument in "Manfred," but otherwise the two works have great similarities structurally and, of course, both are based on Byronic themes. In each work the long opening movement reflects the brooding nature of the hero and each ends with an orgiastic bacchanal (though the Tchaikovsky orgy is succeeded by a quiet coda).

The second movement of "Manfred" shows a certain indebtedness to "The Damnation of Faust" and the third combines features of both inner movements of "Harold." That said, it must be added that if Tchaikovsky borrowed some of Berlioz's devices (consciously or otherwise) he nevertheless produced a work of great originality and substance, which happens to contain more than a few unforgettably fine tunes.

Mr. Steinberg gave the work without cuts, and not only managed to keep up the steam for the entire 55 minutes and to make the most of the melodic opportunities in the inner movements, but also brought off the episodic outer ones with precisely the sort of dramatic conviction needed to knit the episodes into a persuasive musical whole. Everyone in the orchestra seemed to share his enthusiasm for "Manfred;" Ralph Gomberg's oboe solo in the third movement was a joy in itself, but the winds in the preceding scherzo, the brasses in the finale, and the strings throughout the work were no less impressive.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
DEC 20 1969

Steinberg to conduct Friday/Saturday concerts

Music Director William Steinberg returns to conduct the twelfth pair of Friday/Saturday Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, Friday, Jan. 2 at 2 p.m. and Saturday, Jan.3 at 8:30 p.m. Contralto Maureen Forrester and tenor Jon Vickers will be soloists in the program's principle work, Mahler's "Das Lied von der Erde." Steinberg opens the program with Barber's "Die Natali."

Maureen Forrester last appeared with the Boston Symphony in 1958 performing in songs by Mahler and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony which she also recorded with the Orchestra for RCA. In recent seasons she has sung with the New York Philharmonic, the New York City and San Francisco Opera Companies, the Cleveland Orchestra, the Los Angeles Philharmonic, the Philadelphia Orchestra, and many others.

Canadian Jon Vickers makes his first appearance with the Boston Symphony with these concerts. He performs with the Metropolitan Opera company, and Covent Garden in London, where he is resident tenor. Mr. Vickers has appeared with Herbert von Karajan in recordings and performances at Salzburg, La Scala and in New York.

On Tuesday Dec. 30 at 8:30 p.m. William Steinberg conducts the fourth of this season's 'Cambridge' series concerts. The Candian-born cellist Zara Nelsova joins Mr. Steinberg and the Orchestra in Elgar's Cello Concerto. Mr. Steinberg opens the program with Mozart's Overture to 'Don Giovanni' and closes with Tchaikovsky's 'Manfred' Symphony.

CHRONICLE-CITIZEN
BROOKLINE, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 8,450
DEC 25 1969

CITIZEN ITEM
ALLSTON-BRIGHTON
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 7,[illegible]
DEC 25 1969

BACK BAY LEDGER
BROOKLINE, MASS.
WEEKLY 10,000
DEC 25 1969

BSO ON FM

Contralto Maureen Forrester, tenor Jon Vickers and the Framingham Choral Society join the Boston Symphony Orchestra in concerts to be broadcast live and in stereo by WGBH radio. Tuesday, Jan. 6 at 8:30 p.m., William Steinberg will be joined by Miss Forrester and Vickers for a concert whichc includes "Die Natali" by Barber and "Das Lied von der Erde" by Mahler. The Friday-Saturday program (Jan. 9 at 2 p.m. and Jan. 10 at 8:30 p.m.) will feature Mozart's Eine Kleine Nachtmusik, Stravinsky's Scherzo Fantastique (Philip Cho, tenor, Framingham Choral Society), and "A Faust Symphony" by Liszt.

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,387
DEC 26 1969

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000
DEC 25 1969

27

New Year Pair

Music Director William Steinberg will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the season's 12th pair of Friday-Saturday concerts Jan. 2 at 2:30 p.m. and Jan. 3 at 8:30 p.m. Contralto Maureen Forrester and tenor Jon Vickers will be soloists in the principal work, Mahler's "Das Lied von der Erde." The program will open with Barber's "Die Natali".

Dec. 30 at 8:30 p.m., the Canadian-born cellist Zara Nelsova joins Mr. Steinberg and the orchestra in Elgar's Cello Concerto. Also on the Tuesday program are Mozart's overture to "Don Giovanni" and Tchaikovsky's "Manfred" symphony.

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Friday afternoon January 2 1970 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening January 3 1970 at 8.30
Tuesday evening January 6 1970 at 8.30

WILLIAM STEINBERG conductor

BARBER — Die natali, chorale preludes for Christmas op. 37

intermission

MAHLER — Das Lied von der Erde (The song of the earth) for tenor, contralto and orchestra

Das Trinklied vom Jammer der Erde
(The drinking song of earth's sorrow)

Der Einsame im Herbst
(The lonely one in autumn)

Von der Jugend (Of youth)

Von der Schönheit (Of beauty)

Der Trunkene im Frühling
(The drunken one in springtime)

Der Abschied (The farewell)

JON VICKERS tenor

MAUREEN FORRESTER contralto

THE SOLOISTS

JON VICKERS, who makes his first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at these concerts, was born in Prince Albert, Saskatchewan. He joined the company of the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, twelve years ago as a resident tenor. Shortly afterwards he was engaged to sing regularly in Vienna, Bayreuth, San Francisco, Milan, New York and other of the world's major opera centers. Today his time is divided mainly between the Metropolitan in New York, Covent Garden in London, and work with Herbert von Karajan in recordings and performances at Salzburg, La Scala and in New York. He has appeared in two films of opera, the Salzburg production of Carmen and the production at La Scala of Pagliacci. Jon Vickers has already been engaged for performances in 1972, and during the coming seasons he will appear in new productions of Otello, Fidelio and Tristan at Salzburg, performances of Parsifal and Peter Grimes at Covent Garden, of Fidelio and Samson in Dallas and Pagliacci at La Scala. He has recorded for DGG, Angel and RCA. When he is not singing Jon Vickers pursues a second career as a cattle farmer.

Boris Goldenberg

MAUREEN FORRESTER appeared most recently with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1958, performing song cycles by Mahler and Beethoven's Ninth symphony; she also took part in the Orchestra's recordings of those works for RCA. Born in Montreal, she showed musical talent very early, and made her formal recital debut at the age of 23. She was soon engaged to sing orchestral concerts with Otto Klemperer and Josef Krips, and began a series of recital tours in Canada. She made her debut in Europe two years later, and in the United States the following year, 1956. Since that time she has been heard in opera houses and concert halls throughout the United States, Canada, South America, Europe, the Soviet Union, Israel, Australia and New Zealand. She will appear in the Orient for the first time in 1970. In recent seasons she has sung with the New York Philharmonic, the Chicago Symphony, the New York City Opera, the Handel Opera Festival, the Cleveland Orchestra, the Concertgebouw Orchestra, the San Francisco Opera, the Pittsburgh Symphony, the Los Angeles Philharmonic, the Philadelphia Orchestra and many other of the world's leading orchestras. Before going to Japan next June, she will take part in a tour with the Israel Philharmonic. She has often appeared with the Bach Aria Group, and will make a fifth tour with the Group this season. Maureen Forrester has recorded for the RCA, Columbia, Westminster and Vanguard labels.

Drama Missing in BSO Playing of Mahler Symphony

By McLAREN HARRIS

Yesterday's Symphony program brought a juxta position of joy and sorrow, simplicity and sublimity in pairing the seasonal "Die natali" of Samuel Barber with Mahler's epic "Song of the Earth." The performances under William Steinberg lay somewhere in between the same extremes.

Barber's work, a brief, uninterrupted succession of chorale preludes based on Christmas carols, was composed in 1960 and first performed by the BSO before Christmas of that year. It was last done here nearly eight years ago; its carol-quotations are too literal for enduring musical interest and not literal enough for incorporation into the popular Christmas repertory.

Some early sections contain engaging passages — especially the variations on "Lo, how a rose" — while the mystical English horn countermelody to "We Three Kings" and the trumpet-and-tabor setting of "God Rest You Merry, Gentlemen" smack of contrivance. Seams throughout are sewn with rather heavy thread, giving the whole the character of a medley, albeit a cleverly-harmonized, nicely-orchestrated one.

THE CONTRAST between "Die natali" and Mahler's six-movement symphony, even over the span of an intermission, should have been searing and cataclysmic, as the festive joy of fellowship gave way to the bitter despair of loneliness, lost youth, unattained triumphs and a final retirement from life. That such feelings never fully materialized was not the fault of either contralto Maureen Forrester or tenor Jon Vickers, but because both orchestra and conductor seemed unmindful of the enormity of emotional power in Mahler's pages.

There is not a passage in "Das Lied" which is not in some degree touchingly, even grippingly, dramatic. Unfortunately, drama was a missing or unconvincing element in much of yesterday's performance. The tempo which Mr. Steinberg set for the first tenor solo was on the stodgy side, but, more important, the great reaches of color and dynamics of which a hundred-plus musicians are capable — and which Mahler explored very thoroughly in this work — lay unfulfilled.

ORCHESTRALLY, from the opening oboe lines on, "The Lonely One in Autumn" reflected more apathy than piercing isolation; the concluding "farewell" was strung out along an inadequately-directioned path toward expiration. Only the inner "Of Beauty" and "The Drunken One in Spring" built plausible examples of innocense, or carefree abandon, and even here the latter's abrupt, mercuric moods failed to take hold.

Miss Forrester and Mr. Vickers were securely in command of their solos, both displaying tonal consistency and excellent control. Miss Forrester scaled her vocal intensity closely, though more eloquently, with the orchestral substance, from the peak of passion in "Of Beauty" to the final, fading "ewig" of the "Farewell." Mr. Vickers was equally strong in voice and spirit, although his option for delicacy in "Of Youth" left him barely audible.

The merits, of course, were not entirely on the vocal side; the orchestral work was individually accurate, if not wholly precise in ensemble, and some sticky rhythmic configurations were delivered with relative aplomb. But the emotional impact of "Das Lied" was at best partially realized. It should sting the listener with its poignance; instead, it tended to itch with frustration.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(S) 298,557
JAN 3 1970

28

Steinberg conducts Boston Symphony in Mahler

By M[illegible]ael Steinberg
G[illegible]be Staff

Mah[illegible] feared that the melancholy passion in his "Lied von de Erde" (Song of the [illegible]h) would make [illegible] want to do away with themselves. As for the performance at yesterday afternoon's Boston Symphony concert, he need not have worried, for what William Steinberg did was not so much to realize the work as carefully to defuse it. How harmless it all was, with the dynamics squashed together so that nothing was very loud and not much very soft, with accents and dissonances [illegible] and caesuras [illegible] over, with the vivid orchestral coloring neutralized, with playing that was elegant and delicate where Mahler asks for be heavy.

Steinberg produced an eloquent statement of the intimate, yet intense, violin [illegible]lody that leads, in the last song to "Ich senhe mich," but I heard nothing comparable elsewhere. Most of his conducting produced results that were stiff, drab, and characterless. The orchestral sound was generally full and the pitch clean but ensemble, both within the orchestra and between orchestra and singers, was indifferent. There were sensitively played solos by Joseph Silverstein (violin), Doriot Anthony Dwyer (flute), Lois Schaefer (piccolo), and Armando Ghitalla (trumpet), but too many solos by others that were done as though the player in question had not the slightest regard for, or even awareness of, what was going on in the rest of the texture.

There were two admirable singers, Jon Vickers and Maureen Forrester. "Das Lied von der Erde" is a tough assignment for the tenor, who has to command a heroic style and voice in the first movement, sing with extreme delicacy in the third, then manage both in the fifth. Vickers moves more naturally in the forceful passages. He sang the opening savage drinking song, whose scoring Mahler would surely have revised had he ever had an opportunity to test it in performance, with an easy power I have not heard approached by any other tenor, while in the chamber-musical genre picture of the green and white pavilion in the lake he could not quite get away without strain and without momentary escapes into "Fledermaus" falsetto. He sings German words with real feeling for their sound and character, and he is not only an imaginative musician, but one of striking intelligence.

Forrester does not sing these songs with great intensity, but she conveys their expressive range, from the anguished outburst near the end of the second song ("Some der Liebe . . .") to the non-espressivo recitations of "The Farewell." She, too, both uses and expresses the German text with a remarkable sensibility, she is a musician of superb cultivation, and she was, yesterday, in beautiful voice.

The concert began miserably with "Die Natali," the pretentious title for a string of carols elaborately coutured and drenched in sweet and sour perfumes by Sameul Barber. Now if Peter Schickele . . .

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,987 (E) 194,70[illegible]
JA[illegible] 3 1970
Ne Engle News

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 4[illegible]
JAN 3 1970 En Ne

Holiday Symphony

Mahler and Barber say hail and farewell

MONITOR.
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,859
1970

By Louis Snyder

William Steinberg and the Boston Symphony began the new year on the weekend with a program which looked in two directions—toward Christmas past and into the dark and uncertain future.

First there was Samuel Barber's "Die Natali" (what do you program before the "Lied von der Erde," the Ninth Symphony, or "Elektra," for that matter?). A commissioned piece—for the orchestra's 75th anniversary season, and dedicated to Serge and Natalie Koussevitzky—it would be easy to dismiss it as a garland of familiar Christmas carols ("O come, O come, Emmanuel" to "Silent Night"), twined together with ingenuity by a clever orchestrator. Aside from the luxury of hearing this familiar music played with such tonal elegance, one cannot help but be impressed by the pleasing entity that the composer has achieved with such time-tried material. He has chosen traditional tunes of simple beauty and grandeur, embellished them in a happily related way, and strung them over the branches of the orchestra like glowing ornaments on a tree.

It is just possible that "Die Natali" won't really be appreciated until people are less observant of the rites of Christmas. Then it will shine as it did on Friday—as a nostalgic remnant of a time and of sounds we have allowed other less enriching things to obscure.

Facing forward, whatever one's predilection, was Mahler's "Das Lied von der Erde," an original at any season.

Poor Mahler. Help! Help! The musiglobolinks have seized on the composer's one documented session with Siegmund Freud and programmed a case history to explain "Das Lied" which threatens to turn off the most receptive listener forever. And that would be too bad, because the combination of the troubled composer's simple intent and the bittersweet Chinese verses he chose to set, relate very much to the mood of today, without need of extraneous psychological window dressing. Whether or not one wishes to give credence to the rather specious premise of the program note, the Mahler work spoke very powerfully for itself on Friday at Symphony Hall.

Mr. Steinberg had two eminent soloists—contralto Maureen Forrester, and tenor Jon Vickers—plus some of the finest instrumental musicmakers extant to unfold the beauties of this exotic score. Miss Forrester's voice, of extraordinary richness throughout its range, must be the ideal vehicle today for this music. Her phrasing, and her meticulous attention to the vocal coloring of words in the songs of autumn, beauty, and farewell, were unforgettable.

In the opening verses, with their key phrases "Dunkel ist das Leben, ist der Tod," and the later "Trunkene im frühling," Mr. Vickers sang with the heroic thrust and passion which makes him one of the most thrilling tenors around. For the most part, too, on Friday, he navigated the treacherous piano passages of the song of youth — almost too much for a composer to demand of the voice that can do justice to the first "Trinklied."

The orchestra outdid itself. Individually, and by sections, the players produced sounds that had more to do with Mahler's original concept than a book of essays on his eccentricities. Those who wish may dissect or conjecture. But by way of Mr. Steinberg's baton, the two fine singers, and to name a few, Mrs. Dwyer's flute, Mr. Silverstein's violin, and Mr. Gomberg's oboe, it was easier (and pleasanter) to get Mahler's message direct, gloom-free.

Pair of Concerts At the Symphony

The 13th pair of Friday-Saturday Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts will be conducted by the Orchestra's Music Director William Steinberg, Friday, Jan. 9 at 2 o'clock and Saturday, Jan. 10 at 8:30 p.m. The "Faust Symphony" by Liszt is the program's principal work, with tenor Philip Cho as soloist, and the Framingham Choral Society directed by John Oliver. On the first half of the concert, Steinberg conducts Mozart's 'Eine kleine Nachtmusik' and Stravinsky's 'Scherzo Fantastique.'

Philip Cho, born in South Korea, came to the United States in 1966. He had been a leading tenor of the Korean National Opera Theater. Last year, Cho appeared with the Pittsburgh Symphony, and earlier this season gave his New York debut recital. This is his first appearance with the Boston Symphony.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) [illegible] 3,557
JAN [illegible] 1970 Ne Eng Ne

BURLINGTON TIMES UNION
BURLINGTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 6,200
JAN 8 1970

JOURNAL
CONCORD, MASS.
WEEKLY 5,000
JAN 8 1970

Fri., Sat. Concerts Start Tomorrow

The thirteenth pair of Friday/Saturday Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts will be conducted by the Orchestra's Music Director William Steinberg, Friday, Jan. 9, at 2 p.m. and Saturday, Jan. 10, at 8:30 p.m.

MINUTE MAN
[illegible]
JAN 8 1970

CITIZEN
BELMONT, MASS.
WEEKLY 4,200
JAN 8 1970

MINUTEMAN
BEDFORD, MASS.
WEEKLY 3,100
JAN 8 1970

BSO '70 Debut Well Received

By L. David Harris
Music Critic

The Boston Symphony Orchestra entered the new year with melodic remembrances of Christmas and Gustav Mahler's symphonic "Song of the Earth" yesterday afternoon. Both were appreciated.

Samuel Berber's "Die natili, chorale preludes for Chrisamts", began the program. Many concnertgoers remembered it from its 1960 premiere after it was commissioned in celebration of the orchestra's 75th season.

The work is a medley of Christmas carols utilizing various contrapuntal devices. Basically, it was enjoyable and well performed.

As a Christmas listening experience, it left something to be desired in such carols as "Good King Wenceslas," "O Come All Ye Faithful" as Barber seemingly orchestrated them with little thought as to the meanings of their words. And even though he didn't intend words to be sung to them, it is virtually impossible for most listeners to hear carol tunes without at least subconsciously thinking about their words.

The slower carols—"Silent Night," "Lo, How a Rose e'er Blooming," etc.—were much more enjoyable and meaningful. Their effects were far more appreciated.

Tenor Jon Vickers and Contralto Maureen Forrester were soloists in Mahler's six-song "Song of the Earth." Vickers was impressive; Miss Forrester was superb, occasionally magnificant in her vocal control and expressiveness.

The texts for the six songs —three tenor, three for contralto—are from the "Chinese Flute" and are free translations of old Chinese poems. They were not treated as incidental or subordinate movements in the predominantly instrumental work, but as its core and substance.

For the most part, the orchestra kept to an appropriate thinness while the voices were singing and filled out to often rich fullness during some long and meaningful interludes.

Vickers began the six-song set impressively. His first song was a mixture of energy, somber and impressive melodic lines and impressive phrase darkenings.

Vickers also revealed good contrast in the third song, singing with light almost-porcelain quality.

Miss Forrester was brilliant in the "farewell" sixth song. The song's mood, "Darkness is all living and death," seemed to lurk throughout the piece, often given interesting dimensions by quiet undulations in the strings and a rather drooping three-note theme.

Towards the middle, the piece had a rising and falling passion to it—primarily developed through orchestral effects.

Later, however, Miss Forrester, took the piece from its hollow moments and built it to a final ecstasy, long and beautifully sustained, beginning with "I wander toward my homeland — to my long home."

The concert's last two minutes were its best. They were exquisite.

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
JAN 7 1970

'Song Of The Earth'

By Peter Knapp

Something special is in order for the first series of concerts in the new year, and William Steinberg's choice for the Boston Symphony has been Gustav Mahler's lengthy hymn to weltschmerz, "Das Lied von der Erde" ("The Song of the Earth").

Mahler's "Lied", really a cycle of six songs for tenor, contralto (or baritone) and orchestra, is the Austrian composer's most subjective and personal composition — written, we are reminded, under sentence of death.

Mahler had been told by his physician his heart condition would be fatal, though he lived three years after writing this apparent farewell to life in 1908. It could just as well be called, with a letter transposition, "Leid" (sorrow) rather than "Lied," with its mood of loneliness and yearning for return to Mother Earth (a Freudian connection that has been well noted).

The songs are based on Hans Bethge's translations of Chinese lyrics dating back to the 8th century or so, and Mahler's evocative, complex score is often washed with exquisite exotic colorations, beautifully rendered by the Boston Symphony's woodwinds and percussion. The songs alternate for tenor and contralto, leading to the transcendent, half-hour glories of "Der Abschied."

Steinberg's performance last night built intelligently to this peak, and his direction had the benefits of clarity, detail and care for atmosphere. Initially, especially in the "Trinklied," it was somewhat severe with decisive accents, forceful but rather hard in sound and contour, but the performance mellowed as it progressed.

What really made it special was the art of Maureen Forrester, the contralto, who teamed with her fellow Canadian, tenor Jon Vickers, in the solos. Miss Forrester has long been a versatile and cherished singer, and her performance last night matched a voice like a warm, vibrato-rich clarinet, to nobility of expression. "Der Abschied", with its atmosphere of resignation, melodic riches and accumulation of tension, was as moving as it should be with Miss Forrester's sensitivity to word and note.

Vickers is also a sensitive artist, one whose care for phrasing and diction is a pleasure to hear despite a few passages of forcing, where perhaps the orchestra could have been turned down a notch. Mahler, though, reserves the choicest parts for contralto.

Opening the program was Samuel Barber's "Die Natali," chorale preludes on familiar Christmas carols, a pleasant, lightweight work commissioned by the BSO in 1960 for the orchestra's 75th season.

CONTRALTO Maureen Forrester

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
JAN 10 1970 En

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850
JAN 12 1970

Liszt's 'Faust': 'They don't write them like this anymore'

By Louis Snyder

Liszt's Faust Symphony, which was last played by the Boston Symphony in 1948, and is something of a rarity everywhere these days, was the pièce de résistance at Symphony Hall in the new Thursday B series, and at the orchestra's two weekend concerts.

To open the program, William Steinberg chose Mozart's "Eine kleine Nachtmusik," and a Boston premiere—Stravinsky's "Scherzo fantastique," which dates from his early years as a composer. If the results are any indication, both gentlemen, at 31 and 25 respectively, must have had fun writing these zesty numbers, albeit the first was probably workaday, made-to-order for money, the latter in Stravinsky's words "a promising opus three," and undoubtedly a wildly daring youthful experiment.

Flying objects

From beginning to end, the Mozart "musik" is suspended in air, comfortably above the reach of groundlings, while the young Stravinsky exercise whizzes through the atmosphere (if at some length) in the tradition of well-known wing-fluttering pieces by Mendelssohn, Rimsky-Korsakov, Tchaikovsky, and other busy-bee and ballet-bird composers. The orchestra gave both Mozart and Stravinsky their due, if indeed the "Nachtmusik" did not reach the ear with its ultimate magic.

Probably in his own way, Liszt too had a fine time composing his Faust "symphony in three character studies" (Faust, Gretchen, Mephistopheles). It is dedicated to Berlioz, who had previously dedicated his "Damnation of Faust" to Liszt — a real love-Faust-feast — and considering the individualistic opulence of musical expression in which each indulged, their mutual devotion to the Goethe characters is understandable.

Orchestra show

Actually the Liszt version, heard on Friday, is an extraordinariy satisfying romantic triptych, possessed of rich sound, melodic themes, and a unifying scheme which, of its genre, doesn't overtax the interest. Faust and Gretchen are musically defined in "pictures" of their own, and the devil himself is characterized by orchestral devices which are threaded elusively through much of the material that has gone before, until his final mutterings give way to a "Chorus mysticus," led by a solo tenor voice in praise of the perfection of woman's love. In telling the same classic story, it isn't as compelling as Berlioz, but then it isn't as antiseptic as Gounod, either.

Mr. Steinberg directed a performance that was strong in concept, and except for a few rough edges, powerfully executed by the musicians. One can be kept as busy watching the orchestra in this "Faust" as seeing a full-scale opera production, what with quartets, brass choirs, string and woodwind solos, percussion and organ vying for attention. Finally there arrived onstage an excellent male chorus (from the Framingham Choral Society), and a musicianly, pure-voiced tenor, Philip Cho, to put a climactic benediction on the whole proceedings. They don't write them like this anymore, but it is enterprising of Mr. Steinberg and the BSO to show us so searchingly that they did.

At Symphony Hall

Stravinsky, Liszt Enliven Program

By McLAREN HARRIS

Yesterday's Symphony program brought a welcome departure from the ordinary — there have been few enough this season — in the form of Stravinsky's diverting Scherzo fantastique and Liszt's "Faust" Symphony, which had lamentably escaped performance by the orchestra for more than 21 years.

"Faust" is no symphony in a classical sense, but a succession of three interrelated, interdependent tone poems, each with its own unorthodox formal structure governed more by poetic requirements than by strict musical considerations. That, however, does not prevent "Faust" from being one of Liszt's finest orchestral creations; there is almost as much to attract the absolutist aso ne who follows its program — the opening chain of augmented intervals revealing only a shadow of tonality, the wealth of chromaticism throughout the "Faust" movement, the transformation of Faustian themes in succeeding movements through a variety of rhythmic and contrapuntal configurations, and the pure expertise of the orchestration.

AS FOR THE program, the argument over the identity of the true hero in "Faust," and the contention that Arrigo Boito was correct in naming his version of it "Mefistofele," do not apply here. Musically and dramatically, Faust dominates the score, knitting together the movements with motives of distinct character — even discernible through the derision and desecration of Mephistophelian humor.

Faust was all the more in control yesterday, as under William Steinberg the satanic character of Mephistopheles took on a dignified, almost genteel outlook. With orderly tempos and rather muted dynamic language, the movements contained morel ntellectual sport than dramatic conviction. That is certainly not the way it should be, but to the extent that it betrayed Liszt's intents for Mephistopheles, it reflected Steinberg's success with the earlier movements — brooding, intense and grandiose for Faust, lyrically disarming and gent- Gretchen, although woodwind ly, continuously phrased for intonation deserted the latter cause briefly.

MEN'S VOICES of the Framingham Choral Scoiety with tenor Philip Cho supplying the brief verses of the epilogue, were excellent.

Liszt may have stolen the emphasis away from Mozart's Eine Kleine Nachtmusik and Stravinsky's Scherzo, but not their charm. I vote for the Nachtmusik in the quintet version, but the BSO strings acquitted themselves with sufficient lightness for an amiable reading. The Scherzo fantastique, an early, romantic-idiom fantasy of lightly-swirling strings and winds, is presumed to owe its inspiration to Materlinck's "Life of the Bees," despite Stravinsky's disclaimer. The composer and his biographers are so quick to list its suppoed musical "debts" — to Rimsky-Korsakov, Mendelssohn, Tchaikovsky, Dukas, Wagner and Debussy— that one may wonder whether he composed it with pen or with scissors and paste.

But it is an engaging, attractive work of pinpoint-texture of which Stravinsky, after conducting in the late 1950's, remarked that he was pleased it hadn't embarrassed him. In the samem anner of praising with faint condemnation, the BSO perfromance was the day's best effort.

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Thursday evening January 8 1970 at 8.30
Friday afternoon January 9 1970 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening January 10 1970 at 8.30

WILLIAM STEINBERG conductor

MOZART — Eine kleine Nachtmusik K. 525*
Allegro
Romance: andante
Menuetto: allegretto
Rondo: allegro

STRAVINSKY — Scherzo fantastique
first performance in Boston

intermission

LISZT — A Faust symphony in three character studies (after Goethe)
Faust
Lento assai – allegro impetuoso – allegro agitato ed appassionato assai
Gretchen
Andante soave
Mephistopheles
Allegro vivace ironico – andante mistico (with male chorus)

PHILIP CHO tenor

FRAMINGHAM CHORAL SOCIETY
John Oliver Director

THE CHORUS

The FRAMINGHAM CHORAL SOCIETY was founded by Edward F. Gilday Jr in 1937, and was originally a chamber group. Over the years the chorus has grown in numbers and the repertoire has become principally oratorio. Their conductor since 1966 has been John Oliver, who also teaches at the Newton College of the Sacred Heart and is executive assistant to the music director at MIT. He has assisted in the preparation of choruses appearing with the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood and in 1970 will be director of choral activities at the Berkshire Festival.

'Enjoyable' the Word to Use For BSO's Latest Offering

By L. DAVID HARRIS

"Enpoyable" was the word for the latest of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts. — — — ture of light and heavy Mozart, Stravinsky and Liszt.

Conductor William Steinberg directed the music yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall. The program began with a crisp, well-paced interpretation of Mozart's "Eine kleine Nachtmusik," then moved into Stravinsky's "Scherzo fantastique."

The scherzo seemed a mixture of shimmerings with occasionally melodies bursting out at interesting times. The woodwinds seemed exceptionally proficient.

The second half of the concert was Liszt's "Faust" symphony — a masterpiece of symphonic music. It was dramatic, occasionally passionate — a good portraiture of its composer.

In the symphony's first movement ("character study") there were some pitch and intonation problems with the horns. Some problems were quite obvious. On the other hand, the listener might well single out the trumpets as excepional musicians hroughout the program.

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300
JAN 10 1970 N Eng

An additional review of this program may be found on page 32.

THE SOLOIST

PHILIP CHO, a native of South Korea, came to the United States in 1966, and before long was accepted as a pupil by Jan Peerce. He had been singing since he was a young boy, and at the age of 18, winning a voice contest sponsored by Seoul University, was awarded a scholarship by the School of Music. While still at university he made his professional debut with the Korean National Symphony and immediately was engaged for other orchestral and solo appearances. He became leading tenor of the newly formed Korean National Opera Theatre in 1963, and acquired a large operatic repertoire. A year ago Philip Cho gave two recitals in Pittsburgh and appeared with the Pittsburgh Symphony under William Steinberg's direction. He makes his first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at these concerts.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 68,377
JAN 10 1970 Ne Engl

Steinberg conducts in Mozart, Stravinsky and Liszt

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

Friday afternoon at the Boston Symphony, William Steinberg began with Mozart's "Eine kleine Nachtmusik," went on to give the first performance here of Stravinsky's "Scherzo fantastique," and finished with the Liszt "Faust" Symphony. That made it an uncommonly interesting program, but there was, at the same time, a low standard of performance to make the concert a pretty poor one.

The Stravinsky is a charming piece that does not sound much like Stravinsky. It was finished in March 1908, a couple of years before "Firebird," and while it does seem to anticipate some of the passages from that ballet that most sound like Rimsky-Korsakov, it more often harks back to Mendels- the squareness of the four-bar phrases; there is, on the other hand, a lot of sohn, Tchaikovsky, and, of all things, to "Siegfried." Stravinsky now deplores rhythmic inventiveness within those boxes. It is also delightfully scored, and if it is neither a personal piece nor an original one, it is accomplishd and appealing.

The "Faust" Symphony is a work of genius, though flawed and problematic. The movement that portrays Faust has some of Liszt's most inspired and telling music, particularly that which depicts the brooding, old Faust; it is also the movement most apt to bog down in academic formal structures, and there is quite a lot here of Liszt in a certain gaudy, quasi-military vein that is his least attractive.

The Gretchen movement unfolds to become a portrait of surprising range and richness, and it is, besides, one of the great adventures between Berlioz and Mahler in writing chamber music for large orchestra. Liszt's Mephistophelian pieces are all-imagined with instant and worked out with terrific brio, and this one gains, as it were, an extra dimension because Liszt can base his portrait on a series of Satanic interpretations of themes belonging to Faust.

The end of the Symphony, with its setting for tenor and men's chorus of the last lines of Part II of Goethe's play, is a problem. One understands Liszt's not wanting to end with the spirit that denies, yet there is something arbitrary about that imposed dose of redeeming social value. The vocal music, moreover, seems somehow too short, not for Goethe's eight lines and only 42 syllables, but for the scale of the rest of the Symphony. If there is something not quite genuine about Liszt's bringing in the Chorus Mysticus, the music itself is strikingly beautiful in his most fragrantly Catholic style (particularly, one might add, theplace his son-in-law borrowed for the end of "Die Walkuere"). And, even with its unsolved problems, the "Faust" Symphony is a powerfully expressive work of extraordinary musical and dramatic imagination and intellectual vigor.

Philip Cho, a young lyric tenor from South Korea, sang most beautifully, with exquisite art in phrasing and lovely tone quality, at once delicate and bright. Except for their sturdy refusal to be mystical, i.e. pianissimo, the men of the Framingham Choral Society, prepared by John Oliver, sang superbly, particularly with respect to diction.

Otherwise, though, except for sporadic details, the performance was a failure. The fantastical and the passionate are not the genres at which William Steinberg excels, and his interpretations lacked nearly everything in drama, atmosphere, and intensity of expressive. Equally dismaying was the technical insufficiency of the conducting, and inevitably, therefore, of the playing: the beat was rubbery, nothing was together, and there were passages, particularly in "Gretchen," that came out gibberish. Stravinsky's "Scherzo fantastique," which demands a crisply cirtuosix delivery, sounded like a sack of ball-bearings being emptied down a flight of stairs, and Mozart's Serenade was technically smeared, too, as well as interpretively wooden. It is ironic, but if a composer actually wanted and tried to notate the rhythmic complexities that were achieved Friday through imprecision, no orchestra in the world could read the result or play that way on purpose.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
JAN 10 1970 En

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850
JAN 12 1970

At Symphony Hall

Stravinsky, Liszt Enliven Program

By McLAREN HARRIS

Yesterday's Symphony program brought a welcome departure from the ordinary — there have been few enough this season — in the form of Stravinsky's diverting Scherzo fantastique and Liszt's "Faust" Symphony, which had lamentably escaped performance by the orchestra for more than 21 years.

"Faust" is no symphony in a classical sense, but a succession of three interrelated, interdependent tone poems, each with its own unorthodox formal structure governed more by poetic requirements than by strict musical considerations. That, however, does not prevent "Faust" from being one of Liszt's finest orchestral creations; there is almost as much to attract the absolutist aso ne who follows its program — the opening chain of augmented intervals revealing only a shadow of tonality, the wealth of chromaticism throughout the "Faust" movement, the transformation of Faustian themes in succeeding movements through a variety of rhythmic and contrapuntal configurations, and the pure expertise of the orchestration.

AS FOR THE program, the argument over the identity of the true hero in "Faust," and the contention that Arrigo Boito was correct in naming his version of it "Mefistofele," do not apply here. Musically and dramatically, Faust dominates the score, knitting together the movements with motives of distinct character — even discernible through the derision and desecration of Mephistophelian humor.

Faust was all the more in control yesterday, as under William Steinberg the satanic character of Mephistopheles took on a dignified, almost genteel outlook. With orderly tempos and rather muted dynamic language, the movements contained more intellectual sport than dramatic conviction. That is certainly not the way it should be, but to the extent that it betrayed Liszt's intents for Mephistopheles, it reflected Steinberg's success with the earlier movements — brooding, intense and grandiose for Faust, lyrically disarming and gent- Gretchen, although woodwind ly, continuously phrased for intonation deserted the latter cause briefly.

MEN'S VOICES of the Framingham Choral Scoiety with tenor Philip Cho supplying the brief verses of the epilogue, were excellent.

Liszt may have stolen the emphasis away from Mozart's Eine Kleine Nachtmusik and Stravinsky's Scherzo, but not their charm. I vote for the Nachtmusik in the quintet version, but the BSO strings acquitted themselves with sufficient lightness for an amiable reading. The Scherzo fantastique, an early, romantic-idiom fantasy of lightly-swirling strings and winds, is presumed to owe its inspiration to Materlinck's "Life of the Bees," despite Stravinsky's disclaimer. The composer and his biographers are so quick to list its suppoed musical "debts" — to Rimsky-Korsakov, Mendelssohn, Tchaikovsky, Dukas, Wagner and Debussy— that one may wonder whether he composed it with pen or with scissors and paste.

But it is an engaging, attractive work of pinpoint-texture of which Stravinsky, after conducting in the late 1950's, remarked that he was pleased it hadn't embarrassed him. In the samem anner of praising with faint condemnation, the BSO perfromance was the day's best effort.

Liszt's 'Faust': 'They don't write them like this anymore'

By Louis Snyder

Liszt's Faust Symphony, which was last played by the Boston Symphony in 1948, and is something of a rarity everywhere these days, was the pièce de résistance at Symphony Hall in the new Thursday B series, and at the orchestra's two weekend concerts.

To open the program, William Steinberg chose Mozart's "Eine kleine Nachtmusik," and a Boston premiere—Stravinsky's "Scherzo fantastique," which dates from his early years as a composer. If the results are any indication, both gentlemen, at 31 and 25 respectively, must have had fun writing these zesty numbers, albeit the first was probably workaday, made-to-order for money, the latter in Stravinsky's words "a promising opus three," and undoubtedly a wildly daring youthful experiment.

Flying objects

From beginning to end, the Mozart "musik" is suspended in air, comfortably above the reach of groundlings, while the young Stravinsky exercise whizzes through the atmosphere (if at some length) in the tradition of well-known wing-fluttering pieces by Mendelssohn, Rimsky-Korsakov, Tchaikovsky, and other busy-bee and ballet-bird composers. The orchestra gave both Mozart and Stravinsky their due, if indeed the "Nachtmusik" did not reach the ear with its ultimate magic.

Probably in his own way, Liszt too had a fine time composing his Faust "symphony in three character studies" (Faust, Gretchen, Mephistopheles). It is dedicated to Berlioz, who had previously dedicated his "Damnation of Faust" to Liszt — a real love-Faust-feast — and considering the individualistic opulence of musical expression in which each indulged, their mutual devotion to the Goethe characters is understandable.

Orchestra show

Actually the Liszt version, heard on Friday, is an extraordinariy satisfying romantic triptych, possessed of rich sound, melodic themes, and a unifying scheme which, of its genre, doesn't overtax the interest. Faust and Gretchen are musically defined in "pictures" of their own, and the devil himself is characterized by orchestral devices which are threaded elusively through much of the material that has gone before, until his final mutterings give way to a "Chorus mysticus," led by a solo tenor voice in praise of the perfection of woman's love. In telling the same classic story, it isn't as compelling as Berlioz, but then it isn't as antiseptic as Gounod, either.

Mr. Steinberg directed a performance that was strong in concept, and except for a few rough edges, powerfully executed by the musicians. One can be kept as busy watching the orchestra in this "Faust" as seeing a full-scale opera production, what with quartets, brass choirs, string and woodwind solos, percussion and organ vying for attention. Finally there arrived onstage an excellent male chorus (from the Framingham Choral Society), and a musicianly, pure-voiced tenor, Philip Cho, to put a climactic benediction on the whole proceedings. They don't write them like this anymore, but it is enterprising of Mr. Steinberg and the BSO to show us so searchingly that they did.

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Thursday evening January 8 1970 at 8.30
Friday afternoon January 9 1970 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening January 10 1970 at 8.30

WILLIAM STEINBERG conductor

MOZART — Eine kleine Nachtmusik K. 525*
Allegro
Romance: andante
Menuetto: allegretto
Rondo: allegro

STRAVINSKY — Scherzo fantastique
first performance in Boston

intermission

LISZT — A Faust symphony in three character studies (after Goethe)
Faust
Lento assai – allegro impetuoso – allegro agitato ed appassionato assai
Gretchen
Andante soave
Mephistopheles
Allegro vivace ironico – andante mistico (with male chorus)

PHILIP CHO tenor

FRAMINGHAM CHORAL SOCIETY
John Oliver Director

THE CHORUS

The FRAMINGHAM CHORAL SOCIETY was founded by Edward F. Gilday Jr in 1937, and was originally a chamber group. Over the years the chorus has grown in numbers and the repertoire has become principally oratorio. Their conductor since 1966 has been John Oliver, who also teaches at the Newton College of the Sacred Heart and is executive assistant to the music director at MIT. He has assisted in the preparation of choruses appearing with the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood and in 1970 will be director of choral activities at the Berkshire Festival.

'Enjoyable' the Word to Use For BSO's Latest Offering

By L. DAVID HARRIS

"Enpoyable" was the word for the latest of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts. — a mixture of light and heavy Mozart, Stravinsky and Liszt.

Conductor William Steinberg directed the music yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall. The program began with a crisp, well-paced interpretation of Mozart's "Eine kleine Nachtmusik," then moved into Stravinsky's "Scherzo fantastique."

The scherzo seemed a mixture of shimmerings with occasionally melodies bursting out at interesting times. The woodwinds seemed exceptionally proficient.

The second half of the concert was Liszt's "Faust" symphony — a masterpiece of symphonic music. It was dramatic, occasionally passionate — a good portraiture of its composer.

In the symphony's first movement ("character study") there were some pitch and intonation problems with the horns. Some problems were quite obvious. On the other hand, the listener might well single out the trumpets as excepional musicians hroughout the program.

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300
JAN 10 1970 N Eng

An additional review of this program may be found on page 32.

THE SOLOIST

PHILIP CHO, a native of South Korea, came to the United States in 1966, and before long was accepted as a pupil by Jan Peerce. He had been singing since he was a young boy, and at the age of 18, winning a voice contest sponsored by Seoul University, was awarded a scholarship by the School of Music. While still at university he made his professional debut with the Korean National Symphony and immediately was engaged for other orchestral and solo appearances. He became leading tenor of the newly formed Korean National Opera Theatre in 1963, and acquired a large operatic repertoire. A year ago Philip Cho gave two recitals in Pittsburgh and appeared with the Pittsburgh Symphony under William Steinberg's direction. He makes his first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at these concerts.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 227,967 (S) 194,70
JAN 10 1970 Ne Engl

Steinberg conducts in Mozart, Stravinsky and Liszt

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

Friday afternoon at the Boston Symphony, William Steinberg began with Mozart's "Eine kleine Nachtmusik," went on to give the first performance here of Stravinsky's "Scherzo fantastique," and finished with the Liszt "Faust" Symphony. That made it an uncommonly interesting program, but there was, at the same time, a low standard of performance to make the concert a pretty poor one.

The Stravinsky is a charming piece that does not sound much like Stravinsky. It was finished in March 1908, a couple of years before "Firebird," and while it does seem to anticipate some of the passages from that ballet that most sound like Rimsky-Korsakov, it more often harks back to Mendelssohn, the squareness of the four-bar phrases; there is, on the other hand, a lot of the squareness of the four-bar phrases; there is, on the other hand, a lot of sohn, Tchaikovsky, and, of all things, to "Siegfried." Stravinsky now deplores rhythmic inventiveness within those boxes. It is also delightfully scored, and if it is neither a personal piece nor an original one, it is accomplishd and appealing.

The "Faust" Symphony is a work of genius, though flawed and problematic. The movement that portrays Faust has some of Liszt's most inspired and telling music, particularly that which depicts the brooding, old Faust; it is also the movement most apt to bog down in academic formal structures, and there is quite a lot here of Liszt in a certain gaudy, quasi-military vein that is his least attractive.

The Gretchen movement unfolds to become a portrait of surprising range and richness, and it is, besides, one of the great adventures between Berlioz and Mahler in writing chamber music for large orchestra. Liszt's Mephistophelian pieces are all-imagined with instant and worked out with terrific brio, and this one gains, as it were, an extra dimension because Liszt can base his portrait on a series of Satanic interpretations of themes belonging to Faust.

The end of the Symphony, with its setting for tenor and men's chorus of the last lines of Part II of Goethe's play, is a problem. One understands Liszt's not wanting to end with the spirit that denies, yet there is something arbitrary about that imposed dose of redeeming social value. The vocal music, moreover, seems somehow too short, not for Goethe's eight lines and only 42 syllables, but for the scale of the rest of the Symphony. If there is something not quite genuine about Liszt's bringing in the Chorus Mysticus, the music itself is strikingly beautiful in his most fragrantly Catholic style (particularly, one might add, theplace his son-in-law borrowed for the end of "Die Walkuere"). And, even with its unsolved problems, the "Faust" Symphony is a powerfully expressive work of extraordinary musical and dramatic imagination and intellectual vigor.

Philip Cho, a young lyric tenor from South Korea, sang most beautifully, with exquisite art in phrasing and lovely tone quality, at once delicate and bright. Except for their sturdy refusal to be mystical, i.e. pianissimo, the men of the Framingham Choral Society, prepared by John Oliver, sang superbly, particularly with respect to diction.

Otherwise, though, except for sporadic details, the performance was a failure. The fantastical and the passionate are not the genres at which William Steinberg excels, and his interpretations lacked nearly everything in drama, atmosphere, and intensity of expressive. Equally dismaying was the technical insufficiency of the conducting, and inevitably, therefore, of the playing: the beat was rubbery, nothing was together, and there were passages, particularly in "Gretchen," that came out gibberish. Stravinsky's "Scherzo fantastique," which demands a crisply cirtuosix delivery, sounded like a sack of ball-bearings being emptied down a flight of stairs, and Mozart's Serenade was technically smeared, too, as well as interpretively wooden. It is ironic, but if a composer actually wanted and tried to notate the rhythmic complexities that were achieved Friday through imprecision, no orchestra in the world could read the result or play that way on purpose.

30.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

WILLIAM STEINBERG Music Director

PENSION FUND CONCERT

Sunday January 11 1970 at 8.30 pm in Symphony Hall

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
WILLIAM STEINBERG conductor
with

DAVID OISTRAKH violin

BERLIOZ	Overture to 'Benvenuto Cellini'	op. 23
MOZART	Violin concerto in A K. 219 DAVID OISTRAKH
intermission
BRAHMS	Violin concerto in D DAVID OISTRAKH	op. 77

Ticket prices are $5, $6, $7, $8 and $10.
Box Office, Symphony Hall
Boston, Massachusetts 02115

SYMPHONY REVIEW - BOOKSPAN 11 PM NEWS WHAC-TV SUNDAY, JANUARY 11, 1970

AUDIO

~~THANKS, XXXX, XXXX~~ Good evening everyone. You remember that pop tune of about a quarter-of-a-century ago, What a Difference a Day Made? Well, I have to lead off my remarks this evening by saying What a Difference Two Days Made: on Friday evening, I was in Philharmonic Hall in New York to hear the great Russian violinist, David Oistrakh, play the Brahms Violin Concerto.

It was a distressing performance - Oistrakh had all kinds of trouble with intonation and bowing.

This evening, here in Symphony Hall in

Violinist Returns as Soloist

Oistrakh Symphony Perform Flawlessly

David Oistrakh, who first performed with the Boston Symphony Orchestra some 15 years ago, returned for the first time since then as soloist in last night's Pension Fund concert, dedicated to the memory of the orchestra's founder, Henry Lee Higginson. William Steinberg conducted, and Mr. Oistrakh played two concertos with which he has become particularly associated: the Mozart A-major (K. 219) and the Brahms.

It was a Gemutlich affair. The orchestra rose and applauded when Mr. Oistrakh made his entrance, and the give-and-take in the ensuing performances kept building in the happiest blend of amiability and intensity.

The Brahms Violin Concerto is an old story, and it is far from being anything like this listener's favorite music. It may well be Mr. Oistrakh's, though, and hearing him perform it, hyperbolical though it may seem when verbalized, is something like witnessing the miracle of birth: so familiar and yet so new—and time after time so perfect.

Mr. Steinberg was, as always, the perfect partner. (If there is a more effective concerto conductor operating anywhere, he has yet to make himself known.) Since Mr. Oistrakh performed in New York Saturday night, there was time for only minimal rehearsal yesterday morning, but violinist and conductor showed the kind of rapport that would suggest long and productive collaboration, through which a genuine mutuality of interpretive aims has been determined and polished.

If the Brahms was appropriately expansive, the Mozart was appropriately intimate. However, in the Mozart there was also much more of a feeling of "soloist with accompaniment" than the "primus inter pares," as one might wish, for the "intimacy" at times bordered on reticence, while in the Brahms the orchestra was more of a full partner.

In both works, though, Mr. Oistrakh reminded a large and grateful Symphony Hall audience that perfection and warmth are by no means mutally exclusive; it was apparent that he was enjoying himself and knew that was what his music-making was all about. Let him not wait another 15 years to return.

The Joachim cadenzas were played in both concertos. A few weeks ago, in a review of Mr. Steinberg's performance of Tchaikovsky's "Manfred," Ralph Gomberg was mistakenly credited here for the oboe solo actually played by Hugh Matheny. Last night it was indeed Mr. Gomberg who played the lovely solo in the slow movement of the Brahms.

The concert opened with the "Benvenuto Cellini" Overture of Belioz, performance with a certain headlong quality which Belioz can take. If it seemed less than tidy here and there, it was only because of the inevitable comparison with the concert by the London Symphony Orchestra in the same hall a few hours earlier.

RICHARD D. FREED

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
JAN 12 1970

Oistrakh, the BSO

C. S. Monitor Jan. 13, '70

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850
JAN 16 1970

The evening's concert for the Pension Fund was dedicated to the memory of the BSO's founder, Henry Lee Higginson, who would have been proud to know that its membership has increased from "sixty men and a conductor" to 102 men (and 4 women!), a conductor and an assistant conductor. One of the true virtuosos of our time, Mr. Oistrakh, was on hand to play concertos by Mozart (in A, K. 219) and Brahms (in D), and the orchestra's lush-sounding opener was the Berlioz overture to "Benvenuto Cellini"—nothing the Major would have considered "unworthy" and therefore "to be shut out."

The casual ease with which the genial Mr. Oistrakh tossed off these two works belied what the ear heard and the eye saw as evidence of the ultimate artist at work. The style of the Mozart and the flair of the Brahms sang for themselves, without externals, through an unvarying richness of tone and facile technique which add up to the art that conceals art.

No small portion of the evening's pleasure was the orchestra's absorbed partnership under Mr. Steinberg's direction. Strangely enough, considering their long careers, this concert marked the first collaboration between Mr. Oistrakh and Mr. Steinberg—"a promising beginning," as the conductor later remarked.

On the music scene

CSM 12/31/69

The renowned Russian violinist, David Oistrakh, will return to Boston for the first time in more than 15 years to be soloist at the Boston Symphony's annual Pension Fund concert on Sunday evening, Jan. 11, at 8:30. William Steinberg will conduct the orchestra in the "Benvenuto Cellini" overture of Berlioz, and Mr. Oistrakh will play the Mozart A major and Brahms D major concertos. The concert will be dedicated to the memory of Henry Lee Higginson, founder of the orchestra.

ITEM
LYNN, MASS.
(E) 38,000
DEC 27 1969

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY'S annual pension fund concert will feature Russian violinist David Oistrakh. He joins William Steinberg, music director, and the orchestra in a performance of the Brahms violin concerto in D major, one of the masterpieces of the violin repertory. The concert will be held on Sunday, Jan. 11, at 8:30 p.m. in Symphony Hall.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 466,377
JAN 13 1970
New England Newsclip

Evening Globe 1/13/70

Oistrakh in Brahms concerto

By Craig Smith
Contributing Critic

After a disappointing first half, rich-toned playing from Soviet Violinist David Oistrakh and sensible, lucid conducting from William Steinberg brought Sunday night's Boston Symphony pension fund concert alive. The Brahms Violin Concerto which followed intermission has never, to this listener, sounded so clear and logical as in this well-planned performance. It is by now, redundant to mention Oistrakh's complete mastery of the instrument, yet one could not help but be amazed at the splendid, really grand performance of the first movement cadenza, the lovely cantabile of the slow movement and most of all the zest which pervaded the usually much more stodgy finale. If one could utter a complaint about the performace, it would concern Oistrakh's slight tendancy to flatten out the angularities that are an integral part of this great work. This problem was especially evident in the development of the first movement.

The A Major Concerto K. 219 of Mozart is the most complex as well as the most popular of that composer's violin concerti. The work is interesting in form, seeming to lie somewhere between a concerto and a divertments. Especially charming is the songful Adagio and the humorous Rondeau (tempo di menuetto), that contains a Turkish Music section that appears on the scene like a boorish party guest in the midst of an elegant Viennese soiree. Unfortunately the performance was marred by some exceptionally sour wind playing, backward trills, and incorrect appogiaturas, which upset the delicate balance of Mozart's melodic writing. One also wonders why Oistrakh chose not to play along in the tuttis after Mr. Steinberg so correctly reduced the number of players to a properly proportioned Mozartean orchestra.

Hector Berlioz, the bad boy of Parisian musical life in the first half of the nineteenth century, made an ironic appearance (in the form of Benvenuto Cellini Overture) in this most "establishment" of muscal activities the benefit concert. The performance was rousing if not quite clear enough for the complexity of the orchestration.

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,387
JAN 13 1970
New England Newsclip

David Oistrakh

Oistrakh: Overwhelming Ovation

David Oistrakh seems at home in Boston, and Hub concertgoers, for their part, wish it were really so. The great Russian violinist, who has played here several times in the last few years, received a long and affectionate welcome when he stepped onstage Sunday evening as soloist in the 149th Pension Fund Concert for the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A few hours after the London Symphony left the stage, Symphony Hall was full again to hear Oistrakh accompanied by the BSO under William Steinberg in two concerti for the benefit: Mozart's Violin Concerto in A, K. 219, and the Brahms Concerto in D. Also on the program was Berlioz' Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini."

The Brahms concerto made the program a memorable event, with Oistrakh's effortless purity of tone and line, mastery of technique and directness of communication.

There are those who fuss over the Brahms, who exaggerate the phrasing, contort the meter, and produce fluttery, throbbing sounds in the adagio. Oistrakh is not one of them. He used little vibrato, played in time (the adagio moved a little quicker than usual), and phrased naturally and directly. The result, with Steinberg's mellow accompaniment, was a masterpiece of lyric purity and romantic poetry.

Perhaps the most magical moment in a performance of consistent beauty came in the last few pages of the first movement, where Oistrakh's flawless and impeccably-scaled cadenza was followed by the orchestra's gentle re-entry and the violin soared high above the staff in a weightless cantilena. The audience held their breath.

The Mozart concerto was less exalted, principally because of a plodding, wooden accompaniment. Phrasing was often awkward and the orchestra often seemed to be led out of the soloist's way rather than joining in a partnership.

Oistrakh employed a lighter, sweeter tone here, and had a few problems with dropped notes and slight pitch imperfections in the first movement, which he soon corrected. His passagework then was sharp and pointed, and the cadenzas again were models of controlled violinistic brilliance.

30.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

WILLIAM STEINBERG Music Director

PENSION FUND CONCERT

Sunday January 11 1970 at 8.30 pm in Symphony Hall

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
WILLIAM STEINBERG conductor
with

DAVID OISTRAKH violin

BERLIOZ	Overture to 'Benvenuto Cellini'	op. 23
MOZART	Violin concerto in A K. 219 DAVID OISTRAKH
intermission
BRAHMS	Violin concerto in D DAVID OISTRAKH	op. 77

Ticket prices are $5, $6, $7, $8 and $10.
Box Office, Symphony Hall
Boston, Massachusetts 02115

Violinist Returns as Soloist

Oistrakh Symphony Perform Flawlessly

David Oistrakh, who first performed with the Boston Symphony Orchestra some 15 years ago, returned for the first time since then as soloist in last night's Pension Fund concert, dedicated to the memory of the orchestra's founder, Henry Lee Higginson. William Steinberg conducted, and Mr. Oistrakh played two concertos with which he has become particularly associated: the Mozart A-major (K. 219) and the Brahms.

It was a Gemutlich affair. The orchestra rose and applauded when Mr. Oistrakh made his entrance, and the give-and-take in the ensuing performances kept building in the happiest blend of amiability and intensity.

The Brahms Violin Concerto is an old story, and it is far from being anything like this listener's favorite music. It may well be Mr. Oistrakh's, though, and hearing him perform it, hyperbolical though it may seem when verbalized, is something like witnessing the miracle of birth: so familiar and yet so new—and time after time so perfect.

Mr. Steinberg was, as always, the perfect partner. (If there is a more effective concerto conductor operating anywhere, he has yet to make himself known.) Since Mr. Oistrakh performed in New York Saturday night, there was time for only minimal rehearsal yesterday morning, but violinist and conductor showed the kind of rapport that would suggest long and productive collaboration, through which a genuine mutuality of interpretive aims has been determined and polished.

If the Brahms was appropriately expansive, the Mozart was appropriately intimate. However, in the Mozart there was also much more of a feeling of "soloist with accompaniment" than the "primus inter pares," as one might wish, for the "intimacy" at times bordered on reticence, while in the Brahms the orchestra was more of a full partner.

In both works, though, Mr. Oistrakh reminded a large and grateful Symphony Hall audience that perfection and warmth are by no means mutally exclusive; it was apparent that he was enjoying himself and knew that was what his music-making was all about. Let him not wait another 15 years to return.

The Joachim cadenzas were played in both concertos. A few weeks ago, in a review of Mr. Steinberg's performance of Tchaikovsky's "Manfred," Ralph Gomberg was mistakenly credited here for the oboe solo actually played by Hugh Matheny. Last night it was indeed Mr. Gomberg who played the lovely solo in the slow movement of the Brahms.

The concert opened with the "Benvenuto Cellini" Overture of Belioz, performance with a certain headlong quality which Belioz can take. If it seemed less than tidy here and there, it was only because of the inevitable comparison with the concert by the London Symphony Orchestra in the same hall a few hours earlier.

RICHARD D. FREED

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 288,557

JAN 12 1970

Boston, Oistrakh appeared as soloist with William Steinberg and the Boston Symphony in the orchestra's annual Pension Fund concert; again he played the Brahms Concerto, but this time the results were of a different order entirely. Where Friday there was a tentative quality to Oistrakh's playing, this evening he was always in sure command of every situation: there was a freedom and an audacity to his playing that were quite overwhelming, and there was no trouble at all with pitch or bowing unsteadiness. In short, Oistrakh this evening was at the very top of his form - and when he is in that condition, he is one of the most exciting and communicative artists currently before the public.

In addition, to the Brahms, he also played Mozart's "Turkish" Concerto to perfection - and the evening began with a headlong, impetuous performance by Mr. Steinberg and the orchestra of the Benvenuto Cellini Overture by Berlioz.

Symphony Hall seemed filled to its capacity - and those fortunate 2600 people who were in attendance heard a concert they will long remember.

And now, back to Ken Wayne and more news.

Oistrakh, the BSO

C. S. Monitor
Jan. 13, '70

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

JAN 16 1970

The evening's concert for the Pension Fund was dedicated to the memory of the BSO's founder, Henry Lee Higginson, who would have been proud to know that its membership has increased from "sixty men and a conductor" to 102 men (and 4 women!), a conductor and an assistant conductor. One of the true virtuosos of our time, Mr. Oistrakh, was on hand to play concertos by Mozart (in A, K. 219) and Brahms (in D), and the orchestra's lush-sounding opener was the Berlioz overture to "Benvenuto Cellini"—nothing the Major would have considered "unworthy" and therefore "to be shut out."

The casual ease with which the genial Mr. Oistrakh tossed off these two works belied what the ear heard and the eye saw as evidence of the ultimate artist at work. The style of the Mozart and the flair of the Brahms sang for themselves, without externals, through an unvarying richness of tone and facile technique which add up to the art that conceals art.

No small portion of the evening's pleasure was the orchestra's absorbed partnership under Mr. Steinberg's direction. Strangely enough, considering their long careers, this concert marked the first collaboration between Mr. Oistrakh and Mr. Steinberg—"a promising beginning," as the conductor later remarked.

On the music scene

CSM 12/21/69

The renowned Russian violinist, David Oistrakh, will return to Boston for the first time in more than 15 years to be soloist at the Boston Symphony's annual Pension Fund concert on Sunday evening, Jan. 11, at 8:30. William Steinberg will conduct the orchestra in the "Benvenuto Cellini" overture of Berlioz, and Mr. Oistrakh will play the Mozart A major and Brahms D ma-

ITEM
LYNN, MASS.
(E) 38,000

DEC 27 1969

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY'S annual pension fund concert will feature Russian violinist David Oistrakh. He joins William Steinberg, music director, and the orchestra in a performance of the Brahms violin concerto in D major, one of the masterpieces of the violin repertory. The concert will be held on Sunday, Jan. 11, at 8:30 p.m. in Symphony Hall.

* * *

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 466,377

JAN 13 1970

New England Newsclip

Evening Globe 1/13/70

Oistrakh in Brahms concerto

By Craig Smith

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,387

JAN 13 1970

New England

Oistrakh: Overwhelming Ovation

David Oistrakh seems at home in Boston, and Hub concertgoers, for their part, wish it were really so. The great Russian violinist, who has played here several times in the last few years, received a long and affectionate welcome in time (the adagio moved a little quicker than usual), and phrased naturally and directly. The result, with Steinberg's mellow accompaniment, was a masterpiece of lyric purity and romantic poetry.

30.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

WILLIAM STEINBERG Music Director

PENSION FUND CONCERT

Sunday January 11 1970 at 8.30 pm in Symphony Hall

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
WILLIAM STEINBERG conductor
with

DAVID OISTRAKH violin

BERLIOZ	Overture to 'Benvenuto Cellini'	op. 23
MOZART	Violin concerto in A K. 219 DAVID OISTRAKH
intermission
BRAHMS	Violin concerto in D DAVID OISTRAKH	op. 77

Ticket prices are $5, $6, $7, $8 and $10.
Box Office, Symphony Hall
Boston, Massachusetts 02115

On the music scene

CSM 12/31/69

The renowned Russian violinist, David Oistrakh, will return to Boston for the first time in more than 15 years to be soloist at the Boston Symphony's annual Pension Fund concert on Sunday evening, Jan. 11, at 8:30. William Steinberg will conduct the orchestra in the "Benvenuto Cellini" overture of Berlioz, and Mr. Oistrakh will play the Mozart A major and Brahms D major concertos. The concert will be dedicated to the memory of Henry Lee Higginson, founder of the orchestra.

ITEM
LYNN, MASS.
(E) 38,000
DEC 27 1969

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY'S annual pension fund concert will feature Russian violinist David Oistrakh. He joins William Steinberg, music director, and the orchestra in a performance of the Brahms violin concerto in D major, one of the masterpieces of the violin repertory. The concert will be held on Sunday, Jan. 11, at 8:30 p.m. in Symphony Hall.

* * *

Evening Globe 1/13/70

Oistrakh in Brahms concerto

By Craig Smith
Contributing Critic

After a disappointing first half, rich-toned playing from Soviet Violinist David Oistrakh and sensible, lucid conducting from William Steinberg brought Sunday night's Boston Symphony pension fund concert alive. The Brahms Violin Concerto which followed intermission has never, to this listener, sounded so clear and logical as in this well-planned performance. It is by now, redundant to mention Oistrakh's complete mastery of the instrument, yet one could not help but be amazed at the splendid, really grand performance of the first movement cadenza, the lovely cantabile of the slow movement and most of all the zest which pervaded the usually much more stodgy finale. If one could utter a complaint about the performace, it would concern Oistrakh's slight tendancy to flatten out the angularities that are an integral part of this great work. This problem was especially evident in the development of the first movement.

The A Major Concerto K. 219 of Mozart is the most complex as well as the most popular of that composer's violin concerti. The work is interesting in form, seeming to lie somewhere between a concerto and a divertments. Especially charming is the songful Adagio and the humorous Rondeau (tempo di menuetto), that contains a Turkish Music section that appears on the scene like a boorish party guest in the midst of an elegant Viennese soiree. Unfortunately the performance was marred by some exceptionally sour wind playing, backward trills, and incorrect appogiaturas, which upset the delicate balance of Mozart's melodic writing. One also wonders why Oistrakh chose not to play along in the tuttis after Mr. Steinberg so correctly reduced the number of players to a properly proportioned Mozartean orchestra.

Hector Berlioz, the bad boy of Parisian musical life in the first half of the nineteenth century, made an ironic appearance (in the form of Benvenuto Cellini Overture) in this most "establishment" of muscal activities the benefit concert. The performance was rousing if not quite clear enough for the complexity of the orchestration.

Violinist Returns as Soloist

Oistrakh Symphony Perform Flawlessly

David Oistrakh, who first performed with the Boston Symphony Orchestra some 15 years ago, returned for the first time since then as soloist in last night's Pension Fund concert, dedicated to the memory of the orchestra's founder, Henry Lee Higginson. William Steinberg conducted, and Mr. Oistrakh played two concertos with which he has become particularly associated: the Mozart A-major (K. 219) and the Brahms.

It was a Gemutlich affair. The orchestra rose and applauded when Mr. Oistrakh made his entrance, and the give-and-take in the ensuing performances kept building in the happiest blend of amiability and intensity.

The Brahms Violin Concerto is an old story, and it is far from being anything like this listener's favorite music. It may well be Mr. Oistrakh's, though, and hearing him perform it, hyperbolical though it may seem when verbalized, is something like witnessing the miracle of birth: so familiar and yet so new—and time after time so perfect.

Mr. Steinberg was, as always, the perfect partner. (If there is a more effective concerto conductor operating anywhere, he has yet to make himself known.) Since Mr. Oistrakh performed in New York Saturday night, there was time for only minimal rehearsal yesterday morning, but violinist and conductor showed the kind of rapport that would suggest long and productive collaboration, through which a genuine mutuality of interpretive aims has been determined and polished.

If the Brahms was appropriately expansive, the Mozart was appropriately intimate. However, in the Mozart there was also much more of a feeling of "soloist with accompaniment" than the "primus inter pares," as one might wish, for the "intimacy" at times bordered on reticence, while in the Brahms the orchestra was more of a full partner.

In both works, though, Mr. Oistrakh reminded a large and grateful Symphony Hall audience that perfection and warmth are by no means mutally exclusive; it was apparent that he was enjoying himself and knew that was what his music-making was all about. Let him not wait another 15 years to return.

The Joachim cadenzas were played in both concertos. A few weeks ago, in a review of Mr. Steinberg's performance of Tchaikovsky's "Manfred," Ralph Gomberg was mistakenly credited here for the oboe solo actually played by Hugh Matheny. Last night it was indeed Mr. Gomberg who played the lovely solo in the slow movement of the Brahms.

The concert opened with the "Benvenuto Cellini" Overture of Belioz, performance with a certain headlong quality which Belioz can take. If it seemed less than tidy here and there, it was only because of the inevitable comparison with the concert by the London Symphony Orchestra in the same hall a few hours earlier.

RICHARD D. FREED

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 331,927 (S) 194,709
JAN 13 1970
New England Newsclip

SYMPHONY REVIEW - BOOKSPAN 11 PM NEWS WNAC-TV SUNDAY, JANUARY 11, 1970

AUDIO

Thanks, Ken, and good evening everyone. You remember that pop tune of about a quarter-of-a-century ago, What a Difference a Day Made? Well, I have to lead off my remarks this evening by saying What a Difference Two Days Made: on Friday evening, I was in Philharmonic Hall in New York to hear the great Russian violinist, David Oistrakh, play the Brahms Violin Concerto.

It was a distressing performance - Oistrakh had all kinds of trouble with intonation and bowing.

This evening, here in Symphony Hall in

Oistrakh, the BSO

C. S. Monitor, Jan. 13, '70

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

The evening's concert for the Pension Fund was dedicated to the memory of the BSO's founder, Henry Lee Higginson, who would have been proud to know that its membership has increased from "sixty men and a conductor" to 102 men (and 4 women!), a conductor and an assistant conductor. One of the true virtuosos of our time, Mr. Oistrakh, was on hand to play concertos by Mozart (in A, K. 219) and Brahms (in D), and the orchestra's lush-sounding opener was the Berlioz overture to "Benvenuto Cellini"—nothing the Major would have considered "unworthy" and therefore "to be shut out."

The casual ease with which the genial Mr. Oistrakh tossed off these two works belied what the ear heard and the eye saw as evidence of the ultimate artist at work. The style of the Mozart and the flair of the Brahms sang for themselves, without externals, through an unvarying richness of tone and facile technique which add up to the art that conceals art.

No small portion of the evening's pleasure was the orchestra's absorbed partnership under Mr. Steinberg's direction. Strangely enough, considering their long careers, this concert marked the first collaboration between Mr. Oistrakh and Mr. Steinberg—"a promising beginning," as the conductor later remarked.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
JAN 13 1970

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
JAN 13 1970
New England

David Oistrakh

Oistrakh: Overwhelming Ovation

David Oistrakh seems at home in Boston, and Hub concertgoers, for their part, wish it were really so. The great Russian violinist, who has played here several times in the last few years, received a long and affectionate welcome when he stepped onstage Sunday evening as soloist in the 149th Pension Fund Concert for the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A few hours after the London Symphony left the stage, Symphony Hall was full again to hear Oistrakh accompanied by the BSO under William Steinberg in two concerti for the benefit: Mozart's Violin Concerto in A, K. 219, and the Brahms Concerto in D. Also on the program was Berlioz' Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini."

The Brahms concerto made the program a memorable event, with Oistrakh's effortless purity of tone and line, mastery of technique and directness of communication.

There are those who fuss over the Brahms, who exaggerate the phrasing, contort the meter, and produce fluttery, throbbing sounds in the adagio. Oistrakh is not one of them. He used little vibrato, played in time (the adagio moved a little quicker than usual), and phrased naturally and directly. The result, with Steinberg's mellow accompaniment, was a masterpiece of lyric purity and romantic poetry.

Perhaps the most magical moment in a performance of consistent beauty came in the last few pages of the first movement, where Oistrakh's flawless and impeccably-scaled cadenza was followed by the orchestra's gentle re-entry and the violin soared high above the staff in a weightless cantilena. The audience held their breath.

The Mozart concerto was less exalted, principally because of a plodding, wooden accompaniment. Phrasing was often awkward and the orchestra often seemed to be led out of the soloist's way rather than joining in a partnership.

Oistrakh employed a lighter, sweeter tone here, and had a few problems with dropped notes and slight pitch imperfections in the first movement, which he soon corrected. His passagework then was sharp and pointed, and the cadenzas again were models of controlled violinistic brilliance.

31.

Young Conductor Makes TV Debut

Michael Tilson Thomas makes his TV conducting debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Tuesday, January 13, at 7:30 p.m. on Channel 2.

Mr. Thomas, New England music lovers will recall, is the youthful conductor who rocketed to national attention recently when he stepped in to direct the orchestra on a moment's notice.

Substituting in New York for an ailing William Steinberg, Mr. Thomas directed the Boston Symphony in works he had never rehearsed with them—and the critics called the performance "brilliant," "vivid," even "stratospheric."

Now New Englanders will have a chance to see the young man New Yorkers have been talking about in a concert broadcast live by Channel 2 in color, and simultaneously by WGBH-FM in stereo. During intermission Mr. Thomas talks about his unexpected Philharmonic Hall debut in an interview with Boston Symphony program editor Andrew Raeburn.

For his program Mr. Thomas has chosen Haydn's "Symphony No. 98, Three Pieces in New England" by Charles Ives, "Variations In Memoriam to Aldous Huxley" by Igor Stravinsky and Debussy's "La Mer."

A native of Hollywood, the 25-year-old Mr. Thomas became assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony this fall. He is a distinguished pianist and conductor who has performed the premieres of some of this century's most noted composers, among them Pierre Boulez(Karlheinz Stockhausen, Lukas Foss and Ingolf Dahl.

As always, the Symphony producer is Jordan M. Whitelaw, and William Cosel is the television director.

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,387
in shortened form
DEC 30 1969

STAR
WINCHESTER, MASS.
WEEKLY 5,800
JAN 1 1970

Thomas TV Debut With BSO Jan. 13

Michael Tilson Thomas makes his TV conducting debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Tuesday, Jan. 13, at 7:30 p. m. on Channel 2. Thomas is the youthful conductor who rocketed to national attention recently when he stepped in to direct the orchestra on a moment's notice, substituting in New York for an ailing William Steinberg.

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS-

Concert will be broadcast live in color, and simultaneously on WGBH-FM in stereo During intermission Thomas talks about his unexpected Philharmonic Hall debut with Boston Symphony program editor Andrew Raeburn.

For his program Thomas has chosen Haydn's Symphony No 98, Three Pieces in New England by Charles Ives, Variations in Memoriam to Aldous Huxley by Stravinsky and Debussy's "La Mer."

A native of Hollywood, the 25-year-old Thomas became assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony this fall. He is a distinguished pianist and conductor, who has performed the premieres of works by some of this century's most noted composers, among them Pierre Boulez, Karlheinz Stockhausen, Lukas Foss and Ingolf Dahl.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000
JAN 1 1970

E. J. Dias Review

Boston Symphony Is on Firm Ground With Ives' 'Three Places'

By EARL DIAS

Michael Tilson Thomas, the youthful assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra appeared for the first time in the Tuesday "B" Series in Symphony Hall last night. You may recall that Thomas earned much praise from music critics when he substituted, a month or so ago, for the then indisposed William Steinberg in a concert by the Boston Symphony in New York.

Last night, Thomas chose to conduct Haydn's "Symphony No. 98 in B Flat," Charles Ives' "Three Places in New England," Stravinsky's "Variations (Aldous Huxley in Memoriam)" and Debussy's "La Mer."

On the whole, Thomas strikes me as an effective conductor and one with a particularly appealing platform personality. In the opening Haydn, his reading was not quite so impressive as those of the subsequent works of the program. Actually, there seem to be two methods of conducting Haydn. One is to underline the folk element, the good-natured simplicity of the composer. The other is to streamline Papa Haydn by stressing precision of attack and by making the most of the fleet-footed presto movements. Thomas approach is perhaps an attempt to strike a happy medium between these extremes; to give him credit, his reading was straightforward and clear — but somehow, despite a beautifully played Adagio, it lacked punch and much dynamic variation.

With the three movements of the Ives, however — "Boston Common," "Putnam's Camp," and "The Housatonic at Stockbridge" — Thomas and the orchestra were on firm ground. The more I hear of Ives, the more I come to believe that he may well be the most inventive composer this country has yet produced. And "Three Places in New England," like most of his work, is a genuine delight.

Its opening movement is a somewhat somber musical portrait of the St. Gaudens statue of Colonel Shaw on Boston Common. Its second, a lively romp, is typically Ives in its imaginative medley of old American tunes associated with Putnam's Camp in Connecticut. These tunes, performed with plenty of percussion and brass, are set against each other in brilliant counterpoint and to frequently humorous effect. And the final "Housatonic" movement is sheer musical impressionism, with the muted upper strings evoking a distant background of autumn mists and skies.

The Stravinsky "Variations," written when the composer was 81, show his mastery of serial material, with contrasts between block chords, unisons, homophony, really dense polyphony, and small ensembles within the orchestra. It is a difficult work to play, and Thomas and the ensemble merit praise for their virtuosity. However, it is one of those works that probably was fun to compose and is fun to play — but this fun is not communicated at least to one listener.

Debussy's "La Mer" is, of course a staple of the Boston repertory inasmuch as it was one of the favorite show pieces of the late Charles Munch. Thomas does not as yet have Munch's sensitivity with the work, but his conducting was creditable. The finesse, the dexterity, the surety and the unity of the work, plus its almost mystic evocations of the sea which Debussy so loved, came forth in satisfactory style.

The next concert of the series will be performed on Feb. 10, with Claudio Abbado as guest conductor.

STANDARD-TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
(E) 70,000 (S) 60,000
JAN 14 1970

BSO ON FM

Michael Tilson Thomas and Claudio Abbado conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in three full-length Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts to be broadcast live by WGBH-FM.

On Tuesday, Jan. 20 at 8:30 p.m. BSO assistant conductor Michael Tilson Thomas conducts Haydn's Symphony No. 98 in B flat, "Three Places in New England" by Charles Ives, Variations (Aldous Huxley in memoriam) by Stravinsky and Tchaikovsky's Overture-fantasy "Romeo and Juliet."

The following Friday and Saturday (Jan. 23 at 2 p.m., Jan. 24 at 8:30 p.m.) guest conductor Claudio Abbado will direct Donatoni's "Puppenspiel No. 2," Piano Concerto No. 2 by Bartok (Alexis Weissenberg soloist) and Symphony No. 4 by Schumann.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000
JAN 8 1970

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Tuesday evening January 13 1970 at 7.30

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS conductor

HAYDN	Symphony no. 98 in B flat Adagio – allegro Adagio cantabile Menuetto & trio Presto
IVES	'Three places in New England', an orchestral set The 'Saint Gaudens' in Boston Common (Col. Shaw and his Colored Regiment) Putnam's camp, Redding, Connecticut From The Housatonic at Stockbridge
intermission
STRAVINSKY	Variations (Aldous Huxley in memoriam)
DEBUSSY	La mer: trois esquisses symphoniques* (The sea: three symphonic sketches) De l'aube à midi sur la mer (From dawn to noon on the sea) Jeux de vagues (The playing of the waves) Dialogue du vent et de la mer (Dialogue between the wind and the sea)

Dialer's guide

TUESDAY

6:00—Speaking Freely — Ralph Salerno, author of "The Crime Confederation," guest—Ch. 2.

7:30—Special: Boston Symphony Orchestra — Michael Tilson Thomas conducts Boston Symphony in a performance of Haydn's Symphony No. 98 in B-flat major, Ives's "Three Places in New England," Stravinsky's Huxley Variations, and Debussy's "La Mer"; live from Symphony Hall—Ch. 2 (c), WGBH-FM.

7:30—ABC News Special: "The Golden Age of the Automobile"—survey of early automobiles in America—Chs. 6, 7, 9 (c).

8:30—Red Skelton—Duke Ellington, among guests—Chs. 5, 12 (c).

9:30—Course of Our Times—Dr. Abram Sachar of Brandeis University discusses "The Agony of France"—Ch. 2 (c).

10:00—CBS News Special: "On the Road with Charles Kuralt: The Individualists" — six American individualists examined—Ch. 5 (c).

10:30—Flick Out—award-winning film "Why Man Creates" is shown—Ch. 2 (c).

125 western avenue boston massachusetts 02134

868-3800 Helen Peters

NEWS from WGBH-TV 2

Michael Tilson Thomas makes his TV conducting debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Tuesday, January 13 at 7:30 pm on Channel 2.

Thomas, New England music lovers will recall, is the youthful conductor who rocketed to national attention recently when he stepped in to direct the orchestra on a moment's notice. Substituting in New York for an ailing William Steinberg, Thomas directed the Boston Symphony in works he had never rehearsed with them - and the critics called the performance "brilliant", "vivid", even "Stratospheric".

Michael Tilson Thomas—Rising Young Conductor

Michael Tilson Thomas, 25, is the young assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony who, a month or two ago, gained national attention in New York by stepping in at the last moment for the then ailing William Steinberg and conducting the orchestra in a demanding concert with both style and auhhority.

I had my first opportunity to watch young Thomas in action last week in Symphony Hall in the fourth concert of the Tuesday "B" Series. I liked what I saw and heard and admired particularly the young man's charming platform personality and his ability to convey his own ideas about the music being performed. This is not to say that I agree with all his ideas, however. For example, his reading of Haydn's "Symphony No. 97 in B Flat" seemed to me to lack punch and any great variety of dynamic variations, although the conducting was straightforward and lucid.

With Charles Ives' "Three Places in New England," one of my personal favorites, though, Thomas and the orchestra were in fine fettle. All the stimulating high jinks that make Ives the most imaginative and inventive of American composers — two bands playing simultaneously, the vivid impressionism, the constant experimentation in sound and in instrumental combinations — were conveyed with zest and intelligence.

Good, too, was the difficult (though for me unrewarding) Stravinsky "Variations," dedicated to the memory of Aldous Huxley, and that staple of the Boston Symphony repertoire, Debussy's "La Mer." Concerning the latter, Thomas has not yet achieved the mystically poetic and absorbing reading that used to distinguish that of the late Charles Munch, but he did conduct the work with flair and with commendable sensitivity.

Standard Times, New Bedford Mass. 1/18/70
[E. J. Dias]

C. S. Monitor Jan. 13

31.

Young Conductor Makes TV Debut

Michael Tilson Thomas makes his TV conducting debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Tuesday, January 13, at 7:30 p.m. on Channel 2.

Mr. Thomas, New England music lovers will recall, is the youthful conductor who rocketed to national attention recently when he stepped in to direct the orchestra on a moment's notice.

Substituting in New York for an ailing William Steinberg, Mr. Thomas directed the Boston Symphony in works he had never rehearsed with them—and the critics called the performance "brilliant," "vivid," even "stratospheric."

Now New Englanders will have a chance to see the young man New Yorkers have been talking about in a concert broadcast live by Channel 2 in color, and simultaneously by WGBH-FM in stereo. During intermission Mr. Thomas talks about his unexpected Philharmonic Hall debut in an interview with Boston Symphony program editor Andrew Raeburn.

For his program Mr. Thomas has chosen Haydn's "Symphony No. 98, Three Pieces in New England" by Charles Ives, "Variations In Memoriam to Aldous Huxley" by Igor Stravinsky and Debussy's "La Mer."

A native of Hollywood, the 25-year-old Mr. Thomas became assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony this fall. He is a distinguished pianist and conductor who has performed the premieres of some of this century's most noted composers, among them Pierre Boulez(Karlheinz Stockhausen, Lukas Foss and Ingolf Dahl.

As always, the Symphony producer is Jordan M. Whitelaw, and William Cosel is the television director.

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 55,000
in shortened form
DEC 30 1969

STAR
WINCHESTER, MASS.
WEEKLY 5,800
JAN 1 1970
E

Thomas TV Debut With BSO Jan. 13

Michael Tilson Thomas makes his TV conducting debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Tuesday, Jan. 13, at 7:30 p.m. on Channel 2. Thomas is the youthful conductor who rocketed to national attention recently when he stepped in to direct the orchestra on a moment's notice, substituting in New York for an ailing William Steinberg.

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS

Concert will be broadcast live in color, and simultaneously on WGBH-FM in stereo During intermission Thomas talks about his unexpected Philharmonic Hall debut with Boston Symphony program editor Andrew Raeburn.

For his program Thomas has chosen Haydn's Symphony No 98, Three Pieces in New England by Charles Ives, Variations in Memoriam to Aldous Huxley by Stravinsky and Debussy's "La Mer."

A native of Hollywood, the 25-year-old Thomas became assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony this fall. He is a distinguished pianist and conductor, who has performed the premieres of works by some of this century's most noted composers, among them Pierre Boulez, Karlheinz Stockhausen, Lukas Foss and Ingolf Dahl.

STAR
WINCHESTER, MASS.
WEEKLY 5,800
JAN 1 1970
E

E. J. Dias Review

Boston Symphony Is on Firm Ground With Ives' 'Three Places'

By EARL DIAS

Michael Tilson Thomas, the youthful assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, appeared for the first time in the Tuesday "B" Series in Symphony Hall last night. You may recall that Thomas earned much praise from music critics when he substituted, a month or so ago, for the then indisposed William Steinberg in a concert by the Boston Symphony in New York.

Last night, Thomas chose to conduct Haydn's "Symphony No. 98 in B Flat," Charles Ives' "Three Places in New England," Stravinsky's "Variations (Aldous Huxley in Memoriam')' and Debussy's "La Mer."

On the whole, Thomas strikes me as an effective conductor and one with a particularly appealing platform personality. In the opening Haydn, his reading was not quite so impressive as those of the subsequent works of the program. Actually, there seem to be two methods of conducting Haydn. One is to underline the folk element, the good-natured simplicity of the composer. The other is to streamline Papa Haydn by stressing precision of attack and by making the most of the fleet-footed presto movements. Thomas approach is perhaps an attempt to strike a happy medium between these extremes; to give him credit, his reading was straightforward and clear — but somehow, despite a beautifully played Adagio, it lacked punch and much dynamic variation.

With the three movements of the Ives, however — "Boston Common," "Putnam's Camp," and "The Housatonic at Stockbridge" — Thomas and the orchestra were on firm ground. The more I hear of Ives, the more I come to believe that he may well be the most inventive composer this country has yet produced. And "Three Places in New England," like most of his work, is a genuine delight.

Its opening movement is a somewhat somber musical portrait of the St. Gaudens statue of Colonel Shaw on Boston Common. Its second, a lively romp, is typically Ives in its imaginative medley of old American tunes associated with Putnam's Camp in Connecticut. These tunes, performed with plenty of percussion and brass, are set against each other in brilliant counterpoint and to frequently humorous effect. And the final "Housatonic" movement is sheer musical impressionism, with the muted upper strings evoking a distant background of autumn mists and skies.

The Stravinsky "Variations," written when the composer was 81, show his mastery of serial material, with contrasts between block chords, unisons, homophony, really dense polyphony, and small ensembles within the orchestra. It is a difficult work to play, and Thomas and the ensemble merit praise for their virtuosity. However, it is one of those works that probably was fun to compose and is fun to play — but this fun is not communicated at least to one listener.

Debussy's "La Mer" is, of course a staple of the Boston repertory inasmuch as it was one of the favorite show pieces of the late Charles Munch. Thomas does not as yet have Munch's sensitivity with the work, but his conducting was creditable. The finesse, the dexterity, the surety and the unity of the work, plus its almost mystic evocations of the sea which Debussy so loved, came forth in satisfactory style.

The next concert of the series will be performed on Feb. 10, with Claudio Abbado as guest conductor.

STANDARD-TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
(E) 70,000 (S) 60,000
JAN 14 1970

BSO ON FM

Michael Tilson Thomas and Claudio Abbado conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in three full-length Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts to be broadcast live by WGBH-FM.

On Tuesday, Jan. 20 at 8:30 p.m. BSO assistant conductor Michael Tilson Thomas conducts Haydn's Symphony No. 98 in B flat, "Three Places in New England" by Charles Ives, Variations (Aldous Huxley in memoriam) by Stravinsky and Tchaikovsky's Overture-fantasy "Romeo and Juliet."

The following Friday and Saturday (Jan. 23 at 2 p.m., Jan. 24 at 8:30 p.m.) guest conductor Claudio Abbado will direct Donatoni's "Puppenspiel No. 2," Piano Concerto No. 2 by Bartok (Alexis Weissenberg soloist) and Symphony No. 4 by Schumann.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000
JAN 8 1970

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000
JAN 1 1970

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Tuesday evening January 13 1970 at 7.30

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS conductor

HAYDN	Symphony no. 98 in B flat Adagio – allegro Adagio cantabile Menuetto & trio Presto
IVES	'Three places in New England', an orchestral set The 'Saint Gaudens' in Boston Common (Col. Shaw and his Colored Regiment) Putnam's camp, Redding, Connecticut From The Housatonic at Stockbridge
intermission
STRAVINSKY	Variations (Aldous Huxley in memoriam)
DEBUSSY	La mer: trois esquisses symphoniques* (The sea: three symphonic sketches) De l'aube à midi sur la mer (From dawn to noon on the sea) Jeux de vagues (The playing of the waves) Dialogue du vent et de la mer (Dialogue between the wind and the sea)

Dialer's guide

TUESDAY

6:00—Speaking Freely — Ralph Salerno, author of "The Crime Confederation," guest—Ch. 2.

7:30—Special: Boston Symphony Orchestra — Michael Tilson Thomas conducts Boston Symphony in a performance of Haydn's Symphony No. 98 in B-flat major, Ives's "Three Places in New England," Stravinsky's Huxley Variations, and Debussy's "La Mer"; live from Symphony Hall—Ch. 2 (c), WGBH-FM.

7:30—ABC News Special: "The Golden Age of the Automobile"—survey of early automobiles in America—Chs. 6, 7, 9 (c).

8:30—Red Skelton—Duke Ellington, among guests—Chs. 5, 12 (c).

9:30—Course of Our Times—Dr. Abram Sachar of Brandeis University discusses "The Agony of France"—Ch. 2 (c).

10:00—CBS News Special: "On the Road with Charles Kuralt: The Individualists" — six American individualists examined—Ch. 5 (c).

10:30—Flick Out—award-winning film "Why Man Creates" is shown—Ch. 2 (c).

868-3800 Helen Peters

125 western avenue boston massachusetts 02134

NEWS from WGBH-TV 2

Michael Tilson Thomas makes his TV conducting debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Tuesday, January 13 at 7:30 pm on Channel 2.

Thomas, New England music lovers will recall, is the youthful conductor who rocketed to national attention recently when he stepped in to direct the orchestra on a moment's notice. Substituting in New York for an ailing William Steinberg, Thomas directed the Boston Symphony in works he had never rehearsed with them - and the critics called the performance "brilliant", "vivid", even "Stratospheric".

Michael Tilson Thomas—Rising Young Conductor

Michael Tilson Thomas, 25, is the young assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony who, a month or two ago, gained national attention in New York by stepping in at the last moment for the then ailing William Steinberg and conducting the orchestra in a demanding concert with both style and auhhority.

I had my first opportunity to watch young Thomas in action last week in Symphony Hall in the fourth concert of the Tuesday "B" Series. I liked what I saw and heard and admired particularly the young man's charming platform personality and his ability to convey his own ideas about the music being performed. This is not to say that I agree with all his ideas, however. For example, his reading of Haydn's "Symphony No. 97 in B Flat" seemed to me, to lack punch and any great variety of dynamic variations, although the conducting was straightforward and lucid.

With Charles Ives' "Three Places in New England," one of my personal favorites, though, Thomas and the orchestra were in fine fettle. All the stimulating high jinks that make Ives the most imaginative and inventive of American composers — two bands playing simultaneously, the vivid impressionism, the constant experimentation in sound and in instrumental combinations — were conveyed with zest and intelligence.

Good, too, was the difficult (though for me unrewarding) Stravinsky "Variations," dedicated to the memory of Aldous Huxley, and that staple of the Boston Symphony repertoire, Debussy's "La Mer." Concerning the latter, Thomas has not yet achieved the mystically poetic and absorbing reading that used to distinguish that of the late Charles Munch, but he did conduct the work with flair and with commendable sensitivity.

Standard Times, New Bedford Mass. 1/18/70
[E. J. Dias]

C. S. Monitor Jan. 13

Young Conductor Makes TV Debut

Michael Tilson Thomas makes his TV conducting debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Tuesday, January 13, at 7:30 p.m. on Channel 2.

Mr. Thomas, New England music lovers will recall, is the youthful conductor who rocketed to national attention recently when he stepped in to direct the orchestra on a moment's notice.

Substituting in New York for an ailing William Steinberg, Mr. Thomas directed the Boston Symphony in works he had never rehearsed with them—and the critics called the performance "brilliant," "vivid," even "stratospheric."

Now New Englanders will have a chance to see the young man New Yorkers have been talking about in a concert broadcast live by Channel 2 in color, and simultaneously by WGBH-FM in stereo. During intermission Mr. Thomas talks about his unexpected Philharmonic Hall debut in an interview with Boston Symphony program editor Andrew Raeburn.

For his program Mr. Thomas has chosen Haydn's "Symphony No. 98, Three Pieces in New England" by Charles Ives, "Variations In Memoriam to Aldous Huxley" by Igor Stravinsky and Debussy's "La Mer."

A native of Hollywood, the 25-year-old Mr. Thomas became assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony this fall. He is a distinguished pianist and conductor who has performed the premieres of some of this century's most noted composers, among them Pierre Boulez(Karlheinz Stockhausen, Lukas Foss and Ingolf Dahl.

As always, the Symphony producer is Jordan M. Whitelaw, and William Cosel is the television director.

STAR
WINCHESTER, MASS.
WEEKLY 5,800
JAN 1 1970
E

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
DEC 30 1969

Thomas TV Debut With BSO Jan. 13

Michael Tilson Thomas makes his TV conducting debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Tuesday, Jan. 13, at 7:30 p.m. on Channel 2. Thomas is the youthful conductor who rocketed to national attention recently when he stepped in to direct the orchestra on a moment's notice, substituting in New York for an ailing William Steinberg.

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS

Concert will be broadcast live in color, and simultaneously on WGBH-FM in stereo. During intermission Thomas talks about his unexpected Philharmonic Hall debut with Boston Symphony program editor Andrew Raeburn.

For his program Thomas has chosen Haydn's Symphony No 98, Three Pieces in New England by Charles Ives, Variations in Memoriam to Aldous Huxley by Stravinsky and Debussy's "La Mer."

A native of Hollywood, the 25-year-old Thomas became assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony this fall. He is a distinguished pianist and conductor, who has performed the premieres of works by some of this century's most noted composers, among them Pierre Boulez, Karlheinz Stockhausen, Lukas Foss and Ingo Dahl.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000
JAN 1 1970

E. J. Dias Review

Boston Symphony Is on Firm Ground With Ives' 'Three Places'

By EARL DIAS

Michael Tilson Thomas, the youthful assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, appeared for the first time in the Tuesday "B" Series in Symphony Hall last night. You may recall that Thomas earned much praise from music critics when he substituted, a month or so ago, for the then indisposed William Steinberg in a concert by the Boston Symphony in New York.

Last night, Thomas chose to conduct Haydn's "Symphony No. 98 in B Flat," Charles Ives' "Three Places in New England," Stravinsky's "Variations (Aldous Huxley in Memoriam')' and Debussy's "La Mer."

On the whole, Thomas strikes me as an effective conductor and one with a particularly appealing platform personality. In the opening Haydn, his reading was not quite so impressive as those of the subsequent works of the program. Actually, there seem to be two methods of conducting Haydn. One is to underline the folk element, the good-natured simplicity of the composer. The other is to streamline Papa Haydn by stressing precision of attack and by making the most of the fleet-footed presto movements. Thomas approach is perhaps an attempt to strike a happy medium between these extremes; to give him credit, his reading was straightforward and clear — but somehow, despite a beautifully played Adagio, it lacked punch and much dynamic variation.

With the three movements of the Ives, however — "Boston Common," "Putnam's Camp," and "The Housatonic at Stockbridge" — Thomas and the orchestra were on firm ground. The more I hear of Ives, the more I come to believe that he may well be the most inventive composer this country has yet produced. And "Three Places in New England," like most of his work, is a genuine delight.

Its opening movement is a somewhat somber musical portrait of the St. Gaudens statue of Colonel Shaw on Boston Common. Its second, a lively romp, is typically Ives in its imaginative medley of old American tunes associated with Putnam's Camp in Connecticut. These tunes, performed with plenty of percussion and brass, are set against each other in brilliant counterpoint and to frequently humorous effect. And the final "Housatonic" movement is sheer musical impressionism, with the muted upper strings evoking a distant background of autumn mists and skies.

The Stravinsky "Variations," written when the composer was 81, show his mastery of serial material, with contrasts between block chords, unisons, homophony, really dense polyphony, and small ensembles within the orchestra. It is a difficult work to play, and Thomas and the ensemble merit praise for their virtuosity. However, it is one of those works that probably was fun to compose and is fun to play — but this fun is not communicated at least to one listener.

Debussy's "La Mer" is, of course a staple of the Boston repertory inasmuch as it was one of the favorite show pieces of the late Charles Munch. Thomas does not as yet have Munch's sensitivity with the work, but his conducting was creditable. The finesse, the dexterity, the surety and the unity of the work, plus its almost mystic evocations of the sea which Debussy so loved, came forth in satisfactory style.

The next concert of the series will be performed on Feb. 10, with Claudio Abbado as guest conductor.

STANDARD-TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
(E) 70,000 (S) 60,000
JAN 14 1970

31.

BSO ON FM

Michael Tilson Thomas and Claudio Abbado conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in three full-length Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts to be broadcast live by WGBH-FM.

On Tuesday, Jan. 20 at 8:30 p.m. BSO assistant conductor Michael Tilson Thomas conducts Haydn's Symphony No. 98 in B flat, "Three Places in New England" by Charles Ives, Variations (Aldous Huxley in memoriam) by Stravinsky and Tchaikovsky's Overture-fantasy "Romeo and Juliet."

The following Friday and Saturday (Jan. 23 at 2 p.m., Jan. 24 at 8:30 p.m.) guest conductor Claudio Abbado will direct Donatoni's "Puppenspiel No. 2," Piano Concerto No. 2 by Bartok (Alexis Weissenberg soloist) and Symphony No. 4 by Schumann.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000
JAN 8 1970

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Tuesday evening January 13 1970 at 7.30

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS conductor

HAYDN	Symphony no. 98 in B flat
	Adagio – allegro
	Adagio cantabile
	Menuetto & trio
	Presto
IVES	'Three places in New England', an orchestral set
	The 'Saint Gaudens' in Boston Common (Col. Shaw and his Colored Regiment)
	Putnam's camp, Redding, Connecticut
	From The Housatonic at Stockbridge
intermission
STRAVINSKY	Variations (Aldous Huxley in memoriam)
DEBUSSY	La mer: trois esquisses symphoniques* (The sea: three symphonic sketches)
	De l'aube à midi sur la mer (From dawn to noon on the sea)
	Jeux de vagues (The playing of the waves)
	Dialogue du vent et de la mer (Dialogue between the wind and the sea)

Dialer's guide

TUESDAY

6:00—Speaking Freely — Ralph Salerno, author of "The Crime Confederation," guest—Ch. 2.

7:30—Special: Boston Symphony Orchestra — Michael Tilson Thomas conducts Boston Symphony in a performance of Haydn's Symphony No. 98 in B-flat major, Ives's "Three Places in New England," Stravinsky's Huxley Variations, and Debussy's "La Mer"; live from Symphony Hall—Ch. 2 (c), WGBH-FM.

7:30—ABC News Special: "The Golden Age of the Automobile"—survey of early automobiles in America—Chs. 6, 7, 9 (c).

8:30—Red Skelton—Duke Ellington, among guests—Chs. 5, 12 (c).

9:30—Course of Our Times—Dr. Abram Sachar of Brandeis University discusses "The Agony of France"—Ch. 2 (c).

10:00—CBS News Special: "On the Road with Charles Kuralt: The Individualists" — six American individualists examined—Ch. 5 (c).

10:30—Flick Out—award-winning film "Why Man Creates" is shown—Ch. 2 (c).

Now New Englanders will have a chance to see the young man New Yorkers have been talking about in a concert broadcast live by Channel 2 in color, and simultaneously by WGBH-FM in stereo. during intermission Thomas talks about his unexpected Philharmonic Hall debut in an interview with Boston Symphony Program Editor Andrew Raeburn.

For his program Thomas has chosen Haydn's Symphony No. 98, Three Pieces in New England by Charles Ives, Variations In Memoriam to Aldous Huxley by Igor Stravinsky and Debussy's "La Mer".

A native of Hollywood, the 25-year-old Thomas became assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony this fall. He is a distinguished pianist and conductor who has performed the premieres of some of this century's most noted composers, among them Pierre Boulez, Karlheinz Stockhausen, Lukas Foss and Ingolf Dahl.

As always, the Symphony producer is Jordan M. Whitelaw, and William Cosel is the television director.

- 0 - 12-24-69

in shortened form

Michael Tilson Thomas—Rising Young Conductor

Michael Tilson Thomas, 25, is the young assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony who, a month or two ago, gained national attention in New York by stepping in at the last moment for the then ailing William Steinberg and conducting the orchestra in a demanding concert with both style and auhhority.

I had my first opportunity to watch young Thomas in action last week in Symphony Hall in the fourth concert of the Tuesday "B" Series. I liked what I saw and heard and admired particularly the young man's charming platform personality and his ability to convey his own ideas about the music being performed. This is not to say that I agree with all his ideas, however. For example, his reading of Haydn's "Symphony No. 97 in B Flat" seemed to me, to lack punch and any great variety of dynamic variations, although the conducting was straightforward and lucid.

With Charles Ives' "Three Places in New England," one of my personal favorites, though, Thomas and the orchestra were in fine fettle. All the stimulating high jinks that make Ives the most imaginative and inventive of American composers — two bands playing simultaneously, the vivid impressionism, the constant experimentation in sound and in instrumental combinations — were conveyed with zest and intelligence.

Good, too, was the difficult (though for me unrewarding) Stravinsky "Variations," dedicated to the memory of Aldous Huxley, and that staple of the Boston Symphony repertoire, Debussy's "La Mer." Concerning the latter, Thomas has not yet achieved the mystically poetic and absorbing reading that used to distinguish that of the late Charles Munch, but he did conduct the work with flair and with commendable sensitivity.

C. S. Monitor Jan. 13

Standard Times, New Bedford Mass. 1/18/70
[E. J. Dias]

32

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
JAN 17 1970 New Engl

Symphony

Dvorak's Concerto In Welcome Return

By McLAREN HARRIS

One of the more engaging part time for orchestras during the past year has been to unearth neglected piano concertos and sundry works of romantic composers — Rubinstein, Gottschalk, Scharwenka, even Carl Nielsen. Yesterday was Dvorak's turn; Rudolf Firkusny was the soloist for the Symphony's first performance of his lone Piano Concerto in G minor.

Dvorak's concerto strikes a medium between the expansiveness, both in breadth and depth, of Brahms' concertos and the gilt-edged elegance of Tchaikovsky's. Certain features of the first movement are reminiscent of Brahms, notably the woodwind scoring, but the lyric turns and consonant harmony, spiced here or there with augmented intervals, confirm its national character.

The seriousness is contained in the first and second movements — the Andante, in its melodic purity, is almost like Slavic Beethoven — while the finale indulges in considerably more bravura and caprice.

I CONFESS to a lack of close familiarity with the Dvorak Critical Editions and cannot compare in detail the composer's original piano part with Vilem Kurz' revision, or with Mr. Firkusny's further adjustments of that. But again there is an image of Brahms in the keyboard embellishments which run through the orchestral substance, although again the sheer mass of Brahms' heavier choradal and octave passages is missing.

This may be a characteristic of Mr. Firkusny's performance, but it seems inherent in the score. There was no lack of strength or tonal richness on his part. His nuances with tempo were extremely effective, either in a brief poetic lingering over a descending cadence in the Andante, or poised for a virtuosic dash toward the finale's conclusion.

THE ORCHESTRAL accompaniment, under William Steinberg, led off with some jarring intonation from the winds. From there on, it worked fairly well mechanically, but without either the dynamic or temporal flexibility to match the soloist's own language. However that may be Dvorak's Piano Coacerto should be welcomed back to the active repertory.

Bruckner's Symphony No. 6 in A completed the program, and a better choice could have been made. Compared with this work, the Bruckner Eighth, to which this writer was none too kind last month is a true masterpiece. The composer's habits of thematic transposition and repetition were carried to the extreme in No. 6, taking the place of actual development, and only the Scherzo displays much originality.

The orchestra took it on bravely, if somewhat callously; the brass charged Symphony Hall with some rather harsh fortissimos, upsetting the instrumental balance. But adhering to a subdued tone would have robbed the climaxes of their orchestral weight — Bruckner's last high card.

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Friday afternoon January 16 1970 at 2 o'clock

Saturday evening January 17 1970 at 8.30

WILLIAM STEINBERG conductor

DVOŘÁK Piano concerto in G minor op. 33

Allegro agitato

Andante sostenuto

Allegro con fuoco

RUDOLF FIRKUSNY

first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

intermission

BRUCKNER Symphony no. 6 in A

Maestoso

Adagio: sehr feierlich

Scherzo: nicht schnell – trio: langsam

Finale: bewegt, doch nicht zu schnell

B.S.O. plays Dvorak, Bruckner

Globe 1/17/70

By Craig Smith
Contributing Critic

Two little-known works by well-known 19th Century composers were played yesterday afternoon by the Boston Symphony under the direction of William Steinberg. Dvorak's Piano Concerto received its first Boston Symphony performance. Bruckner's 6th Symphony was first performed by the orchestra last year.

Dvorak's early, eclesctic piano concerto showed almost no signs of the later distinction the Czech composer was to achieve as a symphonist. Although some of the gestures were recognizable as uniquely in his own style, most seemed to be borrowed bits from various other Romantic composers, Schumann, Chopin, Brahms, even Liszt. Rudolf Firkuny has, for years, been the only major pianist to play this work. His performance yesterday was really splendid, so fine, in fact, that one wishes he had better material to work with. Boston really deserves to hear him in a better light, perhaps in the Schumann, or one of the Brahms Concerti.

Bruckner's Sixth Symphony is the most seldom played of his later works. It is more lyrical, less melodramatic than his other symphonies; at the same time it is less varied in texture than the other works from this period. The middle two movements, the only ones Bruckner ever heard, are generally the most interesting. The first movement is rather discursive and square in phrasing, the finale, tedious in its repetitiveness and lack of melodic interest.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 356,377
JAN 17 1970 New Engl

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

DVORAK AND BRUCKNER AT BSO

A person could be forgiven for confusing William Steinberg with Perry Rathbone down the pike at the Fine Arts Museum. Mr. Steinberg had already in the young year turned up Tchaikowsky's "Manfred" Symphony and Liszt's "Faust" Symphony, and last week he took another one off the gallery wall—the first Boston Symphony Orchestra performance of Antonin Dvorak's Piano Concerto in G minor, Opus 33.

As is more often the case than not in such revivals, a work of this sort is something that is best reserved as the piece-de-resistance for a conservatory concert. It starts out like vintage Dvorak but swiftly subsides into a prolonged melange of Liszt, Chopin and early Brahms. To be sure, the Dvorak vocabulary periodically breaks through, but it seldom develops into the songfulness, exuberance and authentic national flavor that is his delightful trademark.

The soloist was the Czech pianist, Rudolf Firkusny who, it develops, has for years specialized in this work in various versions, original and edited, including his own version.

He had at it with gusto and command, and it is a pity that somewhere in his career with the piece he had never formulated an edition sufficiently foreshortened to accommodate to the modest materials. Had he done so, here is one listener whose attention span might have been longer than it was.

The other work on the program was the Sixth Symphony of Anton Bruckner, which only nine months ago got its first hearing here at Symphony under Mr. Leinsdorf's direction. The Sixth may be rare, but emphatically that word does not carry the pejorative connotation of a museum piece. It represents the stage of a composer poised just on the brink of full command of his powers. I say brink because there is the promise of that vast surge and sublimity, breadth and romantic glow. The trouble is that the promise is only spasmodically fulfilled, as say in the first half of the opening movement, the outer ends of the Adagio, and in some of the more propulsive moments of an otherwise dreadfully repetitious scherze.

Mr. Steinberg obviously knows his way around this music, but his reading could have been both more taut and more plastic. For example, the Leinsdorf version, as my notes show, ran just over forty-five minutes, while this one was just under an hour. The prolongation was no benefit, although the symphony in its entirety hung together strongly enough.

Claudio Abbado will make his first appearance with the orchestra next week as guest conductor in a program which includes Donatoni's Puppenspiel No. 2 for flute, piccolo and orchestra, with Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute; Bartok's Second Piano Concerto with Alexis Weissenberg as piano soloist; and Schumann's Symphony No. 4 in D minor.

THE SOLOIST

RUDOLF FIRKUSNY, born in Czechoslovakia and now an American citizen, enrolled at the State Conservatory in Brno at the age of six. Only four years later he made his debut with the Prague Philharmonic, playing a Mozart concerto. Before he reached his majority he was already well known throughout Europe. He studied composition with Leoš Janáček, and for a time was a pupil of Artur Schnabel. Forced to leave his native country at the outbreak of the second World War, he settled for a time in Paris, then came to the United States. He made his New York recital debut in 1941. Today Firkusny is known throughout the world: he devotes six months of each year to concerts in North America, three months he spends in Europe, leaving time for trips to South America, Australia or the Orient. He has appeared with many of the major orchestras, and this season alone he plays concerts with the Cleveland Orchestra, the Houston, San Francisco, Chicago Symphonies and with the Buffalo Philharmonic. His repertoire is large, and he has specialized particularly in the Czech and contemporary American literature. His many recordings are on the Capitol, Columbia, Decca, DGG and RCA labels. Rudolf Firkusny most recently appeared with the Boston Symphony in 1958.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000
JAN 22 1970

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850
JAN 19 1970

BSO, Firkusny, and Dvorak

By Allan Sly

The Dvorak piano concerto had a lot of help in getting onto a Boston Symphony program for the first time this weekend. Rudolf Firkusny has long championed it, and offered Boston listeners a version of the solo part neither the composer's nor that of Vilem Kurz, who rewrote it, but a synthesis of both. Mr. Firkusny and William Steinberg (BSO conductor) had agreed further to certain excisions; the Dvorak Society, the Czech Government, and the Cleveland Orchestra all helped, the latter by making available Klaus Roy's informative program note. To admit such broad indebtedness is to reject Stravinsky's dictum, recently displayed in a widely read weekly, that one must not accept verbal preparation for a musical experience!

None of this dialectic seemed to hinder the Friday afternoon audience from thoroughly enjoying an excursion to the Central Europe of a century ago; Mr. Firkusny was in his element, Mr. Steinberg and the orchestra more than collaborative, and one retains a pleasing impression of an amiable personality quite at his ease in talking to us across the years. The concerto is well built and in its modest way is a welcome relief from the higher-strung Brahms or the more flamboyant Romantics.

Dvorak upstaged

But the Bruckner sixth, which took up the rest of the program, upstaged Dvorak in scope, originality and content. How can Boston have managed to exist without it so long? Now that it has arrived, we must never let it go. Its strengths and resplendent colors epitomize the viability of symphony concerts, summing up and restating the human condition—as of Bruckner's time and place—as well as anyone ever did. Mr. Steinberg was instinctively with it; the orchestra exuded a resonant, warm sound, the pace was impelling without ever seeming hustled, the songlike elements ongoing, the rhythmic ones incisive. The impression was entirely adult and masculine, admitting moments of humor or pathos, satisfying one's need for the assertion of faith, whetting the appetite for more.

It could be that Mr. Steinberg's first year in Boston will reach its full fruition in the Beethoven week next April 7 to 11. Isaac Stern and Rudolf Serkin are to be among the participants.

(Review of Jan. 10 Concert)

Steinberg and BSO

Orchestra Strong, Program Weak

By HAROLD C. SPROUL

Last Saturday the Boston Symphony Orchestra under William Steinberg was in excellent form, but that was not enough to rescue second-rate pieces by Mozart, Stravinsky and Liszt—or rather it made them just bearable.

Mozart in his prime (circa Don Giovanni) couldn't write bad music but, like any good professional, could constrain his genius to fit the job. "Eine Kleine Nachtmusic" should be left to school orchestras or played behind palms at social occasions with women and wine to add sparkling counterpoint, or as outdoor serenade to sound quick and tender in the wide night. The orchestra gave it all possible zest and flow, but alas, we—audience sat in solemn phalanx—and no wine.

The Stravinsky "Scherzo Fantastique" is early stuff before the ballet challenge and association with the other artists involved set him off on his great original series starting with the "Firebird". This was a "first" for Boston and worth hearing for all its steal from his teacher, Rimsky-Korsakov, and its debt to Debussy, among others. The Stravinsky ear was already keen: the driving buzz, the great swoops of orchestral color, the surprise of incisive bits of interjection from a solitary wind instrument, the traditional regularities of rhythmic form swept over by continuities of exciting motion. An arbitrary end, as if someone had doused the lights. Yes, second-rate Stravinsky but an addition to our experience of the composer. In 1908 the "fantastic" intention must have been even more evident because of his brilliant tap-dancing through the chromatic spectrum.

The big work was Liszt's "Faust Symphony" in three character studies (after Goethe) Faust, Gretchen and Mephistopheles. It was one of Liszt's bids to be taken seriously beyond his acceptance as piano virtuoso and composer of works for his own performing genius. Goethe's idea of Faust inspired Berlioz, who set off Liszt, who helped Wagner with his early overture, and it is interesting for any musician to compare the similarities and differences. The Liszt is full of bright ideas, harmonic modulations, transformations of motive and theme, chamber music passages and first-desks, somber melodies of great weight and resonance from cellos and basses or all-string unison, etc.—all calculated for expressive characterization. The ironic use of the Faust themes in distorted form to suggest that his overweening ambition for intellectual power has resulted in his becoming the devil sets up the whole technique for Wagner's later dramatizing the changes of character and situation in opera.

All this sound fine in musical verbalizing and it is true that Liszt was an adventurous genius. But the net effect is tedious, even if cause for thought. Endless repetitions, some of them piled up to make long climaxes that have lost inner reason as development. Everything overblown. The man is still an inspired clown. You can smell the greasepaint and the air is stale.

The Framingham Choral Society of men, with the fine tenor of Philip Cho, gave dignity to the last simple statement that all things are naturally corruptible except as redeemed by love. Perhaps Liszt, himself, was a Faust, and knew better than he could do.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000
JAN 15 1970

32.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
JAN 17 1970 Ne Engl

Symphony

Dvorak's Concerto In Welcome Return

By McLAREN HARRIS

One of the more engaging part time for orchestras during the past year has been to unearth neglected piano concertos and sundry works of romantic composers — Rubinstein, Gottschalk, Scharwenka, even Carl Nielsen. Yesterday was Dvorak's turn; Rudolf Firkusny was the soloist for the Symphony's first performance of his lone Piano Concerto in G minor.

Dvorak's concerto strikes a medium between the expansiveness, both in breadth and depth, of Brahms' concertos and the gilt-edged elegance of Tchaikovsky's. Certain features of the first movement are reminiscent of Brahms, notably the woodwind scoring, but the lyric turns and consonant harmony, spiced here or there with augmented intervals, confirm its national character.

The seriousness is contained in the first and second movements — the Andante, in its melodic purity, is almost like Slavic Beethoven — while the finale indulges in considerably more bravura and caprice.

I CONFESS to a lack of close familiarity with the Dvorak Critical Editions and cannot compare in detail the composer's original piano part with Vilem Kurz' revision, or with Mr. Firkusny's further adjustments of that. But again there is an image of Brahms in the keyboard embellishments which run through the orchestral substance, although again the sheer mass of Brahms' heavier choradal and octave passages is missing.

This may be a characteristic of Mr. Firkusny's performance, but it seems inherent in the score. There was no lack of strength or tonal richness on his part. His nuances with tempo were extremely effective, either in a brief poetic lingering over a descending cadence in the Andante, or poised for a virtuosic dash toward the finale's conclusion.

THE ORCHESTRAL accompaniment, under William Steinberg, led off with some jarring intonation from the winds. From there on, it worked fairly well mechanically, but without either the dynamic or temporal flexibility to match the soloist's own language. However that may be Dvorak's Piano Coacerto should be welcomed back to the active repertory.

Bruckner's Symphony No. 6 in A completed the program, and a better choice could have been made. Compared with this work, the Bruckner Eighth, to which this writer was none too kind last month is a true masterpiece. The composer's habits of thematic transposition and repetition were carried to the extreme in No. 6, taking the place of actual development, and only the Scherzo displays much originality.

The orchestra took it on bravely, if somewhat callously; the brass charged Symphony Hall with some rather harsh fortissimos, upsetting the instrumental balance. But adhering to a subdued tone would have robbed the climaxes of their orchestral weight — Bruckner's last high card.

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Friday afternoon January 16 1970 at 2 o'clock

Saturday evening January 17 1970 at 8.30

WILLIAM STEINBERG conductor

DVOŘÁK Piano concerto in G minor op. 33

Allegro agitato

Andante sostenuto

Allegro con fuoco

RUDOLF FIRKUSNY

first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

intermission

BRUCKNER Symphony no. 6 in A

Maestoso

Adagio: sehr feierlich

Scherzo: nicht schnell – trio: langsam

Finale: bewegt, doch nicht zu schnell

B.S.O. plays Dvorak, Bruckner

Globe 1/17/70

By Craig Smith
Contributing Critic

Two little-known works by well-known 19th Century composers were played yesterday afternoon by the Boston Symphony under the direction of William Steinberg. Dvorak's Piano Concerto received its first Boston Symphony performance. Bruckner's 6th Symphony was first performed by the orchestra last year.

Dvorak's early, eclesctic piano concerto showed almost no signs of the later distinction the Czech composer was to achieve as a symphonist. Although some of the gestures were recognizable as uniquely in his own style, most seemed to be borrowed bits from various other Romantic composers, Schumann, Chopin, Brahms, even Liszt. Rudolf Firkuny has, for years, been the only major pianist to play this work. His performance yesterday was really splendid, so fine, in fact, that one wishes he had better material to work with. Boston really deserves to hear him in a better light, perhaps in the Schumann, or one of the Brahms Concerti.

Bruckner's Sixth Symphony is the most seldom played of his later works. It is more lyrical, less melodramatic than his other symphonies; at the same time it is less varied in texture than the other works from this period. The middle two movements, the only ones Bruckner ever heard, are generally the most interesting. The first movement is rather discursive and square in phrasing, the finale, tedious in its repetitiveness and lack of melodic interest.

THE SOLOIST

RUDOLF FIRKUSNY, born in Czechoslovakia and now an American citizen, enrolled at the State Conservatory in Brno at the age of six. Only four years later he made his debut with the Prague Philharmonic, playing a Mozart concerto. Before he reached his majority he was already well known throughout Europe. He studied composition with Leoš Janáček, and for a time was a pupil of Artur Schnabel. Forced to leave his native country at the outbreak of the second World War, he settled for a time in Paris, then came to the United States. He made his New York recital debut in 1941. Today Firkusny is known throughout the world: he devotes six months of each year to concerts in North America, three months he spends in Europe, leaving time for trips to South America, Australia or the Orient. He has appeared with many of the major orchestras, and this season alone he plays concerts with the Cleveland Orchestra, the Houston, San Francisco, Chicago Symphonies and with the Buffalo Philharmonic. His repertoire is large, and he has specialized particularly in the Czech and contemporary American literature. His many recordings are on the Capitol, Columbia, Decca, DGG and RCA labels. Rudolf Firkusny most recently appeared with the Boston Symphony in 1958.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) [illegible] (S) 194,70[illegible]
JAN 17 1970 Ne Eng

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

DVORAK AND BRUCKNER AT BSO

A person could be forgiven for confusing William Steinberg with Perry Rathbone down the pike at the Fine Arts Museum. Mr. Steinberg had already in the young year turned up Tchaikowsky's "Manfred" Symphony and Liszt's "Faust" Symphony, and last week he took another one off the gallery wall—the first Boston Symphony Orchestra performance of Antonin Dvorak's Piano Concerto in G minor, Opus 33.

As is more often the case than not in such revivals, a work of this sort is something that is best reserved as the piece-de-resistance for a conservatory concert. It starts out like vintage Dvorak but swiftly subsides into a prolonged melange of Liszt, Chopin and early Brahms. To be sure, the Dvorak vocabulary periodically breaks through, but it seldom develops into the songfulness, exuberance and authentic national flavor that is his delightful trademark.

The soloist was the Czech pianist, Rudolf Firkusny who, it develops, has for years specialized in this work in various versions, original and edited, including his own version.

He had at it with gusto and command, and it is a pity that somewhere in his career with the piece he had never formulated an edition sufficiently foreshortened to accommodate to the modest materials. Had he done so, here is one listener whose attention span might have been longer than it was.

The other work on the program was the Sixth Symphony of Anton Bruckner, which only nine months ago got its first hearing here at Symphony under Mr. Leinsdorf's direction. The Sixth may be rare, but emphatically that word does not carry the pejorative connotation of a museum piece. It represents the stage of a composer poised just on the brink of full command of his powers. I say brink because there is the promise of that vast surge and sublimity, breadth and romantic glow. The trouble is that the promise is only spasmodically fulfilled, as say in the first half of the opening movement, the outer ends of the Adagio, and in some of the more propulsive moments of an otherwise dreadfully repetitious scherze.

Mr. Steinberg obviously knows his way around this music, but his reading could have been both more taut and more plastic. For example, the Leinsdorf version, as my notes show, ran just over forty-five minutes, while this one was just under an hour. The prolongation was no benefit, although the symphony in its entirety hung together strongly enough.

Claudio Abbado will make his first appearance with the orchestra next week as guest conductor in a program which includes Donatoni's Puppenspiel No. 2 for flute, piccolo and orchestra, with Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute; Bartok's Second Piano Concerto with Alexis Weissenberg as piano soloist; and Schumann's Symphony No. 4 in D minor.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000
JAN 22 1970

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850
JAN 19 1970

BSO, Firkusny, and Dvorak

By Allan Sly

The Dvorak piano concerto had a lot of help in getting onto a Boston Symphony program for the first time ~~this weekend~~. Rudolf Firkusny has long championed it, and offered Boston listeners a version of the solo part neither the composer's nor that of Vilem Kurz, who rewrote it, but a synthesis of both. Mr. Firkusny and William Steinberg (BSO conductor) had agreed further to certain excisions; the Dvorak Society, the Czech Government, and the Cleveland Orchestra all helped, the latter by making available Klaus Roy's informative program note. To admit such broad indebtedness is to reject Stravinsky's dictum, recently displayed in a widely read weekly, that one must not accept verbal preparation for a musical experience!

None of this dialectic seemed to hinder the Friday afternoon audience from thoroughly enjoying an excursion to the Central Europe of a century ago; Mr. Firkusny was in his element, Mr. Steinberg and the orchestra more than collaborative, and one retains a pleasing impression of an amiable personality quite at his ease in talking to us across the years. The concerto is well built and in its modest way is a welcome relief from the higher-strung Brahms or the more flamboyant Romantics.

Dvorak upstaged

But the Bruckner sixth, which took up the rest of the program, upstaged Dvorak in scope, originality and content. How can Boston have managed to exist without it so long? Now that it has arrived, we must never let it go. Its strengths and resplendent colors epitomize the viability of symphony concerts, summing up and restating the human condition—as of Bruckner's time and place—as well as anyone ever did. Mr. Steinberg was instinctively with it; the orchestra exuded a resonant, warm sound, the pace was impelling without ever seeming hustled, the songlike elements ongoing, the rhythmic ones incisive. The impression was entirely adult and masculine, admitting moments of humor or pathos, satisfying one's need for the assertion of faith, whetting the appetite for more.

It could be that Mr. Steinberg's first year in Boston will reach its full fruition in the Beethoven week next April 7 to 11. Isaac Stern and Rudolf Serkin are to be among the participants.

(Review of Jan. 10 Concert)

Steinberg and BSO

Orchestra Strong, Program Weak

By HAROLD C. SPROUL

Last Saturday the Boston Symphony Orchestra under William Steinberg was in excellent form, but that was not enough to rescue second-rate pieces by Mozart, Stravinsky and Liszt—or rather it made them just bearable.

Mozart in his prime (circa Don Giovanni) couldn't write bad music but, like any good professional, could constrain his genius to fit the job. "Eine Kleine Nachtmusic" should be left to school orchestras or played behind palms at social occasions with women and wine to add sparkling counterpoint, or as outdoor serenade to sound quick and tender in the wide night. The orchestra gave it all possible zest and flow, but alas, we—audience sat in solemn phalanx—and no wine.

The Stravinsky "Scherzo Fantastique" is early stuff before the ballet challenge and association with the other artists involved set him off on his great original series starting with the "Firebird". This was a "first" for Boston and worth hearing for all its steal from his teacher, Rimsky-Korsakov, and its debt to Debussy, among others. The Stravinsky ear was already keen: the driving buzz, the great swoops of orchestral color, the surprise of incisive bits of interjection from a solitary wind instrument, the traditional regularities of rhythmic form swept over by continuities of exciting motion. An arbitrary end, as if someone had doused the lights. Yes, second-rate Stravinsky but an addition to our experience of the composer. In 1908 the "fantastic" intention must have been even more evident because of his brilliant tap-dancing through the chromatic spectrum.

The big work was Liszt's "Faust Symphony" in three character studies (after Goethe) Faust, Gretchen and Mephistopheles. It was one of Liszt's bids to be taken seriously beyond his acceptance as piano virtuoso and composer of works for his own performing genius. Goethe's idea of Faust inspired Berlioz, who set off Liszt, who helped Wagner with his early overture, and it is interesting for any musician to compare the similarities and differences. The Liszt is full of bright ideas, harmonic modulations, transformations of motive and theme, chamber music passages and first-desks, somber melodies of great weight and resonance from cellos and basses or all-string unison, etc.—all calculated for expressive characterization. The ironic use of the Faust themes in distorted form to suggest that his overweening ambition for intellectual power has resulted in his becoming the devil sets up the whole technique for Wagner's later dramatizing the changes of character and situation in opera.

All this sound fine in musical verbalizing and it is true that Liszt was an adventurous genius. But the net effect is tedious, even if cause for thought. Endless repetitions, some of them piled up to make long climaxes that have lost inner reason as development. Everything overblown. The man is still an inspired clown. You can smell the greasepaint and the air is stale.

The Framingham Choral Society of men, with the fine tenor of Philip Cho, gave dignity to the last simple statement that all things are naturally corruptible except as redeemed by love. Perhaps Liszt, himself, was a Faust, and knew better than he could do.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000
JAN 15 1970

33.

Abbado conducts Boston Symphony in Donatoni, Bartok

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

Claudio Abbado conducted yesterday afternoon's Boston Symphony concert. Born in Milan in 1933, he was a Koussevitsky Award winner at Tanglewood in 1958 and a Mitropolous Competition winner five years later, has had important engagements in concert and opera on both sides of the Atlantic, and is a very good conductor.

He had a good program, too: the first American performance of "Puppenspiel No. 2" by Franco Donatoni; Bartok's 2d Piano Concerto, with Alexis Weissenberg as soloist, and the Schumann 4th Symphony.

Donatoni, who teaches in Milan, is in his early forties. "Puppenspiel No. 2," written in 1965, is a bravura piece for flute, piccolo (one player), and orchestra, and it is one of the many pieces written in the last two decades to accommodate the special skills of Severino Gazzelloni. The "Puppen" of its title are puppets or marionettes rather than dolls in a more general sense, and both of Donatoni's "Puppenspiele" are inspired by the essay "On the Marionette Theater" (1810) by the German dramatist Kleist. I cannot say just what that means, and program annotator Andrew Raeburn seems also to have been defeated by the composer's obscurantist prose in his attempt to see how the music and Kleist's fascinating critical essay are related.

"Puppenspiel No. 2," at any rate, begins with a tinny fanfare of clear tonality and a touch of carny atmosphere. That initiates a long diminuendo which twitters pleasingly, and which seems not precisely notated. The flute makes what seems a false start, but after its "real" entrance it plays almost uninterruptedly and with compulsive expenditure of energy. Toward the middle, with the texture being progressively lightened, the solo flute is replaced by piccolo; later, it is flute again, and a denser, bigger sound.

Essentially, and in spite of the composer's talk about "re-examination of the traditional resources" and so forth, "Puppenspiel No. 2" comes across as an example of two familiar genres, the texture study, and the Gazzelloni specialty number. Donatoni is one of the ablest composers in his generation, and he has written his piece with finesse, humor, and fantasy in the invention of detail: at least for one go around it was fun to hear.

Given its demands for fantastic speed and its constant, abrupt switches of register, volume, and tone quality, it provided, as well, occasion for stupendously brilliant playing by Doriot Anthony Dwyer. If she has not quite the theatrical flair that Gazzelloni brings to such pieces, she plays, I am sure, many more right notes. What went on in the orchestra sounded both delightful and convincing.

Bartok's 2d Piano Concerto, written in 1931, the last of the big pieces in his ferocious manner, is a powerful, one of his richest, and one that perhaps speaks most compellingly in its Adagio, where it is least fierce. Alexis Weissenberg, though his playing was exceedingly tense and with a feeling about it of something forced, brought to the work imposing resources of energy, projection, power, velocity, and accuracy. Abbado created an effective orchestral context for the solo part; moreover, at the beginning of the Adagio, he got the Boston Symphony to produce a pianissimo whose like I had not heard from them in six years. It was, as a matter of fact, an exaggerated effect, and one that left them nowhere to go when Bartok asked for triple piano 16 measures later, but at least we have found them out: they can, upon insistence, produce a pianissimo as breath-taking as Chicago's or London's.

Actually by time the introduction of Schumann's D minor Symphony came around, we were back to the familiar, comfortable mezzo-piano, and the whole performance tended to be graceless as well as undistinguished in orchestral execution.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
JAN 18 1970

Boston Symphony concerts

1/18/70

The young Italian conductor Claudio Abbado conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fifteenth pair of Friday/Saturday concerts, Friday at 2 p.m. and Saturday at 8:30 p.m. Pianist Alexis Weissenberg is soloist with Mr. Abbado and the Orchestra in Bartok's Piano Concerto no. 2. The program opens with Donatoni's Puppenspiel no. 2 and closes with the Fourth symphony of Schumann.

On Tuesday evening at 8:30 p.m. Michael Tilson Thomas, assistant conductor of the orchestra conducts the fifth of this season's 'Cambridge' series concerts. The program is an all-orchestral one and includes Haydn's Symphony no. 98, Ives' "Three Places in New England," Stravinsky's "Huxley Variations," and Debussy's "La Mer."

On Thursday evening at 7:30 p.m., Mr. Abadbo conducts the fifth of this season's Open Rehearsals for the benefit of the Pension Fund. He will rehearse the Friday/Saturday program.

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Tuesday evening January 20 1970 at 8.30

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS conductor

HAYDN — Symphony no. 98 in B flat
Adagio – allegro
Adagio cantabile
Menuetto & trio
Presto

IVES — 'Three places in New England', an orchestral set
The 'Saint Gaudens' in Boston Common
(Col. Shaw and his Colored Regiment)
Putnam's camp, Redding, Connecticut
From The Housatonic at Stockbridge

intermission

STRAVINSKY — Variations (Aldous Huxley in memoriam)

DEBUSSY — La mer: trois esquisses symphoniques*
(The sea: three symphonic sketches)
De l'aube à midi sur la mer
(From dawn to noon on the sea)
Jeux de vagues
(The playing of the waves)
Dialogue du vent et de la mer
(Dialogue between the wind and the sea)

B.S.O. Series Continue

During these two weeks, the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are playing at a rigorous pace. There are seven regular concerts, an open rehearsal, and a youth concert. Claudio Abbado will be the guest conductor at six of the concerts plus the open rehearsal, and Michael Tilson Thomas, Assistant Conductor of the orchestra, will conduct the January 20 concert. The programs to be performed are extremely different. For example, the concert on January 23 and 24 includes works by Webern, Bartok, and Schumann, while the concert the very next week features music by Donatoni, Schubert, and Prokofiev. All the concerts are presented in Symphony Hall; consult Currently for performance times.

SYMPHONY HALL
251 Huntington Ave., 266-1492.
Jan. 20, 8:30 p.m., Boston Symphony Orchestra
Jan. 22, 7:30 p.m., B.S.O. Open Rehearsal
Jan. 23, 10:20 a.m. Youth Concert
Jan. 23, 2 p.m., B.S.O.
Jan. 24, 8:30 p.m., B.S.O.
Jan. 27, 8:30 p.m., B.S.O.
Jan. 29, 8:30 p.m., B.S.O.
Jan. 30, 2 p.m., B.S.O.
Jan. 31, 8:30 p.m., B.S.O.

Panorama, Boston's official guide mag.

MRS. DORIOT ANTHONY DWYER, Boston Symphony Orchestra principal flutist, will be flute and piccolo soloist in the American premiere of Donatoni's "Puppenspiel No. 2" at the BSO concerts this afternoon and Saturday night in Symphony Hall.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
JAN 23 1970

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Friday afternoon January 23 1970 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening January 24 1970 at 8.30
Tuesday evening January 27 1970 at 8.30
Thursday evening January 29 1970 at 8.30

CLAUDIO ABBADO conductor

DONATONI — Puppenspiel (Puppet show) no. 2 for flute, piccolo and orchestra
DORIOT ANTHONY DWYER flute and piccolo

first performance in America

BARTÓK — Piano concerto no. 2 (1931)
Allegro
Adagio
Allegro molto
ALEXIS WEISSENBERG

intermission

SCHUMANN — Symphony no. 4 in D minor op. 120*
Ziemlich langsam – Lebhaft
Romanze: Ziemlich langsam
Scherzo: Lebhaft
Langsam – Lebhaft

THE SOLOISTS

Principal flute of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, DORIOT ANTHONY DWYER came to Boston in 1952, the first woman to be engaged as a principal by the Orchestra. Her early teachers included her mother and Ernest Liegl, who was then first flute of the Chicago Symphony. Later she studied with Georges Barrère, William Kincaid, and Joseph Mariano at the Eastman School of Music, of which she is a graduate. Before her appointment to the Boston Symphony, Doriot Anthony Dwyer was a member of the Los Angeles Philharmonic, and was chosen by Bruno Walter as first flute of the Hollywood Bowl Symphony the year he was music director there. Mrs Dwyer has served on the faculties of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, the New England Conservatory and Boston University since joining the Boston Symphony. A member of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, she has also appeared as soloist with the Orchestra on many occasions.

ALEXIS WEISSENBERG, who makes his first appearance with the Boston Symphony at these concerts, was born in Sofia, Bulgaria. He studied in his native country and in Israel, where he made his professional debut at the age of fourteen. After a tour to South Africa he came to the United States to attend the Juilliard School. He toured to Israel, Egypt, Turkey and South America, then returned to win the Leventritt Competition, to make his debut with the New York Philharmonic and to start a concert tour throughout the country. He was also invited to appear with the Philadelphia Orchestra. During the following years he made annual tours of North and South America, Europe and the Near East.

Recently Alexis Weissenberg has appeared with the Philadelphia Orchestra conducted by Seiji Ozawa, the Berlin Philharmonic conducted by Herbert von Karajan, as well as the Chicago, Montreal and Detroit Symphonies and the Philharmonics of Vienna and New York. Last season he toured to Japan, the Soviet Union and Europe. He records for the Angel and RCA labels.

THE GUEST CONDUCTOR

CLAUDIO ABBADO was born in Milan, Italy, in 1933. He studied piano and composition at the Verdi Conservatory of his native city, and conducting at the Vienna Academy. He won the Koussevitzky Award for conducting at the Berkshire Music Center in 1958 and five years later won a first prize in the Mitropoulos Competition, which gave him a year with the New York Philharmonic as one of the assistant conductors. In 1964 Herbert von Karajan heard him at the RIAS Festival in Berlin and invited him to appear at the Salzburg Festival the following year, and to conduct the Berlin Philharmonic. Successes followed quickly: Claudio Abbado was named permanent conductor of La Scala in Milan, the first man to be so honored since Guido Cantelli nine years earlier. Engagements followed with other leading opera companies and orchestras, the Metropolitan Opera, the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, the Vienna Philharmonic, the New Philharmonia of London, the Los Angeles Philharmonic, the Philadelphia Orchestra and the Cleveland Orchestra among them. Claudio Abbado has made many recordings on the London and DGG labels. He makes his first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at these concerts.

The Symphony

Musicians Get Abbado Message

By McLAREN HARRIS

From yesterday's indications, these two weeks during which Claudio Abbado occupies the Symphony podium will make up one of the brightest periods of the current season — from the performance standpoint, anyway.

The young conductor, who directs activities at La Scala when he is not in constant demand for guest engagements, combines a clear, forthright baton technique with alertness and seriousness of purpose. He is unspectacular to watch, but what counts is that orchestras get his messages and they work for him.

THE BSO WORKED especially hard for him in the first U.S. performance of Franco Donatoni's Puppenspiel No. 2, a work composed in 1966 for solo flute (and piccolo) and chamber orchestra with an elaborate percussion battery. It is a highly-abstract fantasia, inspired by an essay on marionettes as reflections of man, in which the flute explores the extremes of register, tonal possibilities and melodic texture, all in rather frenzied fashion.

The orchestral parts, even within the regular metric scheme, follow largely independent courses of rhythm and motive, forming a twittering background of avarian confusion which congeals now and then into brief snatches of the Dies Irae.

Soloist Doriot Anthony Dwyer braved its intricacies ably, though not always prominently enough, and the orchestra held together sufficiently to make it an engaging exercise in tonal diversity. Its philosophical application is too diffuse for interpretation, however, and the composer's own note about it in the program is more enigmatic than the riddle of the Sphinx.

The finest workmanship for all concerned was wrought in Bartok's Second Piano Concerto with Alexis Weissenberg. The concerto is among Bartok's most imaginatively fertile works, opening with a primitive thrust in the piano, accompanied by crisp, plangent responses from winds only in the opening movement. Weissenberg's attack produced the massive quality necessary to the keyboard's dominance, but always with a quick-footed agility which fit perfectly into the linear texture.

THE ADAGIO, begun in an almost spellbinding hush by Abbado and the orchestra, contrasted strongly with its internal Presto, led again by Weissenberg's rapid-fire fingerwork. The finale, which brings the piano-orchestra give-and-take to a peak of 33.

Abbado conducts Boston Symphony in Donatoni, Bartok

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

Claudio Abbado conducted yesterday afternoon's Boston Symphony concert. Born in Milan in 1933, he was a Koussevitsky Award winner at Tanglewood in 1958 and a Mitropolous Competition winner five years later, has had important engagements in concert and opera on both sides of the Atlantic, and is a very good conductor.

He had a good program, too: the first American performance of "Puppenspiel No. 2" by Franco Donatoni; Bartok's 2d Piano Concerto, with Alexis Weissenberg as soloist, and the Schumann 4th Symphony.

Donatoni, who teaches in Milan, is in his early forties. "Puppenspiel No. 2," written in 1965, is a bravura piece for flute, piccolo (one player), and orchestra, and it is one of the many pieces written in the last two decades to accommodate the special skills of Severino Gazzelloni. The "Puppen" of its title are puppets or marionettes rather than dolls in a more general sense, and both of Donatoni's "Puppenspiele" are inspired by the essay "On the Marionette Theater" (1810) by the German dramatist Kleist. I cannot say just what that means, and program annotator Andrew Raeburn seems also to have been defeated by the composer's obscurantist prose in his attempt to see how the music and Kleist's fascinating critical essay are related.

"Puppenspiel No. 2," at any rate, begins with a tinny fanfare of clear tonality and a touch of carny atmosphere. That initiates a long diminuendo which twitters pleasingly, and which seems not precisely notated. The flute makes what seems a false start, but after its "real" entrance it plays almost uninterruptedly and with compulsive expenditure of energy. Toward the middle, with the texture being progressively lightened, the solo flute is replaced by piccolo; later, it is flute again, and a denser, bigger sound.

Essentially, and in spite of the composer's talk about "re-examination of the traditional resources" and so forth, "Puppenspiel No. 2" comes across as an example of two familiar genres, the texture study, and the Gazzelloni specialty number. Donatoni is one of the ablest composers in his generation, and he has written his piece with finesse, humor, and fantasy in the invention of detail: at least for one go around it was fun to hear.

Given its demands for fantastic speed and its constant, abrupt switches of register, volume, and tone quality, it provided, as well, occasion for stupendously brilliant playing by Doriot Anthony Dwyer. If she has not quite the theatrical flair that Gazzelloni brings to such pieces, she plays, I am sure, many more right notes. What went on in the orchestra sounded both delightful and convincing.

Bartok's 2d Piano Concerto, written in 1931, the last of the big pieces in his ferocious manner, is a powerful, one of his richest, and one that perhaps speaks most compellingly in its Adagio, where it is least fierce. Alexis Weissenberg, though his playing was exceedingly tense and with a feeling about it of something forced, brought to the work imposing resources of energy, projection, power, velocity, and accuracy. Abbado created an effective orchestral context for the solo part; moreover, at the beginning of the Adagio, he got the Boston Symphony to produce a pianissimo whose like I had not heard from them in six years. It was, as a matter of fact, an exaggerated effect, and one that left them nowhere to go when Bartok asked for triple piano 16 measures later, but at least we have found them out: they can, upon insistence, produce a pianissimo as breath-taking as Chicago's or London's.

Actually by time the introduction of Schumann's D minor Symphony came around, we were back to the familiar, comfortable mezzo-piano, and the whole performance tended to be graceless as well as undistinguished in orchestral execution.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
JAN 18 1970
New Engl News

Boston Symphony concerts

1/18/70

The young Italian conductor Claudio Abbado conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fifteenth pair of Friday/Saturday concerts, Friday at 2 p.m. and Saturday at 8:30 p.m. Pianist Alexis Weissenberg is soloist with Mr. Abbado and the Orchestra in Bartok's Piano Concerto no. 2. The program opens with Donatoni's Puppenspiel no. 2 and closes with the Fourth symphony of Schumann.

On Tuesday evening at 8:30 p.m. Michael Tilson Thomas, assistant conductor of the orchestra conducts the fifth of this season's 'Cambridge' series concerts. The program is an all-orchestral one and includes Haydn's Symphony no. 98, Ives' "Three Places in New England," Stravinsky's "Huxley Variations," and Debussy's "La Mer."

On Thursday evening at 7:30 p.m., Mr. Abaddo conducts the fifth of this season's Open Rehearsals for the benefit of the Pension Fund. He will rehearse the Friday/Saturday program.

MRS. DORIOT ANTHONY DWYER, Boston Symphony Orchestra principal flutist, will be flute and piccolo soloist in the American premiere of Donatoni's "Puppenspiel No. 2" at the BSO concerts this afternoon and Saturday night in Symphony Hall.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
JAN 23 1970
New Engla News

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Tuesday evening January 20 1970 at 8.30

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS conductor

HAYDN — Symphony no. 98 in B flat
Adagio – allegro
Adagio cantabile
Menuetto & trio
Presto

IVES — 'Three places in New England', an orchestral set
The 'Saint Gaudens' in Boston Common
(Col. Shaw and his Colored Regiment)
Putnam's camp, Redding, Connecticut
From The Housatonic at Stockbridge

intermission

STRAVINSKY — Variations (Aldous Huxley in memoriam)

DEBUSSY — La mer: trois esquisses symphoniques*
(The sea: three symphonic sketches)
De l'aube à midi sur la mer
(From dawn to noon on the sea)
Jeux de vagues
(The playing of the waves)
Dialogue du vent et de la mer
(Dialogue between the wind and the sea)

B.S.O. Series Continue

During these two weeks, the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are playing at a rigorous pace. There are seven regular concerts, an open rehearsal, and a youth concert. Claudio Abbado will be the guest conductor at six of the concerts plus the open rehearsal, and Michael Tilson Thomas, Assistant Conductor of the orchestra, will conduct the January 20 concert. The programs to be performed are extremely different. For example, the concert on January 23 and 24 includes works by Webern, Bartok, and Schumann, while the concert the very next week features music by Donatoni, Schubert, and Prokofiev. All the concerts are presented in Symphony Hall; consult Currently for performance times.

SYMPHONY HALL
251 Huntington Ave., 266-1492.
Jan. 20, 8:30 p.m., Boston Symphony Orchestra
Jan. 22, 7:30 p.m., B.S.O. Open Rehearsal
Jan. 23, 10:20 a.m., Youth Concert
Jan. 23, 2 p.m., B.S.O.
Jan. 24, 8:30 p.m., B.S.O.
Jan. 27, 8:30 p.m., B.S.O.
Jan. 29, 8:30 p.m., B.S.O.
Jan. 30, 2 p.m., B.S.O.
Jan. 31, 8:30 p.m., B.S.O.

Panorama. Boston's official guide mag.

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Friday afternoon January 23 1970 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening January 24 1970 at 8.30
Tuesday evening January 27 1970 at 8.30
Thursday evening January 29 1970 at 8.30

CLAUDIO ABBADO conductor

DONATONI — Puppenspiel (Puppet show) no. 2 for flute, piccolo and orchestra
DORIOT ANTHONY DWYER flute and piccolo

first performance in America

BARTÓK — Piano concerto no. 2 (1931)
Allegro
Adagio
Allegro molto
ALEXIS WEISSENBERG

intermission

SCHUMANN — Symphony no. 4 in D minor op. 120*
Ziemlich langsam – Lebhaft
Romanze: Ziemlich langsam
Scherzo: Lebhaft
Langsam – Lebhaft

THE SOLOISTS

Principal flute of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, DORIOT ANTHONY DWYER came to Boston in 1952, the first woman to be engaged as a principal by the Orchestra. Her early teachers included her mother and Ernest Liegl, who was then first flute of the Chicago Symphony. Later she studied with Georges Barrère, William Kincaid, and Joseph Mariano at the Eastman School of Music, of which she is a graduate. Before her appointment to the Boston Symphony, Doriot Anthony Dwyer was a member of the Los Angeles Philharmonic, and was chosen by Bruno Walter as first flute of the Hollywood Bowl Symphony the year he was music director there. Mrs Dwyer has served on the faculties of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, the New England Conservatory and Boston University since joining the Boston Symphony. A member of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, she has also appeared as soloist with the Orchestra on many occasions.

ALEXIS WEISSENBERG, who makes his first appearance with the Boston Symphony at these concerts, was born in Sofia, Bulgaria. He studied in his native country and in Israel, where he made his professional debut at the age of fourteen. After a tour to South Africa he came to the United States to attend the Juilliard School. He toured to Israel, Egypt, Turkey and South America, then returned to win the Leventritt Competition, to make his debut with the New York Philharmonic and to start a concert tour throughout the country. He was also invited to appear with the Philadelphia Orchestra. During the following years he made annual tours of North and South America, Europe and the Near East.

Recently Alexis Weissenberg has appeared with the Philadelphia Orchestra conducted by Seiji Ozawa, the Berlin Philharmonic conducted by Herbert von Karajan, as well as the Chicago, Montreal and Detroit Symphonies and the Philharmonics of Vienna and New York. Last season he toured to Japan, the Soviet Union and Europe. He records for the Angel and RCA labels.

THE GUEST CONDUCTOR

CLAUDIO ABBADO was born in Milan, Italy, in 1933. He studied piano and composition at the Verdi Conservatory of his native city, and conducting at the Vienna Academy. He won the Koussevitzky Award for conducting at the Berkshire Music Center in 1958 and five years later won a first prize in the Mitropoulos Competition, which gave him a year with the New York Philharmonic as one of the assistant conductors. In 1964 Herbert von Karajan heard him at the RIAS Festival in Berlin and invited him to appear at the Salzburg Festival the following year, and to conduct the Berlin Philharmonic. Successes followed quickly: Claudio Abbado was named permanent conductor of La Scala in Milan, the first man to be so honored since Guido Cantelli nine years earlier. Engagements followed with other leading opera companies and orchestras, the Metropolitan Opera, the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, the Vienna Philharmonic, the New Philharmonia of London, the Los Angeles Philharmonic, the Philadelphia Orchestra and the Cleveland Orchestra among them. Claudio Abbado has made many recordings on the London and DGG labels. He makes his first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at these concerts.

The Symphony

Musicians Get Abbado Message

By McLAREN HARRIS

From yesterday's indications, these two weeks during which Claudio Abbado occupies the Symphony podium will make up one of the brightest periods of the current season — from the performance standooint, anyway.

The young conductor, who directs activities at La Scala when he is not in constant demand for guest engagements, combines a clear, forthright baton technique with alertness and seriousness of purpose. He is unspectacular to watch, but what counts is that orchestras get his messages and they work for him.

THE BSO WORKED especially hard for him in the first U.S. performance of Franco Donatoni's Puppenspiel No. 2, a work composed in 1966 for solo flute (and piccolo) and chamber orchestra with an elaborate percussion battery. It is a highly-abstract fantasia, inspired by an essay on marionettes as reflections of man, in which the flute explores the extremes of register, tonal possibilities and melodic texture, all in rather frenzied fashion.

The orchestral parts, even within the regular metric scheme, follow largely independent courses of rhythm and motive, forming a twittering background of avarian confusion which congeals now and then into brief snatches of the Dies Irae.

Soloist Doriot Anthony Dwyer braved its intricacies ably, though not always prominently enough, and the orchestra held together sufficiently to make it an engaging exercise in tonal diversity. Its philosophical application is too diffuse for interpretation, however, and the composer's own note about it in the program is more enigmatic than the riddle of the Sphinx.

The finest workmanship for all concerned was wrought in Bartok's Second Piano Concerto with Alexis Weissenberg. The concerto is among Bartok's most imaginatively fertile works, opening with a primitive thrust in the piano, accompanied by crisp, plangent responses from winds only in the opening movement. Weissenberg's attack produced the massive quality necessary to the keyboard's dominance, but always with a quick-footed agility which fit perfectly into the linear texture.

THE ADAGIO, begun in an almost spellbinding hush by Abbado and the orchestra, contrasted strongly with its internal Presto, led again by Weissenberg's rapid-fire fingerwork. The finale, which brings the piano-orchestra give-and-take to a peak of 34.

WEEKEND ISSUE Monday, January 26, 1970

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

New faces and sounds at Boston Symphony

ARTS
ENTERTAINMENT

By Louis Snyder

First, first, first—with the Boston Symphony. The conductor, young Claudio Abbado; the piano soloist, Alexis Weissenberg, and a program piece—Franco Donatoni's "Puppenspiel No. 2," also a United States permiere. They were all on the orchestra's weekend schedule at Symphony Hall. After performance here this week on Tuesday and Thursday, some or all of them will be heard in Hartford, Conn. (Feb. 3), New York (Feb. 4 and 6), and Brooklyn (Feb. 5).

Mr. Abbado, young, personable, and obviously possessed with musical ideas of his own, did what any young sculptor must do when faced with the Rock of Gibraltar — shape it as best he can. In the opening "Puppenspiel," with a reduced group of musicians and the orchestra's brilliant first flutist, Doriot Anthony Dwyer, he was able to emphasize the composer's felicitous use of instrumental combinations in partnership with the soloist, and add to his accomplishments a first-class reading of a work that may still have a way to go before it gains popular acceptance. But the polite squirmings of the public have nothing to do with the succinct performance by Mr. Abbado, Mrs. Dwyer, and the orchestra. Donatoni's admittedly unusual piece is imaginatively enough constructed and individually enough oriented to find its way into the orchestral repertory a few years hence, if only as a blood-brother in the "Petrushka" family.

Mrs. Dwyer's incredibly skillful flute playing spun the thread on which this fascinating aural piece hung like a clacking mobile, and if everyone had read the program notes (absolutely essential!), there could have been no question of Donatoni's intentions to conjure with during the performance of his metaphysical puppet show. Even aside from the vociferous reception for Mrs. Dwyer, Mr. Abbado and the orchestra, it would seem that the strange new piece had made a generally acceptable impression on first hearing.

It is perhaps less possible to make an impression on first hearing with Bartok's Second Piano Concerto, despite the obvious virtuoso requirements built in by the composer-pianist for himself and his succeeding performers. Mr. Weissenberg, appearing for the first time with the BSO, certainly displayed the technique and the strength to deal with this demanding giant. Whether or not the orchestral rearrangement (celli upstage of violins) was responsible, much of the "tutti" playing of the piano and orchestra, particularly in the first movement, enveloped the soloist in a heavy curtain of sound, leaving hearers with only half of the dual intensity inherent in this music. Balance improved in the two succeeding movements, but despite some spectacular playing by Mr. Weissenberg, this was not an ideal concerto partnership audiencewise. With the best intentions in the world, no doubt, Mr. Abbado submerged his soloist (on Friday, at least) in Bartokian tonal complexities, and one often had to stretch an ear to reach the piano in the maze. However, Mr. Weissenberg's affinity for this music was obvious, and was so recognized by both audience and fellow musicians with a cordial welcoming reception.

Like the Bartok concerto, Robert Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D minor, which followed the intermission, hadn't been played by the BSO since 1962. Here Mr. Abbado's plentiful energies and ideas had room for expression in matters of tempi, phrasing, and interpretation. The result was a reading more romantic and fluid than one is accustomed to hear, but nonetheless productive of a welcome new slant for listeners, who should always be able to consider one. What impressed most, though, was that Mr. Abbado, besides being a no-nonsense artist with the baton, is able to translate effectively a discernible intelligence about his musical choices into solid performance sounds. There was nothing played on Friday afternoon that didn't have his bold hallmark on it—another encouraging sign that the art of conducting is alive and burgeoning.

Magic Flutist

Doriot Anthony Dwyer, first flute of the Boston Symphony, is the "incredibly skillful" soloist in the orchestra's current American premiere performances, in Boston and on tour, of Donatoni's "Puppenspiel No. 2," reviewed on this page.

Claudio Abbado BSO Conductor For Concerts

Tonight at 8:30 p.m. Claudio Abbado conducts the sixth of this season's Boston Symphony Tuesday "A' Series concerts and on Thursday at 8:30, he conducts the fourth Thursday 'A' Series concert in Symphony Hall. Both programs consist of Bartok's Piano concerto No. 2, Donatoni's "Puppenspiel" No. 2 and the Fourth symphony of Schumann. Pianist Alexis Weissenberg is soloist in the Bartok.

Abbado conducts the 16th pair of Friday-Saturday concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season on Friday at 2 p.m. and Saturday at 8:30 p.m. This will be the second of his three week appearance as guest conductor with the Orchestra. The New England Conservatory Chorus will join Abbado and the Orchestra in Debussy's "Three Nocturnes", and Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe"—suite No. 2. The remainder of the program includes Prokofiev's Symphony No. 3 and a second work by Ravel, "Pavane for a dead Infanta."

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
JAN 27 1970
New Engl New

BSO ON FM

Claudio Abbado will be guest conductor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in three concerts to be broadcast live by WGBH-FM.

The first, on Tuesday, Jan. 27 at 8:30 p. m., will feature Alexis Weissenberg in Bartok's Piano Concerto No. 2. Also on the program will be Five Pieces for Orchestra by Webern and Schumann's Symphony No. 4.

On Friday, Jan. 30, at 2 p.m. and Saturday, Jan. 31, at 8:30 p.m., he will lead the orchestra in Donatoni's "Puppenspeil No. 2, Schubert's Symphony No. 2 in B-flat and Prokofiev's Symphony No. 3.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000
JAN 15 1970

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Friday afternoon January 30 1970 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening January 31 1970 at 8.30

CLAUDIO ABBADO conductor

PROKOFIEV Symphony no. 3 op. 44*
Moderato
Andante
Allegro agitato
Andante mosso

intermission

RAVEL Pavane pour une infante défunte (Pavane for a dead Infanta)*

DEBUSSY Nocturnes
Nuages (Clouds)*
Fêtes (Festival)*
Sirènes (Sirens)

RAVEL Daphnis et Chloé – suite no. 2*
Lever du jour (Daybreak)
Pantomime (Mime)
Danse générale (General dance)

NEW ENGLAND CONSERVATORY CHORUS
Lorna Cooke de Varon conductor

THE CHORUS

THE NEW ENGLAND CONSERVATORY CHORUS, under the direction of Lorna Cooke de Varon, has contributed significantly to Boston's musical life, and has become known internationally through its tours and recordings. Composed of students from all departments of the Conservatory, the chorus has a full and varied program each season. It has sung several world premières, including works by Irving Fine and Daniel Pinkham, and introduced several others to America, Bernstein's Kaddish and Bruckner's E minor Mass among them. Gunther Schuller, Leonard Bernstein and Aaron Copland are some of the composers who have conducted the chorus.

The New England Conservatory Tour Chorus has travelled extensively in the United States, and gave a concert tour in Spain and the Soviet Union in 1966 under the auspices of the State Department. On their return Mrs de Varon was awarded the Boston Medal for Distinguished Achievement. Since 1951 the chorus has sung each season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and made many recordings with the orchestra for RCA.

Last season the chorus sang in performances of the German Requiem of Brahms and the Ninth symphony of Beethoven and later took part in the recordings of these pieces for RCA. Recently they gave a benefit concert for Roxbury's 'Project Exodus', and further plans for this season include the Boston première of Webern's Das Augenlicht and the world première of a piece by Robert Cogan of the Conservatory faculty. The chorus will make a concert tour of west coast cities in March.

Earlier this season the chorus sang in performances of Carl Orff's Carmina Burana conducted by Seiji Ozawa.

The Patriot Ledger, Wed., Jan. 28, 1970 Page 32

The Sound of Music

Abbado In Command

By Peter M. Knapp

Claudio Abbado, the dark-haired, 36-year-old maestro from Milan, is making his first appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, concluding the first of three series of programs last night with a concert stimulating for its content and performance.

Despite his relative youth, Abbado has been around — a prizewinner in conducting at Tanglewood in 1958 with the Koussevitsky Award and later in the Mitropoulos Competition, operatic and symphonic concerts in leading music centers, a good deal of recording. He is experienced, to the point, unfussy in the physics of his trade, and gives off a sense of assurance and command.

Two Solo Works

His program was unusual in content and construction — opening with two 20th century solo works — Franco Donatoni's "Puppenspiel No. 2" and Bela Bartok's Piano Concerto No. 2 — and concluding with Robert Schumann's Symphony No. 4 in d minor (also No. 2 in chronology of composition). Atonality for an opener is a rarity in Boston!

Abbado showed himself to be a deft accompanist, perhaps covering the two soloists at times, but keeping good order and imparting a solid rhythmic foundation to both solo works. The Bartok in particular had a muscular rhythmic foundation — a performance of bone and sinew. With soloist Alexis Weissenberg's brilliant playing, the Bartok was often exhilarating Weissenberg has the fabulous technique to cover the keyboard with those hammered chords and octaves Bartok showers on the score, and the direct expression for the inventive piano-timpani dialogue of the adagio movement.

The Donatoni work, given its first performances in America, is equally demanding for its flute and piccolo soloist, the redoubtable Doriot Anthony Dwyer, pitted against a chamber orchestra heavily laden with percussion. Relating to an essay, "On the Marionette Theatre," by Heinrich von Kleist, neither the 1965 work's philosophical content nor the music are immediately obvious and any evaluation of the performance would frankly have to be guesswork.

It is a work of intricate construction, with divided work for strings, much percussion commentary, and complex counterpoint. Yet the orchestra work remains delicate while the flute ranges far and wide with leaps, chirps and flutter tonguing.

The Schumann symphony received a warmly melodicious performance, with Abbado getting a full-blooded occasionally somewhat thick, sound from his strings (which he rearranged, placing the celli in the middle, violas to the right). He gave impetus to melody through shapely swells, but also rushed here and there, tending to accelerate in the codas.

CLAUDIO ABBADO: guest returns

Abbado to lead BSO in Hartford, N.Y. tour

Globe 1/23/7

Claudio Abbado will be guest conductor again next week at Boston Symphony concerts and will lead the orchestra on its tour the first week in February to Hartford and New York City.

His new program, to be heard next Friday at 2 and Saturday at 8:30, consists of Prokofiev's Symphony No. 3, Ravel's Pavane for a dead Infanta, Debussy's Three Nocturnes and Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite No. 2. Women's voices from the New England Conservatory Chorus will participate in the final nocturne of the Debussy work.

On Tuesday and Thursday at 8:30, Abbado will repeat a program that was first done Jan. 23. The orchestra's principal flute, Doriot Anthony Dwyer, will be flute and piccolo soloist in Donatoni's Puppenspiel No. 2 (Puppetshow). Alexis Weissenberg will play the Bartok Piano Concerto No. 2, and the program will conclude with Schumann's Symphony No. 4.

The week of Feb. 2, the orchestra takes these two programs, minus chorus, to Manhattan's Philharmonic and Carnegie Halls and to the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

34.

WEEKEND ISSUE Monday, January 26, 1970

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

New faces and sounds at Boston Symphony

By Louis Snyder

ARTS
ENTERTAINMENT

First, first, first—with the Boston Symphony. The conductor, young Claudio Abbado; the piano soloist, Alexis Weissenberg, and a program piece—Franco Donatoni's "Puppenspiel No. 2," also a United States permiere. They were all on the orchestra's weekend schedule at Symphony Hall. After performance here this week on Tuesday and Thursday, some or all of them will be heard in Hartford, Conn. (Feb. 3), New York (Feb. 4 and 6), and Brooklyn (Feb. 5).

Mr. Abbado, young, personable, and obviously possessed with musical ideas of his own, did what any young sculptor must do when faced with the Rock of Gibraltar — shape it as best he can. In the opening "Puppenspiel," with a reduced group of musicians and the orchestra's brilliant first flutist, Doriot Anthony Dwyer, he was able to emphasize the composer's felicitous use of instrumental combinations in partnership with the soloist, and add to his accomplishments a first-class reading of a work that may still have a way to go before it gains popular acceptance. But the polite squirmings of the public have nothing to do with the succinct performance by Mr. Abbado, Mrs. Dwyer, and the orchestra. Donatoni's admittedly unusual piece is imaginatively enough constructed and individually enough oriented to find its way into the orchestral repertory a few years hence, if only as a blood-brother in the "Petrushka" family.

Mrs. Dwyer's incredibly skillful flute playing spun the thread on which this fascinating aural piece hung like a clacking mobile, and if everyone had read the program notes (absolutely essential!), there could have been no question of Donatoni's intentions to conjure with during the performance of his metaphysical puppet show. Even aside from the vociferous reception for Mrs. Dwyer, Mr. Abbado and the orchestra, it would seem that the strange new piece had made a generally acceptable impression on first hearing.

It is perhaps less possible to make an impression on first hearing with Bartok's Second Piano Concerto, despite the obvious virtuoso requirements built in by the composer-pianist for himself and his succeeding performers. Mr. Weissenberg, appearing for the first time with the BSO, certainly displayed the technique and the strength to deal with this demanding giant. Whether or not the orchestral rearrangement (celli upstage of violins) was responsible, much of the "tutti" playing of the piano and orchestra, particularly in the first movement, enveloped the soloist in a heavy curtain of sound, leaving hearers with only half of the dual intensity inherent in this music. Balance improved in the two succeeding movements, but despite some spectacular playing by Mr. Weissenberg, this was not an ideal concerto partnership audiencewise. With the best intentions in the world, no doubt, Mr. Abbado submerged his soloist (on Friday, at least) in Bartokian tonal complexities, and one often had to stretch an ear to reach the piano in the maze. However, Mr. Weissenberg's affinity for this music was obvious, and was so recognized by both audience and fellow musicians with a cordial welcoming reception.

Like the Bartok concerto, Robert Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D minor, which followed the intermission, hadn't been played by the BSO since 1962. Here Mr. Abbado's plentiful energies and ideas had room for expression in matters of tempi, phrasing, and interpretation. The result was a reading more romantic and fluid than one is accustomed to hear, but nonetheless productive of a welcome new slant for listeners, who should always be able to consider one. What impressed most, though, was that Mr. Abbado, besides being a no-nonsense artist with the baton, is able to translate effectively a discernible intelligence about his musical choices into solid performance sounds. There was nothing played on Friday afternoon that didn't have his bold hallmark on it—another encouraging sign that the art of conducting is alive and burgeoning.

Magic Flutist

Doriot Anthony Dwyer, first flute of the Boston Symphony, is the "incredibly skillful" soloist in the orchestra's current American premiere performances, in Boston and on tour, of Donatoni's "Puppenspiel No. 2," reviewed on this page.

Claudio Abbado BSO Conductor For Concerts

Tonight at 8:30 p.m. Claudio Abbado conducts the sixth of this season's Boston Symphony Tuesday "A' Series concerts and on Thursday at 8:30, he conducts the fourth Thursday 'A' Series concert in Symphony Hall. Both programs consist of Bartok's Piano concerto No. 2, Donatoni's "Puppenspiel" No. 2 and the Fourth symphony of Schumann. Pianist Alexis Weissenberg is soloist in the Bartok.

Abbado conducts the 16th pair of Friday-Saturday concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season on Friday at 2 p.m. and Saturday at 8:30 p.m. This will be the second of his three week appearance as guest conductor with the Orchestra. The New England Conservatory Chorus will join Abbado and the Orchestra in Debussy's "Three Nocturnes", and Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe"—suite No. 2. The remainder of the program includes Prokofiev's Symphony No. 3 and a second work by Ravel, "Pavane for a dead Infanta."

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
JAN 27 1970
New Engl

BSO ON FM

Claudio Abbado will be guest conductor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in three concerts to be broadcast live by WGBH-FM.

The first, on Tuesday, Jan. 27 at 8:30 p. m., will feature Alexis Weissenberg in Bartok's Piano Concerto No. 2. Also on the program will be Five Pieces for Orchestra by Webern and Schumann's Symphony No. 4.

On Friday, Jan. 30, at 2 p.m. and Saturday, Jan. 31, at 8:30 p.m., he will lead the orchestra in Donatoni's "Puppenspeil No. 2, Schubert's Symphony No. 2 in B-flat and Prokofiev's Symphony No. 3.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000
JAN 15 1970

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Friday afternoon January 30 1970 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening January 31 1970 at 8.30

CLAUDIO ABBADO conductor

PROKOFIEV — Symphony no. 3 op. 44*
Moderato
Andante
Allegro agitato
Andante mosso

intermission

RAVEL — Pavane pour une infante défunte (Pavane for a dead Infanta)*

DEBUSSY — Nocturnes
Nuages (Clouds)*
Fêtes (Festival)*
Sirènes (Sirens)

RAVEL — Daphnis et Chloé – suite no. 2*
Lever du jour (Daybreak)
Pantomime (Mime)
Danse générale (General dance)

NEW ENGLAND CONSERVATORY CHORUS
Lorna Cooke de Varon conductor

THE CHORUS

THE NEW ENGLAND CONSERVATORY CHORUS, under the direction of Lorna Cooke de Varon, has contributed significantly to Boston's musical life, and has become known internationally through its tours and recordings. Composed of students from all departments of the Conservatory, the chorus has a full and varied program each season. It has sung several world premières, including works by Irving Fine and Daniel Pinkham, and introduced several others to America, Bernstein's Kaddish and Bruckner's E minor Mass among them. Gunther Schuller, Leonard Bernstein and Aaron Copland are some of the composers who have conducted the chorus.

The New England Conservatory Tour Chorus has travelled extensively in the United States, and gave a concert tour in Spain and the Soviet Union in 1966 under the auspices of the State Department. On their return Mrs de Varon was awarded the Boston Medal for Distinguished Achievement. Since 1951 the chorus has sung each season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and made many recordings with the orchestra for RCA.

Last season the chorus sang in performances of the German Requiem of Brahms and the Ninth symphony of Beethoven and later took part in the recordings of these pieces for RCA. Recently they gave a benefit concert for Roxbury's 'Project Exodus', and further plans for this season include the Boston première of Webern's Das Augenlicht and the world première of a piece by Robert Cogan of the Conservatory faculty. The chorus will make a concert tour of west coast cities in March.

Earlier this season the chorus sang in performances of Carl Orff's Carmina Burana conducted by Seiji Ozawa.

The Patriot Ledger, Wed., Jan. 28, 1970 Page 32

The Sound of Music

Abbado In Command

By Peter M. Knapp

Claudio Abbado, the dark-haired, 36-year-old maestro from Milan, is making his first appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, concluding the first of three series of programs last night with a concert stimulating for its content and performance.

Despite his relative youth, Abbado has been around — a prizewinner in conducting at Tanglewood in 1958 with the Koussevitsky Award and later in the Mitropoulos Competition, operatic and symphonic concerts in leading music centers, a good deal of recording. He is experienced, to the point, unfussy in the physics of his trade, and gives off a sense of assurance and command.

Two Solo Works

His program was unusual in content and construction — opening with two 20th century solo works — Franco Donatoni's "Puppenspiel No. 2" and Bela Bartok's Piano Concerto No. 2 — and concluding with Robert Schumann's Symphony No. 4 in d minor (also No. 2 in chronology of composition). Atonality for an opener is a rarity in Boston!

Abbado showed himself to be a deft accompanist, perhaps covering the two soloists at times, but keeping good order and imparting a solid rhythmic foundation to both solo works. The Bartok in particular had a muscular rhythmic foundation — a performance of bone and sinew. With soloist Alexis Weissenberg's brilliant playing, the Bartok was often exhilarating Weissenberg has the fabulous technique to cover the keyboard with those hammered chords and octaves Bartok showers on the score, and the direct expression for the inventive piano-timpani dialogue of the adagio movement.

The Donatoni work, given its first performances in America, is equally demanding for its flute and piccolo soloist, the redoubtable Doriot Anthony Dwyer, pitted against a chamber orchestra heavily laden with percussion. Relating to an essay, "On the Marionette Theatre," by Heinrich von Kleist, neither the 1965 work's philosophical content nor the music are immediately obvious and any evaluation of the performance would frankly have to be guesswork.

It is a work of intricate construction, with divided work for strings, much percussion commentary, and complex counterpoint. Yet the orchestra work remains delicate while the flute ranges far and wide with leaps, chirps and flutter tonguing.

The Schumann symphony received a warmly melodicious performance, with Abbado getting a full-blooded occasionally somewhat thick, sound from his strings (which he rearranged, placing the celli in the middle, violas to the right). He gave impetus to melody through shapely swells, but also rushed here and there, tending to accelerate in the codas.

CLAUDIO ABBADO: guest returns

Abbado to lead BSO in Hartford, N.Y. tour

Globe 1/23/7

Claudio Abbado will be guest conductor again next week at Boston Symphony concerts and will lead the orchestra on its tour the first week in February to Hartford and New York City.

His new program, to be heard next Friday at 2 and Saturday at 8:30, consists of Prokofiev's Symphony No. 3, Ravel's Pavane for a dead Infanta, Debussy's Three Nocturnes and Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite No. 2. Women's voices from the New England Conservatory Chorus will participate in the final nocturne of the Debussy work.

On Tuesday and Thursday at 8:30, Abbado will repeat a program that was first done Jan. 23. The orchestra's principal flute, Doriot Anthony Dwyer, will be flute and piccolo soloist in Donatoni's Puppenspiel No. 2 (Puppetshow). Alexis Weissenberg will play the Bartok Piano Concerto No. 2, and the program will conclude with Schumann's Symphony No. 4.

The week of Feb. 2, the orchestra takes these two programs, minus chorus, to Manhattan's Philharmonic and Carnegie Halls and to the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

3s—

Abbado and BSO Present One of Season's Best Orchestral Shows

By McLAREN HARRIS
HT Music Critic

Doubtless there are members of the Symphony audience currently engaged in devising methods to keep Claudio Abbado from leaving town, and they should be encouraged. Yesterday Abbado and the BSO put on one of the finest orchestral shows witnessed or heard here all season.

This is not to imply that the conductor is primarily a showman, for besides their surface appeal, his interpretations reflect a good measure of care and concentration. Among works by Prokofiev, Debussy and Ravel, for instance, the Pavane for a Dead Princess is certainly one of the most familiar — and abused — works in orchestral literature. Abbado set a leisurely pace for it, especially toward the conclusion, but the motion was always purposeful, without superimposed pauses or dynamic distortions.

Debussy's Nocturnes were similarly approached with an emphasis upon fullness of phrase and maintenance of a gentle flow in "Nuages" and "Sirenes," and production of well-defined orchestral color and dynamic variety in "Fetes."

RAVEL'S SECOND orchestral suite from "Daphnis et Chloe" and Prokofiev's Symphony No. 3 make excellent orchestral display-pieces; both contain sections of mood-painting and both have their orgiastic conclusions. Prokofiev was always insistent in disclaiming any programmatic content or basis for the Third Symphony, even though its music was largely borrowed from an unproduced opera of his, "The Flaming Angel."

But the lyric and dramatic character of its thematic material endures even in the neoclassic setting. The "mistorioso" Andante, the whilrwind-like Scherzo and the striking instrumental effects in the finale (aided by a good-size percussion battery) may lack an actual program, but their flavor is still anything but absolutist. Except for some disagreement about intonation between winds and strings, the orchestra delivered all Abbado asked, achieving the massive effects of the finale without losing the tonal shape and characteristic Prokofiev crispness.

"DAPHNIS" WAS one of Charles Munch's favorites, and for good reason. He had an excellent ear for its explosive effects and mounting frenzy, and it never failed to win him at least at mini-ovation. In this manner Abbado is everything Munch was, but with considerably greater finesse. The energy was, if anything, even more stringent, contained and released with superb accuracy and with equal dynamic fervor. The New England Conservatory Chorus made a strong contribution in its wordless passages (as had the women earlier in Debussy's "Sirenes," save for tentative entrances).

Claudio Abbado's conducting reveals a rare combination of energy, craftsmanship and devotion, and the demand for such talent is keenly felt in many musical centers — Boston not the least among them.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
JAN 3 1 1970
Ne
Eng
New

Abbado conducts Prokofiev's third

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

Claudio Abbado, in his second week as guest conductor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, began the concert yesterday afternoon with an excellent performance of Prokofiev's Symphony No. 3. The piece, written in 1928 and first played a year later under Monteux, was as good as unknown when Erich Leinsdorf introduced it here four years ago; now, however, several recordings have appeared, performances are no longer quite so infrequent, and the work stands out clearly as one of the finest of the many fine things Prokofiev wrote in the twenties.

It shares material with the opera, "The Flaming Angel," and makes on the whole more effective, because more concentrated, use of it than the fascinating but frustratingly diffuse theater piece. Except for a quiet, and touching Andante, the music of the 3d Symphony is intense, closely packed, anguished, even violent, the Andante and a vividly imagined scherzo in the "rats' feet over broken glass" manner of the finale of Chopin's "Funeral March" Sonata being especially strong movements. This compelling, fastidiously worked, personal symphony got an energetic, often brilliant performance from Abbado and the orchestra, though one less highly characterized than some others in distinguishing the expressive atmospheres of the several movements.

After intermission, Abbado got into a Debussy-Ravel sequence arranged rather evidently less for the sake of putting a convincing concert program together than for the convenience of the Deutsche Grammophon artists and repertory department. It also meant the regrettable disappearance from Abado's programs of Webern's Five Pieces, Op. 10.

What we did get, in any event, was a sensitive performance of Debussy's Nocturnes, with the good singing by the women of the New England Conservatory Chorus rather too "present" for the atmosphere of "Sirenes;" a performances of Ravel's "Pavane" that was fragmented, too slow, and scrappily played; and an efficient one of the 2nd Suite from "Daphnis et Chloes."

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
JAN 3 1 1970
Ne
Engl

Symphony: Abbado conducts Prokofiev, Ravel, Debussy

By Louis Snyder

Claudio Abbado conducted the second of two guest programs with the Boston Symphony on the weekend at Symphony Hall. Beginning Tuesday in Hartford, he will direct a week of tour concerts with the orchestra to include New York and Brooklyn, drawing from his selections of the past two weeks.

On Friday afternoon, Mr. Abbado confirmed and even strengthened the impression he had made at his first local appearance. His positive ideas about the music and his strong technical approach toward bringing them into being were as apparent in the effervescent impressionistic wash of the second (Debussy-Ravel) half of the program as in the turbulent Prokofiev Third Symphony which began it.

Definite concert

He is indeed an active young man on the podium. But, if one watches closely, this is not wasted activity—from somewhere comes the desired response. His beat is all-visible and precise, propelled apparently by a definite concept of what he wants to hear in terms of tonal color and emotional content. More often than not he achieves it for the listener.

Prokofiev's Third Symphony, fashioned in 1928 from themes of his then-unproduced opera, "The Flaming Angel," impresses as a kind of latter-day "Symphonie fantastique," whether or not one cares to concern himself with the mixed-up portagonist, in this case a fanatic angel-fancier named Renata. Better not worry too much about her—the opera, which has been slow of acceptance, allots her a fiendishly difficult soprano part—but concentrate on the expansive thrashing sounds the composer has put into the opening Moderato, or try to ward off the electricity of the Scherzo, or submit to the final somber Andante. The BSO hasn't played it since 1966 — its first performances here—but it is a strong, likable work, which could do with more frequent hearings.

'He is indeed an active young man on the podium. But, if one watches closely, this is not wasted activity — from somewhere comes the desired response.'

NEC Chorus

In "Sirènes" from the Debussy Nocturnes, and the second "Daphnis et Chloé" suite of Ravel, Mr. Abbado and the orchestra had the assistance of the splendidly trained New England Conservatory Chorus, directed by Lorna Cooke de Varon. Here Mr. Abbado further gave evidence of his previous concert and operatic experience in blending vocal and instrumental forces to the requisite degree, to produce a misty to dawnish to general-rejoicing atmosphere.

In the orchestral "Nuages" and "Fêtes," his touch was equally sensitive, as it was in Ravel's "Pavane pour une infante défunte," which was dropped in, sandwich-like, between the longer Debussy and Ravel numbers.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850
FEB 2 1970

Confirming an impression

Claudio Abbado, in his second weekend of Boston Symphony concerts before going on tour, is found to maintain the level of the first.

36.

Abbado guests at the BSO

by Lawrence P. Katzenstein

Guest conductor Claudio Abbado led the Boston Symphony Saturday evening, Jan. 31, in a program of music from the early years of the present century. Three of the works were French and well known, the fourth Russian and a new piece to most listeners.

The new acquaintance, for many, was the third of Serge Prokofiev's seven symphonies, which for various reasons has only in the past few years been recorded and is only now beginning to get programmed with any degree of regularity. Drawn in large part from material composed for the opera The Flaming Angel, the Third is a transitional work. Early Prokofiev tends to be brash, even barbaric—the characteristics most evident in early pieces such as the Scythian Suite or the Second Symphony, or in the Second Piano Concerto of a few years later. Motor rhythms tend to be found more often in the early works too, although the composer never entirely lost his affinity for them, as those familiar with the Seventh Piano Sonata well know.

The Third Symphony was clearly a step forward in style from these early works, with barbarity and motor rhythms mostly confined to the Scherzo. To be sure, it is less refined than a piece like the Fifth Piano Concerto, and like the Second Symphony, it is too heavily scored—yet the work has a magic of its own. The long flute and piccolo solos of the first movement coda and most of the Andante are not soon forgotten. In short, a piece worth knowing.

The BS sounded better than usual, with the strings particularly taking on a sheen not often heard earlier this year. New Yorker magazine critic Winthrop Sargeant never tires of pointing out that the same orchestra sounds very different under different conductors, and Saturday's concert was an example of exactly that, with the emphasis this time on strings rather than winds. Balance, as a whole, seemed more satisfactory than usual. Abbado's tempos were judicious, his approach straight-forward, and everything came off magnificently.

The rest of the program was less interesting. Debussy's

BOSTON AFTER DARK
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 7,500

FEB 11 1970

New Bedford 2-15
Dias - Standard Times

A Note on Conductor Claudio Abbado

The current Boston Symphony season has not been the most exciting within my memory, but it has afforded audiences the opportunity to sample the musical wares of a number of guest conductors.

Last Tuesday night, Italian-born Claudio Abbado, who is 37, took the podium at Symphony Hall and proved immediately that he is not in need of Geritol. Dark-haired, slim, and with the type of proud, sensitive face that one sees in Renaissance portraits of young men about town, he is a bundle of energy and of intensity — energy and intensity that he seems to communicate to the audience. His wide, sweeping gestures, reminiscent of the conducting style of Leonard Bernstein, his ability to make the orchestra respond to his enthusiasm, earned him an ovation for his conducting of works by Prokofieff, Debussy, and Ravel.

Although he is a flamboyant conductor, he is also obviously a sound musician with his own personal ideas about how a piece should sound. In fact, his musical credentials are excellent: He is at present a permanent conductor at La Scala in Milan; he has made numerous recordings with the London Symphony; he has led such famous ensembles as the Metropolitan Opera, the Covent Garden Opera, the Berlin Philharmonic, the Vienna Philharmonic, the Los Angeles Philharmonic, the Philadelphia Orchestra, and the Cleveland Orchestra. Moreover, he won the Koussevitsky Award for conducting at Tanglewood in 1958 and in 1963 first prize in the Dimitri Mitropoulos Competition.

One cannot assess a conductor's real talent from hearing him at only one concert. Nevertheless, I was much impressed by Abbado, and I hope that the Boston Symphony will utilize his abilities again. I should certainly like to hear his readings of some of the classical symphonic repertoire. What conductors do with Beethoven, Mozart, Brahms, Mahler, and the like is the acid test; it is what separates the men from the boys.

Upcoming concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall:

February 10, young Italian guest conductor Claudio Abbado in a program of Debussy, Two Nocturnes; Ravel, Daphnis et Chloe, Suite no. 2; and Prokofiev, Symphony no. 3.

February 13, 14, 17 and 19, Colin Davis directs two works by Mozart, Overture to Idomeneo and the Piano Concerto in D (Coronation) with soloist Ingrid Haebler; and Elgar's Symphony no. 1 in A flat.

February 20 and 21, Davis conducting, Stravinsky's Scherzo a la russe, Symphony no. 2 by Tippett (a U.S. premiere), and Symphony no. 4 in F minor by Tchaikovsky.

March 3, a concert in memory of Karl Muck conducted by William Steinberg with tenor Philip Cho and the Framingham Choral Society: Wagner's Prelude to Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg and Liszt's Faust Symphony.

March 6, 7, 10 and 12, Steinberg directing with pianist Theodore Lettvin: Symphony no. 4 in A (Italian) by Mendelssohn, Reger's Variations and Fugue on a Theme by Mozart, Strauss' Burleske, and L'Apprenti Sorcier by Dukas.

March 13, 14 and 17, Steinberg conducts a pair of symphonies, Mozart's Symphony no. 34 in C and Mahler's Symphony no. 4 in G, with soprano Judith Blegen.

The next open rehearsal will be on February 12, Colin Davis conducting. The program is usually that of the following Friday. Concert times: 8:30 p.m., except Fridays at 2.00 p.m., open rehearsals at 7.30 p.m. All programs are subject to change. For ticket information telephone the box office: 266-1492.

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players, composed of principals of the orchestra, enliven the musical scene with a program on February 15 to include: Debussy (Cello Sonata; Sonata for flute, viola, and harp; and Violin Sonata); Lerdhal's Wake for string trio, percussion, harp and voice with soprano Bethany Beardslee, Michael Tilson Thomas conducting; and Stockhausen's Kontakte for electronic tape, piano, and percussion with the Joshua Light Show. 3:00 p.m. at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge. Tickets available at the Symphony Hall box office or at the door: $1.50-$3.50. 266-1492.

BOSTON MAGAZINE
BOSTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 12,000

FEB 1970

Ingrid Haebler, pianist, who appears with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a performance of Mozart's "Coronation" concerto. Colin Davis will conduct.

Herald Traveler 2/8/70

Davis to lead B.S.O.

Colin Davis returns to the Boston Symphony as guest conductor of two programs. The first will be heard on Friday at 2 and Saturday at 8:30, with an open rehearsal on Thursday at 7:30, and will consist of Mozart's "Idomeneo" Overture and the Piano Concerto, K. 537, and Elgar's Symphony No. 1. Ingrid Haebler will be the piano soloist. Additional performances of this program will be given Feb. 17 and 18 at 8:30.

Davis' second program will come Feb. 20-21. The concerts will begin with Stravinsky's Scherzo a la ruse and continue with the American premiere of Michael Tippett's Symphony No. 2. The Tchaikovsky Symphony No. 4 concludes the program.

Davis, presently the conductor of London's BBC Symphony Orchestra, is music director designate of the Royal Opera at Covent Garden.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

FEB 8 1970

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300

FEB 10 1970

BBC's Conductor to Lead Boston Symphony

Colin Davis, conductor of London's BBC Symphony Orchestra, continues as the Boston Symphony Orchestra's guest conductor for the Friday-Saturday concerts of Feb. 20 and 21.

The principal work is Sir Michael Tippett's "Second Symphony."

BBC's Conductor Will Lead BSO

Colin Davis, conductor of London's BBC Symphony Orchestra, continues as the Boston Symphony Orchestra's guest conductor for the Friday-Saturday concerts of Feb. 20 and 21.

The program's principal work is the American premiere of Sir Michael Tippett's "Second Symphony."

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

FEB 9 1970

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

FEB 11 1970

COLIN DAVIS, English conductor, conducts the Boston Symphony with Ingrid Haebler as soloist on Friday afternoon and Saturday night. The program may be heard in rehearsal on Thursday night at 7:30 in Symphony Hall.

EIGHTY-N

Tuesday Evening February 10 at 7.30

CLAUDIO ABBADO conductor

PROKOFIEV — Symphony no. 3 op. 44*
- Moderato
- Andante
- Allegro agitato
- Andante mosso

intermission

DEBUSSY — Nocturnes
- Nuages (Clouds)*
- Fêtes (Festival)*
- Sirènes (Sirens)

RAVEL — Daphnis et Chloé – suite no. 2*
- Lever du jour (Daybreak)
- Pantomime (Mime)
- Danse générale (General dance)

NEW ENGLAND CONSERVATORY CHORUS
Lorna Cooke de Varon conductor

Earl J. Dias Review

Boston Guest Conductoment

Guest conductor Claudio Abbado, 37, generated considerable excitement last night, in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Tuesday "B" series, with a program that included Prokofieff's "Symphony No. 3, Opus 44," Debussy's "Nocturnes," and Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe, Suite No. 2."

With his long hair and dark eyes, and air of concentrated energy, Abbado looks like one of those Renaissance portraits of a young Italian nobleman. He is a dynamic conductor, given to sweeping gestures, much in the manner of Leonard Bernstein. But his flamboyance is coupled with intelligent musicianship. Conducting without a score, he managed to keep the orchestra unusually responsive and in top form.

The Prokofieff is, of course, a splendid show piece. It has the occasionally astringent quality characteristic of the composer, the bold harmonic clashes, an original rhythmic style and spirit. The opening Moderato has fireworks aplenty, the Andante has interesting melodies and brilliant orchestration, and the last movement achieves some glorious sound. It is, to be sure, a noisy work — but not unpleasant. Abbado received an ovation from the audience for the zest and skill with which he conducted the piece.

Debussy's three Nocturnes — "Clouds," "Festival," and "Sirens," are typically impression- uty-undulant, spa- y.

Abbado's reading ve one. So was Ravel, which has ents, "Daybreak" nd lovely; "Panto- moments of great he lively "General Conservatory Cho- in this work also, as first-rate flute riot Anthony Dw- ogram of the ser- rformed on April am Steinberg on

IDARD-TIMES
BEDFORD, MASS.
0,000 (S) 60,000

FEB 11 1970

Boston Symphony TV Concert Feb. 10

Guest conductor Claudio Abbado directs the Boston Symphony Orchestra and New England Conservatory Chorus in a live colorcast Tuesday, Feb. 10. Concert time is 7:30 p.m.—one hour earlier than usual.

WGBH Radio (89.7 FM) will carry the concert simultaneously in FM stereo, direct from Symphony Hall.

Program includes Symphony No. 3, Op. 44 by Prokofiev: Three Nocturnes by Debussy and the Daphnis and Chloe Suite No. 3 by Ravel. The New England Conservatory Chorus, Lorna Cooke deVaron, conductor, will join the orchestra in the Debussy and Ravel works.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

JAN 29 1970

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Friday afternoon February 13 1970 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening February 14 1970 at 8.30
Tuesday evening February 17 1970 at 8.30
Thursday evening February 19 1970 at 8.30

COLIN DAVIS conductor

MOZART — Overture to 'Idomeneo, Re di Creta' K. 366

MOZART — Piano concerto in D K. 537 'Coronation'
- Allegro
- Larghetto
- Allegretto

INGRID HAEBLER

intermission

ELGAR — Symphony no. 1 in A flat op. 55
- Andante: nobilmente e semplice – allegro
- Allegro molto
- Adagio
- Lento – allegro

THE GUEST CONDUCTOR

COLIN DAVIS was 40 years old when he became Conductor of the BBC Symphony Orchestra in September 1967. Born in Weybridge, Surrey, he studied at the Royal College of Music in London, then joined the profession as a clarinetist. After service with the Household Cavalry he started to conduct, first the Kalmar Orchestra, then the Chelsea Opera Group. Opera performances and guest appearances with English orchestras brought him to the attention of the musical world.

He had been Assistant Conductor of the BBC Scottish Orchestra for two years when he was called to the Royal Festival Hall in 1959 to deputise for Otto Klemperer in a concert performance of Don Giovanni. This marked a turning point in his career: he was appointed Musical Director of the Sadler's Wells Opera Company the following year, conducted Die Zauberflöte at Glyndebourne in place of the ailing Sir Thomas Beecham, and began conducting the major London orchestras regularly, as well as opera at Sadler's Wells, and both ballet and opera at Covent Garden.

He conducted in Canada, the United States and in Russia, directed the first German performance of Britten's War Requiem with the Berlin Philharmonic, and shared the podium with Solti and Kertesz on the 1964 world tour of the London Symphony Orchestra.

Colin Davis is now a regular visitor to America. He has conducted the orchestras of Philadelphia, Montreal, Toronto, Los Angeles and New York, as well as at the Metropolitan Opera, where he has led performances of Peter Grimes and Wozzeck. He becomes Musical Director of the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, in the autumn of 1971, succeeding Georg Solti. He records for the Philips label. Colin Davis appears with the Boston Symphony for the third successive season.

THE SOLOIST

INGRID HAEBLER, who makes her first appearance with the Boston Symphony at these concerts, was born in Vienna and grew up in Lodz, Poland, and in Salzburg, where she attended the Mozarteum. Later she continued her studies at the Staatsakademie in Vienna, then with Nikita Magaloff in Geneva and with Marguerite Long in Paris. In 1954 she won first prizes in the Geneva Schubert competition and an international competition in Munich. Since that year she has appeared annually at the Salzburg Festival. She has made tours each year of western Europe, appearing in recital and with many orchestras, and has traveled in Poland, Czechoslovakia, the Soviet Union, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa and Japan. She made her American debut in 1959. Ingrid Haebler records for the Philips and Mercury labels. She has made recordings of all the piano concertos of Mozart with various orchestras, conducted by Witold Rowicki, Alceo Galliera and Colin Davis; of Mozart's seventeen Piano sonatas; and of works by Haydn, Schumann and Chopin. She is now recording a complete edition of Schubert's music for solo piano.

36.

Abbado guests at the BSO

by Lawrence P. Katzenstein

Guest conductor Claudio Abbado led the Boston Symphony Saturday evening, Jan. 31, in a program of music from the early years of the present century. Three of the works were French and well known, the fourth Russian and a new piece to most listeners.

The new acquaintance, for many, was the third of Serge Prokofiev's seven symphonies, which for various reasons has only in the past few years been recorded and is only now beginning to get programmed with any degree of regularity. Drawn in large part from material composed for the opera The Flaming Angel, the Third is a transitional work. Early Prokofiev tends to be brash, even barbaric—the characteristics most evident in early pieces such as the Scythian Suite or the Second Symphony, or in the Second Piano Concerto of a few years later. Motor rhythms tend to be found more often in the early works too, although the composer never entirely lost his affinity for them, as those familiar with the Seventh Piano Sonata well know.

The Third Symphony was clearly a step forward in style from these early works, with barbarity and motor rhythms mostly confined to the Scherzo. To be sure, it is less refined than a piece like the Fifth Piano Concerto, and like the Second Symphony, it is too heavily scored—yet the work has a magic of its own. The long flute and piccolo solos of the first movement coda and most of the Andante are not soon forgotten. In short, a piece worth knowing.

The BS sounded better than usual, with the strings particularly taking on a sheen not often heard earlier this year. New Yorker magazine critic Winthrop Sargeant never tires of pointing out that the same orchestra sounds very different under different conductors, and Saturday's concert was an example of exactly that, with the emphasis this time on strings rather than winds. Balance, as a whole, seemed more satisfactory than usual. Abbado's tempos were judicious, his approach straight-forward, and everything came off magnificently.

The rest of the program was less interesting. Debussy's

New Bedford 2-15
Dias - Standard Times

A Note on Conductor Claudio Abbado

The current Boston Symphony season has not been the most exciting within my memory, but it has afforded audiences the opportunity to sample the musical wares of a number of guest conductors.

Last Tuesday night, Italian-born Claudio Abbado, who is 37, took the podium at Symphony Hall and proved immediately that he is not in need of Geritol. Dark-haired, slim, and with the type of proud, sensitive face that one sees in Renaissance portraits of young men about town, he is a bundle of energy and of intensity — energy and intensity that he seems to communicate to the audience. His wide, sweeping gestures, reminiscent of the conducting style of Leonard Bernstein, his ability to make the orchestra respond to his enthusiasm, earned him an ovation for his conducting of works by Prokofieff, Debussy, and Ravel.

Although he is a flamboyant conductor, he is also obviously a sound musician with his own personal ideas about how a piece should sound. In fact, his musical credentials are excellent: He is at present a permanent conductor at La Scala in Milan; he has made numerous recordings with the London Symphony; he has led such famous ensembles as the Metropolitan Opera, the Covent Garden Opera, the Berlin Philharmonic, the Vienna Philharmonic, the Los Angeles Philharmonic, the Philadelphia Orchestra, and the Cleveland Orchestra. Moreover, he won the Koussevitsky Award for conducting at Tanglewood in 1958 and in 1963 first prize in the Dimitri Mitropoulos Competition.

One cannot assess a conductor's real talent from hearing him at only one concert. Nevertheless, I was much impressed by Abbado, and I hope that the Boston Symphony will utilize his abilities again. I should certainly like to hear his readings of some of the classical symphonic repertoire. What conductors do with Beethoven, Mozart, Brahms, Mahler, and the like is the acid test; it is what separates the men from the boys.

BOSTON AFTER DARK
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 7,500

FEB 11 1970

Upcoming concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall:

February 10, young Italian guest conductor Claudio Abbado in a program of Debussy, Two Nocturnes; Ravel, Daphnis et Chloe, Suite no. 2; and Prokofiev, Symphony no. 3.

February 13, 14, 17 and 19, Colin Davis directs two works by Mozart, Overture to Idomeneo and the Piano Concerto in D (Coronation) with soloist Ingrid Haebler; and Elgar's Symphony no. 1 in A flat.

February 20 and 21, Davis conducting, Stravinsky's Scherzo a la russe, Symphony no. 2 by Tippett (a U.S. premiere), and Symphony no. 4 in F minor by Tchaikovsky.

March 3, a concert in memory of Karl Muck conducted by William Steinberg with tenor Philip Cho and the Framingham Choral Society: Wagner's Prelude to Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg and Liszt's Faust Symphony.

March 6, 7, 10 and 12, Steinberg directing with pianist Theodore Lettvin: Symphony no. 4 in A (Italian) by Mendelssohn, Reger's Variations and Fugue on a Theme by Mozart, Strauss' Burleske, and L'Apprenti Sorcier by Dukas.

March 13, 14 and 17, Steinberg conducts a pair of symphonies, Mozart's Symphony no. 34 in C and Mahler's Symphony no. 4 in G, with soprano Judith Blegen.

The next open rehearsal will be on February 12, Colin Davis conducting. The program is usually that of the following Friday. Concert times: 8:30 p.m., except Fridays at 2.00 p.m., open rehearsals at 7.30 p.m. All programs are subject to change. For ticket information telephone the box office: 266-1492.

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players, composed of principals of the orchestra, enliven the musical scene with a program on February 15 to include: Debussy (Cello Sonata; Sonata for flute, viola, and harp; and Violin Sonata); Lerdhal's Wake for string trio, percussion, harp and voice with soprano Bethany Beardslee, Michael Tilson Thomas conducting; and Stockhausen's Kontakte for electronic tape, piano, and percussion with the Joshua Light Show. 3:00 p.m. at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge. Tickets available at the Symphony Hall box office or at the door: $1.50-$3.50. 266-1492.

BOSTON MAGAZINE
BOSTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 22,000

Ingrid Haebler, pianist, who appears with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a performance of Mozart's "Coronation" concerto. Colin Davis will conduct.

Herald Traveler 2/8/70

Davis to lead B.S.O.

Colin Davis returns to the Boston Symphony as guest conductor of two programs. The first will be heard on Friday at 2 and Saturday at 8:30, with an open rehearsal on Thursday at 7:30, and will consist of Mozart's "Idomeneo" Overture and the Piano Concerto, K. 537, and Elgar's Symphony No. 1. Ingrid Haebler will be the piano soloist. Additional performances of this program will be given Feb. 17 and 18 at 8:30.

Davis' second program will come Feb. 20-21. The concerts will begin with Stravinsky's Scherzo a la ruse and continue with the American premiere of Michael Tippett's Symphony No. 2. The Tchaikovsky Symphony No. 4 concludes the program.

Davis, presently the conductor of London's BBC Symphony Orchestra, is music director designate of the Royal Opera at Covent Garden.

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300

FEB 10 1970

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 766,377

FEB 8 1970

BBC's Conductor to Lead Boston Symphony

Colin Davis, conductor of London's BBC Symphony Orchestra, continues as the Boston Symphony Orchestra's guest conductor for the Friday-Saturday concerts of Feb. 20 and 21.

The principal work is Sir Michael Tippett's "Second Symphony."

BBC's Conductor Will Lead BSO

Colin Davis, conductor of London's BBC Symphony Orchestra, continues as the Boston Symphony Orchestra's guest conductor for the Friday-Saturday concerts of Feb. 20 and 21.

The program's principal work is the American premiere of Sir Michael Tippett's "Second Symphony."

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

FEB 9 1970

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

FEB 11 1970

COLIN DAVIS, English conductor, conducts the Boston Symphony with Ingrid Haebler as soloist on Friday afternoon and Saturday night. The program may be heard in rehearsal on Thursday night at 7:30 in Symphony Hall.

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Friday afternoon February 13 1970 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening February 14 1970 at 8.30
Tuesday evening February 17 1970 at 8.30
Thursday evening February 19 1970 at 8.30

COLIN DAVIS conductor

MOZART	Overture to 'Idomeneo, Re di Creta'	K. 366
MOZART	Piano concerto in D	K. 537 'Coronation'
	Allegro
	Larghetto
	Allegretto
	INGRID HAEBLER

intermission

ELGAR	Symphony no. 1 in A flat	op. 55
	Andante: nobilmente e semplice – allegro
	Allegro molto
	Adagio
	Lento – allegro

THE GUEST CONDUCTOR

COLIN DAVIS was 40 years old when he became Conductor of the BBC Symphony Orchestra in September 1967. Born in Weybridge, Surrey, he studied at the Royal College of Music in London, then joined the profession as a clarinetist. After service with the Household Cavalry he started to conduct, first the Kalmar Orchestra, then the Chelsea Opera Group. Opera performances and guest appearances with English orchestras brought him to the attention of the musical world.

He had been Assistant Conductor of the BBC Scottish Orchestra for two years when he was called to the Royal Festival Hall in 1959 to deputise for Otto Klemperer in a concert performance of Don Giovanni. This marked a turning point in his career: he was appointed Musical Director of the Sadler's Wells Opera Company the following year, conducted Die Zauberflöte at Glyndebourne in place of the ailing Sir Thomas Beecham, and began conducting the major London orchestras regularly, as well as opera at Sadler's Wells, and both ballet and opera at Covent Garden.

He conducted in Canada, the United States and in Russia, directed the first German performance of Britten's War Requiem with the Berlin Philharmonic, and shared the podium with Solti and Kertesz on the 1964 world tour of the London Symphony Orchestra.

Colin Davis is now a regular visitor to America. He has conducted the orchestras of Philadelphia, Montreal, Toronto, Los Angeles and New York, as well as at the Metropolitan Opera, where he has led performances of Peter Grimes and Wozzeck. He becomes Musical Director of the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, in the autumn of 1971, succeeding Georg Solti. He records for the Philips label. Colin Davis appears with the Boston Symphony for the third successive season.

THE SOLOIST

INGRID HAEBLER, who makes her first appearance with the Boston Symphony at these concerts, was born in Vienna and grew up in Lodz, Poland, and in Salzburg, where she attended the Mozarteum. Later she continued her studies at the Staatsakademie in Vienna, then with Nikita Magaloff in Geneva and with Marguerite Long in Paris. In 1954 she won first prizes in the Geneva Schubert competition and an international competition in Munich. Since that year she has appeared annually at the Salzburg Festival. She has made tours each year of western Europe, appearing in recital and with many orchestras, and has traveled in Poland, Czechoslovakia, the Soviet Union, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa and Japan. She made her American debut in 1959. Ingrid Haebler records for the Philips and Mercury labels. She has made recordings of all the piano concertos of Mozart with various orchestras, conducted by Witold Rowicki, Alceo Galliera and Colin Davis; of Mozart's seventeen Piano sonatas; and of works by Haydn, Schumann and Chopin. She is now recording a complete edition of Schubert's music for solo piano.

EIGHTY-N

Tuesday Evening February 10 at 7.30

CLAUDIO ABBADO conductor

PROKOFIEV	Symphony no. 3	op. 44*
	Moderato
	Andante
	Allegro agitato
	Andante mosso

intermission

DEBUSSY	Nocturnes
	Nuages (Clouds)*
	Fêtes (Festival)*
	Sirènes (Sirens)

RAVEL	Daphnis et Chloé – suite no. 2*
	Lever du jour (Daybreak)
	Pantomime (Mime)
	Danse générale (General dance)

NEW ENGLAND CONSERVATORY CHORUS
Lorna Cooke de Varon conductor

Earl J. Dias Review

FEB 1970

Boston Guest Conductoment

Guest conductor Claudio Abbado, 37, generated considerable excitement last night, in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Tuesday "B" series, with a program that included Prokofieff's "Symphony No. 3, Opus 44," Debussy's "Nocturnes," and Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe, Suite No. 2."

With his long hair and dark eyes, and air of concentrated energy, Abbado looks like one of those Renaissance portraits of a young Italian nobleman. He is a dynamic conductor, given to sweeping gestures, much in the manner of Leonard Bernstein. But his flamboyance is coupled with intelligent musicianship. Conducting without a score, he managed to keep the orchestra unusually responsive and in top form.

The Prokofieff is, of course, a splendid show piece. It has the occasionally astringent quality characteristic of the composer, the bold harmonic clashes, an original rhythmic style and spirit. The opening Moderato has fireworks aplenty, the Andante has interesting melodies and brilliant orchestration, and the last movement achieves some glorious sound. It is, to be sure, a noisy work — but not unpleasant. Abbado received an ovation from the audience for the zest and skill with which he conducted the piece.

Debussy's three Nocturnes — "Clouds," "Festival," and "Sirens," are typically impression-not

, not on to color.
ges as ystery aying
, but the omen gland ffered blems his et th the vatory isitely
, and an it e last y is to have e last illiant luting ecially only as the t had is low

uty-undulant, spay.

Abbado's reading
ve one. So was Ravel, which has ents, "Daybreak"
nd lovely; "Panto-
moments of great
he lively "General
Conservatory Cho-
in this work also,
as first-rate flute
priot Anthony Dw-

ogram of the ser-
rformed on April am Steinberg on

NDARD-TIMES
BEDFORD, MASS.
0,000 (S) 60,000

FEB 11 1970

Boston Symphony TV Concert Feb. 10

Guest conductor Claudio Abbado directs the Boston Symphony Orchestra and New England Conservatory Chorus in a live colorcast Tuesday, Feb. 10. Concert time is 7:30 p.m.—one hour earlier than usual.

WGBH Radio (89-7 FM) will carry the concert simultaneously in FM stereo, direct from Symphony Hall.

Program includes Symphony No. 3, Op. 44 by Prokofiev: Three Nocturnes by Debussy and the Daphnis and Chloe Suite No. 3 by Ravel. The New England Conservatory Chorus, Lorna Cooke deVaron, conductor, will join the orchestra in the Debussy and Ravel works.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

JAN 29 1970

36.

Abbado guests at the BSO

by Lawrence P. Katzenstein

Guest conductor Claudio Abbado led the Boston Symphony Saturday evening, Jan. 31, in a program of music from the early years of the present century. Three of the works were French and well known, the fourth Russian and a new piece to most listeners.

The new acquaintance, for many, was the third of Serge Prokofiev's seven symphonies, which for various reasons has only in the past few years been recorded and is only now beginning to get programmed with any degree of regularity. Drawn in large part from material composed for the opera The Flaming Angel, the Third is a transitional work. Early Prokofiev tends to be brash, even barbaric—the characteristics most evident in early pieces such as the Scythian Suite or the Second Symphony, or in the Second Piano Concerto of a few years later. Motor rhythms tend to be found more often in the early works too, although the composer never entirely lost his affinity for them, as those familiar with the Seventh Piano Sonata well know.

The Third Symphony was clearly a step forward in style from these early works, with barbarity and motor rhythms mostly confined to the Scherzo. To be sure, it is less refined than a piece like the Fifth Piano Concerto, and like the Second Symphony, it is too heavily scored—yet the work has a magic of its own. The long flute and piccolo solos of the first movement coda and most of the Andante are not soon forgotten. In short, a piece worth knowing.

The BS sounded better than usual, with the strings particularly taking on a sheen not often heard earlier this year. New Yorker magazine critic Winthrop Sargeant never tires of pointing out that the same orchestra sounds very different under different conductors, and Saturday's concert was an example of exactly that, with the emphasis this time on strings rather than winds. Balance, as a whole, seemed more satisfactory than usual. Abbado's tempos were judicious, his approach straight-forward, and everything came off magnificently.

The rest of the program was less interesting. Debussy's wonderful Nocturnes had not enough mystery about them, not enough shading or attention to Debussy's discrete use of color. There were a few ragged edges as well. "Fetes" has less mystery than "Nuages" so its playing seemed more in character, but "Sirènes," in which the orchestra was joined by women from the New England Conservatory Chorus, suffered from most of the same problems as "Nuages."

Ravel's second Daphnis et Chloé" suite (this time with the full New England Conservatory Chorus) is an exquisitely colored, virtuoso score, and harder to conduct than it sounds—particularly the last section, where the tendency is to climax too soon and so have nothing in reserve for the last bars. The BSO gave it a brilliant performance. The solo fluting and trumpeting were especially praiseworthy. In fact, the only flaw—a very minor one—was the fact that the bass flutist had some trouble sounding his low G.

New Bedford 2-15
Dias - Standard Times

Model 75CN
cu. ft. AUTOMATIC DE FRIGERATOR-FR
• Large zero degree
• Large crisper
RE AT $319.95
NOW
SAVE
CARLA THAWAY R

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Tuesday Evening February 10 at 7.30

CLAUDIO ABBADO conductor

PROKOFIEV — Symphony no. 3 op. 44*
Moderato
Andante
Allegro agitato
Andante mosso

intermission

DEBUSSY — Nocturnes
Nuages (Clouds)*
Fêtes (Festival)*
Sirènes (Sirens)

RAVEL — Daphnis et Chloé – suite no. 2*
Lever du jour (Daybreak)
Pantomime (Mime)
Danse générale (General dance)

NEW ENGLAND CONSERVATORY CHORUS
Lorna Cooke de Varon conductor

BOSTON AFTER DARK
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 7,500

FEB 11 1970

Upcoming concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall:

February 10, young Italian guest conductor Claudio Abbado in a program of Debussy, Two Nocturnes; Ravel, Daphnis et Chloe, Suite no. 2; and Prokofiev, Symphony no. 3.

February 13, 14, 17 and 19, Colin Davis directs two works by Mozart, Overture to Idomeneo and the Piano Concerto in D (Coronation) with soloist Ingrid Haebler; and Elgar's Symphony no. 1 in A flat.

February 20 and 21, Davis conducting, Stravinsky's Scherzo a la russe, Symphony no. 2 by Tippett (a U.S. premiere), and Symphony no. 4 in F minor by Tchaikovsky.

March 3, a concert in memory of Karl Muck conducted by William Steinberg with tenor Philip Cho and the Framingham Choral Society: Wagner's Prelude to Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg and Liszt's Faust Symphony.

March 6, 7, 10 and 12, Steinberg directing with pianist Theodore Lettvin: Symphony no. 4 in A (Italian) by Mendelssohn, Reger's Variations and Fugue on a Theme by Mozart, Strauss' Burleske, and L'Apprenti Sorcier by Dukas.

March 13, 14 and 17, Steinberg conducts a pair of symphonies, Mozart's Symphony no. 34 in C and Mahler's Symphony no. 4 in G, with soprano Judith Blegen.

The next open rehearsal will be on February 12, Colin Davis conducting. The program is usually that of the following Friday. Concert times: 8:30 p.m., except Fridays at 2.00 p.m., open rehearsals at 7.30 p.m. All programs are subject to change. For ticket information telephone the box office: 266-1492.

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players, composed of principals of the orchestra, enliven the musical scene with a program on February 15 to include: Debussy (Cello Sonata; Sonata for flute, viola, and harp; and Violin Sonata); Lerdhal's Wake for string trio, percussion, harp and voice with soprano Bethany Beardslee, Michael Tilson Thomas conducting; and Stockhausen's Kontakte for electronic tape, piano, and percussion with the Joshua Light Show. 3:00 p.m. at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge. Tickets available at the Symphony Hall box office or at the door: $1.50-$3.50. 266-1492.

BOSTON MAGAZINE
BOSTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 12,000

Ingrid Haebler, pianist, who appears with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a performance of Mozart's "Coronation" concerto. Colin Davis will conduct.

Herald Traveler 2/8/70

Davis to lead B.S.O.

Colin Davis returns to the Boston Symphony as guest conductor of two programs. The first will be heard on Friday at 2 and Saturday at 8:30, with an open rehearsal on Thursday at 7:30, and will consist of Mozart's "Idomeneo" Overture and the Piano Concerto, K. 537, and Elgar's Symphony No. 1. Ingrid Haebler will be the piano soloist. Additional performances of this program will be given Feb. 17 and 18 at 8:30.

Davis' second program will come Feb. 20-21. The concerts will begin with Stravinsky's Scherzo a la ruse and continue with the American premiere of Michael Tippett's Symphony No. 2. The Tchaikovsky Symphony No. 4 concludes the program.

Davis, presently the conductor of London's BBC Symphony Orchestra, is music director designate of the Royal Opera at Covent Garden.

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300

FEB 10 1970

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

FEB 8 1970

BBC's Conductor to Lead Boston Symphony

Colin Davis, conductor of London's BBC Symphony Orchestra, continues as the Boston Symphony Orchestra's guest conductor for the Friday-Saturday concerts of Feb. 20 and 21.

The principal work is Sir Michael Tippett's "Second Symphony."

BBC's Conductor Will Lead BSO

Colin Davis, conductor of London's BBC Symphony Orchestra, continues as the Boston Symphony Orchestra's guest conductor for the Friday-Saturday concerts of Feb. 20 and 21.

The program's principal work is the American premiere of Sir Michael Tippett's "Second Symphony."

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

FEB 9 1970

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

FEB 11 1970

COLIN DAVIS, English conductor, conducts the Boston Symphony with Ingrid Haebler as soloist on Friday afternoon and Saturday night. The program may be heard in rehearsal on Thursday night at 7:30 in Symphony Hall.

Earl J. Dias Review FEB 1970

Boston Guest Conductoment

Guest conductor Claudio Abbado, 37, generated considerable excitement last night, in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Tuesday "B" series, with a program that included Prokofieff's "Symphony No. 3, Opus 44," Debussy's "Nocturnes," and Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe, Suite No. 2."

With his long hair and dark eyes, and air of concentrated energy, Abbado looks like one of those Renaissance portraits of a young Italian nobleman. He is a dynamic conductor, given to sweeping gestures, much in the manner of Leonard Bernstein. But his flamboyance is coupled with intelligent musicianship. Conducting without a score, he managed to keep the orchestra unusually responsive and in top form.

The Prokofieff is, of course, a splendid show piece. It has the occasionally astringent quality characteristic of the composer, the bold harmonic clashes, an original rhythmic style and spirit. The opening Moderato has fireworks aplenty, the Andante has interesting melodies and brilliant orchestration, and the last movement achieves some glorious sound. It is, to be sure, a noisy work — but not unpleasant. Abbado received an ovation from the audience for the zest and skill with which he conducted the piece.

Debussy's three Nocturnes — "Clouds," "Festival," and "Sirens," are typically impressionuty-undulant, spay.

Abbado's reading
ve one. So was Ravel, which has
ents, "Daybreak"
nd lovely; "Panto-
moments of great
he lively "General
Conservatory Cho-
in this work also,
as first-rate flute
riot Anthony Dw-

ogram of the ser-erformed on April
am Steinberg on

NDARD-TIMES
BEDFORD, MASS.
0,000 (S) 60,000

Boston Symphony TV Concert Feb. 10

Guest conductor Claudio Abbado directs the Boston Symphony Orchestra and New England Conservatory Chorus in a live colorcast Tuesday, Feb. 10. Concert time is 7:30 p.m.—one hour earlier than usual.

WGBH Radio (89.7 FM) will carry the concert simultaneously in FM stereo, direct from Symphony Hall.

Program includes Symphony No. 3, Op. 44 by Prokofiev: Three Nocturnes by Debussy and the Daphnis and Chloe Suite No. 3 by Ravel. The New England Conservatory Chorus, Lorna Cooke deVaron, conductor, will join the orchestra in the Debussy and Ravel works.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

JAN 29 1970

FEB 11 1970

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Friday afternoon February 13 1970 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening February 14 1970 at 8.30
Tuesday evening February 17 1970 at 8.30
Thursday evening February 19 1970 at 8.30

COLIN DAVIS conductor

MOZART — Overture to 'Idomeneo, Re di Creta' K. 366

MOZART — Piano concerto in D K. 537 'Coronation'
Allegro
Larghetto
Allegretto
INGRID HAEBLER

intermission

ELGAR — Symphony no. 1 in A flat op. 55
Andante: nobilmente e semplice – allegro
Allegro molto
Adagio
Lento – allegro

THE GUEST CONDUCTOR

COLIN DAVIS was 40 years old when he became Conductor of the BBC Symphony Orchestra in September 1967. Born in Weybridge, Surrey, he studied at the Royal College of Music in London, then joined the profession as a clarinetist. After service with the Household Cavalry he started to conduct, first the Kalmar Orchestra, then the Chelsea Opera Group. Opera performances and guest appearances with English orchestras brought him to the attention of the musical world.

He had been Assistant Conductor of the BBC Scottish Orchestra for two years when he was called to the Royal Festival Hall in 1959 to deputise for Otto Klemperer in a concert performance of Don Giovanni. This marked a turning point in his career: he was appointed Musical Director of the Sadler's Wells Opera Company the following year, conducted Die Zauberflöte at Glyndebourne in place of the ailing Sir Thomas Beecham, and began conducting the major London orchestras regularly, as well as opera at Sadler's Wells, and both ballet and opera at Covent Garden.

He conducted in Canada, the United States and in Russia, directed the first German performance of Britten's War Requiem with the Berlin Philharmonic, and shared the podium with Solti and Kertesz on the 1964 world tour of the London Symphony Orchestra.

Colin Davis is now a regular visitor to America. He has conducted the orchestras of Philadelphia, Montreal, Toronto, Los Angeles and New York, as well as at the Metropolitan Opera, where he has led performances of Peter Grimes and Wozzeck. He becomes Musical Director of the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, in the autumn of 1971, succeeding Georg Solti. He records for the Philips label. Colin Davis appears with the Boston Symphony for the third successive season.

THE SOLOIST

INGRID HAEBLER, who makes her first appearance with the Boston Symphony at these concerts, was born in Vienna and grew up in Lodz, Poland, and in Salzburg, where she attended the Mozarteum. Later she continued her studies at the Staatsakademie in Vienna, then with Nikita Magaloff in Geneva and with Marguerite Long in Paris. In 1954 she won first prizes in the Geneva Schubert competition and an international competition in Munich. Since that year she has appeared annually at the Salzburg Festival. She has made tours each year of western Europe, appearing in recital and with many orchestras, and has traveled in Poland, Czechoslovakia, the Soviet Union, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa and Japan. She made her American debut in 1959. Ingrid Haebler records for the Philips and Mercury labels. She has made recordings of all the piano concertos of Mozart with various orchestras, conducted by Witold Rowicki, Alceo Galliera and Colin Davis; of Mozart's seventeen Piano sonatas; and of works by Haydn, Schumann and Chopin. She is now recording a complete edition of Schubert's music for solo piano.

Symphony Leads Applause for Colin Davis

By McLAREN HARRIS

There is no hiding the great admiration the Symphony harbors for visiting conductor Colin Davis. At the conclusion of yesterday's concert the orchestra led the storm of applause.

This is the third successive season during which Davis has conducted here, and with each appearance his reception has grown more enthusiastic. The reasons are not difficult to find. He conducts with a kind of benevolent authority, commanding the allegiance, rather than simple obedience, of his players; he knows his craft and his material intimately; and he gets superb results.

YESTERDAY'S program of Mozart's overture to "Idomeneo," the "Coronation" Piano Concerto and Elgar's Symphony No. 1 contained very little of the spectacular, but the works were nonetheless striking in their eloquence and for the thoroughness of their preparation. Orchestrally, the Mozart pieces moved with a graceful ease, metrically precise but with no feeling of being chained to the barline, while winds and strings put forth a beautifully integrated, interwoven fabric of sound.

Viennese-born Ingrid Haebler was the soloist for the D major Concerto, and past associations between conductor and pianist were well in evidence. Miss Haebler's approach is delicate and sensitively lyric; what she lacks in force or theatrics she makes up in consistently bright and positive phrasing and sparkling linear clarity. Even the sometimes static or clumsy left-hand configurations of the piano part (the realization was not Mozart's) were handled with complete aplomb.

BOTH MISS HAEBLER'S work and the absolutely stunning accompaniment by the orchestra brought a warm audience response; but it was the Elgar Symphony in A flat, both in performance and afterward, which betrayed the orchestra's regard for Davis.

The Elgar symphony had not seen a BSO performance in 60 years, or since two years after its completion, and those early renditions under Max Fiedler were very likely poorly representative (they were received with little more than politeness). A Vaughan Williams quotation in the program book points up the intimate association between Elgar's music and his English countryside, and one is led to suggest that, although the listener need not be English to appreciate Elgar, an English conductor is virtually required to interpret him (were it not that one of his earliest and strongest champions was the German Hans Richter).

HOWEVER that may be, Davis and the orchestra managed to show the symphony's strengths and curiosities in their most favorable lights—the uplifting, expansively-phrased theme which opens and closes the work; the muscular, contrasting nature of the remainder of the first and last movements; the Allegro molto, which manages to serve the functions of a Scherzo with almost no actual Scherzo character; and the surpassingly serene Adagio.

There were times when the conductor's wishes seemed unfulfilled, as when shifts in dynamics lacked sufficient strings, normally powerful in abruptness, or when the BSO tone, remained strangely reticent. But the totality was yet compelling—testimony to what the orchestra can accomplish under a sure hand, and a tribute to a work of art long neglected.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
FEB 14 1970

Davis leads BSO in Elgar

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

Responsible, cultured, versatile, lively, technically able, Colin Davis has, all in all, seemed to me the most impressive of the guest conductors who have appeared at the Boston Symphony concerts in recent years. When he returned yesterday afternoon, he once again had a considerable audience success and was warmly applauded by the orchestra as well, but for myself I must report that I found his concert disappointing.

He conducted Elgar's Symphony No. 1 in A flat, a more outgoing work (and perhaps one more for audiences) than the Symphony No. 2, which was on one of William Steinberg's programs in October, and one that is neither as deep nor as rich psychologically as that later "passionate pilgrimage of a soul." Nobly elegiac, profoundly troubled, sinister, determined, it suggests a great range of experience, and musically it is more assuredly, even triumphantly, sustained than the 2nd. It opens with the grandest of all his "nobilmente" march melodies, its inward and still Adagio is a page Elgar never surpassed, and the whole work is a marvel of flair and fantasy in writing for orchestra.

The pacing of the performance was not always convincing: the opening, for example, seemed too slow, and certainly not different enough in character from the real slow movement later on; surely, too, it was a mistake for Davis to impose a broad ritard of his own on the carefully composed out deceleration with which Elgar modulates from the Scherzo into the Adagio. The performance, moreover, was altogether too uninflected, unbreathing and without space for things to happen in, with the countless passing accelerations or broadenings either barged through or coarsened. The sonority which should be so luminous and subtly variegated, was greyly homogenized and with much of the detail in woodwinds and harps not clearly audible behind the dense impasto of string tone.

Some of my unhappiness with the performance rests on conceptual disagreement, some of it has to do with a certain technical inadequacy, and much of it stems from my impression that it was one of those performances that just failed to catch fire. No performer is immune to having that happen occasionally, and it might easily all work better at one of the later playings of this program. I heard little, though, and was left unmoved.

Before intermission there was Mozart, and that did not quite go either. Davis began with the "Idomeneo" Overture, a handsome piece in Mozart's grand "opera seria" style, but one so specifically designed to lead into the opening scene of the opera that it is not a convincing concert piece.

Then came the D major Piano Concerto, K.537 ("Coronation"). In spite of some colorful and witty detail, the "Coronation" is as Mozart piano concertos go, a fairly perfunctory work, and one not helped by the inadequacy of the sources, particularly with respect to the piano part, which Mozart wrote out only rather incompletely. Ingrid Haebler's fluent and tasteful playing was the kind that could be made to work in one of Mazart's rich and detailed concertos, one in which most of the life is built into the music; the the "Coronation," however, is a piece that requires a fanciful and really active sort of performance, and Haebler, with all her musical good manners, was too neutral. Davis is a stylish Mozart conductor, and, again excepting some trouble with insufficiently clear woodwinds, he provided an elegant and solicitous orchestral framework for the Concerto and, before that, a strong performance of the Overture.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,067 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,577
FEB 14 1970

Colin Davis conducts Boston Symphony

By Louis Snyder

Colin Davis, one of the most favorite guest conductors of the Boston Symphony, to judge from musicians' and audience's reception of him, conducted the first of two programs with the orchestra on the weekend. As soloist, he introduced the Viennese pianist, Ingrid Haebler, to Symphony Hall in Mozart's "Coronation" Concerto, and led the orchestra in Mozart's "Idomeneo" Overture, and Sir Edward Elgar's First Symphony. This concert will be repeated tomorrow and Thursday evenings.

It was a musicianly program, even if the "Idomeneo" Overture, in its rather detached and bloodless status, is one of Mozart's least likely to stir the emotions, or reveal depths of perception in a conductor. Its performance was all right—a warmup for the Concerto in D (K. 537) which followed.

Unfamiliar first

Miss Haebler and Mr. Davis have collaborated effectively before in performances of Mozart concertos, and the result on Friday was happy proof of that fact for the first time here. She has the appropriately crystalline touch for this music, while Mr. Davis's sensitivity to balance between soloist and orchestra never permitted the scale to tip unduly in either direction. It was some of the best Mozart heard here in a long while, both as an ensemble effort and on the part of the very gifted soloist. Miss Haebler's affinity for this style and the function of the pianist as part of it was continually in evidence. And the attention that her delicately beautiful playing of the Larghetto commanded set some new kind of record for non-pindropping in Symphony Hall.

Any pins dropped during the performance of the Elgar Symphony in A flat would have gone unnoticed, since this is full blown sound that keeps musicians and listeners almost continuously busy, and at high pitch.

The Elgar First cannot be said to be generally familiar. Mr. Davis, in these concerts, brought it back into the BSO repertory for the first time since 1910, and programs elsewhere in the United States, at least, are not dotted through the years with repetitions.

Although it is, in a sense a period piece—it must have sounded really formidable in 1908 when it was first performed—its turbulence and drive, even at their considerable length, don't sound old fashioned in a naive way to modern ears. Though there is an impression of too much of everything, instrumental and emotional, bursting out of the work as written, musically it is all of solid quality and shining worth.

In comparison to the splendid refinements of the Second Symphony, played earlier this season by the orchestra under William Steinberg, the First does perhaps sound rather overheated. But thanks to Mr. Davis and the orchestra's all-out response to him, it is possible for audiences to make a further live assessment of a composer who to many is recognizable only as the personification of "Pomp and Circumstance." The First may never gain general acceptance, but on Friday it earned its right to be dusted off after 60 years on the shelf.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850
FEB 16 1970

Conductor from London

Colin Davis, director of the BBC Symphony Orchestra in London, appeared with the Boston Symphony this past weekend. He will be seen again in next weekend's pair of Friday and Saturday concerts when Sir Michael Tippett's Second Symphony will receive its American premiere.

Elgar's First Symphony Tarnishes BSO Concert

By L. DAVID HARRIS, Music Critic

"All that glitters isn't gold."

The quote aptly applies to yesterday's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert. It had plenty of glitter, but even that was tarnished by a second-half Elgar symphony.

Things began well with Mozart's overture to his opera, "Idomeneo." Guest Conductor Colin Davis directed it with vigor, a certain amount of zest and a pleasing style.

Mozart's overtures are not as poetic as those of other composers (Weber, Beethoven, Wagner), but they do introduce with great skill and there always is something in a particular Mozart over- that unmistakably hints ofthe quali tieso retuf ture that unmistakably hints of the qualities of the opera.

Since Davis is rather an expert on "Indomeneo" (a new three-record album on Philips is a masterpiece under Davis direction), it seemed a pity the BSO's programming limited him to merely the overture in yesterday's concert. Given singers and time, Davis probably could have conducted more of "Idomeneo" and produced one of the most memorable concerts of the season.

Concert pianist Ingrid Haebler then performed Mozart's "Coronation" piano concerto in D. It was an excellent example of much glitter, but little gold — although no fault of Miss Haebler.

Compared to other Mozart works, the "Coronation" is somewhat superficial, full of courtly style, show and flash. However, it lacks contrasts and the restless, disturbing elements which make other Mozart works so exciting.

Miss Haebler gave it an impressive reading, particularly in terms of technique and pianistic accuracy. It was pleasant, too, to hear a more feminine approach to the music — she seemed more sensitive, more politely subdued than so many contemporary concert pianists.

Miss Haebler is a beautiful woman, but she lost some of the impact of her stage presence — and that of her music — by her mannerisms as she played. Swaying and facial expressions didn't help her performance. They seemed overdone for the courtly style of the music itself.

Colin Davis, Guest Conductor

Ingrid Haebler, Guest Soloist

Conductor Colin Davis is a musical artist and genius, but even he couldn't rescue Elgar's first symphony from its inherent pretentiousness.

The concert's second half was given over to the symphony and like Elgar's second symphony (played earlier this season) it is full of sound and fury and effects. And it got tiring — even during the first movement.

This is not to say the orchestra didn't play well, but it had to combat waves of Elgar all the way.

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300
FEB 14 1970

38.

The Patriot Ledger, Wed., Feb. 18, 1970 Page 42

The Sound of Music

Mozart With Style

By Peter M. Knapp

Music by Mozart and Elgar formed the Boston Symphony's program last night as Colin Davis, the 43-year-old English conductor of the BBC Symphony, returned to Boston as guest conductor.

The evening really belonged to Mozart and Ingrid Haebler, the blonde Viennese-born and Salzburg-trained pianist who performed Mozart's Piano Concerto in D, K. 537, the "Coronation" as only the Austrians seem to know how.

Subtle Pianist

Davis has done a lot of Mozart, and he has the right instincts, leading with balance, vigor and a rational approach. But Miss Haebler supplied the nuance, subtlety of phrasing, dynamics and tonal weight that made the orchestra sometimes sound ungainly by contrast. She plays with extraordinary articulation, high finger-action producing an effortless flow of notes in Mozart's intricate passagework like finely-matched strings of pearls. And her technique is as visually graceful as it is aurally.

The "Coronation," so-called since Mozart played it at the crowning of Emperor Leopold II at Frankfurt-am-Main in 1790, is a late, richly-scored concerto ripe with melody and pianistically showy. Yet it is not mindless virtuosity called for here, nor the effete tinkling that sometimes is passed off for Mozart. And certainly not in Miss Haebler's scale of refinement.

She played at a generally soft dynamic level, yet with enormous control over its gradations and great beauty of tone and line in the larghetto. Her playing has warmth and a supple variety too seldom encountered in Mozart performances, and one hopes the BSO will ask her back soon.

Windy Symphony

For an opener, David led a Mozart overture, to "Idomeneo," K. 366, his youthful opera seria. Dark and dramatic accents propel this music, and Davis performed it energetically. The same can be said for Edward Elgar's Symphony No. 1 in A-flat, full of sound and fury well-managed by orchestra and conductor but interminable nevertheless. It is a symphony of Brucknerian length, perhaps in search of an exit.

The adagio is quite beautiful — Elgar could write good uplifting tunes — with its full-throated emotion. But much of the symphony seems too much windy rhetoric, and the pompous hymn that opens the work (and subsequently closes it, with rippling harps and percussive bursts) evokes visions of David Niven or Sir Lawrence Olivier bearing the royal orb and scepter in a grand throne-room procession.

COLIN DAVIS: conductor of the week

Additional review of Davis' first concert (Feb. 13) on page 39.

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Friday afternoon February 20 1970 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening February 21 1970 at 8.30

COLIN DAVIS conductor

STRAVINSKY Scherzo à la russe

first performance in Boston

TIPPETT Symphony no. 2

Allegro vigoroso
Adagio molto e tranquillo
Presto veloce
Allegro moderato

first performance in America

intermissjon

TCHAIKOVSKY Symphony no. 4 in F minor op. 36*

Andante sostenuto – moderato con anima
Andantino in modo di canzona
Scherzo: allegro (pizzicato ostinato)
Finale: allegro con fuoco

The Boston Globe Saturday, February 21, 1970

Davis leads Boston Symphony in Stravinsky, Tchaikovsky

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

For his second program this season with the Boston Symphony, Colin Davis chose Stravinsky's "Scherzo a la russe" (apparently, and incredibly, its first Boston performance), Michael Tippett's Symphony No. 2 (its first performance in America), and the Symphony No. 4 by Tchaikovsky.

Tippett, who is 65, has only recently begun to have wide recognition in England; here, his music is still very little known. The Symphony No. 2, finished in 1957, may be full of echoes of Stravinsky — which was emphasized, I think unfortunately, by its being preceded by a piece of Stravinsky's — and of Copland, but there is something so individual about its sound that it emerges as a very personal piece, strong, and unfailingly absorbing.

The Symphony is in four movements in traditional sequence. The first is an Allegro vigoroso whose springboard is a series of pounding C's to which Tippett returns at various points in the work. The Adagio is the richest and most original movement, one that abounds in striking orchestral ideas, the series of instrumental recitatives (high trumpet, oboe, trombone), the accompaniments for harp and piano (fascinatingly different — more sensuous — from Stravinsky's writing for them in his Scherzo), the effective contrast of this precisely etched soloistic writing with the tutti sound of the middle section. There is a Scherzo whose metrical sophistications are most amusing, and, for a finale, a fantasia-like Allegro with a remarkable, genuinely long, melody that makes a gradual descent from high violins to the deepest bass.

Teppett's music is exceedingly dense in texture, and its surface is predominantly dark, with a finish that is characteristically matte and a bit Brahmsian in effect. The 2d Symphony is a difficult work to sort out in performance, but Davis and the orchestra produced a statement of it that was clear and powerful.

The "Scherzo a la russe" is a bon-bon first written in a version for the Paul Whiteman band in 1944. Most of its humor is Petrushkian carnivalesque, with wheezing harmonica effects, but I had forgotten about the surprise of the first of its two Trios, whose harp-and-piano canon with accompaniment for solo violins seems to look forward to the sound world of "Agon." The performance was trim and funny, just as it should have been.

The performance of the Tchaikovsky 4th was lucidly shaped, respectful, sometimes pleasingly graceful, not not fiery enough. There was some good playing, especially from strings and timpani, but the orchestra was not quite at its most attentive. The real question was: why did we need a performance of the Fourth at all? Three big Tchaikovsky pieces in one season is excessive (earlier, we had "Manfred" from William Steinberg and the "Pathetique" from Erich Leinsdorf). The other part of my objection is best expressed by way of some statistics: the Fourth was last played by the Boston Symphony as recently as 1965, and it has come up in twelve seasons in the last thirty; the delightful Third Symphony ("Polish") has not been played since 1903, the Suite No. 1 in D minor not since 1917, and the Suite No. 2 in C major, which includes some of Tchaikovsky's most original and attractive music, has never been done here at all.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850
FEB 24 1970

Tippett in U.S. premiere

Davis 'remakes' Tchaikovsky

By Louis Snyder

'A stunning performance that really remade a work on which excesses and mumbo-jumbo have left their marks, awaiting only a shining knight like the BSO's welcome visitor to cleanse them away.'

Before it departed on its fourth tour week for engagements in the New York metropolitan area, the Boston Symphony played weekend concerts here again under the direction of Colin Davis, who will conclude his present stint with the orchestra after the out-of-town appearances.

Mr. Davis said good-bye for now with an interesting program—Stravinsky's Scherzo a la Russe, a short piece rescued from the maw of movieland; the American première of Sir Michael Tippett's Second Symphony; and what might be described as a restudied performance of Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4 in F minor.

The Stravinsky, a jaunty, jazzy little number "began as music for another war film, with a Russian setting," but like the composer's other Hollywood cinema ventures, never made it to the studio. (His "Rite of Spring" is used in "Fantasia" because the work was not protected by copyright in the United States).

The Scherzo was then converted into a commissioned piece for radio in 1944 for Paul Whiteman, and later reworked for orchestra. It is remindful of the "Petrushka" Russian dance and, in its brevity, on this occasion merely diverted the ontimers until the latecomers could be admitted and allowed to settle down for more serious fare. Fun, though.

Melodious race

This was, of course, the Tippett Symphony No. 2, first played in London in 1958, and just arriving here. Despite some rather showy instrumental flourishes that start it on its way, it impresses one as a rather spare work structurally (in contrast to memories of one hearing of the First Symphony, which was a confusion of textures). There is a pleasing interplay of lyric sound—toward the end of the first Allegro movement, flute and oboe seem to join cellos and strings in a melodious race to the finale. And the Adagio proceeds with a mesmerizing kind of lyricism, topped by a suave trombone passage, handsomely played by William Gibson.

In fact, there are many solo opportunities throughout the symphony to which, among others, Doriot Anthony Dwyer, Ann Hobson, Joseph Silverstein, Ralph Gomberg, and an invisible (to me) pianist gave their due. Scherzo and Finale emerge just as the composer says in his program notes they should, and the overall effect is one of agreeable if bland inventiveness. There are suggestions of a personality and an individuality here, but until Sir Michael's work (this and others) become more familiar in this country, he will remain an unequated musical quantity on the basis of this Second Symphony.

Event of the day

The real event of the afternoon on Friday was, of all things, the Tchaikovsky Fourth. From the first note it was apparent that Mr. Davis had scrubbed it down, removed the encrustations of time and tradition, and let it stand in its strong, sinewy altogether. It was a cool, crisp reading, more powerful than passionate, but then Tchaikovsky had built in the passion, and very little has to be added by anybody.

It was strongly accented, beautifully shaded, and deftly considerate of the optimum potentialities of each of the choirs of the orchestra. And the BSO returned them in full measure to Mr. Davis in a stunning performance that really remade a work on which excesses and mumbo-jumbo have left their marks, awaiting only a shining knight like the BSO's welcome visitor to cleanse them away.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
FEB 21 1970
New Engl

At the Symphony

Tippett 'Marvelously Expressive'

By HARRY NEVILLE
HT Music Critic

The term "British composer" has come to acquire a slightly pejorative flavor for many people, largely because of a certain blandness of temperament in the work of some of the more popular representatives of 20th century British music.

This generalization is unfair of course and has taken hold partly because we don't hear very much contemporary British music in this country. It was a real service then on the part of conductor Colin Davis to include the Symphony No. 2 of his fellow countryman Michael Tippett in the second program of his guest-conducting stint with the Boston Symphony yesterday afternoon.

TIPPETT DOES, to be sure, evince traits that might vaguely be thought of as British. His mode of expression, for example, is anything but bombastic and there is a powerful control behind even his most rhetorical statements. Yet his music is direct, marvelously expressive and presented in terms that can be understood by any alert listener.

In its large formal aspects the Second Symphony is pretty much a conventional work. The opening movement is a sonata-allegro construction, which is followed by a song-like slow movement and a rhythmically exhilarating scherzo. The finale, described by the composer as a fantasia in four sections, is really the only departure from traditional symphonic form.

Within this framework, however, Tippett manages to convey a musical experience that is seldom less than compelling and at times absorbing and moving to a degree not often encountered in contemporary music. The slow movement, with its elegiac mood, was an especially effective and deeply felt lyric outpouring, and the brilliant scherzo showed that it is still possible to say something original with a rather conventional metrical scheme.

ACCORDING TO Tippett the germinal idea of the Symphony—the pounding bass C's of the opening—came to him while listening to a work of Vivaldi. I would add that it's also possible to hear an echo of Stravinsky in the propulsive motor rhythms of the first movement, although this thought may have been suggested by the latter composer's charming and charmingly played "Scherzo a la Russe," which opened the program.

Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony is one of those works we're likely to imagine having heard a great many more times than is actually the case. This writer last heard the Fourth several years ago, but it still seems a work that should be brought out infrequently and then only by conductors who have something vital to say about it.

Colin Davis is such a conductor and the performance he led made this listener at least experience the work afresh. With the exception of some unlovely woodwind playing and a plodding, graceless scherzo, the performance was first-rate. Davis built up to the climactic moments with superb control and a commanding view of the overall architecture. The result was an exciting musical event and not the orgiastic frenzy that is usually served up.

38.

The Patriot Ledger, Wed., Feb. 18, 1970 Page 42

The Sound of Music

Mozart With Style

By Peter M. Knapp

Music by Mozart and Elgar formed the Boston Symphony's program last night as Colin Davis, the 43-year-old English conductor of the BBC Symphony, returned to Boston as guest conductor.

The evening really belonged to Mozart and Ingrid Haebler, the blonde Viennese-born and Salzburg-trained pianist who performed Mozart's Piano Concerto in D, K. 537, the "Coronation" as only the Austrians seem to know how.

Subtle Pianist

Davis has done a lot of Mozart, and he has the right instincts, leading with balance, vigor and a rational approach. But Miss Haebler supplied the nuance, subtlety of phrasing, dynamics and tonal weight that made the orchestra sometimes sound ungainly by contrast. She plays with extraordinary articulation, high finger-action producing an effortless flow of notes in Mozart's intricate passagework like finely-matched strings of pearls. And her technique is as visually graceful as it is aurally.

The "Coronation," so-called since Mozart played it at the crowning of Emperor Leopold II at Frankfurt-am-Main in 1790, is a late, richly-scored concerto ripe with melody and pianistically showy. Yet it is not mindless virtuosity called for here, nor the effete tinkling that sometimes is passed off for Mozart. And certainly not in Miss Haebler's scale of refinement.

She played at a generally soft dynamic level, yet with enormous control over its gradations and great beauty of tone and line in the larghetto. Her playing has warmth and a supple variety too seldom encountered in Mozart performances, and one hopes the BSO will ask her back soon.

Windy Symphony

For an opener, David led a Mozart overture, to "Idomeneo," K. 366, his youthful opera seria. Dark and dramatic accents propel this music, and Davis performed it energetically. The same can be said for Edward Elgar's Symphony No. 1 in A-flat, full of sound and fury well-managed by orchestra and conductor but interminable nevertheless. It is a symphony of Brucknerian length, perhaps in search of an exit.

The adagio is quite beautiful — Elgar could write good uplifting tunes — with its full-throated emotion. But much of the symphony seems too much windy rhetoric, and the pompous hymn that opens the work (and subsequently closes it, with rippling harps and percussive bursts) evokes visions of David Niven or Sir Lawrence Olivier bearing the royal orb and scepter in a grand throne-room procession.

COLIN DAVIS: conductor of the week

Additional review of Davis' first concert (Feb. 13) on page 39.

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Friday afternoon February 20 1970 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening February 21 1970 at 8.30

COLIN DAVIS conductor

STRAVINSKY Scherzo à la russe

first performance in Boston

TIPPETT Symphony no. 2

Allegro vigoroso
Adagio molto e tranquillo
Presto veloce
Allegro moderato

first performance in America

intermissjon

TCHAIKOVSKY Symphony no. 4 in F minor op. 36*

Andante sostenuto – moderato con anima
Andantino in modo di canzona
Scherzo: allegro (pizzicato ostinato)
Finale: allegro con fuoco

The Boston Globe Saturday, February 21, 1970

Davis leads Boston Symphony in Stravinsky, Tchaikovsky

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

For his second program this season with the Boston Symphony, Colin Davis chose Stravinsky's "Scherzo a la russe" (apparently, and incredibly, its first Boston performance), Michael Tippett's Symphony No. 2 (its first performance in America), and the Symphony No. 4 by Tchaikovsky.

Tippett, who is 65, has only recently begun to have wide recognition in England; here, his music is still very little known. The Symphony No. 2, finished in 1957, may be full of echoes of Stravinsky — which was emphasized, I think unfortunately, by its being preceded by a piece of Stravinsky's — and of Copland, but there is something so individual about its sound that it emerges as a very personal piece, strong, and unfailingly absorbing.

The Symphony is in four movements in traditional sequence. The first is an Allegro vigoroso whose springboard is a series of pounding C's to which Tippett returns at various points in the work. The Adagio is the richest and most original movement, one that abounds in striking orchestral ideas, the series of instrumental recitatives (high trumpet, oboe, trombone), the accompaniments for harp and piano (fascinatingly different — more sensuous — from Stravinsky's writing for them in his Scherzo), the effective contrast of this precisely etched soloistic writing with the tutti sound of the middle section. There is a Scherzo whose metrical sophistications are most amusing, and, for a finale, a fantasia-like Allegro with a remarkable, genuinely long, melody that makes a gradual descent from high violins to the deepest bass.

Teppett's music is exceedingly dense in texture, and its surface is predominantly dark, with a finish that is characteristically matte and a bit Brahmsian in effect. The 2d Symphony is a difficult work to sort out in performance, but Davis and the orchestra produced a statement of it that was clear and powerful.

The "Scherzo a la russe" is a bon-bon first written in a version for the Paul Whiteman band in 1944. Most of its humor is Petrushkian carnivalesque, with wheezing harmonica effects, but I had forgotten about the surprise of the first of its two Trios, whose harp-and-piano canon with accompaniment for solo violins seems to look forward to the sound world of "Agon." The performance was trim and funny, just as it should have been.

The performance of the Tchaikovsky 4th was lucidly shaped, respectful, sometimes pleasingly graceful, not not fiery enough. There was some good playing, especially from strings and timpani, but the orchestra was not quite at its most attentive. The real question was: why did we need a performance of the Fourth at all? Three big Tchaikovsky pieces in one season is excessive (earlier, we had "Manfred" from William Steinberg and the "Pathetique" from Erich Leinsdorf). The other part of my objection is best expressed by way of some statistics: the Fourth was last played by the Boston Symphony as recently as 1965, and it has come up in twelve seasons in the last thirty; the delightful Third Symphony ("Polish") has not been played since 1903, the Suite No. 1 in D minor not since 1917, and the Suite No. 2 in C major, which includes some of Tchaikovsky's most original and attractive music, has never been done here at all.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

FEB 24 1970

Tippett in U.S. premiere

Davis 'remakes' Tchaikovsky

By Louis Snyder

'A stunning performance that really remade a work on which excesses and mumbo-jumbo have left their marks, awaiting only a shining knight like the BSO's welcome visitor to cleanse them away.'

Before it departed on its fourth tour week for engagements in the New York metropolitan area, the Boston Symphony played weekend concerts here again under the direction of Colin Davis, who will conclude his present stint with the orchestra after the out-of-town appearances.

Mr. Davis said good-bye for now with an interesting program—Stravinsky's Scherzo à la Russe, a short piece rescued from the maw of movieland; the American premiere of Sir Michael Tippett's Second Symphony; and what might be described as a restudied performance of Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4 in F minor.

The Stravinsky, a jaunty, jazzy little number "began as music for another war film, with a Russian setting," but like the composer's other Hollywood cinema ventures, never made it to the studio. (His "Rite of Spring" is used in "Fantasia" because the work was not protected by copyright in the United States).

The Scherzo was then converted into a commissioned piece for radio in 1944 for Paul Whiteman, and later reworked for orchestra. It is remindful of the "Petrushka" Russian dance and, in its brevity, on this occasion merely diverted the on-timers until the latecomers could be admitted and allowed to settle down for more serious fare. Fun, though.

Melodious race

This was, of course, the Tippett Symphony No. 2, first played in London in 1958, and just arriving here. Despite some rather showy instrumental flourishes that start it on its way, it impresses one as a rather spare work structurally (in contrast to memories of one hearing of the First Symphony, which was a confusion of textures). There is a pleasing interplay of lyric sound—toward the end of the first Allegro movement, flute and oboe seem to join cellos and strings in a melodious race to the finale. And the Adagio proceeds with a mesmerizing kind of lyricism, topped by a suave trombone passage, handsomely played by William Gibson.

In fact, there are many solo opportunities throughout the symphony to which, among others, Doriot Anthony Dwyer, Ann Hobson, Joseph Silverstein, Ralph Gomberg, and an invisible (to me) pianist gave their due. Scherzo and Finale emerge just as the composer says in his program notes they should, and the overall effect is one of agreeable if bland inventiveness. There are suggestions of a personality and an individuality here, but until Sir Michael's work (this and others) become more familiar in this country, he will remain an unequated musical quantity on the basis of this Second Symphony.

Event of the day

The real event of the afternoon on Friday was, of all things, the Tchaikovsky Fourth. From the first note it was apparent that Mr. Davis had scrubbed it down, removed the encrustations of time and tradition, and let it stand in its strong, sinewy altogether. It was a cool, crisp reading, more powerful than passionate, but then Tchaikovsky had built in the passion, and very little has to be added by anybody.

It was strongly accented, beautifully shaded, and deftly considerate of the optimum potentialities of each of the choirs of the orchestra. And the BSO returned them in full measure to Mr. Davis in a stunning performance that really remade a work on which excesses and mumbo-jumbo have left their marks, awaiting only a shining knight like the BSO's welcome visitor to cleanse them away.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

21 1970 Ne Engl

At the Symphony

Tippett 'Marvelously Expressive'

By HARRY NEVILLE
HT Music Critic

The term "British composer" has come to acquire a slightly pejorative flavor for many people, largely because of a certain blandness of temperament in the work of some of the more popular representatives of 20th century British music.

This generalization is unfair of course and has taken hold partly because we don't hear very much contemporary British music in this country. It was a real service then on the part of conductor Colin Davis to include the Symphony No. 2 of his fellow countryman Michael Tippett in the second program of his guest-conducting stint with the Boston Symphony yesterday afternoon.

TIPPETT DOES, to be sure, evince traits that might vaguely be thought of as British. His mode of expression, for example, is anything but bombastic and there is a powerful control behind even his most rhetorical statements. Yet his music is direct, marvelously expressive and presented in terms that can be understood by any alert listener.

In its large formal aspects the Second Symphony is pretty much a conventional work. The opening movement is a sonata-allegro construction, which is followed by a song-like slow movement and a rhythmically exhilarating scherzo. The finale, described by the composer as a fantasia in four sections, is really the only departure from traditional symphonic form.

Within this framework, however, Tippett manages to convey a musical experience that is seldom less than compelling and at times absorbing and moving to a degree not often encountered in contemporary music. The slow movement, with its elegiac mood, was an especially effective and deeply felt lyric outpouring, and the brilliant scherzo showed that it is still possible to say something original with a rather conventional metrical scheme.

ACCORDING TO Tippett the germinal idea of the Symphony—the pounding bass C's of the opening—came to him while listening to a work of Vivaldi. I would add that it's also possible to hear an echo of Stravinsky in the propulsive motor rhythms of the first movement, although this thought may have been suggested by the latter composer's charming and charmingly played "Scherzo a la Russe," which opened the program.

Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony is one of those works we're likely to imagine having heard a great many more times than is actually the case. This writer last heard the Fourth several years ago, but it still seems a work that should be brought out infrequently and then only by conductors who have something vital to say about it.

Colin Davis is such a conductor and the performance he led made this listener at least experience the work afresh. With the exception of some unlovely woodwind playing and a plodding, graceless scherzo, the performance was first-rate. Davis built up to the climactic moments with superb control and a commanding view of the overall architecture. The result was an exciting musical event and not the orgiastic frenzy that is usually served up.

Boston After Dark

39.

Davis conducts Tippett . . . and tries his hand at Elgar

by Ralph Locke

For his second week of concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Colin Davis chose another mixed bag of familiar and unfamiliar works, again including a major English work (the Second Symphony of Sir Michael Tippett). Tchaikovsky's familiar Fourth Symphony filled the second half of the program, intended, one imagines, as a bribe to get unadventurous listeners to sit through the first half.

Unfortunately, there was little real adventure in the first half. Davis opened the program with the Boston premeire of Scherzo a la Russe, another of Stravinsky's attmepts to flog the dead horse of Russian nationalism. Really, you'd think he would tire of making fun of something that wasn't funny in the first place. Petrushka (1911), Mavra (1922), and The Fairy's Kiss (1928) were all, in whole or in part, imitations of the musical styles of the Russian Five and Tchaikovsky, and here is the master doing it again in 1943. Unfortunately, the Scherzo is a colder, less affectionate parody than the earlier works. Fortunately it is short.

The Second Symphony of Tippett also offered few surprises. Written in 1957, it is mostly just another work by a conservative composer riding on the coattails of Stravinsky. Admittedly, unlike many of the great Igor's American followers, he has ignored the sophisticated posturings in Stravinsky's music and absorbed the more essential elements. His use of polytonality and rhythm, notably in the Scherzo,, shows that he has mastered the composing techniques developed by Stravinsky through the years. These techniques stem originally from Stravinsky's early works, such as The Rite of Spring or Les Noces.

Tippett, however, seems to have learned them from the later works (such as the Symphonies) in which Stravinsky had refined away much of the original driving energy. Tippett has refined even more, and what remains has the intensity of a washed-out watercolor. The "five gestures of farewell" at the end, for example, lack the horrifying tension which Stravinsky creates in his coda (for pianos and chimes) to Les Noces.

An interesting feature of Sir Michael's Second Symphony is that it comes with program notes by the composer. He explains to us how he figures out the form of a work "in as great detail as I can" before starting to think about the themes he will use. It's not often that a modern composer of music quite so badly. Also, Tippett calls the scherzo "a kind of tour de force." Maybe he thinks so.

After intermission, Maestro Davis rewarded us for our patience with Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony. It was invigorating to hear a work by a composer whose originality does not consist of the way in which he copies someone else. It is also ironic that this aged warhorse of a piece sounds more energetic and youthful that either the 30-year-old Stravinsky Scherzo or Tippett's recent Symphony. But so it goes in the 20th century.

Davis's performance of the Tchaikovsky was brilliant, in its way. His concern for orchestral color was magnificent, with the rich string sound a special delight. If I was less than totally satisfied with his interpretation, it may be that I am a spoiled child of the microgroove generation. After growing up on Tchaikovsky recordings by Stokowski, Koussevitzky, the Soviet conductor Yevgeny Mravinsky, and the Czech Vaclav Talich, I find Davis too stiff in his slowish tempos, too unwilling to speed up a little for an exciting phrase. I know that "no-nonsense" performances of Tchaikovsky are in style now, but that doesn't mean I have to like them. I await the day when musicians will again be able to play Tchaikovsky with passion and without embarassment and when critics will not have to apologize for liking it that way.

While I'm sticking pins in voodoo dolls, let me get back at a few of the orchestra's wind players for their inattentive playing (at least on Friday afternoon) in the Tchaikovsky. Really, the first movement was bad enough with the usual out-of-tune solo clarinet playing from Mr. Cioffi. But missing an important cue, as three wind players did, in the last movement, is New York Philharmonic stuff. Mr. Gomberg's oboe solo in the second movement, on the other hand, was sheer perfection: quiet, simple, and graceful, just as Tchaikovsky asks it to be.

If I have not gone into greater detail on the qualities of Colin Davis' direction in these concerts, it is partly because he is so successful at drawing attention to the music instead of to himself. What more can one ask, except that Boston audiences be, given the opportunity to hear this talented conductor more often.

---

by Lawrence P. Katzenstein

The two symphonies of Edward Elgar are not often heard, and on Friday afternoon, February 13, guest conductor Colin Davis and the Boston Symphony reminded us why.

Davis chose the first—and weaker—of the two for his excursion into Elgarland. At least for this listener each of Elgar's large-scale works is a kind of variation on an enigma. The enigma is simply that here was a man with a first-rate musical intelligence, a wonderful ear for orchestration and color, and a gifted melodic sense. But these symphonies! Moments of real insight and beauty surrounded by three times as much bombast, poor taste, banality, even vulgarity. J.W. Turner's description, "Salvation Army music," is perhaps unfair, but understandable.

It's a shame, really, for there are some marvelous effects in the first symphony, like the fine thematic material and subtle scoring of the middle section of the ABA second movement. But the work is over-composed—too complex. One has the feeling, for example, that Elgar was too concerned with satisfying the academicians by forging the allegro molto second movement and the adagio third from the same theme. At any rate, it is an interesting question why England, so prolific in production of great authors and playwrights, has given music only two undeniably great composers —Purcell and Britten.

The BSO sound under Davis was on the lean side, a little like the super-streamlined sound of Szell's Cleveland Orchestra. It wasn't the most spirited performance one could imagine, but Davis' stylish and rather polite rendering of the symphony revealed all of the piece's strengths without dwelling on its weaknesses. Ensemble and intonation were very good—the latter has sometimes been a problem at the BSO this year.

The rest of the program was Mozart, the Idomeneo overture, and the D major piano concerto, No. 26, the latter played by Ingrid Haebler who to my ears is one of the most gifted Mozart players around. The "Coronation" concerto is pure style galant, real virtuoso stuff which explains its popularity and surprisingly weak for mature Mozart.

All Mozart is a joy, though, and Miss Haebler played the concerto superbly, with fluid technique and unflagging musicality. Only her touch failed her, as her forte tone is very harsh. (This may have been the result of unfamiliarity with the instrument). Mr. Davis is a Mozartean of great accomplishment and carried off his part with the finesse we have come to expect.

In a Word: 'Marvelous'

An Honor to Listen To 1st BSO Concert

By L. DAVID HARRIS
Music Critic

"Marvelous" is the word for yesterday's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert. The Stravinsky was invigorating; Tippett's music, artistic. Tchaikovsky was absolutely spine tingling.

Much of the credit must go to Guest Conductor Colin Davis. He engineered it all and seemed in excellent form —better than his first season's appearance here last week.

For contemporary music buffs, Sir Michael Tippett's second symphony was the strong point of the program—and a highlight of the season.

The excitement began with the first pounding Cs in cellos and basses and continued on—made even brighter by excellent solo work by trumpet, trombone, tympani, woodwinds. The music was superbly balanced and its intricate, difficult passages were handled masterfully by section after section of musicians.

The concert marked the symphony's first performance in America. It is complex, penetrating music—quite demanding. There are hints of Hindemith and Stravinsky's motor rhythms. Listen closely and Vivaldi is there too. Its slow movement is quite beautiful, also.

Tchaikovsky's fourth symphony was a tour de force—a triumph of musical moods. It ranged from opening despair through joy; a melancholy second movement; an enchanting pizzicato third movement (throughout the movement, not a string is touched by a bow), and the exultant, tumultuous fourth movement.

Repeating an earlier comment: There were moments when this symphony was virtually spine tingling.

But Davis always was in control. A listener might have wished for even more passion from the symphony, but Davis regulated it through and through with crispness. Emotions were rampant in the music-like tidal waves. But no one got washed away.

Stravinsky's Scherzo a la russe" began the concert—and with a happy, good feeling. The music was a foretaste of the rich, balanced sounds which were to come throughout the program.

Indeed, the concert was enough to make a writer proud to be a reviewer. It's simply an honor to write about such music—and the musicians who brought it so wonderfully to life.

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300

FEB 21 1970

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

FEB 26 1970

Colin Davis Conducts BSO In Three Theatrical Works

By HAROLD C. SPROUL

Colin Davis, English conductor of both opera and symphony (like all great conductors of the past), therefore brings into the concert hall an informed intuition of human attitudes and feelings without which the "abstractions" of symphonic music would be merely physical excitement and its forms of arbitrary.

Stravinsky's "Scherzo a larusse" began as an abortive attempt to crash Hollywood (they only wanted his name) was then adopted to Paul Whiteman and finally was reorganized for full orchestra. This first in Boston made a novelty curtain-raiser. It is a blatant bit of carnival vulgarity—a reminder of the earlier Petrushka, or the music commissioned by the Greatest Show on Earth. Mr. Davis took it in the proper raw, pounding spirit to reluctant applause.

Sir Michael Tippett's "Symphony No. 2" was intended as an abstract drama of inner experience. His avowed method approach to composition is from the general to the specific—from large design to particular sound. This at least avoids a current practice of stacking up sensory images like a series of goodies. A heavy bass reiteration of C begins and ends the work. He seems to like thick textures, even in the Presto of driving off-rhythm. In the first movement (vigoroso) all the instruments are terribly busy but seldom engage in a total effect—the vigor seems acoustically dispersed—until a sort of fugal ending with some solidity. Obviously one hearing is not enough for a reputable and intelligent composer.

The Tchaikovsky Fourth was of course, a return to the familiar but presented with such musicality and regard for the real distinction of the work, that it recovered a rare, convincing freshness. In my own concert experience this great work of the late 19th century has usually been taken for a ride, with the exception of Toscanini's attention to its imaginative and skillful fineness. Colin Davis withheld none of the psychological drama. The opposition of fatality and dream (Tschaikovsky's hint) was there in the first movement but properly moderato so that the moments of quiet loveliness had as much chance as the overpowering force. The dramatic reason of hundred-year-old sonata-form as effective here as in Mozart (one of Tschaikovsky's gods). The Andantino was really ino and song-like (in modo di canzona) gracefully phrased, so that the nostalgia did not slobber. The Scherzo was kept allegro (not a showy presto) so that the pizzicatto arabesque of light intoxication danced without panting and the pianissimo fade-out (an extraordinary achievement for a big orchestra) left a smile. The Finale was, properly, a plunge into objective joy with a hair-raising climax of abandon. Throughout, the Boston tone was a its best, the more so because always at the service of musical (human) ideas deftly controlled by Colin Davis.

Thomas to conduct Boston Symphony in March for ailing Steinberg

The Boston Symphony's concerts here in March will be led by the orchestra's 25-year-old assistant conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas. He takes over the dates from music director William Steinberg who, following medical tests, is resting at his home in Pittsburgh. Steinberg may return to the Boston Symphony in April.

Thomas's first new program will be performed Mar. 5 in Providence and in Symphony Hall Mar. 6-7. It will consist of Beethoven" "Egmont" Overture, the Sibelius Sympnony No. 4, Schoenberg's Five Pieces for Orchestra, Op. 16, and Dawn and Rhine Journey from Wagner's "Die Gotterdammerung."

The Wagner excerpts will also be heard here Mar. 3. That program will also include the Starer Double Concerto, with B.S.O. concertmaster Joseph Silverstein and principal cellist Jules Eskin as soloists, and the Brahms Symphony No. 2. This concert commemorates the 30th anniversary of the death of Dr. Karl Muck, who was music director of the Boston Symphony, 1906-1908 and 1912-1918.

Thomas's B.S.O. debut was on Oct. 10. Less than two weeks later in New York, he took over from an ailing Steinberg at the intermission of a Philharmonic Hall concert, and conducted the rest of the tour. Thomas is also pianist with the Boston Symphony Chamber Players.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967
(S) 566,377 (E) 194,700

FEB 20 1970 New Engl

Program Changes

The programs for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts March 3 and March 5, 6, and 7 have been revised due to a change in conductors.

Michael Tilson Thomas, the orchestra's assistant conductor, will replace William Steinberg, musical director, who is at home in Pittsburgh following medical tests.

Mr. Thomas' first new program in the Friday-Saturday series will be performed March 5 in Providence and March 6 and 7 at Symphony Hall in Boston. The works will be Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture, Sibelius' Symphony No. 4, Shoenberg's Five Pieces for Orchestra, Op. 16, and "Dawn" and the "Rhine Journey" from Wagner's "Die Gotterdammerung."

The March 3 concert in the Tuesday series will comprise the Wagner excerpts, Starer's Double Concerto with concertmaster Joseph Silverstein and principal cellist Jules Eskin as soloists, and Brahms' Symphony No. 2.

An orchestra spokesman confirmed that alternate plans are being made against the possibility that Mr. Steinberg may not be able to return in April to conduct the scheduled Beethoven festival, but said there was nothing to announce at this time.

The metropolitan Opera Association announced that Roberta Peters, instead of Anna Moffo, will sing the title role in "Lucia di Lammermoor" at the April 23 performance during the Met's Boston engagement at Hynes Civic Auditorium in the Prudential Center.

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,387

FEB 24 1970

40.

Douglas Glass

Tippett

BMI
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 16.000

MAY 1970

◆ The American premiere of Michael Tippett's "Symphony No. 2" was a highlight of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, February 20, in Symphony Hall, Boston. Colin Davis conducted. The work was premiered in New York, February 25, at Philharmonic Hall.

Reviewing for Women's Wear Daily, Leighton Kerner found the work had "a rich quality of rhythmic invention and general listenability throughout." He cited, in particular, "a songful and quiet memorable slow movement."

Michael Steinberg (The Boston Globe) said: ". . . there is something so individual about its sound that it emerges as a very personal piece, strong, and unfailingly absorbing.

"The 'Symphony' is in four movements in traditional sequence. The first is an Allegro vigoroso whose springboard is a series of pounding C's to which Tippett returns at various points in the work. The Adagio is the richest and most original movement, one that abounds in striking orchestral ideas, the series of instrumental recitatives (high trumpet, oboe, trombone), the accompaniments for harp and piano (fascinatingly different—more sensuous—from Stravinsky's writing for them in his Scherzo), the effective contrast of this precisely etched solo-istic writing with the tutti sound of the middle section. There is a Scherzo whose metrical sophistications are most amusing, and, for a finale, a fantasia-like Allegro with a remarkable, genuinely long, melody that makes a gradual descent from high violins to the deepest bass."

The Tippett work, completed in 1957, is published in the United States by Schott/Belwin-Mills Publishing Corp.

Patrons May Find Op. 16 Unsettling

Schoenberg for BSO

By HARRY NEVILLE
HT Music Critic

Arnold Schoenberg's Five Pieces for Orchestra, Op. 16, constitute what program annotators are fond of calling a "milestone" in musical history. Written in 1909, they are among the first compositions clearly to abandon tonality, or the feeling of a harmonic key center, that had for two centuries been a bulwark of Western musical thought.

Thus, in spite of their being over 60 years old, the Five Pieces represent for many listeners that special area of listening difficulty summed up by the term "modern music," by which is generally meant 20th century music one happens not to like.

TO BE PLAYED today and at the following three B.S.O. concerts, Op. 16 is likely to prove a mildly unsettling experience for many Symphony patrons — a little like an unpleasant medicine one has to take with an otherwise enjoyable meal. To someone who finds the music extraordinarily attractive, such a reaction is bound to seem a matter that can be straightened out with a bit of coaxing, and such was the original intent of this article.

What intervened was the realization that exposure to the music is the only truly effective help to its enjoyment, and that words, at best, can only try to create a receptive attitude.

FOR THOSE who approach Op. 16 with visions of a work elaborately constructed from tone rows and mathematical formulae it might be useful to know that Schoenberg hadn't yet begun to compose with his famous twelve-tone method at this point. And for the small comfort it provides, this writer can vouch that his own pleasure in the Five Pieces was immediate, instinctive and based on no intellectual considerations whatever.

Schoenberg himself was dubious of the value of words in relation to this specific work. About a request for titles from the publisher, he said: ". . . the music already expresses the ideas that are important — so why use words? If words were necessary you would use them in the first place, whereas in art you can express more than in words."

BUT HE WENT AHEAD and supplied titles anyway, with a stipulation that there should be a note saying they were added as a necessity of publication and not to provide "poetic" atmosphere. He needn't have worried for only the first two titles, "Premonitions" and "The Past," supply much in the way of poetry.

"Peripetia," No. 4, is a Greek term denoting the "turning point" in classical tragedy, and the music can be taken as representing cataclysmic upheaval. No. 5, "The Obbligato Recitative," doesn't yield at all to poetic interpretation.

THE MOST FAMOUS of the Five Pieces is the middle one, "Chord-Colors," which Schoenberg renamed "Summer Morning by a Lake" in his 1949 revision of the score. It is a remarkably beautiful piece and probably the one that least needs a title. Yet, in a stroke worthy of Dr. Sigmund Spaeth, the composer once went so far as to identify a "jumping fish" motive in it.

Finally, to give an idea of the equanimity with which some have viewed this music, the 1912 premiere of Op. 16 took place in London at a "Prom" concert conducted by Sir Henry Wood. Even so, it seems unlikely we'll be hearing the Five Pieces at Pops concerts this spring. Boston isn't quite ready for that.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

MAR 6 1970 Ne

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Friday afternoon March 6 1970 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening March 7 1970 at 8.30
Tuesday evening March 10 1970 at 8.30
Thursday evening March 12 1970 at 8.30

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS conductor

BEETHOVEN	Overture to Goethe's 'Egmont'	op. 84
SIBELIUS	Symphony no. 4 in A minor	op. 63
	Tempo molto moderato quasi adagio
	Allegro molto vivace
	Il tempo largo
	Allegro
intermission
SCHOENBERG	Five pieces for orchestra	op. 16
	Vorgefühle (Premonitions)
	Vergangenes (The past)
	Farben (Chord colors)
	Peripetia
	Das obligate Rezitativ (The obbligato recitative)
WAGNER	'Dawn' and 'Siegfried's Rhine journey'* from 'Die Götterdämmerung'

The concert on Tuesday is televised by WGBH-TV

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Tuesday evening March 3 1970 at 8.30

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS conductor

CONCERT IN MEMORY OF KARL MUCK

WAGNER	'Dawn' and 'Siegfried's Rhine journey'* from 'Die Götterdämmerung'
Robert STARER	Concerto for violin, cello and orchestra
	Moderato
	Presto
	Andante
	Maestoso – allegro
	JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN violin
	JULES ESKIN cello
intermission
BRAHMS	Symphony no. 2 in D	op. 73*
	Allegro non troppo
	Adagio non troppo
	Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino
	Allegro con spirito

KARL MUCK
October 22 1859 — March 3 1940

Karl Muck was Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra between 1906 and 1908, and again from 1912 to 1918. One of the foremost musicians of his generation, he came to Boston after establishing an enviable reputation in Europe. He had been conductor of the Landestheater in Prague and first conductor of the Berlin Opera; he had directed performances of Parsifal at Bayreuth, many Wagner operas at Covent Garden, he had conducted the Vienna Philharmonic, and had appeared in Paris, Rome, Brussels, Madrid and Copenhagen with enormous success. He was a master of orchestral discipline and an interpreter of impeccable taste.

Cont'd. on other side → flip down

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

MAR 8 1970 New England

Bernstein, Fiedler and Schuller to lead BSO for ailing Steinberg

The medical leave of Boston Symphony music director William Steinberg has necessitated changes of programs and conductors for the orchestra's remaining concerts this season in Symphony Hall.

The Beethoven Festival in April will be led by Leonard Bernstein, who will conduct the Ninth Symphony, and Max Rudolf who will be in charge of the four concerto concerts.

Pops maestro Arthur Fiedler will take over the Providence concert Mar. 26 and the New England Conservatory's president Gunther Schuller will conduct at Symphony Hall Mar. 27-28. The Boston Symphony's assistant conductor Michael Tilson Thomas will lead the orchestra's remaining concerts here and in New York.

Fiedler's program in Providence will be a repeat of his 75th birthday concert here Dec. 17: Dvorak's "New World" Symphony, Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto No. 1, with Earl Wild as soloist, and Respighi's "Pines of Rome."

40.

Douglas Glass

Tippett

BMI
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 16,000

MAY 1970

◆ The American premiere of Michael Tippett's "Symphony No. 2" was a highlight of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, February 20, in Symphony Hall, Boston. Colin Davis' conducted. The work was premiered in New York, February 25, at Philharmonic Hall.

Reviewing for Women's Wear Daily, Leighton Kerner found the work had "a rich quality of rhythmic invention and general listenability throughout." He cited, in particular, "a songful and quiet memorable slow movement."

Michael Steinberg (The Boston Globe) said: ". . . there is something so individual about its sound that it emerges as a very personal piece, strong, and unfailingly absorbing.

"The 'Symphony' is in four movements in traditional sequence. The first is an Allegro vigoroso whose springboard is a series of pounding C's to which Tippett returns at various points in the work. The Adagio is the richest and most original movement, one that abounds in striking orchestral ideas, the series of instrumental recitatives (high trumpet, oboe, trombone), the accompaniments for harp and piano (fascinatingly different—more sensuous—from Stravinsky's writing for them in his Scherzo), the effective contrast of this precisely etched solo-istic writing with the tutti sound of the middle section. There is a Scherzo whose metrical sophistications are most amusing, and, for a finale, a fantasia-like Allegro with a remarkable, genuinely long, melody that makes a gradual descent from high violins to the deepest bass."

The Tippett work, completed in 1957, is published in the United States by Schott/Belwin-Mills Publishing Corp.

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Tuesday evening March 3 1970 at 8.30

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS conductor

CONCERT IN MEMORY OF KARL MUCK

WAGNER — 'Dawn' and 'Siegfried's Rhine journey'* from 'Die Götterdämmerung'

Robert STARER — Concerto for violin, cello and orchestra
- Moderato
- Presto
- Andante
- Maestoso – allegro

JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN violin
JULES ESKIN cello

intermission

BRAHMS — Symphony no. 2 in D op. 73*
- Allegro non troppo
- Adagio non troppo
- Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino
- Allegro con spirito

KARL MUCK
October 22 1859 — March 3 1940

Karl Muck was Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra between 1906 and 1908, and again from 1912 to 1918. One of the foremost musicians of his generation, he came to Boston after establishing an enviable reputation in Europe. He had been conductor of the Landestheater in Prague and first conductor of the Berlin Opera; he had directed performances of Parsifal at Bayreuth, many Wagner operas at Covent Garden, he had conducted the Vienna Philharmonic, and had appeared in Paris, Rome, Brussels, Madrid and Copenhagen with enormous success. He was a master of orchestral discipline and an interpreter of impeccable taste.

Cont'd. on other side →
flip down

Patrons May Find Op. 16 Unsettling

Schoenberg for BSO

By HARRY NEVILLE
HT Music Critic

Arnold Schoenberg's Five Pieces for Orchestra, Op. 16, constitute what program annotators are fond of calling a "milestone" in musical history. Written in 1909, they are among the first compositions clearly to abandon tonality, or the feeling of a harmonic key center, that had for two centuries been a bulwark of Western musical thought.

Thus, in spite of their being over 60 years old, the Five Pieces represent for many listeners that special area of listening difficulty summed up by the term "modern music," by which is generally meant 20th century music one happens not to like.

TO BE PLAYED today and at the following three B.S.O. concerts, Op. 16 is likely to prove a mildly unsettling experience for many Symphony patrons — a little like an unpleasant medicine one has to take with an otherwise enjoyable meal. To someone who finds the music extraordinarily attractive, such a reaction is bound to seem a matter that can be straightened out with a bit of coaxing, and such was the original intent of this article.

What intervened was the realization that exposure to the music is the only truly effective help to its enjoyment, and that words, at best, can only try to create a receptive attitude.

FOR THOSE who approach Op. 16 with visions of a work elaborately constructed from tone rows and mathematical formulae it might be useful to know that Schoenberg hadn't yet begun to compose with his famous twelve-tone method at this point. And for the small comfort it provides, this writer 'can vouch that his own pleasure in the Five Pieces was immediate, instinctive and based on no intellectual considerations whatever.'

Schoenberg himself was dubious of the value of words in relation to this specific work. About a request for titles from the publisher, he said: ". . . the music already expresses the ideas that are important — so why use words? If words were necessary you would use them in the first place, whereas in art you can express more than in words."

BUT HE WENT AHEAD and supplied titles anyway, with a stipulation that there should be a note saying they were added as a necessity of publication and not to provide "poetic" atmosphere. He needn't have worried for only the first two titles, "Premonitions" and "The Past," supply much in the way of poetry.

"Peripetia," No. 4, is a Greek term denoting the "turning point" in classical tragedy, and the music can be taken as representing cataclysmic upheaval. No. 5, "The Obbligato Recitative," doesn't yield at all to poetic interpretation.

THE MOST FAMOUS of the Five Pieces is the middle one, "Chord-Colors," which Schoenberg renamed "Summer Morning by a Lake" in his 1949 revision of the score. It is a remarkably beautiful piece and probably the one that least needs a title. Yet, in a stroke worthy of Dr. Sigmund Spaeth, the composer once went so far as to identify a "jumping fish" motive in it.

Finally, to give an idea of the equanimity with which some have viewed this music, the 1912 premiere of Op. 16 took place in London at a "Prom" concert conducted by Sir Henry Wood. Even so, it seems unlikely we'll be hearing the Five Pieces at Pops concerts this spring. Boston isn't quite ready for that.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

MAR 6 1970

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Friday afternoon March 6 1970 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening March 7 1970 at 8.30
Tuesday evening March 10 1970 at 8.30
Thursday evening March 12 1970 at 8.30

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS conductor

BEETHOVEN — Overture to Goethe's 'Egmont' op. 84

SIBELIUS — Symphony no. 4 in A minor op. 63
- Tempo molto moderato quasi adagio
- Allegro molto vivace
- Il tempo largo
- Allegro

intermission

SCHOENBERG — Five pieces for orchestra op. 16
- Vorgefühle (Premonitions)
- Vergangenes (The past)
- Farben (Chord colors)
- Peripetia
- Das obligate Rezitativ (The obbligato recitative)

WAGNER — 'Dawn' and 'Siegfried's Rhine journey'* from 'Die Götterdämmerung'

The concert on Tuesday is televised by WGBH-TV

Bernstein, Fiedler and Schuller to lead BSO for ailing Steinberg

The medical leave of Boston Symphony music director William Steinberg has necessitated changes of programs and conductors for the orchestra's remaining concerts this season in Symphony Hall.

The Beethoven Festival in April will be led by Leonard Bernstein, who will conduct the Ninth Symphony, and Max Rudolf who will be in charge of the four concerto concerts.

Pops maestro Arthur Fielder will take over the Providence concert Mar. 26 and the New England Conservatory's president Gunther Schuller will conduct at Symphony Hall Mar. 27-28. The Boston Symphony's assistant conductor Michael Tilson Thomas will lead the orchestra's remaining concerts here and in New York.

Fiedler's program in Providence will be a repeat of his 75th birthday concert here Dec. 17: Dvorak's "New World" Symphony, Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto No. 1, with Earl Wild as soloist, and Respighi's "Pines of Rome."

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,372

MAR 8 1970 New England

[redacted]

Tippett

BMI
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 16.000

MAY 1970

ous—from Stravinsky's writing for them in his Scherzo), the effective contrast of this precisely etched solo-istic writing with the tutti sound of the middle section. There is a Scherzo whose metrical sophistications are most amusing, and, for a finale, a fantasia-like Allegro with a remarkable, genuinely long, melody that makes a gradual descent from high violins to the deepest bass."

The Tippett work, completed in 1957, is published in the United States by Schott/Belwin-Mills Publishing Corp.

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Tuesday evening March 3 1970 at 8.30

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS conductor

CONCERT IN MEMORY OF KARL MUCK

WAGNER — 'Dawn' and 'Siegfried's Rhine journey'* from 'Die Götterdämmerung'

Robert STARER — Concerto for violin, cello and orchestra
- Moderato
- Presto
- Andante
- Maestoso – allegro

JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN violin
JULES ESKIN cello

intermission

BRAHMS — Symphony no. 2 in D op. 73*
- Allegro non troppo
- Adagio non troppo
- Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino
- Allegro con spirito

The program of Dr Muck's first concert as Conductor of the Boston Symphony included Beethoven's Symphony no. 5 in C minor, and three pieces by Wagner, the Faust overture, Siegfried Idyll and the Prelude to Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg. During that concert, to quote M. A. DeWolfe Howe, Dr Muck 'paid the Orchestra a remarkable compliment, and at the same time assured the audience of his complete confidence in the Boston players, by laying down his baton in the midst of the Beethoven symphony and letting the music proceed without direction.'

The Orchestra's years under Dr Muck's leadership were marked by steady progress. Standards of performance were high and the repertoire was adventurous. He conducted new works by Schoenberg and Stravinsky, while inviting other contemporary composers to conduct their own works. At the end of the 1915-1916 season Philip Hale wrote in the Boston Herald: 'These concerts in Boston are so remarkable, they have been so remarkable under the leadership of Dr Muck, that they are now taken by too many as a matter of course. For the Boston Symphony Orchestra is not merely one that contains certain accomplished virtuosos; the orchestra is a virtuoso. It is an instrument that, having been brought to a state of perfect mechanism by Dr Muck, responds to his imaginative and poetic wishes. He stands there calm, undemonstrative, graceful, elegant, aristocratic; a man of singularly commanding and magnetic personality even in repose. The orchestra is his speech, the expression of the composer's music as it appeals to the conductor's brain, heart, and soul.'

Dr Muck's tenure came to a sad end in the spring of 1918, when he was arrested by the Federal Government under the Alien Enemy Act and interned at Fort Oglethorpe, Georgia, for the duration of the war. He returned in 1919 to Germany where he lived and worked until his death in Stuttgart in 1940.

It is appropriate that at this concert devoted to Karl Muck's memory there should be works by Brahms and Wagner, composers whose works he conducted so outstandingly, as well as a piece by a contemporary composer of this generation.

TO BE PLAYED today and at the following three B.S.O. concerts, Op. 16 is likely to prove a mildly unsettling experience for many Symphony patrons — a little like an unpleasant medicine one has to take with an otherwise enjoyable meal. To someone who finds the music extraordinarily attractive, such a reaction is bound to seem a matter that can be straightened out with a bit of coaxing, and such was the original intent of this article.

What intervened was the realization that exposure to the music is the only truly effective help to its enjoyment, and that words, at best, can only try to create a receptive attitude.

FOR THOSE who approach Op. 16 with visions of a work elaborately constructed from tone rows and mathematical formulae it might be useful to know that Schoenberg hadn't yet begun to compose with his famous twelve-tone method at this point. And for the small comfort it provides, this writer can vouch that his own pleasure in the Five Pieces was immediate, instinctive and based on no intellectual considerations whatever.

Schoenberg himself was dubious of the value of words in relation to this specific work. About a request for titles from the publisher, he said: ". . . the music already expresses the ideas that are important — so why use words? If words were necessary you would use them in the first place, whereas in art you can express more than in words."

BUT HE WENT AHEAD and supplied titles anyway, with a stipulation that there

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

MAR 8 1970 New England

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Friday afternoon March 6 1970 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening March 7 1970 at 8.30
Tuesday evening March 10 1970 at 8.30
Thursday evening March 12 1970 at 8.30

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS conductor

BEETHOVEN — Overture to Goethe's 'Egmont' op. 84

SIBELIUS — Symphony no. 4 in A minor op. 63
- Tempo molto moderato quasi adagio
- Allegro molto vivace
- Il tempo largo
- Allegro

intermission

SCHOENBERG — Five pieces for orchestra op. 16
- Vorgefühle (Premonitions)
- Vergangenes (The past)
- Farben (Chord colors)
- Peripetia
- Das obligate Rezitativ (The obbligato recitative)

WAGNER — 'Dawn' and 'Siegfried's Rhine journey'* from 'Die Götterdämmerung'

The concert on Tuesday is televised by WGBH-TV

Bernstein, Fiedler and Schuller to lead BSO for ailing Steinberg

The medical leave of Boston Symphony music director William Steinberg has necessitated changes of programs and conductors for the orchestra's remaining concerts this season in Symphony Hall.

The Beethoven Festival in April will be led by Leonard Bernstein, who will conduct the Ninth Symphony, and Max Rudolf who will be in charge of the four concerto concerts.

Pops maestro Arthur Fiedler will take over the Providence concert Mar. 26 and the New England Conservatory's president Gunther Schuller will conduct at Symphony Hall Mar. 27-28. The Boston Symphony's assistant conductor Michael Tilson Thomas will lead the orchestra's remaining concerts here and in New York.

Fiedler's program in Providence will be a repeat of his 75th birthday concert here Dec. 17: Dvorak's "New World" Symphony, Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto No. 1, with Earl Wild as soloist, and Respighi's "Pines of Rome."

Talents of Conductor Thomas Benefit Boston

By HARRY NEVILLE

Michael Tilson Thomas, who led yesterday afternoon's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, is one of the nicer things to happen recently to the Boston musical scene. By virtue of an exceptionally refined ear and a keen intellectual grasp of music he is bound to stand out as something special.

Add to those qualities a temperament that is sensitive to divergent stylistic requirements and a baton technique that can translate ideas effectively to the players and you have the basic attributes of a first-rate conductor, which is what he is.

AS WITH MOST young artists, his age, 24, is likely to figure in any discussion of his music-making, most often as an excuse for supposed immaturities of interpretation. No doubt his views of the music he conducts will change in the future, but the essential thing is that they are remarkably valid now.

Yesterday in those few instances where musical points seemed less than convincing, I suspect the causes were mainly under-rehearsal and short acquaintance with the score. In any event the least satisfactory items of the program, Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture and Wagner's "Dawn" and "Siegfried's Rhine Journey" from "Die Gotterdammerung," were probably chosen for the orchestra's and not Thomas's familiarity with them.

The "Egmont" Overture suffered from some technical failures with woodwind entrances, but what this listener missed most both in it and in the Wagner was a greater sense of the release of energy at climaxes. Not that one wants absolutely to be engulfed at the big moments, but one would like to be swept along in any case, and instead there was a feeling of too much control and holding back.

THE GREAT JOYS of the program were the readings of Sibelius' Symphony No. 4, last performed by the BSO in 1940, and Schoenberg's Five Pieces for Orchestra, which had not been played here since 1958.

Both works were stunningly set forth, and if one had to select the most impressive aspect of the performances I think it would be the absolute clarity with which the textures were presented.

The Sibelius is a severely economical work, ascetic in mood, brooding and bleak in outlook. In other words it corresponds very much with our traditional picture of the Nordic temperament. From the listening [illegible] going than the Symphony, which, by the way, [illegible] get an unusually warm response from the audience [illegible] tion by Friday afternoon's Symphony hall standards.

Also on the grateful list should be Jan Sibelius, whose intriguing Fourth Symphony Mr. Thomas resurrected after 30 years on the BSO shelf. Obviously the rhythmic complexities and off-beat sonorities inherent in this work provide the kind of challenges Mr. Thomas needs for sustenance. What he accomplished was certainly prodigious — the audience paid attention even beyond the point where a more experienced hand might have fought to control flagging interest — and it is apparent that in time Mr. Thomas will fill out and reevaluate the two last movements, where the listener thrashing began.

No one laughed Friday, at least audibly.

Herald Traveler 3-7-70

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850
MAR 9 1970

← An additional review of this concert may be found on page 42

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194.700
(S) 566,377
MAR 7 1970 New

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300
MAR 7 1970

Michael Thomas takes the helm at symphony

By Louis Snyder

The undreamed of opportunity that no young conductor could anticipate, and its realistic onerous fulfillment began over the weekend for Michael Tilson Thomas, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony. With the decision of William Steinberg, the orchestra's music director, not to return, for health reasons, until the summer at Tanglewood, it has become the responsibility of the second in command to take over the 20 or so concerts in Boston and on tour originally scheduled for Mr. Steinberg. Max Rudolf and Leonard Bernstein have been announced to conduct four concerts and one, respectively, of the special Beethoven Cycle to be played by the orchestra April 7 through 11 at Symphony Hall.

On Friday afternoon, in a program apparently as his own choice, young Mr. Thomas demonstrated very reassuringly what he is capable of accomplishing under pressure. Even a sudden heart-stopping mischance in the middle of the opening "Egmont" Overture of Beethoven didn't prevent him from picking up the pieces and proceeding unruffled to a triumphant ending. What was important was that the "Egmont," which has for years toddled along as a kind of time-marker for more interesting things to come, all at once became a piece on which some thought had been expended, and as a result assumed an identity of its own. Beethoven, in his two hundredth year of world exposure, should be grateful.

Also on the grateful list should be Jan Sibelius, whose intriguing Fourth Symphony Mr. Thomas resurrected after 30 years on the BSO shelf. Obviously the rhythmic complexities and off-beat sonorities inherent in this work provide the kind of challenges Mr. Thomas needs for sustenance. What he accomplished was certainly prodigious — the audience paid attention even beyond the point where a more experienced hand might have fought to control flagging interest — and it is apparent that in time Mr. Thomas will fill out and reevaluate the two last movements, where the listener thrashing began.

No one laughed Friday, at least audibly, which Olin Downes reported in program notes as the 1914 reaction to the first performance by the BSO of Schoenberg's "Five Pieces for Orchestra." Even 56 years later, these pieces are approached gingerly by audiences, but at least the mood is receptive and the sound has become idiomatic. Mr. Thomas was very much in control here, and the orchestra, individually and as a body, responded with a performance that reflected the lucid exposition impressed on it by its conductor.

As programmemaker, Mr. Thomas also relied on his ability to dazzle, otherwise Wagner's "Dawn and Siegfried's Rhine Journey" might have deflated as easily as a one-time nonrepertory balloon. However, summoning up the magnificent sound the Boston Symphony has to offer (anyone for a BSO "Ring"?), he built this "Götterdämmerung" excerpt into a cumulative, mind-tingling experience that nevertheless spoke with the same clear voice as the classic Beethoven, the diffuse Sibelius, and the quixotic Schoenberg.

Thomas Has Promise --Is Comer at BSO

By L. DAVID HARRIS
Music Critic

There was a certain amount of anxiety present at yesterday's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, but there was brightness too.

The occasion was a program of Beethoven, Sibelius, Schoenberg and Wagner music conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas, the symphony's assistant conductor. Senior Conductor William Steinberg presently is recovering from an illness and hospitalization.

Thomas improved as the concert progressed — as did the Symphony. The opening Beethoven "Egmont Overture" didn't really ever catch on — there were intonation problems, musicians missed cues and much of the overture's verve seemed rather anemic.

Thomas seemed more at ease with the more contemporary fourth symphony of Sibelius. Although strained at times, Thomas gave the work a kind of unity that was impressive in that it has few themes, but only hints and fragments, fugitive phrases and sudden changes of tones that appear as if from nowhere and then vanish as surprisingly as they arrived.

Musically, the symphony's third movement was the most impressive. (There was too little distinction between the first two.) The last movement was a disappointment, but through no fault of Thomas—the movement ends with extreme dissonances without any real sense of affirmation (or defeat) in the symphony's climax.

On the whole, Thomas made it a rather strange, unreal fantasy—a little placid, a little sinister — with an always fragile substance that never allowed it to assume the musical forms of other more conventional symphonies. Thomas carried this unreal quality throughout the symphony. It would be conjecture as to whether he intended to do so.

Schoenberg's "Five Pieces for Orchestra" came next — a superb listening experience and well handled.

A few compliments: In the first piece — well handled rhythms, very fine solo sections along with solo combinations, competent exhibitions of dynamic ranges of notes from many instrumentalists.

The second piece — good distinctions made between color and pitch (in contrast to some rather bad intonations earlier in the program). This was particularly true with a kind of "upward edging" of pitch ranges for some instruments.

The third piece — excellent use of diminution and Thomas had adequate control of the music's constantly changing speeds. The piece also had a strikingly well done ending.

The fifth piece—good blending of harmonics, fine control over the four-, five- and six-part counterpoint sections.

Of course, all of these comments are too brief. They scarcely convey the imagination and craft of the music—qualities Thomas knows well. "Five Pieces" is one of the best contemporary musical experiences available in symphonic programming.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000
MAR 12 1970

Thomas leads BSO

By Craig Smith

Imaginative programming was the most outstanding point of yesterday afternoon's Boston Symphony concert. Assistant conductor Michael Tilson Thomas must be lauded for his coupling of heroic Beethoven with heroic Sibelius on the first half of the program, and for pairing Schoenberg's "Five Pieces for Orchestra" Opus 16 with "Dawn" and "Siegfried's Rhine Journey" from "Die Gotterdammerung" by Wagner on the second half.

The second half in particular was an example of what thoughtful programming can do in order to clarify historical and esthetic perspectives in music Schoenberg's "Five Pieces" are, in themselves, colorful, superbly orchestrated vignettes. When juxtaposed with Wagner's stirring "Siegfried" music their stature as a major work in the development of German music becomes apparent.

After a tentative, rhythmically lax beginning in Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture, Thomas, in Sibelius' fascinati mented 4th showed himself every way equa mands of thi work. If the p was lacking th rhythmic stead can make a di like this coalesce ly, it had the vir traordinary ca clarification of esting textures ius devised; fine ing, especially Eskin; and a

The Boston Globe Saturday, March 14, 1970

Tilson Thomas conducts BSO in J.C. Bach and Stravinsky

By Craig Smith

Exciting things are happening at Symphony Hall these days. Yesterday's concert was just one example of the imaginative programming and new vitality that assistant conductor Michael Tilson Thomas has brought to the Boston Symphony.

Opening with J. C. Bach's elegant E Major Symphony for Double Orchestra, Thomas elicited from the orchestra some of the most suave, refined playing that this listener has heard from any group of that size. The Andante in particular was so liquid in phrasing yet rhythmically so steady that the subdivided sixteenth-note triplets of one orchestra, smoothly deployed against the duple rhythm melody of the other orchestra, never sounded stiff or uncomfortable. All in all a delightful work superbly played.

Stravinsky's dramatic "Symphony in Three Movements" was composed during the second war. While rhythmically it seems to harken back to the days of "Le Sacre du Printemps," there are fascinating anticipations of Stravinsky's rediscovery of chromaticism which was to occur about ten years later. The performance was splendid, a little slower, perhaps than Stravinsky's own recorded version but nevertheless very idiomatic and clear in textures.

The final work on the program was Tchaikovsky's melancholy First Symphony. It is an interesting piece, not so successful as the equally ignored Third Symphony, played last week by the Civic Symphony, but nevertheless worthy of more hearings than it gets. Thomas wisely moved the work along at a good clip so that the somewhat bathetic string writing didn't get out of hand. He was also unusually successful in tying together the diffuse Rondo, the weakest movement of the four. The orchestral playing, as in the rest of the concert, was on an extremely high level.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194.700
(S) 566,377
MAR 15 1970 New

BOSTON HERALD
TRAVELER, SATURDAY, MARCH 14, 1970

Symphony Explores New Paths

By HARRY NEVILLE
HT Music Critic

Despite pleas from composers and critics, it seems obvious for a number of reasons that symphony orchestras will continue to draw their fare almost entirely from a few time-tested works by a few time-tested composers. And one doesn't have to be keenly sympathetic to unplayed contemporary composers in order to feel disgrunteled with this situation.

There is a wealth of exciting and worthwhile music, much of it by familiar composers, which seldom gets played and whose performance would even sharpen our perceptions of the present repertory. It's shameful that conductors, by and large, show so little interest in exploring these neglected musical byways of the 18th, 19th and early 20th centuries.

MICHAEL TILSON Thomas is clearly an exception to this way of thinking, and his concerts with the Boston Symphony have been models of sensible, imaginative programming.

Yesterday afternoon's concert included Stravinsky's Symphony in Three Movements, which though played in 1967 is by no means a standard BSO item. For the rest there was a fine 18th century work, apparently never before heard in Boston, and a Tchaikovsky selection last performed by the orchestra in 1934.

The 18th century work was the Symphony for Double Orchestra in E-flat, Op.18, No. 1, by Johann Christian Bach, one of the sons of Johann Sebastian. It is an immensely attractive work, full of grace and good spirits, and Thomas drew an appropriately elegant reading from the orchestra.

STRAVINSKY'S Symphony got decidedly less refined treatment. Something of its eruptive and pulsating energy did come across, but in a way that was abrasive and detrimental to the textures, of which Thomas is usually very respectful. Principal offenders were the pianist and the brass section, both of which seemed to have been carried away by the aggressiveness of some of the writing.

Tchaikovsky's First Symphony bears the title "Winter Daydreams," with the more specific headings "A Wintry Road" and "Land of Gloom" for the first and second movements. There seems no programmatic intent, only a series of mood pictures, and despite the titles the wintriness and gloom isn't supported by the music, which is rather nostalgic in character.

Despite a false string entrance at the beginning, the orchestra played with nice attention to detail, and the gently restrained adagio emerged as especially appealing. Perhaps now in some future program the BSO will give us Tchaikovsky's equally neglected Second and Third symphonies.

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Friday afternoon March 13 1970 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening March 14 1970 at 8.30
Tuesday evening March 17 1970 at 8.30
Thursday evening March 19 1970 at 8.30

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS conductor

J. C. BACH — Symphony for double orchestra in E flat op. 18 no. 1
Allegro spiritoso
Andante
Allegro

first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

STRAVINSKY — Symphony in three movements
Allegro (quarter note = 160)
Andante (eighth note = 76) –
Interlude: l'istesso tempo –
Con moto (quarter note = 108)

intermission

TCHAIKOVSKY — Symphony no. 1 in G minor op. 13 'Winter daydreams'
Allegro tranquillo (Daydreams on a wintry road)
Adagio cantabile, ma non tanto (Land of gloom; land of mists)
Scherzo: allegro scherzando giocoso
Finale: andante lugubre – allegro maestoso – allegro vivo

Tilson Thomas to lead B.S.O.

Michael Tilson Thomas, the Boston Symphony's assistant conductor, will direct the orchestra's concerts here this week and on tour next week. He takes over also the regular concert subscription dates in April that the Orchestra's music director William Steinberg has been forced to relinquish because of illness. Programs for the April concerts will be announced later.

Mar. 17 and 19 at 8:30—J.C. Bach's E flat Sinfonia for double orchestra, Stravinsky's Symphony in Three Movements, and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 1.

Mar. 20 at 2 and Mar. 21 at 8:30—Ruth Crawford Seeger's Andante for String Orchestra, "Sun-Treader" by Carl Ruggles, "Sheherazade," the Ravel poem for soprano and orchestra, aria "Bella mia fiamma," both with Benita Valente, and Mozart's Symphony No. 34.

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS CONDUCTS BSO

By HAROLD C. SPROUL

In this season of thaw and flood the musical spate of Boston is also cresting. Critical coverage must be condensed.

The Boston Symphony is fortunate in having Michael Tilson Thomas to carry on. Any doubts about his ability to do right by a broad repertoire should be soothed by his Friday dealings with Beethoven, Sibelius, Schoenberg and Wagner. The "Overture to Egmont" op. 84, had the heavy crush of power and the dramatic struggle for liberation that Goethe imagined—Thomas taking a fresh look at tempos, accents, etc., that took the traditional grime off the bust of Beethoven.

Sibelius' Fourth, lifting out of the grumble of basses, was effectively brooding in its stark way, short motives in search of a theme—the 'cellos magnificent with woody sonority (Mr. Eskin's solo 'cello especially eloquent). Schoenberg's Five Pieces, op. 16, was composed about the same time but was even more shocking to Boston audiences in 1914—a tonal, rhythms slipping past each other, sudden harsh climaxes, melodic lines tossed from one instrument to another. An "intellectual" composer, certainly; but remember that the third movement (chord colors) was inspired by nature—the shift of light on a morning sea. (Contemporary composers sometimes imitate the technique without the inner reason.)

The Wagner excerpts from Gotterdammerung with their compilation of melodic motifs in bland harmony reassured any Friday ladies who had been wondering if they might slip out to start cocktails and dinner. But, in truth, Dawn and Siegfried's Rhine Journey, are still strong music—the motifs good metaphor for attitude and feeling, and the magnificent brass still able to shift the weight of the world in a way not heard since except in Bruckner and Hindemith.

To read Mr. Thomas's own notes on the music is to realize how much an informed intelligence directs his sensitive musical intuition and conducting skill.

Talents of Conductor Thomas Benefit Boston

By HARRY NEVILLE

Michael Tilson Thomas, who led yesterday afternoon's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, is one of the nicer things to happen recently to the Boston musical scene. By virtue of an exceptionally refined ear and a keen intellectual grasp of music he is bound to stand out as something special.

Add to those qualities a temperament that is sensitive to divergent stylistic requirements and a baton technique that can translate ideas effectively to the players and you have the basic attributes of a first-rate conductor, which is what he is.

AS WITH MOST young artists, his age, 24, is likely to figure in any discussion of his music-making, most often as an excuse for supposed immaturities of interpretation. No doubt his views of the music he conducts will change in the future, but the essential thing is that they are remarkably valid now.

Yesterday in those few instances where musical points seemed less than convincing, I suspect the causes were mainly under-rehearsal and short acquaintance with the score. In any event the least satisfactory items of the program, Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture, and Wagner's "Dawn" and "Siegfried's Rhine Journey" from "Die Gotterdammerung," were probably chosen for the orchestra's and not Thomas's familiarity with them.

The "Egmont" Overture suffered from some technical failures with woodwind entrances, but what this listener missed most both in it and in the Wagner was a greater sense of the release of energy at climaxes. Not that one wants absolutely to be engulfed at the big moments, but one would like to be swept along in any case, and instead there was a feeling of too much control and holding back.

THE GREAT JOYS of the program were the readings of Sibelius' Symphony No. 4, last performed by the BSO in 1940, and Schoenberg's Five Pieces for Orchestra, which had not been played here since 1958.

Both works were stunningly set forth, and if one had to select the most impressive aspect of the performances I think it would be the absolute clarity with which the textures were presented.

The Sibelius is a severely economical work, ascetic in mood, brooding and bleak in outlook. In other words, it corresponds very much with our traditional picture of the Nordic temperament. For this listener it is more difficult going than the Schoenberg, which, by the way, seemed to get an unusually warm reception by Friday afternoon Symphony Hall standards.

Herald Traveler
3-7-70

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

MAR 9 1970

Michael Thomas takes the helm at symphony

By Louis Snyder

The undreamed of opportunity that no young conductor could anticipate, and its realistic onerous fulfillment began over the weekend for Michael Tilson Thomas, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony. With the decision of William Steinberg, the orchestra's music director, not to return, for health reasons, until the summer at Tanglewood, it has become the responsibility of the second in command to take over the 20 or so concerts in Boston and on tour originally scheduled for Mr. Steinberg. Max Rudolf and Leonard Bernstein have been announced to conduct four concerts and one, respectively, of the special Beethoven Cycle to be played by the orchestra April 7 through 11 at Symphony Hall.

On Friday afternoon, in a program apparently of his own choice, young Mr. Thomas demonstrated very reassuringly what he is capable of accomplishing under pressure. Even a sudden heart-stopping mischance in the middle of the opening "Egmont" Overture of Beethoven didn't prevent him from picking up the pieces and proceeding unruffled to a triumphant ending. What was important was that the "Egmont," which has for years toddled along as a kind of time-marker for more interesting things to come, all at once became a piece on which some thought had been expended, and as a result assumed an identity of its own. Beethoven, in his two hundredth year of world exposure, should be grateful.

Also on the grateful list should be Jan Sibelius, whose intriguing Fourth Symphony Mr. Thomas resurrected after 30 years on the BSO shelf. Obviously the rhythmic complexities and off-beat sonorities inherent in this work provide the kind of challenges Mr. Thomas needs for sustenance. What he accomplished was certainly prodigious — the audience paid attention even beyond the point where a more experienced hand might have fought to control flagging interest — and it is apparent that in time Mr. Thomas will fill out and reevaluate the two last movements, where the listener thrashing began.

No one laughed Friday, at least audibly, which Olin Downes reported in program notes as the 1914 reaction to the first performance by the BSO of Schoenberg's "Five Pieces for Orchestra." Even 56 years later, these pieces are approached gingerly by audiences, but at least the mood is receptive and the sound has become idiomatic. Mr. Thomas was very much in control here, and the orchestra, individually and as a body, responded with a performance that reflected the lucid exposition impressed on it by its conductor.

As programmaker, Mr. Thomas also relied on his ability to dazzle, otherwise Wagner's "Dawn and Siegfried's Rhine Journey" might have deflated as easily as a one-time nonrepertory balloon. However, summoning up the magnificent sound the Boston Symphony has to offer (anyone for a BSO "Ring"?), he built this "Götterdämmerung" excerpt into a cumulative, mind-tingling experience that nevertheless spoke with the same clear voice as the classic Beethoven, the diffuse Sibelius, and the quixotic Schoenberg.

← An additional review of this concert may be found on page 42

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

MAR 7 1970 New

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300

MAR 7 1970

Thomas leads BSO

By Craig Smith

Imaginative programming was the most outstanding point of yesterday afternoon's Boston Symphony concert. Assistant conductor Michael Tilson Thomas must be lauded for his coupling of heroic Beethoven with heroic Sibelius on the first half of the program, and for pairing Schoenberg's "Five Pieces for Orchestra" Opus 16 with "Dawn" and "Siegfried's Rhine Journey" from "Die Gotterdammerung" by Wagner on the second half.

The second half in particular was an example of what thoughtful programming can do in order to clarify historical and esthetic perspectives in music Schoenberg's "Five Pieces" are, in themselves, colorful, superbly orchestrated vignettes. When juxtaposed with Wagner's stirring "Siegfried" music their stature as a major work in the development of German music becomes apparent.

After a tentative, rhythmically lax beginning in Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture, Thomas, in Sibelius' fascinati mented 4th showed himself every way equal mands of this work. If the p was lacking th rhythmic stead can make a dif like this coalesce ly, it had the vir traordinary ca clarification of esting textures ius devised; fine ing, especially Eskin; and a

Thomas Has Promise --Is Comer at BSO

By L. DAVID HARRIS
Music Critic

There was a certain amount of anxiety present at yesterday's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, but there was brightness too.

The occasion was a program of Beethoven, Sibelius, Schoenberg and Wagner music conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas, the symphony's assistant conductor. Senior Conductor William Steinberg presently is recovering from an illness and hospitalization.

Thomas improved as the concert progressed — as did the Symphony. The opening Beethoven "Egmont Overture" didn't really ever catch on — there were intonation problems, musicians missed cues and much of the overture's verve seemed rather anemic.

Thomas seemed more at ease with the more contemporary fourth symphony of Sibelius. Although strained at times, Thomas gave the work a kind of unity that was impressive in that it has few themes, but only hints and fragments, fugitive phrases and sudden changes of tones that appear as if from nowhere and then vanish as surprisingly as they arrived.

Musically, the symphony's third movement was the most impressive. (There was too little distinction between the first two.) The last-movement was a disappointment, but through no fault of Thomas—the movement ends with extreme dissonances without any real sense of affirmation (or defeat) in the symphony's climax.

On the whole, Thomas made it a rather strange, unreal fantasy—a little placid, a little sinister — with an always fragile substance that never allowed it to assume the musical forms of other more conventional symphonies. Thomas carried this unreal quality throughout the symphony. It would be conjecture as to whether he intended to do so.

Schoenberg's "Five Pieces for Orchestra" came next — a superb listening experience and well handled.

A few compliments: In the first piece — well handled rhythms, very fine solo sections along with solo combinations, competent exhibitions of dynamic ranges of notes from many instrumentalists.

The second piece — good distinctions made between color and pitch (in contrast to some rather bad intonations earlier in the program). This was particularly true with a kind of "upward edging" of pitch ranges for some instruments.

The third piece — excellent use of diminution and Thomas had adequate control of the music's constantly changing speeds. The piece also had a strikingly well done ending.

The fifth piece—good blending of harmonics, fine control over the four-, five- and six-part counterpoint sections.

Of course, all of these comments are too brief. They scarcely convey the imagination and craft of the music—qualities Thomas knows well. "Five Pieces" is one of the best contemporary musical experiences available in symphonic programming.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000
MAR 12 1970

The Boston Globe Saturday, March 14, 1970

Tilson Thomas conducts BSO in J.C. Bach and Stravinsky

By Craig Smith

Exciting things are happening at Symphony Hall these days. Yesterday's concert was just one example of the imaginative programming and new vitality that assistant conductor Michael Tilson Thomas has brought to the Boston Symphony.

Opening with J. C. Bach's elegant E Major Symphony for Double Orchestra, Thomas elicited from the orchestra some of the most suave, refined playing that this listener has heard from any group of that size. The Andante in particular was so liquid in phrasing yet rhythmically so steady that the subdivided sixteenth-note triplets of one orchestra, smoothly deployed against the duple rhythm melody of the other orchestra, never sounded stiff or uncomfortable. All in all a delightful work superbly played.

Stravinsky's dramatic "Symphony in Three Movements" was composed during the second war. While rhythmically it seems to harken back to the days of "Le Sacre du Printemps," there are fascinating anticipations of Stravinsky's rediscovery of chromaticism which was to occur about ten years later. The performance was splendid, a little slower, perhaps than Stravinsky's own recorded version but nevertheless very idiomatic and clear in textures.

The final work on the program was Tchaikovsky's melancholy First Symphony. It is an interesting piece, not so successful as the equally ignored Third Symphony, played last week by the Civic Symphony, but nevertheless worthy of more hearings than it gets. Thomas wisely moved the work along at a good clip so that the somewhat bathetic string writing didn't get out of hand. He was also unusually successful in tying together the diffuse Rondo, the weakest movement of the four. The orchestral playing, as in the rest of the concert, was on an extremely high level.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967
(S) 566,377 (E) 194,700

MAR 15 1970 New

Tilson Thomas to lead B.S.O.

Michael Tilson Thomas, the Boston Symphony's assistant conductor, will direct the orchestra's concerts here this week and on tour next week. He takes over also the regular concert subscription dates in April that the Orchestra's music director William Steinberg has been forced to relinquish because of illness. Programs for the April concerts will be announced later.

Mar. 17 and 19 at 8:30—J.C. Bach's E flat Sinfonia for double orchestra, Stravinsky's Symphony in Three Movements, and Tchaikovský's Symphony No. 1.

Mar. 20 at 2 and Mar. 21 at 8:30—Ruth Crawford Seeger's Andante for String Orchestra, "Sun-Treader" by Carl Ruggles, "Sheherazade," the Ravel poem for soprano and orchestra, aria "Bella mia fiamma," both with Benita Valente, and Mozart's Symphony No. 34.

BOSTON HERALD
TRAVELER, SATURDAY, MARCH 14, 1970

Symphony Explores New Paths

By HARRY NEVILLE
HT Music Critic

Despite pleas from composers and critics, it seems obvious for a number of reasons that symphony orchestras will continue to draw their fare almost entirely from a few time-tested works by a few time-tested composers. And one doesn't have to be keenly sympathetic to unplayed contemporary composers in order to feel disgrunteled with this situation.

There is a wealth of exciting and worthwhile music, much of it by familiar composers, which seldom gets played and whose performance would even sharpen our perceptions of the present repertory. It's shameful that conductors, by and large, show so little interest in exploring these neglected musical byways of the 18th, 19th and early 20th centuries.

MICHAEL TILSON Thomas is clearly an exception to this way of thinking, and his concerts with the Boston Symphony have been models of sensible, imaginative programming.

Yesterday afternoon's concert included Stravinsky's Symphony in Three Movements, which though played in 1967 is by no means a standard BSO item. For the rest there was a fine 18th century work, apparently never before heard in Boston, and a Tchaikovsky selection last performed by the orchestra in 1934.

The 18th century work was the Symphony for Double Orchestra in E-flat, Op.18, No. 1, by Johann Christian Bach, one of the sons of Johann Sebastian. It is an immensely attractive work, full of grace and good spirits, and Thomas drew an appropriately elegant reading from the orchestra.

STRAVINSKY'S Symphony got decidedly less refined treatment. Something of its eruptive and pulsating energy did come across, but in a way that was abrasive and detrimental to the textures, of which Thomas is usually very respectful. Principal offenders were the pianist and the brass section, both of which seemed to have been carried away by the aggressiveness of some of the writing.

Tchaikovsky's First Symphony bears the title "Winter Daydreams," with the more specific headings "A Wintry Road" and "Land of Gloom" for the first and second movements. There seems no programmatic intent, only a series of mood pictures, and despite the titles the wintriness and gloom isn't supported by the music, which is rather nostalgic in character.

Despite a false string entrance at the beginning, the orchestra played with nice attention to detail, and the gently restrained adagio emerged as especially appealing. Perhaps now in some future program the BSO will give us Tchaikovsky's equally neglected Second and Third symphonies.

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Friday afternoon March 13 1970 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening March 14 1970 at 8.30
Tuesday evening March 17 1970 at 8.30
Thursday evening March 19 1970 at 8.30

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS conductor

J. C. BACH — Symphony for double orchestra in E flat op. 18 no. 1
Allegro spiritoso
Andante
Allegro

first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

STRAVINSKY — Symphony in three movements
Allegro (quarter note = 160)
Andante (eighth note = 76) – Interlude: l'istesso tempo –
Con moto (quarter note = 108)

intermission

TCHAIKOVSKY — Symphony no. 1 in G minor op. 13 'Winter daydreams'
Allegro tranquillo (Daydreams on a wintry road)
Adagio cantabile, ma non tanto (Land of gloom; land of mists)
Scherzo: allegro scherzando giocoso
Finale: andante lugubre – allegro maestoso – allegro vivo

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS CONDUCTS BSO

By HAROLD C. SPROUL

In this season of thaw and flood the musical spate of Boston is also cresting. Critical coverage must be condensed.

The Boston Symphony is fortunate in having Michael Tilson Thomas to carry on. Any doubts about his ability to do right by a broad repertoire should be soothed by his Friday dealings with Beethoven, Sibelius, Schoenberg and Wagner. The "Overture to Egmont" op. 84, had the heavy crush of power and the dramatic struggle for liberation that Goethe imagined—Thomas taking a fresh look at tempos, accents, etc., that took the traditional grime off the bust of Beethoven.

Sibelius' Fourth, lifting out of the grumble of basses, was effectively brooding in its stark way, short motives in search of a theme—the 'cellos magnificent with woody sonority (Mr. Eskin's solo 'cello especially eloquent). Schoenberg's Five Pieces, op. 16, was composed about the same time but was even more shocking to Boston audiences in 1914—a tonal, rhythms slipping past each other, sudden harsh climaxes, melodic lines tossed from one instrument to another. An "intellectual" composer, certainly; but remember that the third movement (chord colors) was inspired by nature—the shift of light on a morning sea. (Contemporary composers sometimes imitate the technique without the inner reason.)

The Wagner excerpts from Gotterdammerung with their compilation of melodic motifs in bland harmony reassured any Friday ladies who had been wondering if they might slip out to start cocktails and dinner. But, in truth, Dawn and Siegfried's Rhine Journey, are still strong music—the motifs good metaphor for attitude and feeling, and the magnificent brass still able to shift the weight of the world in a way not heard since except in Bruckner and Hindemith.

To read Mr. Thomas's own notes on the music is to realize how much an informed intelligence directs his sensitive musical intuition and conducting skill.

42.

Poised New Baton

By Peter M. Knapp

Michael Tilson Thomas, the dynamic 24-year-old assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony, is making the most of his extraordinary opportunity.

Last October, he stepped in, to critical acclaim, when Music Director William Steinberg became ill during the orchestra's concerts in New York. Now, because of Steinberg's current illness, Thomas has taken over the orchestra for the rest of the season.

The orchestra is in secure and interesting hands. Despite his youth, Thomas has poise, maturity and a good dash of charisma. He handles himself like a veteran. And his music-making, on the basis of the two Thomas-led concerts this reviewer has heard this season, has been among the most satisfying of the BSO's programs.

'London' Bach

Last night's program spanned music of the last three centuries: Johann Christian Bach's Symphony for double orchestra in E-flat, Opus 18, No. 1; Igor Stravinsky's Symphony in Three Movements, and Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 1 in g minor. All of it was a pleasure.

Johnann Sebastian Bach's talented sons get little play these days, which is unfortunate. Not up to the imposing stature of their father, they nevertheless were musicians of imagination and ingenuity. The youngest, Johann Christian (1735-1782) — who changed his name according to location, being Giovanni Cristiano in Italy, Jean-Cretien France and John Christian Bach in England — finally settled down in London, where he wrote three sinfonia for double orchestra about the time of the American Revolution.

The first of these, played last night, is a delightful, Mozartian work, using the two orchestras for antiphonal or echo effects and showing a very handy way with melody. The opening seems a close quotation of Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony, though Bach got there first. And aside from a few rough moments, the work was played with style and charm.

Exciting Strevinsky

Stravinsky's masterly symphony dates from the mid-1940s. Clear in texture and structure, it jigs and jags along on the composer's characteristic ostinati. Thomas has a keen rhythmic sense, and his Stravinsky with its lean sound, clarity, precise meters and thrusting accents, was always purposeful and often exciting — the high point of the evening.

The early Tschaikowsky symphony was last played by the BSO in 1934, and this hearing was not so much of a bore as anticipated. No. 1, subtitled, "Winter Daydreams", is long-winded, but generally free from bombast until the coda of the finale, and it does contain a healthy dosage of those dark and sweet Tschaikowsky melodies and the composer's skill in orchestration. The prevailing mood is gentle and the whole, fervently conducted and played, is akin to the later ballet music.

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,387

MAR 18 1970

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Friday afternoon March 20 1970 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening March 21 1970 at 8.30

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS conductor

SEEGER — Andante for string orchestra
first performance in Boston

RUGGLES — Sun-treader
first performance in Boston

intermission

MOZART — 'Ruhe sanft, mein holdes Leben' from Zaide K. 344
BENITA VALENTE soprano

MOZART — 'Exsultate, jubilate' motet for soprano K. 165
Allegro – Recitativo –
Andante – Vivace
BENITA VALENTE soprano

MOZART — Symphony no. 34 in C K. 338
Allegro vivace
Andante di molto
Minuet & trio (K. 409)
Finale: allegro vivace

THE SOLOIST

BENITA VALENTE, who comes from Delano, California, won the Metropolitan Opera Auditions in 1960. When she was soprano-in-residence at the Marlboro Festival, she sang in many concerts with Rudolf Serkin, and later made recordings with him for Columbia Records. She became well known in the musical world, and in 1962 started her successful European career, appearing at the Zürich and Freiburg Operas among other places. She now sings frequently both in Europe and the United States. During the past seasons she has appeared with the Baltimore Opera, the Dallas Symphony, the Philadelphia Orchestra and the Cincinnati Symphony. She has also been heard recently in Berlin, Hamburg, Amsterdam, Stuttgart, Cologne, Bonn and Nuremberg.

Last season she sang with the Detroit Symphony, the Kansas Philharmonic, the New Orleans Philharmonic, at the Philharmonic Hall Haydn-Mozart Festival and in recital in New York, Boston and Cleveland. During the summer of 1969 she took part in Rossini's L'Italiana in Algeri and in the chamber music series at the Festival of two worlds at Spoleto. Benita Valente made her debut with the Boston Symphony in January 1969, singing the role of Najade in the American première of the original version of Strauss' Ariadne auf Naxos.

AWARD FOR PROGRAM NOTES OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

At a special press conference held on Thursday March 19 in the Auditorium of the Library and Museum of the Performing Arts at Lincoln Center, New York, Stanley Adams, President of the American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers, presented a Prize for articles and a check for $300 to James Lyons for his notes for the program book of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the 1967-1968 season.

James Lyons, who has regularly contributed notes during the past three seasons, is Editor of the American Record Guide. He was born in Peabody, Massachusetts, and is an alumnus of the New England Conservatory and a graduate of Boston University. He wrote about music for The Boston Post and The Boston Globe, and contributed to The Christian Science Monitor; he was editor and critic for Musical America. He also teaches psychology at New York University.

Michael Thomas and the BSO

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR
Monday, March 16, 1970

Music 'hewn and shaped before one's eyes'

By Louis Snyder

. . . everything worked to produce that rare concert-going feeling — of not wanting the music to end.

There was nothing usual about the Boston Symphony program Michael Tilson Thomas conducted during the weekend at Symphony Hall, even though the composers represented were Bach, Stravinsky, and Tchaikovsky. And nothing usual about the way the orchestra played it, either. The program will be repeated tomorrow and Thursday evenings.

Bach, Johann Christian this time, was represented by a Symphony for Double Orchestra in E flat, never performed in Boston before to anyone's knowledge, and a complete charmer. Stravinsky's Symphony in Three Movements, which was introduced to Boston in 1946 by the composer himself, is still something of a novelty although it was conducted here three years ago by Colin Davis. And the First Symphony of Tchaikovsky, last played by the orchestra in 1934, and as neglected almost everywhere else, comes under the head of a surprising new experience for most listeners.

Top of the season

It turned out to be the most diverting concert of the year so far, what with these fresh and contrasting scores, Mr. Thomas's clear and effulgent molding of them, and superlative playing by the musicians, together and singly. The season has not been without its high points, but this time everything worked to produce that rare concert-going feeling—of not wanting the music to end.

The strong bond that seems to exist between Mr. Thomas and the orchestra must be responsible for this, because understanding of music, which the conductor fairly exudes, is translated into superlative sound through an almost visible responsive process. It was evidenced in the stylishness of the Bach, the sophisticated orderliness of the Stravinsky, and the simple revelation of the Tchaikovsky—an overwhelming impression that music is being hewn and shaped before one's eyes.

A way with Stravinsky

The three works received the performances of their lives. The Bach Symphony which divided the orchestra in two on opposite sides of the stage, revealed how much there is still to know and appreciate about this skilled predecessor of Mozart, besides his expert craftsmanship and melodic and rhythmic inventiveness. It was played crisply and concisely, giving real pleasure.

Mr. Thomas has a way of delineating the music of Stravinsky with an almost mathematical clarity and purity, which on this occasion showed the three-movement symphony for the elegant piece it is. Here, as throughout the afternoon on Friday, there is much for instrumentalists to do solo or by sections, and the playing was of unfailing quality.

The Tchaikovsky is, of course, like seeing for the first time an early picture of someone we know very well. And realizing immediately that the features we admire most are there in bold recognizable form. (The same sensation occurred earlier in the week when Tchaikovsky's Third Symphony was played by the Civic Symphony.) There is certainly nothing immature about this first work, and it is too bad that it has not been used to give the Fourth, Fifth, and Sixth symphonies a rest all these years. Certainly, the quasi-impressionistic Adagio ("Land of gloom; land of mists") and the Scherzo in which a "new" typically Tchaikovskian melody soars are enough in themselves to give the symphony a belated popularity.

Enthusiasm was at a high pitch throughout the program on Friday, with Mr. Thomas being singled out for applause, both by the audience and by his colleages. It was a heartening occasion, which made reports of waning interest in symphonic music seem irresponsible indeed.

BOSTON AFTER DARK
March 18 1970

BSO under Thomas: met every challenge

(from concert on page 40)

by Lawrence P. Katzenstein

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has played at least two concerts of extra-special importance this season—both of them led by Assistant Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas. Last fall Thomas played a program of Stravinsky, Ives, and Debussy. Friday and Saturday, March 6 and 7 (replacing the still-ailing William Steinberg), he explored Beethoven, Schoenberg, Sibelius, and Wagner.

Schoenberg's Five Pieces for Orchestra and the Fourth Symphony of Sibelius—both wonderfully innovative masterpieces from the early part of the 20th century—were the core of the program.

The Sibelius is one of his most profound achievements, and unfairly neglected (the last performance of it in Boston was by Koussevitzky in 1940). Reasons for this neglect are not hard to find, though: it is bleak, uncompromising music. Sibelius's personal means of expression become clear only with complete familiarity. The Fourth Symphony is intense, introspective, pessimistic, and — I think — enormously moving music. But its formalistic innovations take some getting used to—particularly its way of revealing the significance of motivic fragments only at the later stages of each movement, when they present the motives in full to finally demonstrate their relationships to one another (what Tovey called, vision of dry bones coming together). Let us hope that Boston won't have to wait another 30 years to hear this symphony again.

Thomas certainly didn't choose a program of easy successes, and met every challenge on the way. The Schoenberg was big, dramatic, colorful; the Sibelius taut and lucid. In the latter work, I think Thomas sustained the tension more successfully than any of the currently available recorded performances.

Beethoven's Egmont Overture and excerpts from Die Goetterdaemmerung rounded out the program. The orchestra played superbly all evening. In everyway it was an extraordinary concert.

BSO plays music new to Boston

By Louis Snyder

Two 20th-century works, both almost 40 years old, made their first local appearances on the weekend program of the Boston Symphony under Michael Tilson Thomas's direction. The first, an Andante for String Orchestra, was adapted by its late composer, Ruth Crawford Seeger, from her String Quartet. The second, "Sun-treader" is a massive work by Carl Ruggles, the individualistic New Englander, who was honored by Bowdoin College on the occasion of his 90th birthday in 1966, at which festival the BSO gave the first United States performance of "Sun-treader" (completed in 1931), with Jean Martinon conducting.

Mrs. Seeger's Andante, a short piece experimenting in the use of "dynamic counterpoint," is a clue to the compositional interests of a pioneer woman musician in the realms of the new music. The first of her sex to be awarded a Guggenheim fellowship for study of composition abroad, she did not continue composing in later years, so that the Andante and the Quartet from which it comes remain as interesting but inconclusive evidence of a progressive talent.

Musical friendships

There is nothing fragmentary about Ruggles's "Sun-treader," which is a rough-hewn monolith of sound. As Eric Salzman's extensive program notes indicate, there was a bond of musical understanding between Ruggles and that other hard-headed Yankee composer, Charles Ives, whose road to acceptance was equally thorny.

And, perhaps even less than with Ives, affinity for Ruggles may not be formed at first hearing, although "Sun-treader" already impresses as being better constructed and more vigorously alive than many of its latter-day counterparts. Its reception on Friday afternoon was cordial, but if one cannot be sure how many friends it made then, one knew it had a friend in Mr. Thomas who directed it with the great force and zeal of a true Ruggles believer. The orchestra too met the challenge with a strong performance.

Mozart comeback

The music of Mozart, which has had its ups and downs at Symphony Hall this season, formed the second half of the program. Benita Valente, a musicianly singer with a silvery lyric soprano, was soloist in the "Ruhe sanft" aria from his unfinished opera, "Zaide," and the motet, "Exsultate, jubilate," which was accompanied by an orchestra of reduced size, in this case an equal boon to musicology and audibility. One was charmed if not thrilled.

The full complement of musicians was back, however, for the Symphony No. 34 in C (K. 338), not only on the platform but in top playing form. It was the kind of crisp, precise Mozart playing, with plenty of heart, that everyone knows the orchestra is capable of, and it was a pleasure to sit back and hear them prove it. Despite larger forces, Mr. Thomas produced an even, controlled sound, stylish, delicate, and always very much alive. The performance included the conjectural Minuet (K. 409), which may or may not "rightfully" belong in this symphony. There were no audible nay-sayers on Friday afternoon, at least.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

MAR 18 1970 New England

Soprano changes B.S.O. program

Soprano Bonita Valente, who is to be guest artist with the Boston Symphony Friday at 2 and Saturday at 8:30 ,has decided not to do Ravel's "Sheherazade." She will now sing two works by Mozart, the aria "Ruhe sanft, mein holdes Leben" from Zaide," and the concert piece, "Exsultate, jubilate."

Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct. The rest of the program remains as announced: Ruth Crawford Seeger's Andante for String Orchestra, Carl Ruggles' "Sun-treader" and Mozart's Symphony No. 34.

42.

Poised New Baton

By Peter M. Knapp

Michael Tilson Thomas, the dynamic 24-year-old assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony, is making the most of his extraordinary opportunity.

Last October, he stepped in, to critical acclaim, when Music Director William Steinberg became ill during the orchestra's concerts in New York. Now, because of Steinberg's current illness, Thomas has taken over the orchestra for the rest of the season.

The orchestra is in secure and interesting hands. Despite his youth, Thomas has poise, maturity and a good dash of charisma. He handles himself like a veteran. And his music-making, on the basis of the two Thomas-led concerts this reviewer has heard this season, has been among the most satisfying of the BSO's programs.

'London' Bach

Last night's program spanned music of the last three centuries: Johann Christian Bach's Symphony for double orchestra in E-flat, Opus 18, No. 1; Igor Stravinsky's Symphony in Three Movements, and Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 1 in g minor. All of it was a pleasure.

Johnann Sebastian Bach's talented sons get little play these days, which is unfortunate. Not up to the imposing stature of their father, they nevertheless were musicians of imagination and ingenuity. The youngest, Johann Christian (1735-1782) — who changed his name according to location, being Giovanni Cristiano in Italy, Jean-Cretien France and John Christian Bach in England — finally settled down in London, where he wrote three sinfonia for double orchestra about the time of the American Revolution.

The first of these, played last night, is a delightful, Mozartian work, using the two orchestras for antiphonal or echo effects and showing a very handy way with melody. The opening seems a close quotation of Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony, though Bach got there first. And aside from a few rough moments, the work was played with style and charm.

Exciting Strevinsky

Stravinsky's masterly symphony dates from the mid-1940s. Clear in texture and structure, it jigs and jags along on the composer's characteristic ostinati. Thomas has a keen rhythmic sense, and his Stravinsky with its lean sound, clarity, precise meters and thrusting accents, was always purposeful and often exciting — the high point of the evening.

The early Tschaikowsky symphony was last played by the BSO in 1934, and this hearing was not so much of a bore as anticipated. No. 1, subtitled, "Winter Daydreams", is long-winded, but generally free from bombast until the coda of the finale, and it does contain a healthy dosage of those dark and sweet Tschaikowsky melodies and the composer's skill in orchestration. The prevailing mood is gentle and the whole, fervently conducted and played, is akin to the later ballet music.

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,387

MAR 18 1970

Michael Thomas and the BSO

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR
Monday, March 16, 1970

Music 'hewn and shaped before one's eyes'

By Louis Snyder

. . . everything worked to produce that rare concert-going feeling — of not wanting the music to end.

There was nothing usual about the Boston Symphony program Michael Tilson Thomas conducted during the weekend at Symphony Hall, even though the composers represented were Bach, Stravinsky, and Tchaikovsky. And nothing usual about the way the orchestra played it, either. The program will be repeated tomorrow and Thursday evenings.

Bach, Johann Christian this time, was represented by a Symphony for Double Orchestra in E flat, never performed in Boston before to anyone's knowledge, and a complete charmer. Stravinsky's Symphony in Three Movements, which was introduced to Boston in 1946 by the composer himself, is still something of a novelty although it was conducted here three years ago by Colin Davis. And the First Symphony of Tchaikovsky, last played by the orchestra in 1934, and as neglected almost everywhere else, comes under the head of a surprising new experience for most listeners.

Top of the season

It turned out to be the most diverting concert of the year so far, what with these fresh and contrasting scores, Mr. Thomas's clear and effulgent molding of them, and superlative playing by the musicians, together and singly. The season has not been without its high points, but this time everything worked to produce that rare concert-going feeling—of not wanting the music to end.

The strong bond that seems to exist between Mr. Thomas and the orchestra must be responsible for this, because understanding of music, which the conductor fairly exudes, is translated into superlative sound through an almost visible responsive process. It was evidenced in the stylishness of the Bach, the sophisticated orderliness of the Stravinsky, and the simple revelation of the Tchaikovsky—an overwhelming impression that music is being hewn and shaped before one's eyes.

A way with Stravinsky

The three works received the performances of their lives. The Bach Symphony which divided the orchestra in two on opposite sides of the stage, revealed how much there is still to know and appreciate about this skilled predecessor of Mozart, besides his expert craftsmanship and melodic and rhythmic inventiveness. It was played crisply and concisely, giving real pleasure.

Mr. Thomas has a way of delineating the music of Stravinsky with an almost mathematical clarity and purity, which on this occasion showed the three-movement symphony for the elegant piece it is. Here, as throughout the afternoon on Friday, there is much for instrumentalists to do solo or by sections, and the playing was of unfailing quality.

The Tchaikovsky is, of course, like seeing for the first time an early picture of someone we know very well. And realizing immediately that the features we admire most are there in bold recognizable form. (The same sensation occurred earlier in the week when Tchaikovsky's Third Symphony was played by the Civic Symphony.) There is certainly nothing immature about this first work, and it is too bad that it has not been used to give the Fourth, Fifth, and Sixth symphonies a rest all these years. Certainly, the quasi-impressionistic Adagio ("Land of gloom; land of mists") and the Scherzo in which a "new" typically Tchaikovskian melody soars are enough in themselves to give the symphony a belated popularity.

Enthusiasm was at a high pitch throughout the program on Friday, with Mr. Thomas being singled out for applause, both by the audience and by his colleagues. It was a heartening occasion, which made reports of waning interest in symphonic music seem irresponsible indeed.

BOSTON AFTER DARK

March 18 1970

BSO under Thomas: met every challenge

(From concert on page 40)

by Lawrence P. Katzenstein

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has played at least two concerts of extra-special importance this season—both of them led by Assistant Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas. Last fall Thomas played a program of Stravinsky, Ives, and Debussy. Friday and Saturday, March 6 and 7 (replacing the still-ailing William Steinberg), he explored Beethoven, Schoenberg, Sibelius, and Wagner.

Schoenberg's Five Pieces for Orchestra and the Fourth Symphony of Sibelius—both wonderfully innovative masterpieces from the early part of the 20th century—were the core of the program.

The Sibelius is one of his most profound achievements, and unfairly neglected (the last performance of it in Boston was by Koussevitzky in 1940). Reasons for this neglect are not hard to find, though: it is bleak, uncompromising music. Sibelius's personal means of expression become clear only with complete familiarity. The Fourth Symphony is intense, introspective, pessimistic, and — I think — enormously moving music. But its formalistic innovations take some getting used to — particularly its way of revealing the significance of motivic fragments only at the later stages of each movement, when they present the motives in full to finally demonstrate their relationships to one another (what Tovey called, vision of dry bones coming together). Let us hope that Boston won't have to wait another 30 years to hear this symphony again.

Thomas certainly didn't choose a program of easy successes, and met every challenge on the way. The Schoenberg was big, dramatic, colorful; the Sibelius taut and lucid. In the latter work, I think Thomas sustained the tension more successfully than any of the currently available recorded performances.

Beethoven's Egmont Overture and excerpts from Die Goetterdaemmerung rounded out the program. The orchestra played superbly all evening. In everyway it was an extraordinary concert.

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Friday afternoon March 20 1970 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening March 21 1970 at 8.30

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS conductor

SEEGER — Andante for string orchestra
first performance in Boston

RUGGLES — Sun-treader
first performance in Boston

intermission

MOZART — 'Ruhe sanft, mein holdes Leben' from Zaide K. 344
BENITA VALENTE soprano

MOZART — 'Exsultate, jubilate' motet for soprano K. 165
Allegro – Recitativo –
Andante – Vivace
BENITA VALENTE soprano

MOZART — Symphony no. 34 in C K. 338
Allegro vivace
Andante di molto
Minuet & trio (K. 409)
Finale: allegro vivace

THE SOLOIST

BENITA VALENTE, who comes from Delano, California, won the Metropolitan Opera Auditions in 1960. When she was soprano-in-residence at the Marlboro Festival, she sang in many concerts with Rudolf Serkin, and later made recordings with him for Columbia Records. She became well known in the musical world, and in 1962 started her successful European career, appearing at the Zürich and Freiburg Operas among other places. She now sings frequently both in Europe and the United States. During the past seasons she has appeared with the Baltimore Opera, the Dallas Symphony, the Philadelphia Orchestra and the Cincinnati Symphony. She has also been heard recently in Berlin, Hamburg, Amsterdam, Stuttgart, Cologne, Bonn and Nuremberg.

Last season she sang with the Detroit Symphony, the Kansas Philharmonic, the New Orleans Philharmonic, at the Philharmonic Hall Haydn-Mozart Festival and in recital in New York, Boston and Cleveland. During the summer of 1969 she took part in Rossini's L'Italiana in Algeri and in the chamber music series at the Festival of two worlds at Spoleto. Benita Valente made her debut with the Boston Symphony in January 1969, singing the role of Najade in the American première of the original version of Strauss' Ariadne auf Naxos.

AWARD FOR PROGRAM NOTES OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

At a special press conference held on Thursday March 19 in the Auditorium of the Library and Museum of the Performing Arts at Lincoln Center, New York, Stanley Adams, President of the American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers, presented a Prize for articles and a check for $300 to James Lyons for his notes for the program book of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the 1967-1968 season.

James Lyons, who has regularly contributed notes during the past three seasons, is Editor of the American Record Guide. He was born in Peabody, Massachusetts, and is an alumnus of the New England Conservatory and a graduate of Boston University. He wrote about music for The Boston Post and The Boston Globe, and contributed to The Christian Science Monitor; he was editor and critic for Musical America. He also teaches psychology at New York University.

BSO plays music new to Boston

By Louis Snyder

Two 20th-century works, both almost 40 years old, made their first local appearances on the weekend program of the Boston Symphony under Michael Tilson Thomas's direction. The first, an Andante for String Orchestra, was adapted by its late composer, Ruth Crawford Seeger, from her String Quartet. The second, "Sun-treader" is a massive work by Carl Ruggles, the individualistic New Englander, who was honored by Bowdoin College on the occasion of his 90th birthday in 1966, at which festival the BSO gave the first United States performance of "Sun-treader" (completed in 1931), with Jean Martinon conducting.

Mrs. Seeger's Andante, a short piece experimenting in the use of "dynamic counterpoint," is a clue to the compositional interests of a pioneer woman musician in the realms of the new music. The first of her sex to be awarded a Guggenheim fellowship for study of composition abroad, she did not continue composing in later years, so that the Andante and the Quartet from which it comes remain as interesting but inconclusive evidence of a progressive talent.

Musical friendships

There is nothing fragmentary about Ruggles's "Sun-treader," which is a rough-hewn monolith of sound. As Eric Salzman's extensive program notes indicate, there was a bond of musical understanding between Ruggles and that other hard-headed Yankee composer, Charles Ives, whose road to acceptance was equally thorny.

And, perhaps even less than with Ives, affinity for Ruggles may not be formed at first hearing, although "Sun-treader" already impresses as being better constructed and more vigorously alive than many of its latter-day counterparts. Its reception on Friday afternoon was cordial, but if one cannot be sure how many friends it made then, one knew it had a friend in Mr. Thomas who directed it with the great force and zeal of a true Ruggles believer. The orchestra too met the challenge with a strong performance.

Mozart comeback

The music of Mozart, which has had its ups and downs at Symphony Hall this season, formed the second half of the program. Benita Valente, a musicianly singer with a silvery lyric soprano, was soloist in the "Ruhe sanft" aria from his unfinished opera, "Zaide," and the motet, "Exsultate, jubilate," which was accompanied by an orchestra of reduced size, in this case an equal boon to musicology and audibility. One was charmed if not thrilled.

The full complement of musicians was back, however, for the Symphony No. 34 in C (K. 338), not only on the platform but in top playing form. It was the kind of crisp, precise Mozart playing, with plenty of heart, that everyone knows the orchestra is capable of, and it was a pleasure to sit back and hear them prove it. Despite larger forces, Mr. Thomas produced an even, controlled sound, stylish, delicate, and always very much alive. The performance included the conjectural Minuet (K. 409), which may or may not "rightfully" belong in this symphony. There were no audible nay-sayers on Friday afternoon, at least.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,70[illegible]
(S) 566,377

MAR 18 1970 New England

Soprano changes B.S.O. program

Soprano Bonita Valente, who is to be guest artist with the Boston Symphony Friday at 2 and Saturday at 8:30 ,has decided not to do Ravel's "Sheherazade." She will now sing two works by Mozart, the aria "Ruhe sanft, mein holdes Leben" from Zaide," and the concert piece, "Exsultate, jubilate."

Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct. The rest of the program remains as announced: Ruth Crawford Seeger's Andante for String Orchestra, Carl Ruggles' "Sun-treader" and Mozart's Symphony No. 34.

Thomas leads BSO in Mrs. Seeger's Andante

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

Michael Tilson Thomas put an unusual program together for his Boston Symphony concert yesterday afternoon. He began with American music of forty years ago, Ruth Crawford Seeger's Andante for String Orchestra and "Sun-treader" by Carl Ruggles, and then gave us a second half that was all Mozart, "Ruhe sanft" from the unfinished Singspiel "Zaide" and the motet, "Exsultate, jubilate," both with Benita Valente as soprano soloist, and the Symphony No. 34 in C.

Mrs. Seeger, who was born in 1901 and who died in 1953, was a pupil, and later the wife, of Charles Seeger, a musicologist and a scrappy, forward-looking critic and teacher. They became the parents of the famous Pete, and Mrs. Seeger was in fact much more involved in the study of folk music in the last 20 years of her life than in composing. Her career as a "serious" composer was drastically and sadly short, for the String Quartet which she wrote in 1931 not only marked her real coming of age as a creative artist, but was also her last major work.

That Quartet is one of the most expressive, personal and arresting works of the rich period in which it was composed, and the Andante which the Symphony played is an orchestral setting of its slow movement. It is a remarkable movement in which dynamics are isolated as a primary structural element much as colors are in the third of Schoenberg's Five Pieces, Op. 16. It is like a study in wave motion, a dense, often highly dissonant polyphony of independent patterns of swell and contraction. Incidentally, the house program was absurdly fussy, or perhaps just mistaken, in claiming this performance as a Boston premiere: Thomas conducted the piece with the Philharmonia last April, though admittedly that was in Cambridge.

The "Sun-treader" performance was a bona fide Boston premiere, though the first American performance four years ago was given by the Boston Symphony, though in Portland, Me., as part of a Ruggles 90th birthday celebration organized by Bowdoin College. Where Mrs. Seeger's Expressionist Andante is a statement of Angst and torment, Ruggles' virtually contemporary (1927-32) tone-poem is an angrily aggressive, marching - forth - to - war sort of steamroller.

It is a single movement, somewhere between 15 and 20 minutes long, and written in a Sonata form so stiff that Clementi might have blushed to own up to it. That is its weakness, but it has remarkable strengths: rhythmic invention and skill, an impressive sense of motion (at least until the arrival of the over-prepared and over-explicit recapitulation), a fascinating notion of counterpoint, and enormous expressive energy. The orchestral sound is thick, quite unlike any other I know, and relentlessly loud, and I am not sure whether all that is naive and a partial failure or a bold gamble and a crushing success.

Both these works got cohesive, generally effective, but less than unfailingly precise performances. Thanks also to program editor Andrew Raeburn for reprinting Eric Salzman's long and interesting essay on Ruggles.

The 34th Symphony is the one about which Mozart wrote to his father that he heard it at Mannheim (or perhaps conducted it — I forget which) with all the woodwinds doubled and with an enormous lot of strings and that the result had been "magnifique." It is a festive and joyous piece whose minor-mode patches are there for richness of color rather than as adumbrations of pathos, and it flourishes under "big" treatment. If anything, the performance was less massive than I had anticipated, Thomas' Mozart being generally delicate, cool, "classical."

That made him a most suitable partner for Benita Valente, whose exquisitely silvery, poised, virtuosic, elegantly and sensitively phrased singing was a particular pleasure. All three Mozart performances fell a little short of being either as touching or as exciting as they might have been; still, they were on a level rarely attained, and I would have a hard time naming a lyric soprano who is a finer Mozart singer than Miss Valente.

Boston Globe
3-21-'70

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

MAR 27 1970

BSO at 3:30 p.m.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that today's concert will begin at 3:30 p.m. instead of the customary 2:0'clock.

3:30 Starting Time For BSO Concert

Because of Good Friday observances today's BSO concert will begin at 3:30 p.m. instead of the usual starting time. The program will include music from "Parsifal," as well as work of Haydn, Schuller and Webern. Gunther Schuller will conduct.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

MAR 27 1970

Thomas Conducts

BSO in An Unusual Program

By HAROLD C. SPROUL

The program and performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Michael Tilson Thomas last Saturday was a delight. Andante for String Orchestra is a work of 1931 by Ruth Crawford Seeger (mother of Pete) arranged from her string quartet. It is a gradual accretion of tonal layers, dissonantly spaced, each swelling, ceasing, shifting in its own time without rhythmic pulse, except that the intrusion of new notes gives an irregular push to the mass, and the difference in the timing of the swells adds motion as well as a kind of inner counterpoint of resonance.

There is one punctuation when the tension flares up like a burst balloon. The fine string tone of the BSO, especially of the basses, came into its own. The fact that Schoenberg had done something roughly similar is no detraction.

Carl Ruggles Sun Treader, inspired by a line from Browning's tribute to Shelley ("Sun-treader, light and life be thine forever") made terrific contrast to the Seeger, the tread of the tympany calling up a rhythmic assertion of brasses (many extras) that split open all mental smog with dissonant splendor and proceeded to build a calculated complex of counterpoint, tense with harmonic conflict. Classis uses of motif and line and section are still there to integrate a Walt Whitmanesque rhetoric. Dramatic silences and a few quiet phrases contribute to the overall largeness. The crusty Ruggles, most individual among artists in an individualistic time (now in his nineties and more painter than composer) achieved the splendor he conceived in this first Boston performance of Sun-treader.

After intermission, there was Mozart in his most beguiling manner. Benita Valente sang Rest peacefully, my gentle one, a love song from the unfinished opera, Zaide, with the clean and and colorful decision, the emotive intention of scale and figure, that instrumentalists like to think instrumenta.

And then with the Exsultate, jubilate mutet, (an incredible composition for age 16) Valente showed how coloratura leaps and figures can be line and feeling—a fine excess. The famous Allelujah at the end had the fling of creative joy in life whatever the evil. Mr. Thomas showed accoustical discretion in the use of only one double-bass. Miss Valente's high notes, never thin or forced or exploited, just appeared as a natural realiztion of Mozartean naturalness. Mr. Thomas' accompaniment was discrete but supporting and always in motion. Despite commentators, there is no irreverence in dance before the altar.

This led easily into Symphony No. 34, its deft delight again incredible, that it came out of Mozart's frustration in provincial Salzburg not long before he was kicked out. The Allegro, crisp sprightliness; Andante singing sentmient; Minuet (a separate one which Mozart might have used, when he did want the dance he raised it to symphonic status by development beyond the popular—as in this one) — a Finale that, as Thomas played it, was a scampering of laughter. I have seldom heard the Boston Symphony play with such sensitive and joyful definition.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

MAR 26 1970

Herald Traveler
3-21-'70

Record American 3-21-'70

BSO, Soprano In Excellent Duo

By L. DAVID HARRIS
Music Critic

One of the best Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts of the season was performed yesterday. Its excellence was personified in the qualities of guest soprano Benita Valente.

Miss Valente sang two Mozart works—the "Ruhe sanft, mein holdes Leben" from "Zaide" opera and the "Exsultate, jubilate" motet.

The first "Zaide" aria was the concert's high point, particularly suited for her light, high soprano voice. It was a graceful minuet with an andante middle section, beautiful florid passages that demanded good vocal flexibility.

The "Exultate, jubilate" motet was equally well done. Some passages seemed a bit harsh, but the familiar "Allelujah!" section could only be described as artistically performed—a model of grace and decorum.

Michael Tilson Thomas conducted the orchestra and there was good rapport between the musicians and the soloist. The orchestra seldom — if ever — was too loud and it all was a thoroughly enjoyable listening experience.

Perhaps it might be suggested in future performances Miss Valente be positioned a little closer to the front of the stage. She was not visible to this reviewer—and to many persons sitting in the right section of the symphony's main floor.

Another plus point of the concert was Carl Ruggles' "Sun Treader" tone poem.

Composer Ruggles (a New England neighbor living now in Bennington, Vt.) has too long been neglected and his atonal music was especially welcomed.

It glittered with grandeur and was a challenge to hear —visioning the rugged New Englander who put it all together.

Conductor Thomas made the most of its final chord. Surely if the northern lights are visible in Vermont, Ruggles must have been seized by them when he finished "Sun Treader."

There is an old story about how Ruggles was once heard by hammering out a dissonant chord over and over again by a Vermont neighbor.

"Carl, what in heaven's name are you trying to do with that chord?"

And Ruggles replied:

"I'm giving it the test of time!"

Surely it must have been the same chord Conductor Thomas made such effective use of yesterday.

Symphony

Little-Performed Works Appeal

By HARRY NEVILLE

At the risk of belaboring the subject, this writer would like to say once again what a fine thing Boston has in Michael Tilson Thomas, the BSO's associate conductor. It would be premature to make predictions about his long-range success with this or any other orchestra because of the simple fact that honeymoons between conductors and their players and public (and critics) are notoriously short-lived affairs.

It would be unrealistic, too, to suppose that Thomas's current success has nothing to do with his age, his newness and the fact that he isn't burdened with difficult and often alienating decisions about orchestra policy and personnel. No doubt he operates at present under singularly benign circumstances, but what a pleasure, nevertheless, to hear him at this particular point of his career. And what a pleasure it must be for him too.

YESTERDAY afternoon's program, like preceding ones under Thomas, was an appealing mixture of little performed works by composers familiar and unfamiliar. It included the first Boston performances of compositions by Ruth Crawford Seeger and Carl Ruggles, both of whose works date from 1931.

On the basis of her Andante for String Orchestra, Mrs. Seeger would seem to have been not only a truly original composer but also that even rarer thing, a first-rate female composer. It speaks volumes on the subject of the paucity of good female composers to say that Mrs. Seeger wrote little after her marriage.

As the program notes pointed out, the Andante, with its rhythmic stasis and subtly shifting dynamics, recalls Schoenberg's "Farben," played only two weeks previously. But whereas the latter work seems an impressionistic mood piece, Seeger's is more overtly emotional, particularly so in its expressive use of minor seconds.

"Sun-Treader" is a tone poem by a Massachusetts native and one-time Boston resident. Carl Ruggles, now 94, has for years lived in Vermont, and his music is as jagged and granitic as parts of the landscape of that state. Like Seeger, he too is an original, only more so, for it would be difficult to point to antecedents or, for that matter, consequences of his musical way of thinking.

THE WORK'S TITLE is a phrase used by Robert Browning to describe the poet Shelley, and the dark, somber music with its recurring drum beats is indeed suggestive of some tragic figure or concept. Written as one continuous movement, the work's structural organization seems to divide into no neatly defined segments, but Thomas did a masterful job of giving it a lucid, coherent shape.

Soprano Benita Valente appeared as soloist in two works of Mozart, an aria from "Zaide" and the motet "Exsultate, jubilate." She has a pure, sweet voice and gave much pleasure, especially with her sensitive phrasing. Her coloratura work could have been more clearly articulated; however, it was effective in the final section of the motet, even if at a speed somewhat slower than Mozart's indicated vivace.

In the final selection of the afternoon, Mozart's Symphony No. 34 in C, Thomas got some of the most gracious and elegant Mozart playing this listener has heard from the BSO.

43.

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Friday afternoon March 27 1970 at 3.30
Saturday evening March 28 1970 at 8.30

GUNTHER SCHULLER conductor

HAYDN	Symphony no. 31 in D 'Hornsignal'
	Allegro
	Adagio
	Menuet & trio
	Moderato molto (theme and variations) — presto
SCHULLER	Spectra
first performance in Boston
intermission
WEBERN	Five pieces for orchestra op. 10
	Sehr ruhig und zart (Very quietly and delicately)
	Lebhaft und zart bewegt (Moving briskly and delicately)
	Sehr langsam und äusserst ruhig (Very slowly and extremely quietly)
	Fliessend, äusserst zart (Flowing, extremely delicately)
	Sehr fliessend (Very flowing)
WAGNER	Music from Act three of 'Parsifal'

THE GUEST CONDUCTOR

GUNTHER SCHULLER, who has been appointed, with Seiji Ozawa, Artistic Director of Tanglewood, was inaugurated as the New England Conservatory's ninth president on November 16 1967. His father was a violinist with the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra. At the age of twelve, Gunther Schuller began to take an active part in music, joining the St Thomas Choir School as a boy soprano, and beginning the study of composition, flute, and later, french horn.

He started composing two years later, when he wrote his First symphony; he developed so rapidly in his study of the french horn that in 1942, at the age of sixteen, he was offered a professional position with the Ballet Theatre Orchestra. At seventeen, he became solo french horn with the Cincinnati Symphony, and the following year performed his own Horn concerto with the orchestra directed by Eugene Goosens. By the time he was nineteen he had accepted a position in the Metropolitan Opera Orchestra. His Symphony for brass and percussion, written in 1949, received its first public performance under the direction of Leon Barzin and was later performed by the New York Philharmonic under the direction of Dimitri Mitropoulos. In 1959, Gunther Schuller resigned his position as solo horn with the Metropolitan Opera Orchestra in order to devote more time to creative work.

He has received commissions from many of the major orchestras in this country: Gala music, written for the 75th Anniversary of the Chicago Symphony; Spectra, commissioned by the New York Philharmonic; Seven studies on themes of Paul Klee, commissioned by a Ford Foundation grant for the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra. He was commissioned to write a ballet for the New York City Ballet which was choreographed by George Balanchine. Major European orchestras have also commissioned works: the opera The Visitation was commissioned by the Hamburg State Opera Company. This work was given its first American production by the San Francisco Opera Company in 1967, and has been presented since at the Metropolitan Opera in New York, and in other cities in Europe and America. His String quartet was commissioned by the Fromm Music Foundation for the University of Illinois; Music for brass quintet by the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation; Double quintet for woodwinds and brass by the University of Southern California. The sacred cantata — Psalm XCVIII, written on commission from the American Guild of Organists, received its first performance at the Guild's annual convention in Atlanta, Georgia, in June 1966 and was heard in Boston in December 1967 in a concert at Symphony Hall, performed by the New England Conservatory Chorus. One of Schuller's more recent works, Triplum, was commissioned by the New York Philharmonic for its 125th Anniversary celebrations and was recorded by the Orchestra with Leonard Bernstein conducting. In honor of its 60th Anniversary, the Junior League of Boston announced the com- [illegible] for the Arts. Earlier this year he was appointed by the Governor of Massachusetts to the Commonwealth's Council on the Arts and Humanities.

Works by Gunther Schuller have been performed by the Boston Symphony in past seasons, and Erich Leinsdorf conducted the recording of Seven studies on themes of Paul Klee for RCA Records. Schuller has himself conducted the Orchestra in 1964, 1966 and 1967.

Thomas leads BSO in Mrs. Seeger's Andante

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

Michael Tilson Thomas put an unusual program together for his Boston Symphony concert yesterday afternoon. He began with American music of forty years ago, Ruth Crawford Seeger's Andante for String Orchestra and "Sun-treader" by Carl Ruggles, and then gave us a second half that was all Mozart, "Ruhe sanft" from the unfinished Singspiel "Zaide" and the motet, "Exsultate, jubilate," both with Benita Valente as soprano soloist, and the Symphony No. 34 in C.

Mrs. Seeger, who was born in 1901 and who died in 1953, was a pupil, and later the wife, of Charles Seeger, a musicologist and a scrappy, forward-looking critic and teacher. They became the parents of the famous Pete, and Mrs. Seeger was in fact much more involved in the study of folk music in the last 20 years of her life than in composing. Her career as a "serious" composer was drastically and sadly short, for the String Quartet which she wrote in 1931 not only marked her real coming of age as a creative artist, but was also her last major work.

That Quartet is one of the most expressive, personal and arresting works of the rich period in which it was composed, and the Andante which the Symphony played is an orchestral setting of its slow movement. It is a remarkable movement in which dynamics are isolated as a primary structural element much as colors are in the third of Schoenberg's Five Pieces, Op. 16. It is like a study in wave motion, a dense, often highly dissonant polyphony of independent patterns of swell and contraction. Incidentally, the house program was absurdly fussy, or perhaps just mistaken, in claiming this performance as a Boston premiere: Thomas conducted the piece with the Philharmonia last April, though admittedly that was in Cambridge.

The "Sun-treader" performance was a bona fide Boston premiere, though the first American performance four years ago was given by the Boston Symphony, though in Portland, Me., as part of a Ruggles 90th birthday celebration organized by Bowdoin College. Where Mrs. Seeger's Expressionist Andante is a statement of Angst and torment, Ruggles' virtually contemporary (1927-32) tone-poem is an angrily aggressive, marching - forth - to - war sort of steamroller.

It is a single movement, somewhere between 15 and 20 minutes long, and written in a Sonata form so stiff that Clementi might have blushed to own up to it. That is its weakness, but it has remarkable strengths: rhythmic invention and skill, an impressive sense of motion (at least until the arrival of the over-prepared and over-explicit recapitulation), a fascinating notion of counterpoint, and enormous expressive energy. The orchestral sound is thick, quite unlike any other I know, and relentlessly loud, and I am not sure whether all that is naive and a partial failure or a bold gamble and a crushing success.

Both these works got cohesive, generally effective, but less than unfailingly precise performances. Thanks also to program editor Andrew Raeburn for reprinting Eric Salzman's long and interesting essay on Ruggles.

The 34th Symphony is the one about which Mozart wrote to his father that he heard it at Mannheim (or perhaps conducted it — I forget which) with all the woodwinds doubled and with an enormous lot of strings and that the result had been "magnifique." It is a festive and joyous piece whose minor-mode patches are there for richness of color rather than as adumbrations of pathos, and it flourishes under "big" treatment. If anything, the performance was less massive than I had anticipated, Thomas' Mozart being generally delicate, cool, "classical."

That made him a most suitable partner for Benita Valente, whose exquisitely silvery, poised, virtuosic, elegantly and sensitively phrased singing was a particular pleasure. All three Mozart performances fell a little short of being either as touching or as exciting as they might have been; still, they were on a level rarely attained, and I would have a hard time naming a lyric soprano who is a finer Mozart singer than Miss Valente.

Boston Globe
3-21-'70

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

MAR 27 1970

BSO at 3:30 p.m.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that today's concert will begin at 3:30 p.m. instead of the customary 2 o'clock.

3:30 Starting Ti[illegible] For BSO Concert

Because of Good Frida[illegible] servances today's BSO co[illegible] will begin at 3:30 p.m. ins[illegible] of the usual starting time. [illegible] program will include m[illegible] from "Parsifal," as wel[illegible] work of Haydn, Schuller [illegible] Webern. Gunther Schuller conduct.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 29[illegible]

MAR 27 1970

Thomas Conducts

BSO in An Unusual Program

By HAROLD C. SPROUL

The program and performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Michael Tilson Thomas last Saturday was a delight. Andante for String Orchestra is a work of 1931 by Ruth Crawford Seeger (mother of Pete) arranged from her string quartet. It is a gradual accretion of tonal layers, dissonantly spaced, each swelling, ceasing, shifting in its own time without rhythmic pulse, except that the intrusion of new notes gives an irregular push to the mass, and the difference in the timing of the swells adds motion as well as a kind of inner counterpoint of resonance.

There is one punctuation when the tension flares up like a burst balloon. The fine string tone of the BSO, especially of the basses, came into its own. The fact that Schoenberg had done something roughly similar is no detraction.

Carl Ruggles Sun Treader, inspired by a line from Browning's tribute to Shelley ("Sun-treader, light and life be thine forever") made terrific contrast to the Seeger, the tread of the tympany calling up a rhythmic assertion of brasses (many extras) that split open all mental smog with dissonant splendor and proceeded to build a calculated complex of counterpoint, tense with harmonic conflict. Classis uses of motif and line and section are still there to integrate a Walt Whitmanesque rhetoric. Dramatic silences and a few quiet phrases contribute to the overall largeness. The crusty Ruggles, most individual among artists in an individualistic time (now in his nineties and more painter than composer), achieved the splendor he conceived in this first Boston performance of Sun-treader.

After intermission, there was Mozart in his most beguiling manner. Benita Valente sang Rest peacefully, my gentle one, a love song from the unfinished opera, Zaide, with the clean and and colorful decision, the emotive intention of scale and figure, that instrumentalists like to think instrumenta.

And then with the Exsultate, jubilate mutet, (an incredible composition for age 16) Valente showed how coloratura leaps and figures can be line and feeling—a fine excess. The famous Allelujah at the end had the fling of creative joy in life whatever the evil. Mr. Thomas showed accoustical discretion in the use of only one double-bass. Miss Valente's high notes, never thin or forced or exploited, just appeared as a natural realiztion of Mozartean naturalness. Mr. Thomas' accompaniment was discrete but supporting and always in motion. Despite commentators, there is no irreverence in dance before the altar.

This led easily into Symphony No. 34, its deft delight again incredible, that it came out of Mozart's frustration in provincial Salzburg not long before he was kicked out. The Allegro, crisp sprightliness; Andante singing sentmient; Minuet (a separate one which Mozart might have used, when he did want the dance he raised it to symphonic status by development beyond the popular—as in this one) — a Finale that, as Thomas played it, was a scampering of laughter. I have seldom heard the Boston Symphony play with such sensitive and joyful definition.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

MAR 26 1970

Symphony

Little-Performed Works Appeal

By HARRY NEVILLE

At the risk of belaboring the subject, this writer would like to say once again what a fine thing Boston has in Michael Tilson Thomas, the BSO's associate conductor. It would be premature to make predictions about his long-range success with this or any other orchestra because of the simple fact that honeymoons between conductors and their players and public (and critics) are notoriously short-lived affairs.

It would be unrealistic, too, to suppose that Thomas's current success has nothing to do with his age, his newness and the fact that he isn't burdened with difficult and often alienating decisions about orchestra policy and personnel. No doubt he operates at present under singularly benign circumstances, but what a pleasure, nevertheless, to hear him at this particular point of his career. And what a pleasure it must be for him too.

YESTERDAY afternoon's program, like preceding ones under Thomas, was an appealing mixture of little performed works by composers familiar and unfamiliar. It included the first Boston performances of compositions by Ruth Crawford Seeger and Carl Ruggles, both of whose works date from 1931.

On the basis of her Andante for String Orchestra, Mrs. Seeger would seem to have been not only a truly original composer but also that even rarer thing, a first-rate female composer. It speaks volumes on the subject of the paucity of good female composers to say that Mrs. Seeger wrote little after her marriage.

As the program notes pointed out, the Andante, with its rhythmic stasis and subtly shifting dynamics, recalls Schoenberg's "Farben," played only two weeks previously. But whereas the latter work seems an impressionistic mood piece, Seeger's is more overtly emotional, particularly so in its expressive use of minor seconds.

"Sun-Treader" is a tone poem by a Massachusetts native and one-time Boston resident. Carl Ruggles, now 94, has for years lived in Vermont, and his music is as jagged and granitic as parts of the landscape of that state. Like Seeger, he too is an original, only more so, for it would be difficult to point to antecedents or, for that matter, consequences of his musical way of thinking.

THE WORK'S TITLE is a phrase used by Robert Browning to describe the poet Shelley, and the dark, somber music with its recurring drum beats is indeed suggestive of some tragic figure or concept. Written as one continuous movement, the work's structural organization seems to divide into no neatly defined segments, but Thomas did a masterful job of giving it a lucid, coherent shape.

Soprano Benita Valente appeared as soloist in two works of Mozart, an aria from "Zaide" and the motet "Exsultate, jubilate." She has a pure, sweet voice and gave much pleasure, especially with her sensitive phrasing. Her coloratura work could have been more clearly articulated; however, it was effective in the final section of the motet, even if at a speed somewhat slower than Mozart's indicated vivace.

In the final selection of the afternoon, Mozart's Symphony No. 34 in C, Thomas got some of the most gracious and elegant Mozart playing this listener has heard from the BSO.

Herald Traveler
3-21-'70

Record American 3-21-'70

BSO, Soprano In Excellent Duo

By L. DAVID HARRIS
Music Critic

One of the best Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts of the season was performed yesterday. Its excellence was personified in the qualities of guest soprano Benita Valente.

Miss Valente sang two Mozart works—the "Ruhe sanft, mein holdes Leben" from "Zaide" opera and the "Exsultate, jubilate" motet.

The first "Zaide" aria was the concert's high point, particularly suited for her light, high soprano voice. It was a graceful minuet with an andante middle section, beautiful florid passages that demanded good vocal flexibility.

The "Exultate, jubilate" motet was equally well done. Some passages seemed a bit harsh, but the familiar "Allelujah!" section could only be described as artistically performed—a model of grace and decorum.

Michael Tilson Thomas conducted the orchestra and there was good rapport between the musicians and the soloist. The orchestra seldom — if ever — was too loud and it all was a thoroughly enjoyable listening experience.

Perhaps it might be suggested in future performances Miss Valente be positioned a little closer to the front of the stage. She was not visible to this reviewer—and to many persons sitting in the right section of the symphony's main floor.

Another plus point of the concert was Carl Ruggles' "Sun Treader" tone poem.

Composer Ruggles (a New England neighbor living now in Bennington, Vt.) has too long been neglected and his atonal music was especially welcomed.

It glittered with grandeur and was a challenge to hear —visioning the rugged New Englander who put it all together.

Conductor Thomas made the most of its final chord. Surely if the northern lights are visible in Vermont, Ruggles must have been seized by them when he finished "Sun Treader."

There is an old story about how Ruggles was once heard by hammering out a dissonant chord over and over again by a Vermont neighbor.

"Carl, what in heaven's name are you trying to do with that chord?"

And Ruggles replied:

"I'm giving it the test of time!"

Surely it must have been the same chord Conductor Thomas made such effective use of yesterday.

43.

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Friday afternoon March 27 1970 at 3.30
Saturday evening March 28 1970 at 8.30

GUNTHER SCHULLER conductor

The Friends of the New England Conservatory

Gunther Schuller, President of the New England Conservatory, is the guest Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week.

23 members of the Orchestra are graduates of the Conservatory.

33 members of the Orchestra are on the Conservatory Faculty.

No further proof is needed that support of the New England Conservatory is vitally important to the future of great music.

If you would like to help, you can do so by joining the Friends of the New England Conservatory.

For membership information please call 262-1120 ext. 267.

toward the center of the stage, making the stage seem [illegible] ascends the altar steps, takes the Grail from the shrine, and breathes a silent prayer before it. The Chalice gradually becomes suffused with a soft glow, while darkness slowly descends upon the hall. The main motives of the prelude to the work are subtly interwoven with each other in strings, woodwind and harps. 'Wondrous high salvation! Redeemed the Redeemer!' sing the squires and knights, while mystic voices (sopranos and altos) float down from the middle height and the dome. A ray of light falls upon the Grail, which now glows ardently, and a white dove descends from the dome and hovers over Parsifal's head. Kundry, her enigmatic course through the world completed, her part played to the end in the enlightenment of Parsifal through pity, sinks to the ground lifeless, her last look being turned on him. Amfortas and Gurnemanz kneel in homage before Parsifal, the new King, as he stands aloft among the worshipping brotherhood, waving the Grail from side to side in blessing of them. The harmonic and contrapuntal texture becomes more and more etherealised and the Act closes with a return of the theme which had appeared in the prelude to Act one, with a final gentle insistence provided by the rich tones of trumpets and trombones.

missioning of a children's opera to be written by Gunther Schuller. The opera, which will be performed for the first time by the Opera Company of Boston on May 8 of this year, is set to a libretto by John Updike, based on the fairy tale The fisherman and his wife by the Brothers Grimm. Gunther Schuller's long association with John Lewis and the Modern Jazz Quartet has led him to compose many works for this group, as well as for Ornette Coleman and the late Eric Dolphy. An absorbing example of his compositions in the 'third stream' idiom is his Conversations. performed by the Modern Jazz Quartet and the Beaux Arts String Quartet in an album on Atlantic Records entitled Third Stream Music.

As a conductor, he has made guest appearances with the orchestras in Cincinnati, Los Angeles, St Louis, Baltimore, Minneapolis, Cleveland, New York, Chicago, Rochester, Washington and San Francisco. In Europe, he has conducted the BBC Symphony, the Berlin Free Radio Symphony, the Berlin Philharmonic, the Philharmonia Orchestra of London, the Philharmonic Orchestra of the French Radio (O.R.T.F.) as well as the Icelandic Symphony Orchestra. Recently he led concerts by the Boston Philharmonia, the Springfield Symphony and the Minnesota Orchestra.

A series of concerts entitled 'Twentieth Century innovations', sponsored by the Carnegie Hall Corporation, was organized and conducted by Schuller in New York City from 1963 through 1965. Also in New York, over WBAI, he broadcast a weekly program entitled 'Contemporary music in evolution', which presented an analysis of contemporary music from 1900 to the present. Subsequently this series was heard over stations of the National Association of Educational Broadcasters.

As a teacher, Gunther Schuller was acting head of the Composition Department of the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood from 1963 to 1965. In 1965, he was appointed Head of the Composition Department, succeeding Aaron Copland, and three years later Head of Contemporary Music Activities. He served on the faculty of Yale University as Associate Professor, a post he left to become President of the New England Conservatory.

His musico-analytical study of jazz, Early jazz: its roots and musical development, was published two years ago by Oxford University Press, the house which also published his book on Horn technique in 1962.

Gunther Schuller has been the recipient of such awards as a National Institute of Arts and Letters award in 1960, the Brandeis Creative Arts Award in 1960, and a Guggenheim Fellowship for two successive years. In 1967 he was elected a member of the National Institute of Arts and Letters, and is a member of the Music Panel of the National Endowment for the Arts. Earlier this year he was appointed by the Governor of Massachusetts to the Commonwealth's Council on the Arts and Humanities.

Works by Gunther Schuller have been performed by the Boston Symphony in past seasons, and Erich Leinsdorf conducted the recording of Seven studies on themes of Paul Klee for RCA Records. Schuller has himself conducted the Orchestra in 1964, 1966 and 1967.

Thomas leads BSO in Mrs. Seeger's Andante

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

Michael Tilson Thomas put an unusual program together for his Boston Symphony concert yesterday afternoon. He began with American music of forty years ago, Ruth Crawford Seeger's Andante for String Orchestra and "Sun-treader" by Carl Ruggles, and then gave us a second half that was all Mozart, "Ruhe sanft" from the unfinished Singspiel "Zaide" and the motet, "Exsultate, jubilate," both with Benita Valente as soprano soloist, and the Symphony No. 34 in C.

Mrs. Seeger, who was born in 1901 and who died in 1953, was a pupil, and later the wife, of Charles Seeger, a musicologist and a scrappy, forward-looking critic and teacher. They became the parents of the famous Pete, and Mrs. Seeger was in fact much more involved in the study of folk music in the last 20 years of her life than in composing. Her career as a "serious" composer was drastically and sadly short, for the String Quartet which she wrote in 1931 not only marked her real coming of age as a creative artist, but was also her last major work.

That Quartet is one of the most expressive, personal and arresting works of the rich period in which it was composed, and the Andante which the Symphony played is an orchestral setting of its slow movement. It is a remarkable movement in which dynamics are isolated as a primary structural element much as colors are in the third of Schoenberg's Five Pieces, Op. 16. It is like a study in wave motion, a dense, often highly dissonant polyphony of independent patterns of swell and contraction. Incidentally, the house program was absurdly fussy, or perhaps just mistaken, in claiming this performance as a Boston premiere: Thomas conducted the piece with the Philharmonia last April, though admittedly that was in Cambridge.

The "Sun-treader" performance was a bona fide Boston premiere, though the first American performance four years ago was given by the Boston Symphony, though in Portland, Me., as part of a Ruggles 90th birthday celebration organized by Bowdoin College. Where Mrs. Seeger's Expressionist Andante is a statement of Angst and torment, Ruggles' virtually contemporary (1927-32) tone-poem is an angrily aggressive, marching - forth - to - war sort of steamroller.

It is a single movement, somewhere between 15 and 20 minutes long, and written in a Sonata form so stiff that Clementi might have blushed to own up to it. That is its weakness, but it has remarkable strengths: rhythmic invention and skill, an impressive sense of motion (at least until the arrival of the over-prepared and over-explicit recapitulation), a fascinating notion of counterpoint, and enormous expressive energy. The orchestral sound is thick, quite unlike any other I know, and relentlessly loud, and I am not sure whether all that is naive and a partial failure or a bold gamble and a crushing success.

Both these works got cohesive, generally effective, but less than unfailingly precise performances. Thanks also to program editor Andrew Raeburn for reprinting Eric Salzman's long and interesting essay on Ruggles.

The 34th Symphony is the one about which Mozart wrote to his father that he heard it at Mannheim (or perhaps conducted it — I forget which) with all the woodwinds doubled and with an enormous lot of strings and that the result had been "magnifique." It is a festive and joyous piece whose minor-mode patches are there for richness of color rather than as adumbrations of pathos, and it flourishes under "big" treatment. If anything, the performance was less massive than I had anticipated, Thomas' Mozart being generally delicate, cool, "classical."

That made him a most suitable partner for Benita Valente, whose exquisitely silvery, poised, virtuosic, elegantly and sensitively phrased singing was a particular pleasure. All three Mozart performances fell a little short of being either as touching or as exciting as they might have been; still, they were on a level rarely attained, and I would have a hard time naming a lyric soprano who is a finer Mozart singer than Miss Valente.

Boston Globe
3-21-'70

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

MAR 27 1970

BSO at 3:30 p.m.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that today's concert will begin at 3:30 p.m. instead of the customary 2 o'clock.

3:30 Starting Ti[illegible] For BSO Concert

Because of Good Frid[illegible] servances today's BSO co[illegible] will begin at 3:30 p.m. ins[illegible] of the usual starting time. [illegible] program will include m[illegible] from "Parsifal," as wel[illegible] work of Haydn, Schuller [illegible] Webern. Gunther Schuller [illegible] conduct.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 29[illegible]

MAR 27 1970

Thomas Conducts
BSO in An Unusual Program

By HAROLD C. SPROUL

The program and performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Michael Tilson Thomas last Saturday was a delight. Andante for String Orchestra is a work of 1931 by Ruth Crawford Seeger (mother of Pete) arranged from her string quartet. It is a gradual accretion of tonal layers, dissonantly spaced, each swelling, ceasing, shifting in its own time without rhythmic pulse, except that the intrusion of new notes gives an irregular push to the mass, and the difference in the timing of the swells adds motion as well as a kind of inner counterpoint of resonance.

There is one punctuation when the tension flares up like a burst balloon. The fine string tone of the BSO, especially of the basses, came into its own. The fact that Schoenberg had done something roughly similar is no detraction.

Carl Ruggles Sun Treader, inspired by a line from Browning's tribute to Shelley ("Sun-treader, light and life be thine forever") made terrific contrast to the Seeger, the tread of the tympany calling up a rhythmic assertion of brasses (many extras) that split open all mental smog with dissonant splendor and proceeded to build a calculated complex of counterpoint, tense with harmonic conflict. Classis uses of motif and line and section are still there to integrate a Walt Whitmanesque rhetoric. Dramatic silences and a few quiet phrases contribute to the overall largeness. The crusty Ruggles, most individual among artists in an individualistic time (now in his nineties and more painter than composer) achieved the splendor he conceived in this first Boston performance of Sun-treader.

After intermission, there was Mozart in his most beguiling manner. Benita Valente sang Rest peacefully, my gentle one, a love song from the unfinished opera, Zaide, with the clean and and colorful decision, the emotive intention of scale and figure, that instrumentalists like to think instrumenta.

And then with the Exsultate, jubilate mutet, (an incredible composition for age 16) Valente showed how coloratura leaps and figures can be line and feeling—a fine excess. The famous Allelujah at the end had the fling of creative joy in life whatever the evil. Mr. Thomas showed accoustical discretion in the use of only one double-bass. Miss Valente's high notes, never thin or forced or exploited, just appeared as a natural realiztion of Mozartean naturalness. Mr. Thomas' accompaniment was discrete but supporting and always in motion. Despite commentators, there is no irreverence in dance before the altar.

This led easily into Symphony No. 34, its deft delight again incredible, that it came out of Mozart's frustration in provincial Salzburg not long before he was kicked out. The Allegro, crisp sprightliness; Andante singing sentmient; Minuet (a separate one which Mozart might have used, when he did want the dance he raised, it to symphonic status by development beyond the popular—as in this one) — a Finale that, as Thomas played it, was a scampering of laughter. I have seldom heard the Boston Symphony play with such sensitive and joyful definition.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

MAR 26 1970

Herald Traveler
3-21-'70

Symphony
Little-Performed Works Appeal

By HARRY NEVILLE

At the risk of belaboring the subject, this writer would like to say once again what a fine thing Boston has in Michael Tilson Thomas, the BSO's associate conductor. It would be premature to make predictions about his long-range success with this or any other orchestra because of the simple fact that honeymoons between conductors and their players and public (and critics) are notoriously short-lived affairs.

It would be unrealistic, too, to suppose that Thomas's current success has nothing to do with his age, his newness and the fact that he isn't burdened with difficult and often alienating decisions about orchestra policy and personnel. No doubt he operates at present under singularly benign circumstances, but what a pleasure, nevertheless, to hear him at this particular point of his career. And what a pleasure it must be for him too.

YESTERDAY afternoon's program, like preceding ones under Thomas, was an appealing mixture of little performed works by composers familiar and unfamiliar. It included the first Boston performances of compositions by Ruth Crawford Seeger and Carl Ruggles, both of whose works date from 1931.

On the basis of her Andante for String Orchestra, Mrs. Seeger would seem to have been not only a truly original composer but also that even rarer thing, a first-rate female composer. It speaks volumes on the subject of the paucity of good female composers to say that Mrs. Seeger wrote little after her marriage.

As the program notes pointed out, the Andante, with its rhythmic stasis and subtly shifting dynamics, recalls Schoenberg's "Farben," played only two weeks previously. But whereas the latter work seems an impressionistic mood piece, Seeger's is more overtly emotional, particularly so in its expressive use of minor seconds.

"Sun-Treader" is a tone poem by a Massachusetts native and one-time Boston resident. Carl Ruggles, now 94, has for years lived in Vermont, and his music is as jagged and granitic as parts of the landscape of that state. Like Seeger, he too is an original, only more so, for it would be difficult to point to antecedents or, for that matter, consequences of his musical way of thinking.

THE WORK'S TITLE is a phrase used by Robert Browning to describe the poet Shelley, and the dark, somber music with its recurring drum beats is indeed suggestive of some tragic figure or concept. Written as one continuous movement, the work's structural organization seems to divide into no neatly defined segments, but Thomas did a masterful job of giving it a lucid, coherent shape.

Soprano Benita Valente appeared as soloist in two works of Mozart, an aria from "Zaide" and the motet "Exsultate, jubilate." She has a pure, sweet voice and gave much pleasure, especially with her sensitive phrasing. Her coloratura work could have been more clearly articulated; however, it was effective in the final section of the motet, even if at a speed somewhat slower than Mozart's indicated vivace.

In the final selection of the afternoon, Mozart's Symphony No. 34 in C, Thomas got some of the most gracious and elegant Mozart playing this listener has heard from the BSO.

Record American 3-21-'70

BSO, Soprano In Excellent Duo

By L. DAVID HARRIS
Music Critic

One of the best Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts of the season was performed yesterday. Its excellence was personified in the qualities of guest soprano Benita Valente.

Miss Valente sang two Mozart works—the "Ruhe sanft, mein holdes Leben" from "Zaide" opera and the "Exsultate, jubilate" motet.

The first "Zaide" aria was the concert's high point, particularly suited for her light, high soprano voice. It was a graceful minuet with an andante middle section, beautiful florid passages that demanded good vocal flexibility.

The "Exultate, jubilate" motet was equally well done. Some passages seemed a bit harsh, but the familiar "Allelujah!" section could only be described as artistically performed—a model of grace and decorum.

Michael Tilson Thomas conducted the orchestra and there was good rapport between the musicians and the soloist. The orchestra seldom — if ever — was too loud and it all was a thoroughly enjoyable listening experience.

Perhaps it might be suggested in future performances Miss Valente be positioned a little closer to the front of the stage. She was not visible to this reviewer—and to many persons sitting in the right section of the symphony's main floor.

Another plus point of the concert was Carl Ruggles' "Sun Treader" tone poem.

Composer Ruggles (a New England neighbor living now in Bennington, Vt.) has too long been neglected and his atonal music was especially welcomed.

It glittered with grandeur and was a challenge to hear —visioning the rugged New Englander who put it all together.

Conductor Thomas made the most of its final chord. Surely if the northern lights are visible in Vermont, Ruggles must have been seized by them when he finished "Sun Treader."

There is an old story about how Ruggles was once heard by hammering out a dissonant chord over and over again by a Vermont neighbor.

"Carl, what in heaven's name are you trying to do with that chord?"

And Ruggles replied:

"I'm giving it the test of time!"

Surely it must have been the same chord Conductor Thomas made such effective use of yesterday.

43.

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Friday afternoon March 27 1970 at 3.30
Saturday evening March 28 1970 at 8.30

GUNTHER SCHULLER conductor

toward the center of the stage, moving the space [illegible] ascends the altar steps, takes the Grail from the shrine, and breathes a silent prayer before it. The Chalice gradually becomes suffused with a soft glow, while darkness slowly descends upon the hall. The main motives of the prelude to the work are subtly interwoven with each other in strings, woodwind and harps. 'Wondrous high salvation! Redeemed the Redeemer!' sing the squires and knights, while mystic voices (sopranos and altos) float down from the middle height and the dome. A ray of light falls upon the Grail, which now glows ardently, and a white dove descends from the dome and hovers over Parsifal's head. Kundry, her enigmatic course through the world completed, her part played to the end in the enlightenment of Parsifal through pity, sinks to the ground lifeless, her last look being turned on him. Amfortas and Gurnemanz kneel in homage before Parsifal, the new king, as he stands aloft among the worshipping brotherhood, waving the Grail from side to side in blessing of them. The harmonic and contrapuntal texture becomes more and more etherealised and the Act closes with a return of the theme which had appeared in the prelude to Act one, with a final gentle insistence provided by the rich tones of trumpets and trombones.

The Friends of the New England Conservatory

Gunther Schuller, President of the New England Conservatory, is the guest Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week.

23 members of the Orchestra are graduates of the Conservatory.

33 members of the Orchestra are on the Conservatory Faculty.

No further proof is needed that support of the New England Conservatory is vitally important to the future of great music.

If you would like to help, you can do so by joining the Friends of the New England Conservatory.

For membership information please call 262-1120 ext. 267.

missioning of a children's opera to be written by Gunther Schuller. The opera, which will be performed for the first time by the Opera Company of Boston on May 8 of this year, is set to a libretto by John Updike, based on the fairy tale The fisherman and his wife by the Brothers Grimm. Gunther Schuller's long association with John Lewis and the Modern Jazz Quartet has led him to compose many works for this group, as well as for Ornette Coleman and the late Eric Dolphy. An absorbing example of his compositions in the 'third stream' idiom is his Conversations. performed by the Modern Jazz Quartet and the Beaux Arts String Quartet in an album on Atlantic Records entitled Third Stream Music.

As a conductor, he has made guest appearances with the orchestras in Cincinnati, Los Angeles, St Louis, Baltimore, Minneapolis, Cleveland, New York, Chicago, Rochester, Washington and San Francisco. In Europe, he has conducted the BBC Symphony, the Berlin Free Radio Symphony, the Berlin Philharmonic, the Philharmonia Orchestra of London, the Philharmonic Orchestra of the French Radio (O.R.T.F.) as well as the Icelandic Symphony Orchestra. Recently he led concerts by the Boston Philharmonia, the Springfield Symphony and the Minnesota Orchestra.

A series of concerts entitled 'Twentieth Century innovations', sponsored by the Carnegie Hall Corporation, was organized and conducted by Schuller in New York City from 1963 through 1965. Also in New York, over WBAI, he broadcast a weekly program entitled 'Contemporary music in evolution', which presented an analysis of contemporary music from 1900 to the present. Subsequently this series was heard over stations of the National Association of Educational Broadcasters.

As a teacher, Gunther Schuller was acting head of the Composition Department of the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood from 1963 to 1965. In 1965, he was appointed Head of the Composition Department, succeeding Aaron Copland, and three years later Head of Contemporary Music Activities. He served on the faculty of Yale University as Associate Professor, a post he left to become President of the New England Conservatory.

His musico-analytical study of jazz, Early jazz: its roots and musical development, was published two years ago by Oxford University Press, the house which also published his book on Horn technique in 1962.

Gunther Schuller has been the recipient of such awards as a National Institute of Arts and Letters award in 1960, the Brandeis Creative Arts Award in 1960, and a Guggenheim Fellowship for two successive years. In 1967 he was elected a member of the National Institute of Arts and Letters, and is a member of the Music Panel of the National Endowment for the Arts. Earlier this year he was appointed by the Governor of Massachusetts to the Commonwealth's Council on the Arts and Humanities.

Works by Gunther Schuller have been performed by the Boston Symphony in past seasons, and Erich Leinsdorf conducted the recording of Seven studies on themes of Paul Klee for RCA Records. Schuller has himself conducted the Orchestra in 1964, 1966 and 1967.

Thomas leads BSO in Mrs. Seeger's Andante

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

MAR 27 1970

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

Michael Tilson Thomas put an unusual program together for his Boston Symphony concert yesterday afternoon. He began with American music of forty years ago, Ruth Crawford Seeger's Andante for String Orchestra and "Sun-treader" by Carl Ruggles, and then gave us a second half that was all Mozart, "Ruhe sanft" from the unfinished Singspiel "Zaide" and the motet, "Exsultate, jubilate," both with Benita Valente as soprano soloist, and the Symphony No. 34 in C.

Mrs. Seeger, who was born in 1901 and who died in 1953, was a pupil, and later the wife, of Charles Seeger, a musicologist and a scrappy, forward-looking critic and teacher. They became the parents of the famous Pete, and Mrs. Seeger was in fact much more involved in the study of folk music in the last 20 years of her life than in composing. Her career as a "serious" composer was drastically and sadly short, for the String Quartet which she wrote in 1931 not only marked her real coming of age as a creative artist, but was also her last major work.

That Quartet is one of the most expressive, personal and arresting works of the rich period in which it was composed, and the Andante which the Symphony played is an orchestral setting of its slow movement. It is a remarkable movement in which dynamics are isolated as a primary structural element much as colors are in the third of Schoenberg's Five Pieces, Op. 16. It is like a study in wave motion, a dense, often highly dissonant polyphony of independent patterns of swell and contraction. Incidentally, the house program was absurdly fussy, or perhaps just mistaken, in claiming this performance as a Boston premiere: Thomas conducted the piece with the Philharmonia last April, though admittedly that was in Cambridge.

The "Sun-treader" performance was a bona fide Boston premiere, though the first American performance four years ago was given by the Boston Symphony, though in Portland, Me., as part of a Ruggles 90th birthday celebration organized by Bowdoin College. Where Mrs. Seeger's Expressionist Andante is a statement of Angst and torment, Ruggles' virtually contemporary (1927-32) tone-poem is an angrily aggressive, marching - forth - to - war sort of steamroller.

It is a single movement, somewhere between 15 and 20 minutes long, and written in a Sonata form so stiff that Clementi might have blushed to own up to it. That is its weakness, but it has remarkable strengths: rhythmic invention and skill, an impressive sense of motion (at least until the arrival of the over-prepared and over-explicit recapitulation), a fascinating notion of counterpoint, and enormous expressive energy. The orchestral sound is thick, quite unlike any other I know, and relentlessly loud, and I am not sure whether all that is naive and a partial failure or a bold gamble and a crushing success.

Both these works got cohesive, generally effective, but less than unfailingly precise performances. Thanks also to program editor Andrew Raeburn for reprinting Eric Salzman's long and interesting essay on Ruggles.

The 34th Symphony is the one about which Mozart wrote to his father that he heard it at Mannheim (or perhaps conducted it — I forget which) with all the woodwinds doubled and with an enormous lot of strings and that the result had been "magnifique." It is a festive and joyous piece whose minor-mode patches are there for richness of color rather than as adumbrations of pathos, and it flourishes under "big" treatment. If anything, the performance was less massive than I had anticipated, Thomas' Mozart being generally delicate, cool, "classical."

That made him a most suitable partner for Benita Valente, whose exquisitely silvery, poised, virtuosic, elegantly and sensitively phrased singing was a particular pleasure. All three Mozart performances fell a little short of being either as touching or as exciting as they might have been; still, they were on a level rarely attained, and I would have a hard time naming a lyric soprano who is a finer Mozart singer than Miss Valente.

Boston Globe
3-21-'70

BSO at 3:30 p.m.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that today's concert will begin at 3:30 p.m. instead of the customary 2:0'clock.

3:30 Starting Time For BSO Concert

Because of Good Friday observances today's BSO concert will begin at 3:30 p.m. instead of the usual starting time. The program will include music from "Parsifal," as well as work of Haydn, Schuller and Webern. Gunther Schuller will conduct.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

MAR 27 1970

Thomas Conducts

BSO in An Unusual Program

By HAROLD C. SPROUL

The program and performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Michael Tilson Thomas last Saturday was a delight. Andante for String Orchestra is a work of 1931 by Ruth Crawford Seeger (mother of Pete) arranged from her string quartet. It is a gradual accretion of tonal layers, dissonantly spaced, each swelling, ceasing, shifting in its own time without rhythmic pulse, except that the intrusion of new notes gives an irregular push to the mass, and the difference in the timing of the swells adds motion as well as a kind of inner counterpoint of resonance.

There is one punctuation when the tension flares up like a burst balloon. The fine string tone of the BSO, especially of the basses, came into its own. The fact that Schoenberg had done something roughly similar is no detraction.

Carl Ruggles Sun Treader, inspired by a line from Browning's tribute to Shelley ("Sun-treader, light and life be thine forever") made terrific contrast to the Seeger, the tread of the tympany calling up a rhythmic assertion of brasses (many extras) that split open all mental smog with dissonant splendor and proceeded to build a calculated complex of counterpoint, tense with harmonic conflict. Classis uses of motif and line and section are still there to integrate a Walt Whitmanesque rhetoric. Dramatic silences and a few quiet phrases contribute to the overall largeness. The crusty Ruggles, most individual among artists in an individualistic time (now in his nineties and more painter than composer) achieved the splendor he conceived in this first Boston performance of Sun-treader.

After intermission, there was Mozart in his most beguiling manner. Benita Valente sang Rest peacefully, my gentle one, a love song from the unfinished opera, Zaide, with the clean and and colorful decision, the emotive intention of scale and figure, that instrumentalists like to think instrumenta.

And then with the Exsultate, jubilate mutet, (an incredible composition for age 16) Valente showed how coloratura leaps and figures can be line and feeling—a fine excess. The famous Allelujah at the end had the fling of creative joy in life whatever the evil. Mr. Thomas showed accoustical discretion in the use of only one double-bass. Miss Valente's high notes, never thin or forced or exploited, just appeared as a natural realiztion of Mozartean naturalness. Mr. Thomas' accompaniment was discrete but supporting and always in motion. Despite commentators, there is no irreverence in dance before the altar.

This led easily into Symphony No. 34, its deft delight again incredible, that it came out of Mozart's frustration in provincial Salzburg not long before he was kicked out. The Allegro, crisp sprightliness; Andante singing sentmient; Minuet (a separate one which Mozart might have used, when he did want the dance he raised, it to symphonic status by development beyond the popular—as in this one) — a Finale that, as Thomas played it, was a scampering of laughter. I have seldom heard the Boston Symphony play with such sensitive and joyful definition.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

MAR 26 1970

Record American 3-21-'70

BSO, Soprano In Excellent Duo

By L. DAVID HARRIS
Music Critic

One of the best Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts of the season was performed yesterday. Its excellence was personified in the qualities of guest soprano Benita Valente.

Miss Valente sang two Mozart works—the "Ruhe sanft, mein holdes Leben" from "Zaide" opera and the "Exsultate, jubilate" motet.

The first "Zaide" aria was the concert's high point, particularly suited for her light, high soprano voice. It was a graceful minuet with an andante middle section, beautiful florid passages that demanded good vocal flexibility.

The "Exultate, jubilate" motet was equally well done. Some passages seemed a bit harsh, but the familiar "Allelujah!" section could only be described as artistically performed—a model of grace and decorum.

Michael Tilson Thomas conducted the orchestra and there was good rapport between the musicians and the soloist. The orchestra seldom — if ever — was too loud and it all was a thoroughly enjoyable listening experience.

Perhaps it might be suggested in future performances Miss Valente be positioned a little closer to the front of the stage. She was not visible to this reviewer—and to many persons sitting in the right section of the symphony's main floor.

Another plus point of the concert was Carl Ruggles' "Sun Treader" tone poem.

Composer Ruggles (a New England neighbor living now in Bennington, Vt.) has too long been neglected and his atonal music was especially welcomed.

It glittered with grandeur and was a challenge to hear —visioning the rugged New Englander who put it all together.

Conductor Thomas made the most of its final chord. Surely if the northern lights are visible in Vermont, Ruggles must have been seized by them when he finished "Sun Treader."

There is an old story about how Ruggles was once heard by hammering out a dissonant chord over and over again by a Vermont neighbor.

"Carl, what in heaven's name are you trying to do with that chord?"

And Ruggles replied:

"I'm giving it the test of time!"

Surely it must have been the same chord Conductor Thomas made such effective use of yesterday.

Symphony

Little-Performed Works Appeal

By HARRY NEVILLE

At the risk of belaboring the subject, this writer would like to say once again what a fine thing Boston has in Michael Tilson Thomas, the BSO's associate conductor. It would be premature to make predictions about his long-range success with this or any other orchestra because of the simple fact that honeymoons between conductors and their players and public (and critics) are notoriously short-lived affairs.

It would be unrealistic, too, to suppose that Thomas's current success has nothing to do with his age, his newness and the fact that he isn't burdened with difficult and often alienating decisions about orchestra policy and personnel. No doubt he operates at present under singularly benign circumstances, but what a pleasure, nevertheless, to hear him at this particular point of his career. And what a pleasure it must be for him too.

YESTERDAY afternoon's program, like preceding ones under Thomas, was an appealing mixture of little performed works by composers familiar and unfamiliar. It included the first Boston performances of compositions by Ruth Crawford Seeger and Carl Ruggles, both of whose works date from 1931.

On the basis of her Andante for String Orchestra, Mrs. Seeger would seem to have been not only a truly original composer but also that even rarer thing, a first-rate female composer. It speaks volumes on the subject of the paucity of good female composers to say that Mrs. Seeger wrote little after her marriage.

As the program notes pointed out, the Andante, with its rhythmic stasis and subtly shifting dynamics, recalls Schoenberg's "Farben," played only two weeks previously. But whereas the latter work seems an impressionistic mood piece, Seeger's is more overtly emotional, particularly so in its expressive use of minor seconds.

"Sun-Treader" is a tone poem by a Massachusetts native and one-time Boston resident, Carl Ruggles, now 94, has for years lived in Vermont, and his music is as jagged and granitic as parts of the landscape of that state. Like Seeger, he too is an original, only more so, for it would be difficult to point to antecedents or, for that matter, consequences of his musical way of thinking.

THE WORK'S TITLE is a phrase used by Robert Browning to describe the poet Shelley, and the dark, somber music with its recurring drum beats is indeed suggestive of some tragic figure or concept. Written as one continuous movement, the work's structural organization seems to divide into no neatly defined segments, but Thomas did a masterful job of giving it a lucid, coherent shape.

Soprano Benita Valente appeared as soloist in two works of Mozart, an aria from "Zaide" and the motet "Exsultate, jubilate." She has a pure, sweet voice and gave much pleasure, especially with her sensitive phrasing. Her coloratura work could have been more clearly articulated; however, it was effective in the final section of the motet, even if at a speed somewhat slower than Mozart's indicated vivace.

In the final selection of the afternoon, Mozart's Symphony No. 34 in C, Thomas got some of the most gracious and elegant Mozart playing this listener has heard from the BSO.

Herald Traveler
3-21-'70

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

43.

Friday afternoon March 27 1970 at 3.30
Saturday evening March 28 1970 at 8.30

GUNTHER SCHULLER conductor

HAYDN — Symphony no. 31 in D 'Hornsignal'
- Allegro
- Adagio
- Menuet & trio
- Moderato molto (theme and variations) — presto

SCHULLER — Spectra
first performance in Boston

intermission

WEBERN — Five pieces for orchestra op. 10
- Sehr ruhig und zart (Very quietly and delicately)
- Lebhaft und zart bewegt (Moving briskly and delicately)
- Sehr langsam und äusserst ruhig (Very slowly and extremely quietly)
- Fliessend, äusserst zart (Flowing, extremely delicately)
- Sehr fliessend (Very flowing)

WAGNER — Music from Act three of 'Parsifal'

THE GUEST CONDUCTOR

GUNTHER SCHULLER, who has been appointed, with Seiji Ozawa, Artistic Director of Tanglewood, was inaugurated as the New England Conservatory's ninth president on November 16 1967. His father was a violinist with the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra. At the age of twelve, Gunther Schuller began to take an active part in music, joining the St Thomas Choir School as a boy soprano, and beginning the study of composition, flute, and later, french horn.

He started composing two years later, when he wrote his First symphony; he developed so rapidly in his study of the french horn that in 1942, at the age of sixteen, he was offered a professional position with the Ballet Theatre Orchestra. At seventeen, he became solo french horn with the Cincinnati Symphony, and the following year performed his own Horn concerto with the orchestra directed by Eugene Goosens. By the time he was nineteen he had accepted a position in the Metropolitan Opera Orchestra. His Symphony for brass and percussion, written in 1949, received its first public performance under the direction of Leon Barzin and was later performed by the New York Philharmonic under the direction of Dimitri Mitropoulos. In 1959, Gunther Schuller resigned his position as solo horn with the Metropolitan Opera Orchestra in order to devote more time to creative work.

He has received commissions from many of the major orchestras in this country: Gala music, written for the 75th Anniversary of the Chicago Symphony; Spectra, commissioned by the New York Philharmonic; Seven studies on themes of Paul Klee, commissioned by a Ford Foundation grant for the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra. He was commissioned to write a ballet for the New York City Ballet which was choreographed by George Balanchine. Major European orchestras have also commissioned works: the opera The Visitation was commissioned by the Hamburg State Opera Company. This work was given its first American production by the San Francisco Opera Company in 1967, and has been presented since at the Metropolitan Opera in New York, and in other cities in Europe and America. His String quartet was commissioned by the Fromm Music Foundation for the University of Illinois; Music for brass quintet by the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation; Double quintet for woodwinds and brass by the University of Southern California. The sacred cantata — Psalm XCVIII, written on commission from the American Guild of Organists, received its first performance at the Guild's annual convention in Atlanta, Georgia, in June 1966 and was heard in Boston in December 1967 in a concert at Symphony Hall, performed by the New England Conservatory Chorus. One of Schuller's more recent works, Triplum, was commissioned by the New York Philharmonic for its 125th Anniversary celebrations and was recorded by the Orchestra with Leonard Bernstein conducting. In honor of its 60th Anniversary, the Junior League of Boston announced the com-

Letters, and is a member of the Music Panel of the National Endowment for the Arts. Earlier this year he was appointed by the Governor of Massachusetts to the Commonwealth's Council on the Arts and Humanities.

Works by Gunther Schuller have been performed by the Boston Symphony in past seasons, and Erich Leinsdorf conducted the recording of Seven studies on themes of Paul Klee for RCA Records. Schuller has himself conducted the Orchestra in 1964, 1966 and 1967.

44.

Schuller conducts BSO in a 'Spectra' premiere

By Louis Snyder

Gunther Schuller's "Spectra," in its Boston premiere, was the centerpiece of the challenging program he directed with the Boston Symphony in its two weekend concerts at Symphony Hall. However, his other selections — Haydn's "Hornsignal" Symphony, Webern's Five Pieces for Orchestra, and Music from Act 3 of Wagner's "Parsifal"—were all part of a general pattern, conscious or not, which delved interestingly into degrees and variations of sound.

To begin with, the Haydn Symphony (No. 31 in D) is a thorough delight for the ear from start to finish. Not only does it employ four horns (when he was an orchestral player, the horn was Mr. Schuller's instrument), but throughout, there are melodic solo opportunities for first violin, cello, and flute, against a busy background of orchestral and harpsichord continuo (not buried on this occasion, as is sometimes the case). It was played with great style—a really heart-warming piece. Mr. Schuller rightly made a point of singling out the four horn players —Messrs. Stagliano, Shapiro, Pottle, and O'Bannion—for special applause.

Mr. Schuller's own work, to no one's surprise, is hardly to be assimilated at one hearing. In program notes, he has explained his intentions in "Spectra" not only to liberate contemporary musical writing from previous "formal and organizational laws," but to accommodate the resulting changes in actual performance by redistributing the orchestra. This involved a central core of five chamber-sized groups (strings and winds, strings, brass, and winds, etc.) fringed by the remaining body of strings.

First time around, "Spectra" seems tightly organized, full of brilliant sounds (attributable to the changed seating arrangement ?), and rather extended (it is a long one-movement work). By itself, it could supply an afternoon of pondering, but with the contrasting pieces that surrounded it, "Spectra" delivered its message in behalf of contemporary tonal exploration.

After intermission the contrasts continued with the playing of Webern's Five Pieces—miniatures for a miniature orchestra—followed by the "Parsifal" music with a stageful of musicians.

The Webern Pieces are, of course, rarities for their brevity, fragility, and almost whispered quality of deeply personal feeling. One must listen intently, particularly in a hall as large as Symphony, for this set which is here and gone in no time.

No trouble hearing the Wagner, the concluding tribute to sonority and Good Friday. Mr. Schuller gave a free, almost impressionistic reading of the third-act music, which began with the Prelude and ended with the descent of the dove, not forgetting, of course, the Good Friday Spell which never seems to lose its fresh and simple appeal. Although there was rather much of this too, the "Parsifal" excerpts illustrated in more familiar terms how music used to be made and where it comes from. The orchestra made it sound wonderful, and Mr. Schuller, whether or not it was his intent, climaxed an afternoon which was a good lesson in listening.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

MAR 30 1970

Variety of Romanticisms

Gunther Schuller Conducts BSO

By HAROLD C. SPROUL

Haydn (Symphony No. 31 in D) fulfilled his onerous job at the Esterhazy court by experimenting ingeniously in ways to stir up the impulses of dance and sentiment and drama. This was brought out by Boston Symphony Orchestra concert last week.

Gunther Schuller (Spectra, first Boston performance) arranges the orchestra in seven mixed groups—five of them balanced chamber musically—the better to oppose or blend instrumental qualities as if on a color-organ. There is only occasionally a scrap of rhythmic pattern but always motion as complexities of tone move around in stage perspective. Latter-day expressionist painters have similarly exploited the romantic impact of large color areas (A Rothko would make a seductive end-wall) but without the come-on of motion —that is, until now with the active machinery of lights.

Webern (Five Pieces for Orchestra opus 10) eschewed the Wagnerian, learned from Schoenberg but remained his own intense, inspired, neurotic self in these tiny shafts that go straight to the heart (if you have a heart and an ear). Schuller used twenty instruments for this.

And finally, Wagner (music from Act III of Parsifal) in the deep involvement of melting chromatics, long evolutions of melody, expanding, welling-up impulse and emerging glory of the assuring brass.

So—we have come full circle (at least, with Schuller) but spirally, so that hardness of heart (the impersonal, the no-meaning) gives way to the fulfillment of total involvement of thought, feeling and action. This is what the young are asking for sometimes thrashing around in dubious ways.

Like some other composer-conductors, Schuller is modest in gesture, completely concentrated in the music. His conceptions of each piece were imaginative and orchestrally projected.

Spectra afforded the most enchanting instrumental sounds I have ever heard from an orchestra. Since it progressed as a self-generating immediacy there was no over-all restriction of form and the only way to follow was to relax. That, of course, meant that the length was arbitrary (except to the composer) and the piece might have ended many times before it did, though I enjoyed every extension of it. The same with the Parsifal—it could go on forever, but without the stage action, why? Out of Webern you couldn't extract a note.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

APR 2 1970

Schuller leads BSO in his 'Spectra'

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

Gunther Schuller was guest conductor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon and used the occasion to give the rather overdue Boston premiere of one of his strongest compositions, "Spectra." Schuller wrote the work in 1958 on commission from the Board of Directors of the New York Philharmonic for presentation as a parting gift to Dimitri Mitropoulos whom they had just bumped out as Music Director.

Schuller was 32 then, and just beginning to be recognized as a serious composer, as one of the liveliest figures in this country's musical life generally. Actually, Schuller had been composing steadily since he was in his teens, and "Spectra," as assured as it is imaginative, is anything other than a beginner's piece.

Schuller's striking orchestral fantasy and discipline is most vividly in evidence, and "Spectra" indeed is very much and very specifically a piece about the sonorities and the ensemble characteristics of the modern virtuoso orchestra. To emphasize that a composer in the 1950's combines instruments differently from one in the middle of the 19th century, Schuller asks for a special seating plan, as peculiarly efficient for his music as the conventional is for Brahms, which splits the orchestra into five groups of from four to 14 players, each containing some representation of strings, wood, and brass, placing the kitchen department at the back of the stage in the normal way, but otherwise mantling the five quasi-chamber groups within a surrounding semicircle of tutti strings.

Not surprisingly, then, the deployment of sounds in space — the difference in effect between, for example, the horn who sits where you would normally see the 5th cellist and the one who is mixed up among the second violins somewhere — plays an important role in the argument of "Spectra."

It is a one-movement work, extended in scale, and perhaps less effective than "Triplum," Schuller's more recent New York Philharmonic commission, only because it is not quite concise in saying its piece. It gets going a little slowly, but it finds its way eventually to some eloquent and appealing music, a spare and tense section in very slow tempo, then its one really quick outburst, and a glissando-laden coda that I hear as partaking both of the comic and the sinister. In all, I find much in "Spectra" that is absorbing, and more than a little that confirms my impression that Schuller at his best is one of the relatively few composers who not only have vocabulary and a technique but who have something to say, too.

Schuller produced a generally effective and at times impressively played performance of "Spectra." He did well with Webern's Five Pieces, Op. 10, and the playing was good except for those clarinet solos which Mr. Cioffi blew into the room not in Webern's pianissimo and triple piano but at a persistently hearty mezzo-forte; however, these beautifully made examples of "multum in parvo" never really stood a chance against the noise-making resources of the restless audience.

The concert began with Haydn's Symphony No. 31 in D ("Hornsignal"), heard in a performance in which the lively playing of the first movement promised well, but which soon foundered in a number of stylistic solecisms, the impossibly slow tempi in the Adagio and the Variation set being the most damaging, and with exceedingly undistinguished playing throughout. The program ended with a Good Friday observance in the form of orchestral excerpts from Act III of Wagner's "Parsifal."

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

MAR 28 1970 New

Whitestone Photo

Guest conductor

Gunther Schuller, composer and president of the New England Conservatory, will direct the Boston Symphony on Friday, March 27, at 3:30 p.m. and Saturday, March 28, at 8:30 p.m. in a program which will include his own "Spectra," as well as works by Haydn, Webern, and Wagner.

Schuller Displays Failings as Guest Conductor at the Symphony

By HARRY NEVILLE
HT Music Critic

Partly because of the indisposition of its music director, William Steinberg, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has had an unusual number of guest conductors this season—more, really, than has been good for the orchestra's well being.

Many of the guests, to be sure, have achieved excellent results (even spectacular results in a few cases), and of course it has been interesting to observe a succession of conducting styles.

BUT IT IS almost inevitable that at some point both audience and orchestra will pay for whatever pleasures this situation affords, and that point seemed to have arrived yesterday for the BSO, when Gunther Schuller appeared as guest conductor.

Schuller's musical gifts are evident in much that he has done, but it's difficult —for this listener at least—to extend that observation to his conducting efforts. Friday's concert was not merely undistinguished, but it unvolved also a shocking lack of such fundamentals of the conductor's art as the ability to achieve sensible orchestral balances.

Such failings were most apparent in Haydn's Symphony No. 31, where much of the solo playing was also quite poor. But the Good Friday excerpts from Wagner's "Parsifal" and Webern's Five Pieces, Op. 10, were equally if less obviously afflicted.

SCHULLER'S OWN "Spectra," a composition dating from 1958, received its Boston premiere in what one can only assume was an authoritative performance. In the composer's words, the title "refers to the use of various color series as an important all-pervading structural element of the work."

Perhaps the most immediately impressive things about "Spectra" are its vast range of striking coloristic effects and its sometimes quite beautiful sonorities. Schuller does not appear to have organized the musical events in any conventionally logical way, and on first hearing this listener was oppressed by a sense of shapelessness and inordinate length.

With "Spectra" and Webern's Five Pieces on the same program it was impossible not to observe how scrupulously respectful the latter composer is of the listener's sensibilities. The Five Pieces, which make listening demands similar to those of "Spectra," last about six minutes in all, while Schuller's work, at a guess, takes somewhere in the neighborhood of twenty.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

MAR 28 1970 N Eng

Festivals to Salute Birth of Beethoven

By JOHN F. KYES
Gazette Music Critic

On Dec. 17, 1770 a baby was baptized in Bonn, Germany, and christened Ludwig van Beethoven. Historians, lacking birth records, assume that the famous composer was born on Dec. 16, 1770, the day before his baptism.

During the entire calendar year of 1970, innumerable Beethoven celebrations will include performances of his works.

For musical organizations whose seasons extend from fall to spring, this poses a problem: whether to celebrate in the season of 1969-70 or 1970-71, or both. We have already noticed some Beethoven performances as early as October, 1969.

Worldwide celebrations at Bonn consist of a three-part International Beethoven Festival, to be held May 2-8, Sept. 12-26 and Dec. 11-17, 1970.

Vienna will hold an official festival May 24-June 21.

In preliminary events, Leonard Hokanson, pianist, formerly of Worcester, will solo with the Vienna Philharmonic January 11 in Beethoven's Fourth Piano Concerto.

Worcester Festival

Worcester Music Festival heads are working on plans for Beethoven performances at the 111th Festival, to be held Oct. 26-31, 1970.

The festival repertoire list from 1873 to date is an interesting but inconclusive sidelight on the media's recent statement regarding the world of music: that Beethoven performances, long leading the classical list, have been overtaken by Mozart.

Leonard Hokanson

The longest festival listings are, in order: Wagner, Beethoven, Mozart, Verdi, Tchaikovsky, Handel, Mendelssohn, Bach, Brahms and Berlioz. The Wagner list is of course mostly operatic, and its length less significant, because so many different excerpts from each opera are listed.

It is true that the listening mood has turned back to the exquisite forms of Mozart and his predecessors, but the challenge of Beethoven still remains a potent one.

Chamber Music

Beethoven and Mozart each offer the listener a wealth of chamber music, in addition to instrumental works of major size. Mozart's array of vocal music is longer and more varied, containing many operas and religious works, so that Beethoven can be said to maintain his place in men's hearts and minds with a much smaller total output.

In a 57-year life, Beethoven's works totaled 259, including numberings added later by Grove. In his 37 years, Mozart's works (as listed by Kochel) exceeded 626.

New England concertgoers have many Beethoven performances available this year.

Boston Symphony Orchestra will stage a Beethoven Festival April 7-11, Steinberg conducting throughout. The programs will feature Isaac Stern, Rudolf Serkin (three times), the Chorus pro Musica and Rutgers University Choir.

Tanglewood

Tanglewood's Berkshire Festival, July 3-Aug. 23, will include a series of Beethoven performances, to be announced in detail Feb. 1.

Hartford Symphony Orchestra, under Arthur Winograd, will continue its observances with an all-Beethoven program Feb. 11, consisting of Symphony No. 6 (Pastoral), the Great Fugue and David Oistrakh in the Violin Concerto.

Rhode Island Philharmonic Orchestra's all-Beethoven program of Feb. 7, under Francis Madeira, will include the Overture to "Fidelio," Symphony No. 5, and Itzhak Perlman in the Violin Concerto.

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.

JAN 8 1970

BEETHOVEN FESTIVAL April 7-11

By Lotte Meitner-Graf

Three soloists for Beethoven

Rudolf Serkin, Martina Arroyo, and Isaac Stern will join with three more individual performers in the Beethoven celebration to be held in April at Symphony Hall to take note of the composer's anniversary.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

JAN 28 1970

A Beethoven celebration

The 200th anniversary of the birth of Ludwig van Beethoven will be celebrated at Symphony Hall in April with five evening concerts by the Boston Symphony, William Steinberg conducting. Works to be performed in the two subscription series of three (A) and two (B) concerts respectively, are the violin concerto, all five piano concertos and the Choral Fantasy (for piano and chorus), the "Missa Solemnis," three overtures, and the Third ("Eroica") and Fifth Symphonies.

Soloists engaged are Isaac Stern, who will be heard in the violin concerto on the opening night, Tuesday, April 7; Rudolf Serkin, who will play the five piano concertos and the Choral Fantasy in concerts on April 8, 9 and 10; and Martina Arroyo, soprano, Lili Chookasian, contralto, Richard Lewis, tenor, and Thomas Paul, bass, in the "Missa Solemnis" on April 11. The Chorus Pro Musica will be the singing group for the Choral Fantasy, while the orchestra will be joined by the Rutgers University Choir for the mass.

Subscriptions and detailed information about both series are now available at Symphony Hall.

Some musicians plan to mark the anniversary in one fell swoop and have done with. William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will do that. From April 7 through 11 he will conduct the orchestra in a five concert cycle at Symphony Hall.

Partaking will be Isaac Stern, to perform the violin concerto, and Rudolf Serkin, in all five piano concertos plus the Choral Fantasia for piano, orchestra and chorus.

The culminating concert will have the Missa Solemnis in which the orchestra will be joined by the Rutgers University Chorus. Soloists scheduled are soprano Martina Arroyo, contralto Lili Chookasian, tenor Richard Lewis and bass Thomas Paul.

Why all the fuss? For a much beloved composer, Beethoven was about the least lovable of men. A social misfit, his manner often was insulting even in the toniest Viennese gathering. Nor could you blame his deafness; he was simply a chronically unhappy, loutish type with few close friends.

Yet the enormous humanity of his music cannot be denied, that and an intellectual capacity he showed in music almost alone. On the one hand there is his idealism in Fidelio, the Eroica and the Ninth, on the other the constant exploration of melody, counterpoint and pure spatial sound throughout his writing.

Combine these with the man and and you have a fascinatingly complex personality. Opportunities to read about him will crop up all year long, naturally. Perhaps Alan Pryce-Jones' short but very rounded study, first published in 1933 and reprinted by Collier Books in 1962, will be brought back. If so, this is recommended reading to accompany all the listening you will be doing.

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
(M) 66,728 (S) 208,349

JAN 25 1970 New Engl News

THE BEETHOVEN BICENTENNIAL will be celebrated by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with five special all-Beethoven concerts April 7-11. William Steinberg will conduct and featured soloists will include Rudolph Sirkin (left), who will play all five piano concertos and Isaac Stern, who will perform the Violin Concerto. Tickets will be sold by subscription in two series: (A) — three concerts, April 7, 8 and 10 and (B) — two concerts, April 9 and 11.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

JAN 29 1970

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

FOUNDED IN 1881 BY HENRY LEE HIGGINSON

BEETHOVEN FESTIVAL

APRIL 7-11 1970

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

JAN 30 1970 New Engl News

Five All-Beethoven Concerts by BSO

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will present five special all-Beethoven concerts, April 7, 8, 9, 10, and 11, in commemoration of the 200th anniversary of Beethoven's birth. William Steinberg, music director of the Orchestra, will conduct the concerts. Pianist Rudolf Serkin will play all five Piano concertos, and Isaac Stern the Violin concerto. Soprano Martina Arroyo, contralto Lili Chookasian, tenor Richard Lewis and bass Thomas Paul will be soloists in the 'Missa Colemnis.' All concerts are at 8:30 p.m.

Beethoven Concert Programs

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will present five all-Beethoven concerts, April 7, 8, 9, 10 and 11, in commemoration of the 200th anniversary of Beethoven's birth. William Steinberg, music director of the orchestra, will conduct the concerts.

Pianist Rudolf Serkin will play all five piano concertos, and Isaac Stern the violin concerto. Soprano Martina Arroyo,

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300

JAN 31 1970 New Eng News

Monday, March 23, 1970
CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

46

Limelight
...focus on the arts

The Patriot Ledger, Wed., Feb. 4, 1970 Page 36

Beethoven's Birthday Is Coming

Pianist Rudolph Serkin, violinist Isaac Stern and Metropolitan Opera soprano Martina Arroyo will be among the soloists with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its Beethoven Festival, beginning April 7, commemorating the 200th anniversary of the composer's birth.

Mr. Serkin will play all five of the Beethoven piano concerti, and Mr. Stern will perform the violin concerto. Soloists with Miss Arroyo in the "Missa Solemnis" will be Lili Chookasian, contralto, Richard Lewis, tenor, and Thomas Paul, bass.

The Beethoven Festival opens on Tuesday evening, April 7, with the Egmont Overture. Violinist Isaac Stern follows with the Violin concerto and the program concludes with Symphony no. 3, the 'Eroica'.

On Wednesday evening, April 8, the second concert of the Beethoven series opens with the Leonore Overture no. 2. The remainder of the program consists of Piano concertos nos. 1 and 3 with Rudolf Serkin as soloist. This will be the first of Mr. Serkin's appearances in the Festival, when he will play all 5 Piano concertos and the Choral Fantasy during 3 consecutive evenings.

The third of the 'Beethoven Festival' programs, Thursday April 9, opens with the 'King Stephen' Overture. Following, Mr. Serkin and the Orchestra will play Piano concerto no. 2, and no. 5, the 'Emperor'.

On Friday evening, April 10, the fourth of the 'Beethoven Festival' programs opens with the Choral Fantasy. Rudolf Serkin is piano soloist. The Chorus Pro Musica, conducted by Alfred Nash Patterson, will also perform. The Chorus first appeared with the Boston Symphony in 1950 when Serge Koussevitzky conducted Barraud's 'Mystere des Saints Innocents'. They have appeared with the Orchestra over 50 times. The remainder of the April 10 program consists of the Piano concerto no. 4, with Mr. Serkin as soloist, and Symphony no. 5.

The final concert of the 'Beethoven Festival', Saturday evening April 11, is devoted to a single work, the 'Missa Solemnis'. William Steinberg will conduct soloists Martina Arroyo (soprano), Lili Chookasian (contralto), Richard Lewis (tenor), and Thomas Paul (bass), and the Rutgers University Choir. The 'Missa Solemnis' was first.

Tickets for the 'Beethoven Festival' are sold by subscription in two series — Series A (3 concerts) including April 7, 8 and 10; and Series B (2 concerts) including April 9 and 11, in person, by mail or by telephone from the Subscription Office, Symphony Hall, Boston, Massachusetts 02115. A complete listing of programs, dates, soloists and prices is available at Symphony Hall. All concerts will be at Symphony Hall at 8:30 p.m.

RUDOLPH SERKIN

MARTINA ARROYO

E. J. DIAS

A Look At the Arts

On Dec. 16, 1770, Ludwig Van Beethoven was born. Consequently, during this year of 1970, throughout the civilized world, the bicentennial anniversary of his birth will be celebrated. I suspect that the eminent pianist, Schroeder, in Charles Schulz's delightful comic strip, "Peanuts," will have much to say about the commemoration, with or without the help of the irascible Lucy and the irrepressible Snoopy. In April, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will present an all-Beethoven Series, featuring such celebrated soloists as pianist Rudolf Serkin and violinist Isaac Stern. In fact, there is not a major music ensemble in the world that will not do its bit in paying tribute to the memory of the man who must rank among the three or four greatest composers of all time.

On the local scene, although the year is still young, we already have had the opportunity to listen to two programs dedicated to Beethoven. The first of these was performed on Feb. 1 by the New Bedford Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of John R. Pandolfi — a concert that included the "Egmont" Overture, the "Eroica" Symphony, and the "Violin Concerto in D Major," with Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as soloist.

Mr. Pandolfi and his musicians rose well to the seriousness of the occasion by playing the "Egmont" in good, crisp style; by doing good work in the "Eroica," particularly in the famous "Funeral March" of the second movement, and by providing surprisingly cohesive accompaniment for Mr. Silverstein in his beautifully-controlled and genuinely sensitive performance of the remarkable and perpetually popular violin concerto. Certainly, the concert was an auspicious beginning for this year of Beethoven.

Stern, Serkin to join B.S.O. in Beethoven series

The Boston Symphony's contribution to the bicentennial of Beethoven's birthday will be a series of concerts Apr. 7-11 in Symphony Hall. William Steinberg, the orchestra's music director, is scheduled to conduct.

Beethoven's concertos for the solo violin and solo piano will be featured in the series. Three overtures and two of the nine symphonies will be included, and the finale of the series will be devoted to a choral work, the Missa Solemnis.

Both instrumental soloists are old favorites with Boston Symphony audiences. Violinist Isaac Stern has performed 41 times with the B.S.O. (1948-1965) and pianist Rudolf Serkin 37 times (1938-1966).

Serkin will play the five piano concertos. In addition, he will perform the piano part in the Choral Fantasy, a work traditionally performed at his Marlboro, Vt., Music Festival.

Two choral groups will participate in the festival — Boston's Chorus pro Musica in the Choral Fantasy and the Rutgers University Choir in the Missa Solemnis. The Missa Solemnis was first performed by the Boston Symphony on Oct. 10, 1900, the inaugural concert of Symphony Hall.

Soloists for the Missa Solemnis, all noted opera and oratorio artists, are soprano Martina Arroyo, contralto Lili Chookasian, tenor Richard Lewis and basso Thomas Paul.

Tickets for the Boston Symphony's Beethoven festival will be sold by subscription in two series. Programs for Series A will be heard Apr. 7-8 and 10, and for Series B on Apr. 9 and 11. All concerts will begin at 8:30.

The schedule:

Series A—Apr. 7: "Egmont" Overture, Violin Concerto (Isaac Stern), Symphony No. 3 "Eroica." Apr. 8: "Leonore" Overture No. 2, Piano Concertos Nos. 1 and 3 (Rudolf Serkin). Apr. 10: Choral Fantasy (Chorus pro Musica, Serkin), Piano Concerto No. 4 (Serkin), Symphony No. 5.

Series B — Apr. 9: "King Stephen" Overture, Piano Concertos Nos. 2 and 5 (Serkin). Apr. 11: Missa Solemnis (soprano Martina Arroyo, contralto Lili Chooksasian, tenor Richard Lewis, basso Thomas Paul).

Rudolf Serkin
...Pianist

Isaac Stern
...Violinist

Lili Chookasian
...Contralto

Richard Lewis
...Tenor

Martin Arroyo
...Soprano

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,962 (E) 194,700
(S) 56[illegible]
FEB 15 1970 New Engl[illegible] News

BOSTON AFTER DARK
BOSTON, MASS.
W. [illegible]
FEB 18 1970

BOSTON AFTER DARK
Page 25—WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 1970

Beethoven and BSO

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has chosen to celebrate the 200th anniversary of Beethoven's birth with a five-day festival in April. William Steinberg is scheduled to conduct all five concerts, on consecutive evenings from April 7 to 11. Rudolf Serkin will perform the five piano concertos and the Choral Fantasy; Isaac Stern will appear in the Violin Concerto; and the festival will conclude with a performance of the Missa Solemnis, with Martina Arroyo, Lili Chookasian, Richard Lewis, and Thomas Paul as soloists.

Unfortunately the repertoire for these concerts consists exclusively of warhorse material—the same pieces that the BSO has been playing year in and year out for as long as anyone can remember. There will be no early works (apart from the well-known First and Second Piano Concertos), no chamber music, and none of the less frequently heard symphonies. The Missa Solemnis is the one ambitious undertaking of the festival.

Tickets are available by subscription, in two series. Series A (three concerts) may be heard for $12, 15, 18, 20, 25. Series B (two concerts) costs $8, 10, 12,14, and 17.50. Subscriptions are available in person, by mail, or by telephone from the subscription office, Symphony Hall (266-1492).

The programs for the festival are as follows:

Series A

Tuesday, April 7
Isaac Stern, violinist; William Steinberg, conductor
Egmont Overture
Violin Concerto
Symphony No. 3

Wednesday, April 8
Rudolf Serkin, pianist; William Steinberg, conductor
Leonore Overture No. 2
Piano Concerto No. 1
Piano Concerto No. 3

Friday, April 10
Rudolf Serkin, pianist; Chorus Pro Musica; William Steinberg, conductor Choral Fantasy
Piano Concerto No. 4
Symphony No. 5

Series B

Thursday, April 9
Rudolf Serkin, pianist; William Steinberg, conductor
King Stephen Overture
Piano Concerto No. 2
Piano Concerto No. 5

Saturday, April 11
Martina Arroyo, soprano; Lili Chookasian, contralto; Richard Lewis, tenor; Thomas Paul, bass; Rutgers University Choir; Willima Steinberg, conductor
Missa Solemnis

STANDARD-TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
(E) 70,000 (S) 60,000
FEB 15 1970 New Eng

Back in Boston

Leonard Bernstein will return to the Boston Symphony for the first time in 14 years on April 11 to conduct the Ninth Symphony in the fifth and final concert at Symphony Hall of the BSO's Beethoven Festival.

CSM 3/24/70

"MISSA SOLEMNIS" OF BEETHOVEN will be performed during the Boston Symphony Orchestra's celebration of the composer's bicentennial April 7-11. Soloists in the choral work will include (left to right) Thomas Paul, bass; Lili Chookasian, contralto; Martina Arroyo, soprano and Richard Lewis, tenor. Other soloists will include pianist Rudolph Serkin and Isaac Stern, violinist. Tickets for the Beethoven Festival will be sold by subscription in two series: "A" (3 concerts) April 7, 8 and 10; and "B" (2 concerts) April 9 and 11.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000
FEB 5 1970

Photography Incorporated

1818 portrait

A painting of Ludwig von Beethoven, done from life in 1818-19 by his friend Ferdinand Schimon. Now in the possession of Mr. and Mrs. F. Michael Bosch of Harvard, Mass., the portrait has been loaned to the Boston Symphony in connection with its current Beethoven Festival.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

APR 10 1970

RUDOLPH SERKIN performs all five Beethoven Piano Concertos, next week with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

MUSIC

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA—
Symphony Hall, corner of Mass. and Huntington Aves., Boston.
Beethoven Festival, Tues. through Sat. at 8:30 p.m.

Max Rudolf conductor, Isaac Stern violinist. Program: Symphony no. 3 (Eroica), Violin concerto.
Wednesday

Max Rudolf conductor, Rudolf Serkin pianist. Program: Leonore overture no. 2, Piano concerto no. 1, Piano concerto no. 3.
Thursday

Max Rudolf conductor, Rudolf Serkin pianist. Program: Coriolan overture, Piano concerto no. 2, Piano concerto no. 5, (Emperor).
Friday

Max Rudolf conductor, Rudolf Serkin pianist, Chorus Pro Musica. Program: Choral fantasy, Piano concerto no. 4, Symphony no. 5.
Saturday
Leonard Bernstein, conductor; Martina Arroyo, soprano; Lili Chookasian, contralto; Richard Lewis, tenor; Thomas Paul, bass, Chorus Pro Musica; Tanglewood Festival Chorus. Program: Symphony no. 9 'Choral.'

around THE HUB

SYMPHONY HALL
251 Huntington Ave., 266-1492.
April 1, 9 p.m., Joe Cocker
April 2, 8 p.m., Phil Ochs
April 3, 8:30 p.m., Jose Greco, flamenco dancer
April 4, 8 p.m., Bobby Sherman, singer
April 5, 3 p.m., Andre Watts, piano
April 7, Beethoven Festival, with Boston Symphony Orchestra and Isaac Stern
April 8, 8:30 p.m., Beethoven Festival B.S.O. with Rudolf Serkin
April 10, 8:30 p.m. Beethoven Festival, B.S.O., with Rudolf Serkin and Chorus Pro Musica
April 11, 8:30, Beethoven Festival, B.S.O. with Martina Arroyo, Lili Chookasian, Richard Lewis, Thomas Paul, and the Rutgers University Choir.

Happy Birthday, Dear Beethoven

The 200th anniversary of Ludwig van Beethoven's birth has prompted all kinds of celebrations; the Beethoven Festival planned by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will surely be one of the most exciting, as it brings together one of the world's finest orchestras with two outstanding soloists, pianist Rudolf Serkin and violinst Isaac Stern. The Festival will be held at Symphony Hall on five successive evenings beginning April 7, with Stern as soloist the evening of April 7, and Serkin performing April 8, 9, and 10. A highlight of the exceptional five-day festival will be a complete performance of the Missa Solemnis on April 11, with the Rutgers University Choir and soloists Martina Arroyo, soprano; Lili Chookasian, contralto; Richard Lewis, tenor; and Thomas Paul, bass. BSO Musical Director William Steinberg will conduct for all five performances, for which tickets are available at the Symphony Hall box office.

Panorama Vol. 20
No. 16

Rudolf Serkin will be piano soloist with the B.S.O. during its Beethoven Festival April 7 through 11

5-Day Beethoven Festival to Open At Symphony Hall

The Boston Symphony's five-day Beethoven festival opens at Symphony Hall, Tuesday at 8:30 p.m. Max Rudolf will conduct and Isaac Stern will appear as soloist in the Beethoven violin concerto. On Wednesday, Thursday and Friday evenings Rudolf Serkin will perform the piano concertos, with Rudolf again conducting.

The final program, Saturday, APRIL 1/8/8, WILL CONSIST OF THE Symphony No. 9, with conductor Leonard Bernstein, soprano Martina Arroya, contralto Lili Chookasian, tenor Richard Lewis, bass Thomas Paul, the Chorus Pro Musica and Tanglewood Festival Chorus.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

APR 3 1970

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, SYMPHONY HALL (266-1492) APRIL 7: Beethoven week begins with Max Rudolph and Isaac Stern and the Eroica and a violin concerto, all at 8:30 pm. APRIL 8: Rudolf Serkin is a soloist in piano concerto no. 1 and 3; and you get the Leonore overture no.2 as well. 8:30 pm. APRIL 9: The Coriolan overture, followed by Mr. Serkin with concerti no. 2 and 5. 8:30 pm. APRIL 10: The Chorus Pro Musica joins in with the Choral Fantasy, followed by Mr. Serkin and the fourth piano concerto, followed by the orchestra and the fifth symphony. 2:00 pm. APRIL 11: Beethoven week ends with the ninth symphony and the Chorus Pro Musica and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus and Leonard Bernstein and Martina Arroyo and Lili Chookasian and Richard Lewis and Thomas Paul. Beethoven, exhausted, died years ago. 8:30 pm. APRIL 14: Joseph Silverstein conducts Edith Peinemann in Bach's violin concerto no. 2 and Dvorak's ditto in A minor. Then Michael Tilson Thomas conducts Tchaikovsky's first symphony. 7:30 pm.

PHOENIX
CAMBRIDGE, MASS.
WEEKLY 15,000

APR 2 1970

Max Rudolf appointed to nation music panel

Nancy Hanks, chairman for the National Endowment for the Arts in Washington, D. C., has announced the appointment of Max Rudolf to serve on their Orchestra and Opera Advisory Panel.

Mr. Rudolf will conduct an all-Beethoven Festival on April 7, 8, 9 and 10, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, including Beethoven's Symphonies Nos. 3 and 5 with renowned guest-soloists Isaac Stern, violinist, and Rudolf Serkin, pianist.

Mr. Stern will perform Beethoven's Violin Concerto and Mr. Serkin's repertoire will include all five piano concertos as well as the Chorale Fantasy. After this all-Beethoven Festival, Mr. Rudolf will return to Cincinnati's Music Hall for an all-Wagner program on April 17 and 18. He will conduct excerpts from five operas by Wagner, including "Tannhauser," "Gotterdammerung" and "Tristan and Isolde."

Mr. Rudolf brought acclaim to the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra when he took command in 1958. Among his innovations were a unique program of in-school concerts, increase in musician personnel and an exclusive long-term contract with Decca Records.

Also to his credit was the Orchestra's selection by the U. S. Department of State for a 10-week around-the-world tour in 1966 and a 5-week European Tour (1968-69) to the music capitals of Europe.

In appreciation for Mr. Rudolf's 11 years of dedicated service, the Board of Trustees and management of the Orchestra, recently bestowed upon him the title of "Music Director Emeritus."

The Cincinnati Post
AND TIMES STAR
D. 243,618

APR 2 1970

The PERFORMING ARTS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will commemorate the 200th anniversary of Beethoven's birth in a five-concert festival under the conduction of Leonard Bernstein and Max Rudolf.

Performances at Symphony Hall will be at 8:30 p.m., Tuesday through Saturday. All five piano concertos will be played by Rudolf Serkin. Isaac Sterm will be soloist in the Violin Concerto, Tuesday evening, and the Chorus Pro Musica and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus will perform Symphony No. 9 'Choral.' to conclude the festival on Saturday.

Also featured will be the Choral Fantasy, Symphony No. 3 "Eroica", and Leonore Overture No. 2.

* * *

ITEM
LYNN, MASS.
(E) 3...

APR 4 1970

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

APR 2 1970

Four-Channel Stereo For BSO Beethoven Festival April 7-11

WCRB and WGBH-FM announces that they will broadcast the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Beethoven Festival live in 4-channel stereo direct from Symphony Hall.

Scheduled Tuesday, April 7, through Saturday, April 11, at 8:30 each evening, the Festival will feature outstanding guest artists including conductors Leonard Bernstein and Max Rudolf; violinist Isaac Stern, pianist Rudolf Serkin and soprano Martina Arroyo, contralto Lili Chookasian, tenor Richard Lewis, bass Thomas Paul, the Chorus Pro Musica and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, in the Ninth Symphony led by Bernstein Saturday evening, April 11.

48

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

APR 8 1970 New England

Beethoven festival has good start

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

A couple of the advertisers in the program book for the Boston Symphony's Beethoven festival have put Beethoven to work seeling the wares. One of them is the First & Old Colony Bank, which finds occasion to quotethe opening of the 5th Symphony, but in a piano reduction and, so help me, up a whole tone, in D minor! Well, may their interest rates ise even as their pitch transportations.

To make up for that indignity, the five-concert festival got off to a good musical start with a performance, under Max Rudolf, of the "Eroica" Symphony that I thought was most distinguished, enjoyable, stimulating, and altogether admirable.

What made it all that for me had to do particularly with the tempi, which were refreshingly anti-drag and, especially in the first movement, interestingly and tellingly inflected; then, still more, with Rudolf's feeling for rhythm, the breadth of it, and the gradual, impressive translation and expansion of the ense of what was preparatory and what arrival, all the way up to the largest architectural units. It gave remarkable continuity to the performance as well as vitality. It was, as an act of music-making, fresh and informed by great honesty and intelligence—the very thing one would want from the kind of reconsideration that the anniversary celebration of a much played master composer invites. The Boston Symphony's playing, though not elegant (rehearsal time for the festival being minimal), was transparent in sonority and very much alive.

After intermission came the Violin Concerto and Isaac Stern to play it. That was very much a "well, we all know how that goes" kind of performance, habit-ridden — and some of the "traditions" that encumber the piece are awful, particularly those pertaining to tempo — and altogether a bit wanting in thought and taste. Stern can make lovely sounds and sometimes it comes over him to play a phrase simply; those moments were, however, outnumbered by other in which the tone was blowzy and he phrasing tricky. Rudolf was efficient at getting the orchestra to arrive places together with the soloist, but the performance could not be described as a really effective collaboration is any more significant sense.

BSO off to a soaring start

Rudolf and Stern open Beethoven week

By Louis Snyder

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, guest conducted by Max Rudolf, began its five-concert Beethoven Festival on Tuesday evening in the best way possible—with soaring performances of the Third Symphony, and of the Violin Concerto, which had Isaac Stern as its dazzling soloist. The occasion seemed to serve notice that this series is not to be a solemn, musty commemoration of some of the mightiest music we've inherited, but a timely restatement of belief in it, living and breathing fire.

From the first notes of the "Eroica," it became apparent that Mr. Rudolf and the musicians shared a tacit understanding of the kind of performance this would be. His is a subdued, undemonstrative beat that nevertheless conceals a businesslike directness in its affability. He seemed to be giving the orchestra all the freedom in the world, and the expansiveness and nobility of the sound it produced didn't belie it, but Mr. Rudolf was, nevertheless, molding and containing all of the symphony's elements within a suitably large frame. The result was a majestic, glowing reading, with Beethoven himself the ultimate "hero."

The Violin Concerto truly belongs to the foremost virtuosos of the instrument, and on Tuesday Isaac Stern was on hand, in top form. How unbelievably tall Beethoven stands was illustrated again in this second inspired performance of the evening—Mr. Stern playing with legend-making elegance, and Mr. Rudolf correlating the orchestral part with a care and perception that made the concerto much more than a soloist's showpiece, albeit nothing overshadowed Mr. Stern's opportunities to shine.

A program note describing the style of Franz Clement, who first played the concerto in 1806, as graceful, tender of expression, technically extraordinary, perfect of intonation "in the most hazardous passages, and his bowing of the greatest dexterity," might well have been characterizing Mr. Stern's extraordinary musical outpouring on this occasion. In fact, from all the musicians on the stage Tuesday evening, it was to Beethoven, with love.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

APR 9 1970

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300

APR 9 1970 Ev

For Beethoven's 200th

Eroica a Superb Birthday Present

By L. DAVID HARRIS

Happy Birthday, dear Ludwig.

It was an apt and excellent present—a superbly performed Beethoven violin concerto by Isaac Stern and a competent, professional performance of the master's third symphony—the Eroica.

The occasion was the first of five Beethoven festival concerts being presented this week by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The festival honors the great composer's 200th birtday—one of the many Beethoven festivals, concerts, etc., being held this year throughout the world.

Stern's reading of the concerto was noble, full of disciplined vitality and great lyrical breadth, all given in streams of emotional tones. It was a joy to hear.

Conductor Max Rudolf kept the orchestra down, giving Stern leeway to unfold the nobly curved phrases (particularly in the first movement) without ever letting the overall structure lose its shape and unity.

Ludwig von Beethoven

As soloist, Stern chose the dramatic way. For example, there is indescribable humor in the concerto's third "Rondo" movement — the theme is like the banter of a very wise old man released from bonds of seriousness. But Stern's rendition found it not humorous, but dramatic and vital.

The Eroica symphony was performed as if it had been gift-wrapped for Beethoven —packaged, boxed, tied with ribbons—everything in place. There were joyous loose ends of richness and emotion, but they weren't that numerous.

Rudolf interpreted it with precision, searching depths of harmony, using almost architectural control.

But emotion was lacking. The exciting variations of the first movement simply weren't present; later, the horns were a little weak. Moments within the symphony that call for rebellious reiteration, ominous threatenings, heart-breaking loveliness — they seemed to be played down as if to keep them from breaking forth in emotional expression. But—giving credit to Rudolf—the symphony improved as it progressed.

Summarizing, it was a superb evening of Beethoven.

Symphony Fetes Beethoven

By HARRY NEVILLE
HT Music Critic

The Boston Symphony began its five-day celebration of Beethoven's 200th birthday last night with two of the master's most familiar works, the Symphony No. 3 ("Eroica") and the Violin Concerto in D. Max Rudolf, music director emeritus of the Cincinnati Symphony who will lead the next three concerts of the series, appeared as conductor, while Isaac Stern was soloist in the concerto.

Rudolf gave a pleasurable reading of the Third Symphony, one that was very sensible, quite literal and not very dramatic. Nearly every "t" was crossed and every "i" dotted; hardly a single nuance of rhythm, tempo or dynamics escaped his attention. Moreover, he indulged in no breast-beating gestures nor "expressive" ritards. The first movement's second subject, for example, was taken at a speed just fractionally slowed down instead of at the offensive molto adagio we usually get at that point.

IN SHORT, aside from some terribly unimaginative woodwind playing (no fault of Rudolf's), there were many admirable things about the performance—except that in being neither very taut nor very expansive it ended up being not very exciting.

Stern gave a glowing account of the violin concerto. Again it was not a grippingly dramatic performance, but rather one that was moving by virtue of the warmth with which it was suffused. Stern achieved a pure, vibrant tone at nearly every point, even during the demanding complexities of Kreisler's first movement cadenza. Rudolf and the orchestra gave sensitive support throughout.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

APR 8 1970 Ne

Beethoven concertos by Serkin

By Louis Snyder

ARTS
ENTERTAINMENT

Four of the five piano concertos, played by that formidable contemporary Beethoven authority, Rudolf Serkin, were featured on the Wednesday and Thursday evening concerts in this week's Boston Symphony bicentennial festival honoring the lion of composers. Max Rudolf again was the conductor.

On Wednesday, No. 1 in C, and No. 3 in C minor were preceded by the "Leonore" Overture No. 2; on Thursday, the "Coriolan" Overture opened a program which included the B-flat Concerto (No. 2), and No. 5 in E flat, the redoubtable "Emperor." Last night were scheduled, besides the Fifth Symphony, the Piano Concerto No. 4, and the C minor Fantasy with Mr. Serkin, Mr. Rudolf conducting the orchestra, and the Chorus Pro Musica. Tonight, Leonard Bernstein will direct soloists, chorus, and the BSO in the Ninth Symphony to conclude the festivities.

To the four piano concertos on Wednesday and Thursday, Mr. Serkin, surprising no one, brought the ruggedly individualistic approach and patent physical involvement that has long been characteristic of his playing. You either accept it, or you don't—not because his musicianly intentions can be doubted or his spectacular technique faulted, but perhaps because Beethoven may not really come through to you in this rather angular context. The earlier concertos survived the rather stringent treatment, surprisingly enough, better than the Third and the "Emperor" (for the doubters, that is); however, there was a fervent reception for Mr. Serkin on both nights, to which he responded with winning modesty and obvious gratitude.

As the several portrait copies in Symphony Hall Gallery prove, there have always been many ways of looking at Beethoven; he is often unrecognizable as the same man. Thus, the composer whose "Eroica" and Violin Concerto revealed so much majesty and human warmth on Tuesday, became a more complicated, almost irascible being—sometimes an aural thunderer — on Wednesday and Thursday, in Mr. Serkin's performances. The question is, of course, whether this is the way Beethoven seems to you. Or sounds. With such a lofty concept projected, it was a surprise and a disappointment to have the heart left untouched.

Mr. Rudolf continued to use his firm hand to achieve eloquence in the two overtures, and to supply Mr. Serkin with the kind of meticulous support in the concertos that any artist must cherish.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

APR 11 1970

Serkin performs Beethoven

By Craig Smith
Globe Correspondent

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Beethoven Festival continued yesterday evening in Symphony Hall with a program consisting of the Leonora Overture and the 1st and 3rd piano concerti with Rudolf Serkin as soloist. The porgram proved to be extremely disappointing with pugnacious, brittle playing from Serkin and unusually ragged ensemble orchestra.

The Leonora Overture fared best. It is a wonderful work, not so well known only because most of the materials used in it are found in the Leonora No. 3 Overture which is even better. The performance was very quick with conductor Max Rudolf, driving the tempo of the last Allegro a little beyond the capabilities of the winds. This was, nevertheless an exciting, authoritative performance, very much worthy of a Beethoven festival.

Unfortunately both of the concerti received the most graceless, thumpy performances that this listener has ever heard. The 1st Concerto was so totally stripped of its elegance (and this is one of Beethoven's most elegant, Viennese works) by Serkin's incessant bumping of the first beat of every bar, that the whole tradition from which the piece grew was practically unrecognizable. The Third Concerto is a little more resilient to this type of treatment but was nevertheless ultimately defeated by loud, insensitive playing from Serkin and lack of rehearsal of the orchestra. Beethoven really deserves better.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

APR 9 1970 New England

Beethoven Featured

Serkin and BSO Bring Tonal Joy

By WESLEY FULLER
Contributing Critic

It was sheer kinetic, tonal joy at Symphony Hall Wednesday night. Rudolph Serkin and the Boston Symphony, under the direction of Max Rudolph, performed Beethoven's First and Third Piano Concertos.

The Leonore No. 2 Overture opened the evening with lovely pianissimo mystery, but then became over-fussy, somewhat impersonal and disconnected.

PERFORMANCES of the C Major Concerto can sound like tortured Czerny, but not with Serkin. Scale passages (and they do abound in this music) were exciting, directional thrusts or quiet, expressive spatial gestures. A single note or rolled chord was brushed from the keyboard with soft, plucked effect. Reposeful moments were meditative but never simply motoric or stolid.

The mischievous, rustic, sometimes pastoral last movement of the Third Concerto abounded in youthful zest and vigor. The naive motives keep returning, but where as in some performances you wish they wouldn't, with Serkin—now a kind of Wizard with Ed Wynn eruptions—you couldn't wait to hear them dance again.

THE ORCHESTRA created some beautiful color moments; moments that are heard only in these earlier Concertos.

The clarinet solos in the last movement of No. 3 were beautifully played in the right pastoral spirit. The fugal episode, unfortunately, did not hang together and lacked the sense of anachronistic fun it ought to have in such a movement.

RUDOLPH MAINTAINED, most of the time, a convincing interplay between solo and orchestra. Without extensive collaboration and rehearsal it is too much to expect that the individual, stylistic approach of the soloist will be completely reflected in the orchestra. It really should be mentioned that a tendency towards variety within a single section of the orchestra in the performance of dotted rhythms occurred enough during the evening to be annoying, a small point which grew larger through frequency.

Greater emotional heights and depths will be experienced before the Beethoven Festival concludes with the Ninth Symphony on Saturday, but how splendid to hear these Concertos receive such brilliantly communicative performances.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

APR 10 1970 N Eng

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

APR 13 1970

Max Rudolf Conducts Exciting Performance of Beethoven's Fifth

By WESLEY
Contributing Critic

Max Rudolf led the Boston Symphony in a firm, often exciting performance of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony Friday night in Symphony Hall. Another great Beethoven statement, the Fourth Piano Concerto, and the infinitely less great Fantasy in C Minor for Piano, Chorus and Orchestra were also performed.

Conducting the Fifth Symphony in his straight-backed, technicaly disciplined style, Rudolf frequently allowed the orchestra to sound as it should, always. The opening motive was not clearly defined rhythmically, but from there on things were gratifying. Quiet phrases rolled in flowing, circular manner. Tempos were refreshingly brisk, except for moments in the last movement. One hears many polite, dull readings of this work. It was good to hear one that came close to the heart of the matter.

THE FOURTH Piano Concerto received a damaging performance, damaging, for instance, if there happened to be someone in the audience who had not heard the work before and went away thinking that was it. That wasn't it. The things which made for excitement in Serkin's playing of the First and Third Concertos on Wednesday night—dash, bravura, variety of piano color, rustic with—don't suffice for the Fourth Concerto.

This work is full of grace, affairmation (not bravura), pathos and genuine piano-orchestra effervescence. When it should have expressed slow, quiet pathos, it didn't. (The opening piano phrase of the second movement was too fast without any stretch between chord impulses.) when things should have pushed ahead, they didn't. (The last movement lagged badly, except for some unwanted spurts here and there.) Tepo relationships between piano and orchestra passage were awkward and unconvincing.

COMMENTING on Beethoven's compositional process and first performance of the Fantasy in C Minor, a writer described it as 'all rather a rush." So was this performance. No one seemed to know exactly what they wanted to do with it. It isn't easy to put all those rather disparate elements together, but there can be moments of exhilaration and fun.

However, Serkin rushed errationally through the opening cadenza. The horns didn't even pretend to believe in their announcement. The suite-like dance moments didn't dance, and while the Chorus Pro Musica sang pleasantly enough (with the same troubles on the top soprano notes which often happen in the work) it was all just haphazard. If there isn't time to think it through, it would be a favor to Beethoven to let it alone. It might be under any conditions.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

APR 13 1970

Beethoven's rare Choral Fantasy

By Louis Snyder

That curious early 19th-century amalgam, the Fantasy in C minor for piano, chorus, and orchestra, received one of its rare performances in the Boston Symphony's Beethoven Festival at Symphony Hall on the weekend. Rudolf Serkin was the pianist, Max Rudolf the conductor, and the Chorus Pro Musica sang the choral passages which hark back to "Fidelio," and hint of the "Ode to Joy" to come.

'Everybody has his chance . . . and everybody took advantage of it.'

Everybody has his chance in the Fantasy, and on Friday everybody took advantage of it. Mr. Serkin, who leads off, found an appropriate vehicle for his declarative style in the flamboyant solo, and in the variations with orchestra which follow. The chorus, when it joined with its paean to life's harmonies, was convincingly eloquent, while Mr. Rudolf kept the general exuberance fittingly contained.

Mr. Serkin received another standing ovation for his playing of the Piano Concerto No. 4 in G, which completed his review during the festival of Beethoven's total output of five in this genre. It was again a scholarly reading, technically remarkable and emotionally spare.

Also concluding his visit to the orchestra was Mr. Rudolf, who brought the program to a close with a straightforward, no-nonsense performance of the Fifth Symphony. Here there were the same welcome elements of warmth and deep feeling which marked his introductory "Eroica," and which no manifestations dedicated to Beethoven's memory can afford to subordinate. A cheering audience also made known to Mr. Rudolf and the orchestra its approval of this approach.

Symphony Audience Hails Pianist Serkin

By HARRY NEVELLE
HT Music Critic

The Boston Symphony continued its Beethoven Festival Thursday night, again with conductor Max Rudolf and pianist Rudolf Serkin, the latter appearing this time as soloist in the Second and Fifth ("Emperor") Concertos.

Serkin is a great favorite of Boston audiences, as he is indeed of audiences everywhere, and at the end of the evening there occurred one of those fervent ovations signalling that some basic act of communication had transpired.

THE QUALITY of the communication may possibly have had more to do with visual than with aural aspects of the performance, for Serkin is a totally engrossing person to watch. He projects a profound immersion in the music, as well as delight, zest and enormous vitality.

But any such analysis is speculative because a live performance is, in fact, as much a visual as an auditory experience, and the two elements are inextricably meshed. The foregoing suggested itself simply because this particular listener happens to enjoy watching Serkin but doesn't much care for his kind of piano playing.

IT IS TOO MUCH at a feverish pitch, too uninflected dynamically, and too rhythmically monotonous. Lyric flow is likely to be interrupted at the bar line, and climaxes are too often anticipated and thus robbed of their impact.

For this individual Serkin is at his best in broadly declamatory passages, such as the opening of the "Emperor," or in places where Beethoven is being rhythmically bumptious in a fairly straightforward way. Unfortunately there is too much else going on that needs a different kind of treatment.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

APR 11 1970

Bernstein Flails—BSO Responds

By HARRY NEVILLE
HT Music Critic

Leonard Bernstein's conducting has for a long time been the object of humorous or would-be humorous barbs, one of them being that it takes a dance critic and not a music critic to render his performances full justice.

Boston concert-goers had a chance to judge for themselves Saturday night when Bernstein led the Boston Symphony, Chorus Pro Musica and Tanglewood Festival Chorus in Beethoven's Ninth ("Choral") Symphony. The impressive cast of soloists at Symphony Hall included soprano Martina Arroyo, contralto Lili Chookasian, tenor Richard Lewis and bass Thomas Paul.

As it turned out, the performance was not unlike a balletic experience, for throughout the evening one's attention was riveted to the podium where an extraordinary succession of JETES, PLIES and DANSEUR NOBLE histrionics was to be seen. At a few points Bernstein literally leaped into the air and if some of the front row players were as astonished as they appeared to be, it was a perfectly understandable reaction. A miscalulation might at any moment have forced one of them to assume the novel role of supporting partner.

ONE OF THE POINTS of such carryings-on is the quite valid one of getting a vital response from the orchestra—though with players unused to such behavior the actual results might be something other than vital. A more questionable aspect of such conducting is that it tends to plot the listener's emotional responses for him, and some listeners will of course resent any real or imagined attempt at extramusical manipulation.

In any event, Bernstein's exertions create the expectation of sonic miracles and if the miracles don't occur and if the listener can't project them onto the performance, then he ends up feeling either amused or cheated or both.

BERNSTEIN IS without doubt one of the world's most respected conductors, and the relatively small amount of critical flack he receives is probably related, in large part, to the kind of reaction just described.

Saturday night's performance was disappointing for this listener partly for the reasons advanced above but also because orchestra and conductor appeared to be insufficiently experienced with each other.

What the players seemed to respond to and communicate chiefly was the raw nervous energy of Bernstein's conception. Needless to say that in itself was exciting, but it wasn't the totally absorbing experience that Beethoven's Ninth can be.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

APR 13 1970

Leonard Bernstein conducts BSO in Hub; 1st time since '56

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

Leonard Bernstein conducted the Boston Symphony in Boston for the first time since 1956 when, Saturday evening, he wound up the orchestra's five-concert Beethoven series with a performance of the 9th ("Choral" or "Help!") Symphony.

It was exciting. There were, to be sure, extra-musical things to make it so, mainly to do with Bernstein's long association with this city and its symphony and his much too long absence from both, so that, with this special sense of homecoming, Bernstein himself, the orchestra, and the audience, were all particularly turned on by and for the occasion. Quite apart from all that, though, and to the extent to which it is possible to isolate purely musical qualities from personal associations, it was a Ninth to remember.

That it was alone on the program may have been dictated by practical considerations, but it intensified the impact. For many reasons, most of them good and some bad, musical, historical, associative, sentimental, the Beethoven Ninth is, to most people who know it, a work that occupies a very special place in the repertory. To play it by itself and to allow it make the sole claim on our attention is to dramatize its uniqueness and to convey a sense of special occasion, which, even at a time of instant accessibility to recorded music, a performance of the Ninth should have. Perhaps I was also not the only person impressed by the force of that wonderful opening, that progression from silence to inchoate sound to powerfully articulated statement, when it is the first music heard at a concert.

But again, apart from that, the performance Bernstein produced was impressive. Dramatic, humorous, beautifully lyric in the slow movement, it was an interpretation with a lively understanding of musical character, and also one that was masterfully planned and unfailingly cohesive. There was an effortless clarity about it all, but not bought at the expense of vitality. The orchestral playing was a bit wildcat at times (affecting in the scherzo even a musician usually as fastidious as timpanist Everett Firth), but far more often it was clear, luminous, in all important ways excellent (with details as fine as Firth's quiet playing in the Adagio, David Ohanian's elegant negotiating of the 4th horn solo in the same movement, or the cello and bass recitatives in the finale), and it was at all times involved and alive.

By the same token, I should say that I had reservations about certain specific points, for example, Bernstein's decision to use an edition with some Wagnerian touchings-up of the scoring, or what seemed to me the excessively fast tempo of the Trio, or the idea (not so uncommon) that the first couple of bars of the Adagio need not be played at the same pace as the material they introduce; but here, too, I should then go on to say that those were minor blemishes on a surpassingly convincing performance.

The Chorus Pro Musica and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, whose directors are Alfred Nash Patterson and John Oliver respectively, contributed strong singing, and Martina Arroyo, Lili Chookasian, Richard Lewis, and Thomas Paul were a highly competent solo quartet.

The Boston Globe
Monday, April 13, 1970

50.

Visiting Performers for FESTIVAL

Bernstein and Beethoven in doubleheader

Vienna acclaims Leonard Bernstein's conducting of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony in a Beethoven bicentennial performance taped for American TV. Boston follows suit as Bernstein conducts the Ninth to climax the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Beethoven festival. Reviews: Page 4

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

APR 17 1970

In person and for U.S. TV

Bernstein's Viennese coup...

By Rudolf Klein

Vienna

'Bernstein offered an interpretation of the work that was perhaps more impressive than any Vienna has ever heard.'

Leonard Bernstein has once again conquered Vienna. In connection with recording Beethoven's Ninth Symphony he also gave two live presentations of the work in the Vienna Concert House, where the opportunity was used to tape it for television. This is intended for the American public and is to be beamed at the time of Beethoven's 200th birthday in the middle of December.

Vienna has never before seen such a show. Platforms were set up for the cameras. More than a half-dozen of these silent monsters watched the conductor's every move and his musicians' every response. Batteries of floodlights illuminated the podium, in the middle of which stood a bust of Beethoven. Through the subsequent work of its television producers, the American public will certainly experience a performance that will, to a hair, be the visual equal of any in an American concert hall.

All this, all the paraphernalia, would be enough to set the Viennese public against the conductor and his interpretation. In fact, reverberations have occurred in the press, even though in principle it acknowledged the achievement of those who undertook it.

Fortunately, the "American" aspect of the television staging did no harm to the music; in one respect it even helped it, for by providing the State Opera chorus with highrise stands, the acoustics in the hall were remarkably improved. Apart from that, Bernstein offered an interpretation of the work that was perhaps more impressive than any Vienna has ever heard — a presentation that never became hung up on externals but went to the core of the composition.

Romantic

Bernstein's approach to Beethoven is frequently characterized as romantic. This word, however, applies in its positive sense only, that is, to the invigoration of the melodic line, to the intensity with which Bernstein draws it, to his ability to feel it. Nothing that is disparaging in this term applies here. First of all, Bernstein does not permit himself any distortions of form, any fluctuation in tempo, any departure from classical simplicity. His greatest achievement seems to result from his comprehensive grasp of the material. He points out consistencies that were previously only sensed; he relates motifs that were previously heard only in juxtaposition; through his music he causes the listener to perceive many significant entities.

The understanding that he thus imparted to the public—and that perhaps affords the greatest wealth of comprehension in the slow movement—includes acceptance of the touched-up instrumentation introduced by Mahler and the increased complement of woodwinds. Under such inspired conducting the Vienna Philharmonic and the State Opera chorus gave a magnificent performance. The quartet was splendidly comprised of Gwyneth Jones, Shirley Verrett, Placido Domingo, and Martti Talvela. The perfection of this presentation will remain a standard even in Vienna.

ARTS
ENTERTAINMENT

THE CONDUCTORS

MAX RUDOLF, Music Director Emeritus of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, has been a professional musician for nearly 50 years. Born in Frankfurt-am-Main in 1902, he started to study piano as a boy of seven and to compose at the age of twelve. Formal musical education began when he was at high school: he studied composition with a teacher of Hindemith, and enlarged his mastery of instruments by learning to play trumpet, cello and organ. Enrolling at Frankfurt University and the Hoch Conservatory of Music, his interest turned to conducting. After graduation he became assistant conductor at the Freiburg Municipal Theatre; before his first season ended he had conducted Die Fledermaus.

By the time he was twenty-five Max Rudolf held a leading position in Darmstadt. Two years later, in 1929, he began conducting at the German Opera House in Prague, at the same time appearing as a guest with the Czech National Opera. During that period he was also offered assignments with other orchestras, including the Berlin Philharmonic.

In 1935 Max Rudolf moved to Göteborg, Sweden, to become Director of the city's Oratorio Society, guest conductor of the orchestra and to be conductor and pianist on radio programs. Soon after the outbreak of the Second world war, he moved to the United States. After several years of teaching in Cleveland, Chicago and New York, he conducted La vie parisienne for the New Opera Company at New York. He was invited in 1945 to join the conducting staff of the Metropolitan Opera, later becoming artistic administrator. He conducted numerous performances there and made operatic recordings for the Cetra and Columbia labels.

Meanwhile he was guest conductor with many leading orchestras, the New York Philharmonic, the Philadelphia Orchestra and the Cleveland Orchestra among them. He resigned from the Metropolitan Opera in 1958 to become Music Director of the Cincinnati Symphony. During his tenure there, the orchestra's personnel was enlarged as was the number of its annual concerts, and he made many recordings for Decca. In 1966 the State Department sponsored a ten-week world tour during which the Orchestra visited fifteen countries in Europe and the Far and Near East. Max Rudolf also led a tour to Europe in the 1968-1969 season. Apart from his conducting duties in Cincinnati, he broadcast a weekly radio program describing the music to be performed by the orchestra and contributed articles to various musical publications. As a teacher, he has taught conducting at the Peabody Conservatory, the Juilliard School, and was Chairman of a conductors' course at the Berkshire Music Center in 1964. He has recived many awards and honorary degrees.

In November 1968 Max Rudolf announced his resignation from the Cincinnati Symphony to accept the post of Head of the Opera department at the Curtis Institute of Philadelphia, beginning in the fall of

...and an acclaimed return in BSO's Beethoven week

By Louis Snyder

785

Boston

'He searched out and revealed the dark corners of the score, as well as the bright ones, in a spacious reading that consistently bore his individual mark.'

That irresistible catalyzer of music, musicians, and listeners, Leonard Bernstein, returned to Symphony Hall for the first time in 14 years to conduct the final concert of the Boston Symphony's Beethoven Festival on the weekend. The work was the mighty Ninth Symphony, and the house, like the previous four, was sold out to expectant Beethovenites, and also in this case, Bernsteinites.

There are those who have objected to the Ninth on the basis of its musical paradoxes, its departure from rulebook form, and even (once upon a time) its "noisy bad taste," but Mr. Bernstein surely isn't one of them. With the entire personal involvement he brings to his conducting, he searched out and revealed the dark corners of the score, as well as the bright ones, in a spacious reading that consistently bore his individual mark. The great first movement became indeed "un poco maestoso," the Scherzo a rhythmic revelation, and the Adagio was likewise lovingly explored.

All this built with cumulative impact to the finale, with its references to the previous movements, and its introduction of vocal solo and choral passages. Mr. Bernstein's envelopment of these added forces into his large concept was accomplished with logical and moving effect, to bring the evening to a stirring, breathtaking close.

The attention that Mr. Bernstein commands was equally divided between his colleagues on the platform and an intent audience on Saturday evening. Fittingly, the occasion took on aspects of a dedicatory rite as instrumentalists and singers focused their undivided attention on the beat of the leader, who, in his turn, with arms extended, on and off tiptoe, bounded in the direction of the golden Beethoven plaque in the center of the proscenium overhead. Fortunately, this athleticism no more reflects elements of exhibitionism than does the composer's own startling musical behavior in the Ninth — it represents in both cases, a natural means of arriving at desired ends, now time-honored.

Orchestra, soloists, and chorus were, figuratively, on their toes too. The two gentlemen whom Beethoven honored with solos—bass Thomas Paul, and tenor Richard Lewis in a belated but welcome BSO debut—sang them to great effect. The ladies—soprano Martina Arroyo, and contralto Lili Chookasian—who work as hard in the quartets, but with less opportunity for personal glory, nevertheless were impressive, with Miss Arroyo's velvet brand of sound adding a becoming new texture in these circumstances. The choral groups, the accomplished Chorus Pro Musica, and the new Tanglewood Festival Chorus, were very much on top of the music, while the BSO, which has played the Ninth singly or collectively under who-knows-how-many conductors, responded malleably to Mr. Bernstein and his uniquely personal version.

At the end, there was a roaring, clapping, stamping ovation for all concerned, with possibly a slight edge for Bernstein — and Beethoven.

↑
same review
↓

Bernstein and Beethoven at BSO

That irresistible catalyzer of music, musicians, and listeners, Leonard Bernstein, returned to Symphony Hall for the first time in 14 years to conduct the final concert of the Boston Symphony's Beethoven Festival on the weekend. The work was the mighty Ninth Symphony, and the house, like the previous four, was sold out to expectant Beethovenites, and also in this case, Bernsteinites.

There are those who have objected to the Ninth on the basis of its musical paradoxes, its departure from rulebook form, and even (once upon a time) its "noisy bad taste," but Mr. Bernstein surely isn't one of them. With the entire personal involvement he brings to his conducting, he searched out and revealed the dark corners of the score, as well as the bright ones, in a spacious reading that consistently bore his individual mark. The great first movement became indeed "un poco maestoso," the Scherzo a rhythmic revelation, and the Adagio was likewise lovingly explored.

All this built with cumulative impact to the finale, with its references to the previous movements, and its introduction of vocal solo and choral passages. Mr. Bernstein's

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

APR 14 1970

50.

Bernstein and Beetho

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

APR 17 1970

In person and for U.S. TV

Bernstein's Viennese

By Rudolf Klein

Vienna

Leonard Bernstein has once again conquered Vienna. In connection with recording Beethoven's Ninth Symphony he also gave two live presentations of the work in the Vienna Concert House, where the opportunity was used to tape it for television. This is intended for the American public and is to be beamed at the time of Beethoven's 200th birthday in the middle of December.

Vienna has never before seen such a show. Platforms were set up for the cameras. More than a half-dozen of these silent monsters watched the conductor's every move and his musicians' every response. Batteries of floodlights illuminated the podium, in the middle of which stood a bust of Beethoven. Through the subsequent work of its television producers, the American public will certainly experience a performance that will, to a hair, be the visual equal of any in an American concert hall.

All this, all the paraphernalia, would be enough to set the Viennese public against the conductor and his interpretation. In fact, reverberations have occurred in the press, even though in principle it acknowledged the achievement of those who undertook it.

Fortunately, the "American" aspect of the television staging did no harm to the music; in one respect it even helped it, for by providing the State Opera chorus with highrise stands, the acoustics in the hall were remarkably improved. Apart from that, Bernstein offered an interpretation of the work that was perhaps more impressive than any Vienna has ever heard — a presentation that never became hung up on externals but went to the core of the composition.

Romantic

Bernstein's approach to Beethoven is frequently characterized as romantic. This word, however, applies in its positive sense only, that is, to the invigoration of the melodic line, to the intensity with which Bernstein draws it, to his ability to feel it.

'Bernstein offered an int was perhaps more impre ever heard.'

Nothing that is disparaging in this term applies here. First of all, Bernstein does not permit himself any distortions of form, any fluctuation in tempo, any departure from classical simplicity. His greatest achievement seems to result from his comprehen-

ARTS
ENTERTAINMENT

1970. On his return to Cincinnati as a guest conductor earlier this season, the Board of Directors honored him with his appointment as Music Director Emeritus.

LEONARD BERNSTEIN, appointed Advisor to Tanglewood with the opening of the 1970 season, has been associated with Boston and the Symphony throughout his life. Born in Lawrence, he grew up in the Hub city. He graduated in 1935 from the Boston Latin School and in 1939 from Harvard, where his teachers were A. Tillman Merritt, Walter Piston and Edward Burlingame Hill. The next two years he spent at the Curtis Institute in Philadelphia, where he studied conducting with Fritz Reiner and orchestration with Randall Thompson. Piano studies, begun in Boston with Helen Coates and Heinrich Gebhard, continued with Isabelle Vengerova.

Accepted as a student in conducting by Koussevitzky, Leonard Bernstein spent two summers at the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood. He was immediately engaged by Artur Rodzinski as Assistant Conductor of the New York Philharmonic for the 1943-1944 season, and was called unexpectedly to the podium in November when Bruno Walter became ill, making a brilliant debut with the Orchestra. In 1945 he began his three years as director of the New York City Symphony.

Meanwhile he had made the first of his many appearances with the Boston Symphony, conducting among other works his own Jeremiah symphony. His career as a composer was also established with the scores for the ballet Fancy free and for On the town. From 1951 until 1955 he was Head of the orchestra and conducting department of the Berkshire Music Center, and from 1951 to 1956 professor of music at Brandeis University. In October 1955 he began a series of concerts on the 'Omnibus' television program, a precursor of the later series 'Leonard Bernstein and the New York Philharmonic'.

During the same period he appeared with the world's leading orchestras, including those of Philadelphia, San Francisco, Chicago, Pittsburgh, Los Angeles, Rome, Prague, London, Budapest, Vienna, Milan, Munich and Israel. In 1953 he made his operatic debut at La Scala, Milan, the first American musician to conduct there. He appeared with the Metropolitan Opera for the first time ten years later.

In 1958 Leonard Bernstein was appointed Music Director of the New York Philharmonic, a post he held until the end of the 1968-1969 season. He then became 'Laureate Conductor' of the Orchestra, and will continue to be closely associated with all its activities, including touring, recording and television. In his years in New York he conducted more than 900 concerts with the Philharmonic, led many tours in the United States and abroad and made countless recordings for Columbia. He also found time to continue composing and writing books. Many honors, awards and honorary degrees have been conferred on him nationally and internationally.

Leonard Bernstein conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra most recently at Tanglewood at a Berkshire Music Center gala concert in 1965. Next month he will conduct performances of a new production of Fidelio in Vienna, as part of that city's Beethoven celebrations.

THE SOLOISTS

ISAAC STERN has performed with the Boston Symphony Orchestra more than twenty different works, ranging from Bach and Viotti to Berg, Bernstein and Schuman, since his first appearance with the Orchestra in January 1948. Born in Kriminiesz, Russia, in 1920, he was brought by his parents to San Francisco when he was less than a year old. He began to learn the piano as a boy of six, but changed to the violin two years later. He studied with teachers from the San Francisco Conservatory and made his debut at the age of fifteen in a performance of Bach's Double concerto with Naoum Blinder, his principal teacher and Concertmaster of the San Francisco Symphony. His debut in New York took place in 1937, and after his concert in Carnegie Hall in January 1943 he was acclaimed as one of the world's leading violinists. Since then he has appeared regularly across the United States, in Europe, Israel, South America and Australia. He has also played at the Casals Festivals, in Japan, in India and several times in the Soviet Union, where he was the first American artist to be invited to play after the Second world war.

In addition to his solo engagements Isaac Stern gives many chamber recitals with Eugene Istomin and Leonard Rose. He is President of Carnegie Hall, a member of the National Council on the arts and President of the America-Israel Cultural Foundation. He has made numerous recordings on the Columbia label.

RUDOLF SERKIN made his first appearance with the Boston Symphony in 1938 and has returned many times since, most recently four years ago when he played concertos by Mozart and Brahms at a Pension Fund concert. Born in Bohemia in 1903, he was educated in Vienna, where his composition teacher was Arnold Schoenberg. He made his debut at the age of twelve with the Vienna Symphony, then started a regular concert career only five years later. He appeared in the United States for the first time in 1933, and made his formal debut in New York in 1936 with the New York Philharmonic conducted by Toscanini. He has made annual tours of this country for nearly forty years, and has played regularly in Europe. He has also traveled to South America, Iceland, India, Israel and the Far East.

...and an acclaimed return in BSO's Beethoven week

By Louis Snyder

785

Boston

That irresistible catalyzer of music, musicians, and listeners, Leonard Bernstein, returned to Symphony Hall for the first time in 14 years to conduct the final concert of the Boston Symphony's Beethoven Festival on the weekend. The work was the mighty Ninth Symphony, and the house, like the previous four, was sold out to expectant Beethovenites, and also in this case, Bernsteinites.

There are those who have objected to the Ninth on the basis of its musical paradoxes, its departure from rulebook form, and even (once upon a time) its "noisy bad taste," but Mr. Bernstein surely isn't one of them. With the entire personal involvement he brings to his conducting, he searched out and revealed the dark corners of the score, as well as the bright ones, in a spacious reading that consistently bore his individual mark. The great first movement became indeed "un poco maestoso," the Scherzo a rhythmic revelation, and the Adagio was likewise lovingly explored.

All this built with cumulative impact to the finale, with its references to the previous movements, and its introduction of vocal solo and choral passages. Mr. Bernstein's envelopment of these added forces into his large concept was accomplished with logical and moving effect, to bring the evening to a stirring, breathtaking close.

'He searched out and revealed the dark corners of the score, as well as the bright ones, in a spacious reading that consistently bore his individual mark.'

The attention that Mr. Bernstein commands was equally divided between his colleagues on the platform and an intent audience on Saturday evening. Fittingly, the occasion took on aspects of a dedicatory rite as instrumentalists and singers focused their undivided attention on the beat of the leader, who, in his turn, with arms extended, on and off tiptoe, bounded in the direction of the golden Beethoven plaque in the center of the proscenium overhead. Fortunately, this athleticism no more reflects elements of exhibitionism than does the composer's own startling musical behavior in the Ninth — it represents in both cases, a natural means of arriving at desired ends, now time-honored.

Orchestra, soloists, and chorus were, figuratively, on their toes too. The two gentlemen whom Beethoven honored with solos—bass Thomas Paul, and tenor Richard Lewis in a belated but welcome BSO debut—sang them to great effect. The ladies—soprano Martina Arroyo, and contralto Lili Chookasian—who work as hard in the quartets, but with less opportunity for personal glory, nevertheless were impressive, with Miss Arroyo's velvet brand of sound adding a becoming new texture in these circumstances. The choral groups, the accomplished Chorus Pro Musica, and the new Tanglewood Festival Chorus, were very much on top of the music, while the BSO, which has played the Ninth singly or collectively under who-knows-how-many conductors, responded malleably to Mr. Bernstein and his uniquely personal version.

At the end, there was a roaring, clapping, stamping ovation for all concerned, with possibly a slight edge for Bernstein — and Beethoven.

same review

Bernstein and Beethoven at BSO

That irresistible catalyzer of music, musicians, and listeners, Leonard Bernstein, returned to Symphony Hall for the first time in 14 years to conduct the final concert of the Boston Symphony's Beethoven Festival on the weekend. The work was the mighty Ninth Symphony, and the house, like the previous four, was sold out to expectant Beethovenites, and also in this case, Bernsteinites.

There are those who have objected to the Ninth on the basis of its musical paradoxes, its departure from rulebook form, and even (once upon a time) its "noisy bad taste," but Mr. Bernstein surely isn't one of them. With the entire personal involvement he brings to his conducting, he searched out and revealed the dark corners of the score, as well as the bright ones, in a spacious reading that consistently bore his individual mark. The great first movement became indeed "un poco maestoso," the Scherzo a rhythmic revelation, and the Adagio was likewise lovingly explored.

All this built with cumulative impact to the finale, with its references to the previous movements, and its introduction of vocal solo and choral passages. Mr. Bernstein's

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

APR 14 1970

50.

Bernstein and Beetho

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

APR 17 1970

In person and for U.S. TV

Bernstein's Viennese c

By Rudolf Klein

Vienna

Leonard Bernstein has once again conquered Vienna. In connection with recording Beethoven's Ninth Symphony he also gave two live presentations of the work in the Vienna Concert House, where the opportunity was used to tape it for television. This is intended for the American public and is to be beamed at the time of Beethoven's 200th birthday in the middle of December.

Vienna has never before seen such a show. Platforms were set up for the cameras. More than a half-dozen of these silent monsters watched the conductor's every move and his musicians' every response. Batteries of floodlights illuminated the podium, in the middle of which stood a bust of Beethoven. Through the subsequent work of its television producers, the American public will certainly experience a performance that will, to a hair, be the visual equal of any in an American concert hall.

All this, all the paraphernalia, would be enough to set the Viennese public against the conductor and his interpretation. In fact, reverberations have occurred in the press, even though in principle it acknowledged the achievement of those who undertook it.

Fortunately, the "American" aspect of the television staging did no harm to the music; in one respect it even helped it, for by providing the State Opera chorus with highrise stands, the acoustics in the hall were remarkably improved. Apart from that, Bernstein offered an interpretation of the work that was perhaps more impressive than any Vienna has ever heard — a presentation that never became hung up on externals but went to the core of the composition.

Romantic

Bernstein's approach to Beethoven is frequently characterized as romantic. This word, however, applies in its positive sense only, that is, to the invigoration of the melodic line, to the intensity with which Bernstein draws it, to his ability to feel it.

'Bernstein offered an inte was perhaps more impres ever heard.'

Nothing that is disparaging in this term applies here. First of all, Bernstein does not permit himself any distortions of form, any fluctuation in tempo, any departure from classical simplicity. His greatest achievement seems to result from his comprehen-

ARTS
ENTERTAINMENT

For many years he was associated with his father-in-law, the late Adolf Busch, and since 1950 has taken part in the Casals Festivals in the Pyrenees and Puerto Rico. He was appointed in 1939 Head of the piano department at the Curtis Institute in Philadelphia, a post he still holds. As joint founder with Adolf and Hermann Busch, Blanche Honegger, Louis and Marcel Moyse, of the Marlboro School of Music, of which he is Artistic Director, Rudolf Serkin spends much of the summer teaching and performing in Vermont. A resident of the United States since 1939, he and his family have been American citizens for many years.

Rudolf Serkin served in 1966 on the Carnegie Commission on educational television, and in the same year played at the White House at a dinner in honor of the President of Israel. He has received many awards and honorary degrees, and in 1964 President John F. Kennedy named him a recipient of the Presidential Medal of Freedom. He has made numerous recordings of concertos, chamber music and solo works for piano on the Columbia label.

MARTINA ARROYO, leading soprano of the Metropolitan Opera, made her debut with the Boston Symphony in a performance of Verdi's Requiem at the Berkshire Festival in 1967. After graduating from Hunter College in New York, she spent three years as a school teacher and a social worker, then launched her career with her debut at Carnegie Hall in Pizzetti's Murder in the Cathedral. She spent a short time singing minor roles at the Metropolitan, then leading opera houses in Europe, the Vienna State and the Deutsche Oper in Berlin among them, offered her major parts. She returned to the Metropolitan in 1965 to sing the title role in Aida, and she was immediately offered a contract to sing Leonore in Il Trovatore, Elizabeth in Don Carlo and the title role in Madama Butterfly and Aida. During the present season she has added Santuzza in Cavalleria rusticana and Madeleine de Coigny in Andrea Chenier to her list of leading roles with the company. She has also sung in opera, concert and recital in London, including the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, New York, Chicago, Paris, San Francisco, Rome, Boston, Munich, Cologne, Berlin, Stuttgart, Buenos Aires, Tel Aviv and Vienna. Martina Arroyo has made many recordings on the DGG, London, EMI and Columbia labels.

FROM THE PROGRAM BOOKS OF THE ROYAL FESTIVAL HALL, LONDON

During a recent test in the Hall, a note played mezzoforte on the horn measured approximately 65 decibels (dB(A)) of sound. A single 'uncovered' cough gave the same reading. A handkerchief placed over the mouth when coughing assists in obtaining a pianissimo.

LILI CHOOKASIAN first came to prominence when she appeared with the Chicago Symphony at Grant Park under Bruno Walter's direction. She was immediately re-engaged for a performance of Mahler's Symphony no. 2, and shortly afterwards made her operatic debut in Little Rock, Arkansas, as Adalgisa. After hearing a tape of the Norma performance Thomas Schippers invited her to audition for him, then engaged her for the Festival of two worlds at Spoleto and for appearances with the New York Philharmonic. The following year, 1962, Lili Chookasian made her debut at the Metropolitan in La gioconda.

Since that time she has appeared regularly at the Metropolitan in new and classic operas, The last savage, Eugen Onegin, Falstaff, Der fliegende Holländer and Peter Grimes, to name a few. She has also performed with the New York City Opera the title role in The medium. She sings recitals in all parts of the United States, and has appeared with many of the world's leading orchestras, the Philadelphia Orchestra, the Los Angeles Philharmonic, the San Francisco Symphony and the Toronto Symphony among them. Lili Chookasian has sung with the Boston Symphony on several occasions, and took part in the Orchestra's recordings for RCA of Verdi's Requiem, Menotti's The death of the Bishop of Brindisi and the 'Song of the wood-dove' from Schoenberg's Gurrelieder, all directed by Erich Leinsdorf. Her other recordings are on the Columbia label.

RICHARD LEWIS, who was honored in 1963 by Queen Elizabeth as Commander of the Order of the British Empire, made his debut in the United States fifteen years ago, when he was invited by the San Francisco Opera Company to sing the leading role in the first performance in this country of Sir William Walton's Troilus and Cressida; he had earlier sung in the world permière at the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden. Since that time he has appeared in America regularly both in opera and concert. In San Francisco he has sung fourteen leading tenor roles, ranging from Don José in Carmen to Tom Rakewell in The rake's progress. A member of the Bach Aria Group, he has also appeared with many of the major American orchestras.

Born in Manchester of Welsh parents, Richard Lewis was a boy soprano, then later won a scholarship to the Royal Manchester College of Music. His first major role was the Male Commentator in The rape of Lucretia at Glyndebourne. He made his debut at Covent Garden soon afterwards in the title role of Peter Grimes. Not only does he sing the standard operatic repertoire, but has also sung leading roles in Tippett's The midsummer marriage, Schoenberg's Moses und Aron and Berg's Wozzeck. Other premières in which he has taken part include Stravinsky's

...and an acclaimed return in BSO's Beethoven week

By Louis Snyder

785

Boston

That irresistible catalyzer of music, musicians, and listeners, Leonard Bernstein, returned to Symphony Hall for the first time in 14 years to conduct the final concert of the Boston Symphony's Beethoven Festival on the weekend. The work was the mighty Ninth Symphony, and the house, like the previous four, was sold out to expectant Beethovenites, and also in this case, Bernsteinites.

There are those who have objected to the Ninth on the basis of its musical paradoxes, its departure from rulebook form, and even (once upon a time) its "noisy bad taste," but Mr. Bernstein surely isn't one of them. With the entire personal involvement he brings to his conducting, he searched out and revealed the dark corners of the score, as well as the bright ones, in a spacious reading that consistently bore his individual mark. The great first movement became indeed "un poco maestoso," the Scherzo a rhythmic revelation, and the Adagio was likewise lovingly explored.

All this built with cumulative impact to the finale, with its references to the previous movements, and its introduction of vocal solo and choral passages. Mr. Bernstein's envelopment of these added forces into his large concept was accomplished with logical and moving effect, to bring the evening to a stirring, breathtaking close.

'He searched out and revealed the dark corners of the score, as well as the bright ones, in a spacious reading that consistently bore his individual mark.'

The attention that Mr. Bernstein commands was equally divided between his colleagues on the platform and an intent audience on Saturday evening. Fittingly, the occasion took on aspects of a dedicatory rite as instrumentalists and singers focused their undivided attention on the beat of the leader, who, in his turn, with arms extended, on and off tiptoe, bounded in the direction of the golden Beethoven plaque in the center of the proscenium overhead. Fortunately, this athleticism no more reflects elements of exhibitionism than does the composer's own startling musical behavior in the Ninth — it represents in both cases, a natural means of arriving at desired ends, now time-honored.

Orchestra, soloists, and chorus were, figuratively, on their toes too. The two gentlemen whom Beethoven honored with solos—bass Thomas Paul, and tenor Richard Lewis in a belated but welcome BSO debut—sang them to great effect. The ladies—soprano Martina Arroyo, and contralto Lili Chookasian—who work as hard in the quartets, but with less opportunity for personal glory, nevertheless were impressive, with Miss Arroyo's velvet brand of sound adding a becoming new texture in these circumstances. The choral groups, the accomplished Chorus Pro Musica, and the new Tanglewood Festival Chorus, were very much on top of the music, while the BSO, which has played the Ninth singly or collectively under who-knows-how-many conductors, responded malleably to Mr. Bernstein and his uniquely personal version.

At the end, there was a roaring, clapping, stamping ovation for all concerned, with possibly a slight edge for Bernstein — and Beethoven.

same review

Bernstein and Beethoven at BSO

That irresistible catalyzer of music, musicians, and listeners, Leonard Bernstein, returned to Symphony Hall for the first time in 14 years to conduct the final concert of the Boston Symphony's Beethoven Festival on the weekend. The work was the mighty Ninth Symphony, and the house, like the previous four, was sold out to expectant Beethovenites, and also in this case, Bernsteinites.

There are those who have objected to the Ninth on the basis of its musical paradoxes, its departure from rulebook form, and even (once upon a time) its "noisy bad taste," but Mr. Bernstein surely isn't one of them. With the entire personal involvement he brings to his conducting, he searched out and revealed the dark corners of the score, as well as the bright ones, in a spacious reading that consistently bore his individual mark. The great first movement became indeed "un poco maestoso," the Scherzo a rhythmic revelation, and the Adagio was likewise lovingly explored.

All this built with cumulative impact to the finale, with its references to the previous movements, and its introduction of vocal solo and choral passages. Mr. Bernstein's

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

APR 14 1970

50.

Visiting Performers for FESTIVAL

Bernstein and Beethoven in doubleheader

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

Vienna acclaims Leonard Bernstein's conducting of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony in a Beethoven bicentennial performance taped for American TV. Boston follows suit as Bernstein conducts the Ninth to climax the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Beethoven festival. Reviews: Page 4

APR 17 1970

In person and for U.S. TV

Bernstein's Viennese coup . . .

By Rudolf Klein

Vienna

'Bernstein offered an interpretation of the work that was perhaps more impressive than any Vienna has ever heard.'

Leonard Bernstein has once again conquered Vienna. In connection with recording Beethoven's Ninth Symphony he also gave two live presentations of the work in the Vienna Concert House, where the opportunity was used to tape it for television. This is intended for the American public and is to be beamed at the time of Beethoven's 200th birthday in the middle of December.

Vienna has never before seen such a show. Platforms were set up for the cameras. More than a half-dozen of these silent monsters watched the conductor's every move and his musicians' every response. Batteries of floodlights illuminated the podium, in the middle of which stood a bust of Beethoven. Through the subsequent work of its television producers, the American public will certainly experience a performance that will, to a hair, be the visual equal of any in an American concert hall.

All this, all the paraphernalia, would be enough to set the Viennese public against the conductor and his interpretation. In fact, reverberations have occurred in the press, even though in principle it acknowledged the achievement of those who undertook it.

Fortunately, the "American" aspect of the television staging did no harm to the music; in one respect it even helped it, for by providing the State Opera chorus with highrise stands, the acoustics in the hall were remarkably improved. Apart from that, Bernstein offered an interpretation of the work that was perhaps more impressive than any Vienna has ever heard — a presentation that never became hung up on externals but went to the core of the composition.

Romantic

Bernstein's approach to Beethoven is frequently characterized as romantic. This word, however, applies in its positive sense only, that is, to the invigoration of the melodic line, to the intensity with which Bernstein draws it, to his ability to feel it. Nothing that is disparaging in this term applies here. First of all, Bernstein does not permit himself any distortions of form, any fluctuation in tempo, any departure from classical simplicity. His greatest achievement seems to result from his comprehensive grasp of the material. He points out consistencies that were previously only sensed; he relates motifs that were previously heard only in juxtaposition; through his music he causes the listener to perceive many significant entities.

The understanding that he thus imparted to the public—and that perhaps affords the greatest wealth of comprehension in the slow movement—includes acceptance of the touched-up instrumentation introduced by Mahler and the increased complement of woodwinds. Under such inspired conducting the Vienna Philharmonic and the State Opera chorus gave a magnificent performance. The quartet was splendidly comprised of Gwyneth Jones, Shirley Verrett, Placido Domingo, and Martti Talvela. The perfection of this presentation will remain a standard even in Vienna.

ARTS
ENTERTAINMENT

THE CONDUCTORS

MAX RUDOLF, Music Director Emeritus of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, has been a professional musician for nearly 50 years. Born in Frankfurt-am-Main in 1902, he started to study piano as a boy of seven and to compose at the age of twelve. Formal musical education began when he was at high school: he studied composition with a teacher of Hindemith, and enlarged his mastery of instruments by learning to play trumpet, cello and organ. Enrolling at Frankfurt University and the Hoch Conservatory of Music, his interest turned to conducting. After graduation he became assistant conductor at the Freiburg Municipal Theatre; before his first season ended he had conducted Die Fledermaus.

By the time he was twenty-five Max Rudolf held a leading position in Darmstadt. Two years later, in 1929, he began conducting at the German Opera House in Prague, at the same time appearing as a guest with the Czech National Opera. During that period he was also offered assignments with other orchestras, including the Berlin Philharmonic.

In 1935 Max Rudolf moved to Göteborg, Sweden, to become Director of the city's Oratorio Society, guest conductor of the orchestra and to be conductor and pianist on radio programs. Soon after the outbreak of the Second world war, he moved to the United States. After several years of teaching in Cleveland, Chicago and New York, he conducted La vie parisienne for the New Opera Company at New York. He was invited in 1945 to join the conducting staff of the Metropolitan Opera, later becoming artistic administrator. He conducted numerous performances there and made operatic recordings for the Cetra and Columbia labels.

Meanwhile he was guest conductor with many leading orchestras, the New York Philharmonic, the Philadelphia Orchestra and the Cleveland Orchestra among them. He resigned from the Metropolitan Opera in 1958 to become Music Director of the Cincinnati Symphony. During his tenure there, the orchestra's personnel was enlarged as was the number of its annual concerts, and he made many recordings for Decca. In 1966 the State Department sponsored a ten-week world tour during which the Orchestra visited fifteen countries in Europe and the Far and Near East. Max Rudolf also led a tour to Europe in the 1968-1969 season. Apart from his conducting duties in Cincinnati, he broadcast a weekly radio program describing the music to be performed by the orchestra and contributed articles to various musical publications. As a teacher, he has taught conducting at the Peabody Conservatory, the Juilliard School, and was Chairman of a conductors' course at the Berkshire Music Center in 1964. He has recived many awards and honorary degrees.

In November 1968 Max Rudolf announced his resignation from the Cincinnati Symphony to accept the post of Head of the Opera department at the Curtis Institute of Philadelphia, beginning in the fall of

. . . and an acclaimed return in BSO's Beethoven week

By Louis Snyder

785

Boston

'He searched out and revealed the dark corners of the score, as well as the bright ones, in a spacious reading that consistently bore his individual mark.'

That irresistible catalyzer of music, musicians, and listeners, Leonard Bernstein, returned to Symphony Hall for the first time in 14 years to conduct the final concert of the Boston Symphony's Beethoven Festival on the weekend. The work was the mighty Ninth Symphony, and the house, like the previous four, was sold out to expectant Beethovenites, and also in this case, Bernsteinites.

There are those who have objected to the Ninth on the basis of its musical paradoxes, its departure from rulebook form, and even (once upon a time) its "noisy bad taste," but Mr. Bernstein surely isn't one of them. With the entire personal involvement he brings to his conducting, he searched out and revealed the dark corners of the score, as well as the bright ones, in a spacious reading that consistently bore his individual mark. The great first movement became indeed "un poco maestoso," the Scherzo a rhythmic revelation, and the Adagio was likewise lovingly explored.

All this built with cumulative impact to the finale, with its references to the previous movements, and its introduction of vocal solo and choral passages. Mr. Bernstein's envelopment of these added forces into his large concept was accomplished with logical and moving effect, to bring the evening to a stirring, breathtaking close.

The attention that Mr. Bernstein commands was equally divided between his colleagues on the platform and an intent audience on Saturday evening. Fittingly, the occasion took on aspects of a dedicatory rite as instrumentalists and singers focused their undivided attention on the beat of the leader, who, in his turn, with arms extended, on and off tiptoe, bounded in the direction of the golden Beethoven plaque in the center of the proscenium overhead. Fortunately, this athleticism no more reflects elements of exhibitionism than does the composer's own startling musical behavior in the Ninth — it represents in both cases, a natural means of arriving at desired ends, now time-honored.

Orchestra, soloists, and chorus were, figuratively, on their toes too. The two gentlemen whom Beethoven honored with solos—bass Thomas Paul, and tenor Richard Lewis in a belated but welcome BSO debut—sang them to great effect. The ladies—soprano Martina Arroyo, and contralto Lili Chookasian—who work as hard in the quartets, but with less opportunity for personal glory, nevertheless were impressive, with Miss Arroyo's velvet brand of sound adding a becoming new texture in these circumstances. The choral groups, the accomplished Chorus Pro Musica, and the new Tanglewood Festival Chorus, were very much on top of the music, while the BSO, which has played the Ninth singly or collectively under who-knows-how-many conductors, responded malleably to Mr. Bernstein and his uniquely personal version.

At the end, there was a roaring, clapping, stamping ovation for all concerned, with possibly a slight edge for Bernstein — and Beethoven.

same review

Bernstein and Beethoven at BSO

That irresistible catalyzer of music, musicians, and listeners, Leonard Bernstein, returned to Symphony Hall for the first time in 14 years to conduct the final concert of the Boston Symphony's Beethoven Festival on the weekend. The work was the mighty Ninth Symphony, and the house, like the previous four, was sold out to expectant Beethovenites, and also in this case, Bernsteinites.

There are those who have objected to the Ninth on the basis of its musical paradoxes, its departure from rulebook form, and even (once upon a time) its "noisy bad taste," but Mr. Bernstein surely isn't one of them. With the entire personal involvement he brings to his conducting, he searched out and revealed the dark corners of the score, as well as the bright ones, in a spacious reading that consistently bore his individual mark. The great first movement became indeed "un poco maestoso," the Scherzo a rhythmic revelation, and the Adagio was likewise lovingly explored.

All this built with cumulative impact to the finale, with its references to the previous movements, and its introduction of vocal solo and choral passages. Mr. Bernstein's

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

APR 14 1970

WHRB HARVARD RADIO BROADCASTING CO., INC.
45 QUINCY STREET CAMBRIDGE, MASS. 02138
TELEPHONE 864-9550

The second of the Beethoven Festival concerts belonged to Rudolf Serkin. He was heard in the first and third piano concertos and, while Max Rudolf's conducting shouldn't be slighted, Serkin's personality dominated the evening.

The program began with the Lenore Overture No. 2. After a season of Steinberg's generally sluggish performances and even Tilson Thomas' ~~distinctively~~ sensitive ones, Max Rudolf's approach was refreshingly unecc ntric. It was a thoroughly predictable performance: Dramatic passages were loud with frequent sharp accents, but the rhythm was relaxed when the mood became lyrical. Rudolf seemed to get a rougher string tone, when he wanted it, than one usually hears at the Boston Symphony. Orchestral playing, particularly the cellos and winds, was most appealing.

Next Serkin came on stage for the C major piano concerto. The orchestra was toned down to something appropriate for early Beethoven, and the pianist took over. To say that Serkin's performance was interesting or well-thought-out would be a gross understatement. Every phrase had definite character. At times this was exaggerated and I began to feel that the performance was mannered, but those times were few. The piece worked; it was brilliant and exciting. Even the very long Beethoven cadenza to the first movement sounded all right. My only objection came in the second movement where Gian Cioffi played the prominent clarinet part with a tone much too resonant and amorphous for the music.

The third piano concerto, which followed intermission, slide out top sheet to read 2nd sheet last Thursday y wait until a re week---that ce of one man, rt Einstein and one of Beethoven's orchestra, and hat less than hroughout; the emendous rhythmic strings, which anissimo ending,

sterful, and the lent.

Rudolf Serkin

took over. His playing was as technically and artistically competent as it was singing and sensitive; and the experience was like Serkin and Beethoven, the great artists on the program, were interacting, giving life to each other, combining to give life to the experience. The Second Piano Concerto begins with a first movement that is more Mozart than Beethoven, and it seemed almost out of place after the forceful Coriolan. But the second movement is one of Beethoven's best slow movements, ranking, I think, with the second movements of the D Major and Pathetique sonatas. Serkin and the

AUDIO

1970 is the year of Beethoven, as musical organizations the world over celebrate the 200th anniversary of the composer's birth. Here in Boston this past week we've had something of a Beethoven Festival, as the Symphony has given us five concerts made up entirely of music by Beethoven.

The last Beethoven Festival by the Boston Symphony that I recall, was given at Tanglewood in the late '40's, when Serge Koussevitzky was the conductor. That Festival included all the symphonies, along with some of the concertos. This time around, there were only three symphonies played, but all the piano concertos and the violin concerto, with Rudolf Serkin and Isaac Stern as the soloists. In and of itself, this fact is a revealing one. In Koussevitzky's day, the emphasis was on the orchestra and on Koussevitzky's performances. Now, the orchestra has served for the most part as an accompaniment vehicle for two of today's most illustrious soloists.

phony been driven to such extremes of dynamic intensity in the Ninth - and I'm sure noone in the audience will ever forget it.

And not since the days of Koussevitzky has was given probably the least successful performance of the evening. The piece itself is a transitional work between the sort of intellectual brilliance of the early piano music and middle-Beethoven romanticism. It contains enough pretentious gestures with banal music so that it is hard to bring off. Serkin and Rudolf did a good job with it. A fairly brisk tempo in the first movement helped unity; and Serkin's powers of characterization, particularly in the last movement, made the piece more i get excited only

I don't wa

who can get tic

concert ought t

For WHRB t

BSO-BEETHOVEN
WHRB REVIEW BY JOHN ZUSSMAN

The question that comes to mind after hearing last Thursday evening's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert is "Why wait until a 200-year anniversary to have a Beethoven festival?"

For it was a concert---and, I am told, an entire week---that proved, if nothing else, the total musical dominance of one man, Ludwig van Beethoven, born 200 years ago, the Albert Einstein and William Shakespeare of the world of music.

The program began with the Coriolan overture, one of Beethoven's most powerful short works, composed in 1807. The orchestra, and especially the conducting of Max Rudolf, was somewhat less than overwhelming. The tempo was slow and it dragged throughout; the accents were weak and thus was lost some of the tremendous rhythmic impact; and at the times the brass overpowered the strings, which are dominant through most of the work. But the pianissimo ending, one of Beethoven's best and most difficult, was masterful, and the intensity and thematic unity of Coriolan were evident.

But that was only an introduction; from there, Rudolf Serkin took over. His playing was as technically and artistically competent as it was singing and sensitive; and the experience was like Serkin and Beethoven, the great artists on the program, were interacting, giving life to each other, combining to give life to the experience. The Second Piano Concerto begins with a first movement that is more Mozart than Beethoven, and it seemed almost out of place after the forceful Coriolan. But the second movement is one of Beethoven's best slow movements, ranking, I think, with the second movements of the D Major and Pathetique sonatas. Serkin and the

REVIEW - BOOKSPAN WNAC-TV 10:30 PM NEWS SATURDAY, APRIL 11, 1970

AUDIO

1970 is the year of Beethoven, as

The concerts earlier this week brought to the Symphony Hall podium for the first time, Max Rudolf, the Conductor Emeritus of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra. Rudolf was very impressive in the two concerts of his that I attended, leading with the conviction and security of a real pro, and investing his performances with a virility and momentum that were welcome indeed. The Festival came to a grand climax this evening, as Leonard Bernstein returned to conduct the Boston Symphony in Boston for the first time in 15 years. The single work on the program was Beethoven's monumental Ninth Symphony, and assisting in the performance were two choruses and four fine vocal soloists.

It was a Ninth Symphony ablaze with passion and vitality that Bernstein gave us - with a welcome leavening of warmth and introspection in the slow movement. Not since the days of Koussevitzky has the Boston Symphony been driven to such extremes of dynamic intensity in the Ninth - and I'm sure noone in the audience will ever forget it.

And not since the days of Koussevitzky has the Boston Symphony played with such commit-was given probably evening. The piec

the sort of intell and middle-Beetho gestures with ban
Serkin and Rudolf tempo in the fir of characterisat
the piece more i get excited only
I don't wa
who can get tic concert ought t
For WHRB t

BSO were able to do justice to it. The third movement is a rondo which is much more advanced than its 1795 composition date would indicate, foreshadowing the rondos from both the third and fifth concerti. The problem is that the foreshadowing is almost completely in the solo instrument, and the piano part is musically far ahead of the orchestra. Serkin was aware of the possibilities and seemed like he really wanted to "take off" with the music, but was weighed down by the extremely Mozartian orchestra.

Last on the program was the Fifth Concerto, the great "Emperor," and again it was the artistry of Mr. Serkin that made the piece the beautiful work that it is. The excited motions and gestures that might have been interpreted as "showing off" by some other pianists came across clearly as a great love for the music; Serkin was into it completely and if you heard it, you believed it. The most that can be said for Mr. Rudolf's handling of the orchestra was that it didn't detract from the work; the conductor's failure to transform the orchestra from instruments to artists might have been due to his lack of experience with the orchestra and his late notice about the concerts. But the combination of Beethoven and Serkin was nothing less than overpowering. It was Leonard Bernstein who said that Beethoven's greatness lies in the fact that he always knew which note had to come next, and Thursday night's concert was certainly a tribute to that art.

For WHRB, this is John Zussman.

30 PM NEWS SATURDAY, APRIL 11, 1970

AUDIO

1970 is the year of Beethoven, as

The concerts earlier this week brought to the Symphony Hall podium for the first time, Max Rudolf, the Conductor Emeritus of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra. Rudolf was very impressive in the two concerts of his that I attended, leading with the conviction and security of a real pro, and investing his performances with a virility ment and abandon. Tonight's concert was an absolute sell-out - as were three others of the Beethoven Festival. As a matter of fact, hundreds of would-be ticket-buyers crowded the lobby and the sidewalk in front of Symphony Hall before the concert, hoping there might be some last-minute returns. But there were very few.

One final note: the audience at all the concerts was a remarkable one - quite unlike the Symphony's normal subscription audience. These people were young, enthusiastic and knowledgable. I'm sure their vitality communicated itself to the performers on stage, and contributed to the success of the Beethoven Festival. Happy Birthday, Ludwig van Beethoven!

Now, back to Ken Wayne.

was given probably the least successful performance of the evening. The piece itself is a transitional work between the sort of intellectual brilliance of the early piano music and middle-Beethoven romanticism. It contains enough pretentious gestures with banal music so that it is hard to bring off. Serkin and Rudolf did a good job with it. A fairly brisk tempo in the first movement helped unity; and Serkin's powers of characterization, particularly in the last movement, made the piece more interesting than I remembered. Still, I could get excited only by parts and not by the whole.

I don't want to end on a lukewarm note however. Anyone who can get tickets to hear Serkin and Rudolf in tomorrow's concert ought to go.

For WHRB this is Jerry Gechter.

day ll a hat n,
and ven's
c
...g,
...cerful, and the
...olan were evident.
...y an introduction; from there, Rudolf Serkin
...over. His playing was as technically and artistically competent as it was singing and sensitive; and the experience was like Serkin and Beethoven, the great artists on the program, were interacting, giving life to each other, combining to give life to the experience. The Second Piano Concerto begins with a first movement that is more Mozart than Beethoven, and it seemed almost out of place after the forceful Coriolan. But the second movement is one of Beethoven's best slow movements, ranking, I think, with the second movements of the D Major and Pathetique sonatas. Serkin and the

REVIEW - BOOKSPAN WNAC-TV 10:30 PM NEWS SATURDAY, APRIL 11, 1970

AUDIO

1970 is the year of Beethoven, as

The concerts earlier this week brought to the Symphony Hall podium for the first time, Max Rudolf, the Conductor Emeritus of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra. Rudolf was very impressive in the two concerts of his that I attended, leading with the conviction and security of a real pro, and investing his performances with a virility ment and abandon. Tonight's concert was an absolute sell-out - as were three others of the Beethoven Festival. As a matter of fact, hundreds of would-be ticket-buyers crowded the lobby and the sidewalk in front of Symphony Hall before the concert, hoping there might be some last-minute returns. But there were very few.

One final note: the audience at all the concerts was a remarkable one - quite unlike the Symphony's normal subscription audience. These people were young, enthusiastic and knowledgable. I'm sure their vitality communicated itself to the performers on stage, and contributed to the success of the Beethoven Festival.

Happy Birthday, Ludwig van Beethoven!

Now, back to Ken Wayne.

52.

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Tuesday evening April 14 1970 at 7.30

JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN conductor

BACH — Violin concerto no. 2 in E BWV 1042
Allegro
Adagio
Allegro
EDITH PEINEMANN

DVOŘÁK — Violin concerto in A minor op. 53
Allegro ma non troppo –
Adagio ma non troppo
Finale: allegro giocoso, ma non troppo
EDITH PEINEMANN

intermission

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS conductor

TCHAIKOVSKY — Symphony no. 1 in G minor op. 13 'Winter daydreams'
Allegro tranquillo (Daydreams on a wintry road)
Adagio cantabile, ma non tanto (Land of gloom; land of mists)
Scherzo: allegro scherzando giocoso
Finale: andante lugubre – allegro maestoso – allegro vivo

JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony since 1962, makes his debut as conductor with the Orchestra at this concert. He joined the Orchestra at the age of twenty-three, the youngest member at that time. Born in Detroit, he studied at the Curtis Institute in Philadelphia, and later with Joseph Gingold and Mischa Mischakoff. He was a prize winner in the 1959 Queen Elisabeth of Belgium International Competition, and a year later won the Naumberg Foundation Award. Before coming to Boston he played in the orchestras of Houston, Denver and Philadelphia.

Joseph Silverstein has established an international reputation as soloist and as first violin of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players. In 1967 he led their tour to the Soviet Union, Germany and England, and last spring a tour to the Virgin Islands and Florida. During past seasons he has performed with the Orchestra concertos by Bartók and Stravinsky (which he has recorded for RCA), and by Bach, Beethoven, Brahms, Bruch, Schoenberg and Sibelius; the Brahms he also played with Leopold Stokowski and the American Symphony Orchestra in New York. During the 1969 Berkshire Festival he played the solo violin part in works by Bach, Bartók and Haydn, and conducted a concert at Tanglewood by the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra. Earlier this season he played the Stravinsky concerto with the Boston Symphony.

Violinist of the Boston Symphony String Trio, Joseph Silverstein is also organizer of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, a faculty member of the New England Conservatory and Chairman of the Faculty of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood. Last year he received an honorary Doctorate of Music from Tufts University. He made his debut as conductor in the Boston area recently at a concert given by the Cantata Singers in Sanders Theatre.

THE SOLOIST

EDITH PEINEMANN, who makes her debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week, first played in the United States eight years ago, when she appeared with the Cincinnati Symphony. Born in Mainz, Germany, where her father is concertmaster of the local orchestra, she started to play the violin as a child of four. In 1954 she won the contest of the Cultural circle of German industry and was awarded a scholarship which enabled her to continue her studies with Max Rostal in London. Two years later, after winning the first prize in the German Radio's International Competition, she was engaged by the Bavarian Radio Symphony, then by Georg Solti. In Frankfurt she appeared with William Steinberg, who persuaded her to play in the United States earlier than she had planned.

Edith Peinemann has appeared with the world's major musical organizations; among the European orchestras are the Berlin Philharmonic, the Vienna Symphony, the State Philharmonic of Hamburg, the Concertgebouw of Amsterdam, the Munich Philharmonic, the Rotterdam Philharmonic, the Philharmonic of Yugoslavia, the Barcelona Municipal Orchestra, the Philharmonia of Hungary, the Stockholm Philharmonic, the Czech Philharmonic and the Royal Philharmonic of London. In this country Edith Peinemann has played with the Pittsburgh Symphony, the Cleveland Orchestra, the Chicago Symphony, the New York Philharmonic, the Los Angeles Philharmonic and many other of the well known orchestras. She has also given countless recitals on both sides of the Atlantic, and has made many recordings for DGG.

BSO Concertmaster Takes on New Role

HT 4/18

By HARRY NEVILLE

Boston Symphony Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein is sharing that orchestra's podium this week with Michael Tilson Thomas inthe next-to-last program of the winter season. The role of conductor is fairly new with Silverstein. He made his debut only a few weeks ago with the Cantata Singers, and this was his first appearance ever in a conducting capacity with the BSO.

His half of the program consisted of violin concertos (Dvorak's A minor and Bach's No. 2 in E) in which Edith Peinemann joined him as soloist. Silverstein is a violinist of distinction and one who is well aware of the special problems of orchestral accomplaihment. It isn't at all clear at this point that a brilliant future awaits Silverstein as a virtuoso conductor, but it seems unlikely he has that in mind anyway. His accompaniments yesterday were sensitive, perhaps a bit on the voerly discrete side, and (in the Dvork) rather lacking in sweep and propulsion at the big moments.

Miss Peinemann gave pleasant, immensely competent readings of both works. She has a big tone but not an especially warm one. This listener wished for crisper articulation in the Bach concerto and for a more soaring, passionate quality in the Dvork. She has no major liabilities except that she gives the kind of performance one is not likely to describe with superlatives.

During the second half of the program Michael Tilson Thomas conducted Bartok's Music for Strings, percussion and celesta, and BU composer Gardner Read's "Night Flight," in honor of Boston University's Centennial.

The latter work is a short tone poem completed in 1937 when the composer was 24. Inspired by Saint-Exupery's novel of the same name, "Night Flight," according to Read, is not intended as a literal tone-painting of the airplane flights described in the novel but as an expression of the beauty, mystery and loneliness of such flights. At the time it was written, Read's use of clusters of tones must have seemed rather striking and progressive. While those particular qualities may not be apparent today, "Night Flight" does retain an appeal that is charming and refreshingly uncomplicated.

As this writer has come to expect, Thomas gave a very lucid performance of the Bartok work, one that at every oint made clear the sometimes quite complicated textures. It was also a very subdued performance. Some of the dance sections might easily have benefitted from a greater feeling of abandon, and the climaxes in all four movements could well have been more forceful and gripping.

Herald Traveler 4-18-70

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Thursday evening April 16 1970 at 8.30
Friday afternoon April 17 1970 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening April 18 1970 at 8.30

JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN conductor

BACH — Violin concerto no. 2 in E BWV 1042
Allegro
Adagio
Allegro
EDITH PEINEMANN

DVOŘÁK — Violin concerto in A minor op. 53
Allegro ma non troppo –
Adagio ma non troppo
Finale: allegro giocoso, ma non troppo
EDITH PEINEMANN

intermission

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS conductor

READ — 'Night flight', tone poem for orchestra op. 44 in honor of Boston University's centenary year
first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

BARTÓK — Music for strings, percussion and celesta (1935)
Allegro tranquillo
Allegro
Adagio
Allegro molto

Silverstein, Thomas conduct

By Craig Smith
Special to The Globe

Two conductors, four composers, one soloist, and a wild diversity of performance standards ranging from inadequate to spectacular made yesterday afternoon's Boston Symphony concert one of the most unpredictable of the year.

The first half of the program was devoted to two violin concerti with Edith Peinemann as soloist and BSO Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein as conductor. Bach's E major Violin Concerto opened the program and was, quite simply a failure. At this late date, it would seem hardly necessary to mention that a different sort of phrasing and more vitality in the smaller levels of note-values is required in Bach as opposed to, for instance, Dvorak whose violin concerto was performed next. Yet long-line Romantic phrasing, thick vibrato from the strings, and muddy, unspecific textures were prevalent in the performance. Robert Levin's imaginative continuo realizations were about the only redeeming feature of this dreary performance.

Dvorak's Violin concerto was better. It is not Dvorak's strongest work and would have, perhaps, profited from more shapely incisive playing from the orchestra than it reeeived. Mr. Silverstein and Miss Peinemann are, however, much more attuned to the idiom than in the Bach, and gave the work an appropriately loving account. Miss Peinemann's lovely tone and fine intonation were also distinct assets.

Two works from the mid 1930s took up the second half of the program. First, in honor of Boston University's centennial celebration, "Night Flight," an early work by BU faculty member Gardner Read was played. It is a quaint work, full of picturesque sound effects and then modish, low, rumbling ostinato patterns. Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas made the most of it, but the ropelessly outdated nature of the music defeated him.

Perhaps Mr. Read's piece would not have sounded so passe if it had not been placed next to such a superb performance of Bartok's marvelous "Music for Strings, Percussion and Celesta". The Bartok is often played for pure shock value, with the quicker movements whipped into an insane helter-skelter sort of frenzy. What a pleasure, then to hear Thomas' lucid, well-organized account of the work, with its emphasis on clean textures and structural clarity. It is a revelation too, to find that once the more rhythmical, folksy elements of the score are put in their proper perspective they achieve a measure of excitement and energy not found in a more patently virtuoso treatment of the piece. The orchestra's spectacular playing in this extraordinary difficult work was an important factor in the success of the performance.

Boston Globe 4-18-'70

Boston Symphony in rare show

At BSO Concert

Silverstein and Thomas Conduct

785

By HAROLD C. SPROUL

Two conductors, a violinist from Germany and an odd program gave last weekend's Symphony a what-next character. Joseph Silverstein, in the first half, presided over Edith Peineman's Boston debut playing of Bach's Violin Concerto No. 2 and Dvorak's Violin Concerto in A minor (Miss Peineman has visited other U.S. orchestras in the last eight years). The concertmaster, like Burgin before him, indulges in no tricks of baton or temperament and with the two concertos kept things neat and well-balanced. I suppose that in the first he took his cue for tempo from the soloist, all three movements were heavily slow, the Adagio so much so that every eighth note of the repeated bass figure became a plodding that almost stopped the movement.

But meanwhile the violin did warmly expressive things with the solo line. After all, both Peineman and Bach are German and perhaps American conceptions go in too much for a hectic brilliance. Even so, that dominating bass motif could have been phrased, no matter how slow, to give it lyrical shape. It doesn't pay to take J.S.B. too for granted as a solid citizen!

However Bach is played, even by amateurs, there is such inner integrity to the patterns of action and of introspection that something eventuates. Not so with the Dvorak concerto. It is just another one of those tiresome, over-extended nineteenth century pieces concocted to show off the individual (violinist, cellist, pianist) as hero. My guess is that such stupifying effort continues only because teachers think there is nothing else to teach beyond scales. There are a very few flakes of Dvorak's inspiration that shine momentarily only to be lost in flimflam. Peineman showed appropriately with tone and virtuosity, and the Symphony did a clean job of its chore.

After intermission life brightened as Tilson Thomas took over the podium for a first reading of Gardner Read's Night Flight tone poem and Bela Bartok's incomparable Music for Strings, Percussion and Celesta. Both scores appeared about the same time (1936-1942). Mr. Read, now resident at Boston University, has been around for quite a while—an all around musician of distinction.

Night Flight reflects the imaginative excitement in earlier days of planes—the drone of engines— a long pedal note—the radio beam signal—atmospheric tone clusters, etc. There is a fine, pre-electronic ear in this composition which wanes to climax and wanes with departure. Mr. Read has revived the interests of Debussy on a more contemporary level of life and instrumental technique. The eerie sounds (space and stars) that slip and slide above the drone (of engines) would be musically effective even without the hint of the title.

Then came Bartok with the inner complexity of Bach, the Dvorak tune (only Bulgarian and joking) and the ear for colorful orchestral sounds divided into rich textures (two orchestras of strings). It all starts with a chromatic fugue, all underground in feeling. Each suceeding movement comss out of the same material but bursting away from the first introspective tension—the last movement a wild fling with the complex rhythms Bartok sifted out of his studies of folk music. Mr. Thomas and the orchestra did a beautiful job with a difficult score, difficult, but meant to be heard, using techniques old and new to express the intense world of a genius, newly ejected by the forces of Hitler, on a Swiss commission and soon to die in America of tuberculosis.

At Reed College, where I met Bartok in his last few years, he came into the music room where a record-player was on and said: "It's a quarter-tone too flat—you must get that fixed." The ear, the structural intelligence, but who can tell of a sensibility, like Mozart's, that goes off the deep-end into night?

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

APR 23 1970

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Tuesday evening April 21 1970 at 8.30

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS conductor

MOZART Serenade no. 12 in C minor for winds K. 388
'Night music'

Allegro
Andante
Menuetto in canone & trio
Allegro

RALPH GOMBERG oboe JAMES STAGLIANO horn
JOHN HOLMES oboe HARRY SHAPIRO horn
GINO CIOFFI clarinet SHERMAN WALT bassoon
PASQUALE CARDILLO clarinet ERNST PANENKA bassoon

MOZART Symphony no. 34 in C K. 338

Allegro vivace
Andante di molto
Minuet & trio (K. 409)
Finale: allegro vivace

intermission

SEEGER Andante for string orchestra

BARTÓK Music for strings, percussion and celesta (1935)

Allegro tranquillo
Allegro
Adagio
Allegro molto

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967
(S) 566,377 (E) 194,700

APR 12 1970 New

Bach, Mahler on BSO finale

A Bach cantata and Mahler's Symphony No. 9 will be heard at the Boston Symphony's final concerts of the Symphony Hall season Apr. 24 at and Apr. 25 at 8:30. Michael Tilson Thomas, the orchestra's assistant conductor, will direct.

Bartok At Symphony

Patriot Ledger 4-22-70

By Peter M. Knapp

Bela Bartok's Music for Strings, Percussion and Celesta was the main attraction at last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas. Also heard were two Mozart works, the Serenade No. 12 in c minor for winds, K. 388, and the Symphony No. 34 in C, K. 338, and the Andante for String Orchestra of Ruth Crawford Seeger.

Written on commission in 1935, the Bartok is an extraordinary composition, aglow with Bartok's fine ear for sounds and propelled by his dynamic rhythms. Bartok dispenses with winds entirely, splitting the strings into two self-contained sections divided by percussion — timpani, bass and side drums, cymbals, celesta, xylophone, piano and harp.

Exotic Sounds

From this grouping Bartok produces marvellous sounds — antiphonal effects from the divided strings, beautifully managed in the first movement, an elegaic fugato built in a gradual crescendo, then at the climax winding back down in the inversion of the theme in a diminuendo; pizzicato strings coupled with piano against a motoric harp figuration; pedaled celesta with harp arpeggios; timpani glissandi.

The slow movements were the finest, Thomas managing the polyphony and long crescendo of the first movement beautifully, and creating a mystical Magyar mood in the superb adagio. Movements two and four with their pulsating dance rhythms were tidy but slightly cautious and might have been let out more.

Ruth Crawford Seeger (1901-1953) was the second wife of musicologist Charles L. Seeger, father of folksinger Pete Seeger. Her Andante for String Orchestra is an arrangement of the slow movement of her 1931 string quartet, an interesting experiment in alternations of crescendo and diminuendo. There is no real melody, just varying pitches with constant rise and fall of volume, creating a humming, yawing effect. The performance had a lot of tension and fine string sound.

Mozard fared less well. The serenade, for pairs of oboes, clarinets, horns and bassoons, is glorious music from the several standard-setting scores Mozart wrote for wind band. For all its merit and invention, the wind music is often overlooked, particularly for symphony orchestra concerts where large-scale works predominate, and Thomas deserves congratulations for programming it. Yet the performance was a disappointment in its stiffness and formality, and the playing seemed more "learned" than "felt."

The Mozart symphony, played by a huge orchestra with full strings, had more energy and pulse, but the playing also was often hard, severe and in the last movement, driven. Best were the inserted K. 409 minuet and the number of finely-shaped details in the development section of the first movement.

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR Monday, April 20, 1970

BSO season wanes in a timely program

←

By Louis Snyder

A violinist played two concertos while another violinist conducted the orchestra. A piece about the mysterious beauty of space in which 1944 gas-engined planes flew was played (on Friday) two hours after a 1970 spaceship splashed down in the Pacific on its return from circling the moon. And music for strings, percussion, and celesta, written in 1935, sounded as if it had been composed only yesterday.

Such was the Boston Symphony's weekend program, its next-to-last before the regular BSO season at Symphony Hall ends this Saturday.

Lady with a bow

Handsome was as handsome did where the lady violinist, Edith Peinemann, was concerned. Making her BSO debut in these concerts, playing the Bach Concerto No. 2 in E, and the Dvorak A minor Concerto, she proved rather conclusively why she has been in demand in Europe and in the United States during the short time of her career. She has a full, rich tone and a mobile sense of style capable of accommodating both concertos, which were programmed consecutively. There seemed to be few technical problems (maybe a gritty passage in the second Bach Allegro, but nothing serious), while the visual impression of ease which her performances conveyed left plenty of room for audience concentration on her interpretative skill.

Conducting the orchestra in both concertos was Joseph Silverstein, who as the BSO's concertmaster has been within bow's distance of the podium for eight years. As might be expected, his were readings which showed a happy degree of solicitude for the soloist, without sacrificing the orchestral color, particularly in the lyric Dvorak, so essential to give the solo passages dimension.

Prophetic 'Flight'

Following intermission, Michael Tilson Thomas took over the baton, and in honor of Boston University's centenary year, directed the orchestra in its first performance of "Night Flight," a tone poem by Gardner Read, who is BU's composer-in-residence. Written in the late 1930's and first performed in 1944, when Mr. Thomas was first waving his arms in his cradle, Mr. Read's piece is an interesting bit of tonal Americana, with its droning plane sounds and its radio beam signals, albeit his expressed denial of any literal program for this evocation of sensations evoked by night-flying pioneers.

Interesting by contrast is Luigi Dallapiccola's turbulent operatic setting of Antoine de Saint-Exupéry's novel, "Night Flight," which as "Volo di Notte" had its premiere four years earlier, but must have inspired both composers at the same time. Where Mr. Read's work is spatial in concept, even to foreshadowing electronic sound, the Italian composer made his impact through the musical play of human emotions against the then-unknowns of space travel.

Ageless work

A fan-shaped reseating of the orchestra to the composer's specifications took place for Bartok's Music for Strings, Percussion and Celesta, which Mr. Thomas conducted as the program's final offering. Another work of the 1930's, it is, in its intricacies of rhythm, sonority, and structure, every bit as much a work of today. For it is continuously challenging to follow — to attempt to unscramble at some times, to try to catch up with at others. Its predominating good humor, coupled with compositional virtuosity, present the listener with a "dare you to keep up with me" offer that can't be denied.

Mr. Thomas and the orchestra gave it a stunning performance, precise (which is necessary), but not so precise as to make it sound academic, which by nature it certainly is not.

EIGHTY-NINTH SEASON 1969-1970

Friday afternoon April 24 1970 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening April 25 1970 at 8.30

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS conductor

J. S. BACH Cantata no. 140 'Wachet auf, ruft uns die Stimme'

Chorus
Recitative (tenor)
Aria (soprano and bass with violin solo)
Chorale (tenor)
Recitative (bass)
Aria (soprano and bass with oboe solo)
Chorale (tutti)

BETHANY BEARDSLEE soprano
ROBERT GARTSIDE tenor
VERN SHINALL bass

JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN violin
RALPH GOMBERG oboe
JULES ESKIN cello continuo
MATTHEW RUGGIERO bassoon continuo
JOHN ADAMS harpsichord continuo
BERJ ZAMKOCHIAN organ continuo

HARVARD GLEE CLUB and RADCLIFFE CHORAL SOCIETY
Elliot Forbes conductor

first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston

intermission

MAHLER Symphony no. 9 in D

Andante comodo
Im Tempo eines gemächlichen Ländlers: etwas täppisch und sehr derb
(In tempo of a gentle Ländler: in a somewhat heavy and very uncouth manner)
Rondo-Burlesque: Allegro assai, sehr trotzig (very boldly)
Adagio

THE SOLOISTS

BETHANY BEARDSLEE, who has appeared on several occasions with the Orchestra here, at Tanglewood and in New York, recently appeared with the Boston Symphony Chamber Players in one of the Sanders Theater concerts. Born in Michigan, she studied at the Michigan State University and the Juilliard School in New York. A specialist in contemporary music, she was soloist in the première of Stravinsky's Threni, and in the first performances of works by Berg, Babbitt, Schoenberg, Webern, Krenek and other major American composers. She has also been the featured soprano with the New York Pro Musica, and sung many baroque and classical works with musical organizations throughout the United States, as well as giving many solo recitals. Bethany Beardslee has received the Laurel Leaf Citation for modern music and a Ford Foundation grant for concert soloist. Her recordings are on the Columbia, CRI and Epic labels.

ROBERT GARTSIDE first appeared with the Boston Symphony as a member of the Harvard Glee Club during the time when Serge Koussevitzky was Conductor. Later, when he was Assistant Conductor to G. Wallace Woodworth, he sang the tenor solo in Beethoven's Ninth symphony at one of Charles Munch's open rehearsals. In 1955 he traveled to Europe and lived in Paris for the following twelve years. During that time he studied with Pierre Bernac and Ernst Reichert, and appeared in recitals and concerts, many of which were broadcasts on radio and television throughout England and the Continent. Three years ago he returned to the United States and was appointed to the music faculty of Boston University, where he is now Director of choral activities and a member of the voice faculty. He returned recently from a recital tour of California after which he appeared in the Boston area as soloist in the Te Deum of Berlioz and as Jesus in Beethoven's Christ on the Mount of Olives.

VERN SHINALL, who makes his first appearance with the Orchestra at these concerts, started his operatic career, as a bass, at the University of Indiana, where he had originally enrolled with a football scholarship. Later he sang in Europe as bass soloist in a series of US Army choral concerts. His professional debut took place in St Louis, where he sang Mefisto in Gounod's Faust. He was then invited to join the Metropolitan Opera National Company. In the fall of 1968 William Steinberg invited him to sing in a concert performance of Fidelio in Pittsburgh, while other companies with which Vern Shinall has sung in the last two years include the Philadelphia Lyric, the Cincinnati Summer, the Edmondton Opera, the Connecticut Opera and several others. Now a baritone rather than a bass, he has sung the roles of Scarpia, Rigoletto, di Luna, Escamillo, Amonasro, and parts in contemporary American operas. Later this year he is scheduled to sing Rigoletto with the Opera Company of Boston.

THE CHORUSES

The HARVARD GLEE CLUB and RADCLIFFE CHORAL SOCIETY, which first appeared with the Boston Symphony in 1917, have sung with the Orchestra on more than 100 occasions since. During their long and successful history the choruses have toured in many parts of the world, have sung several premières, including that of Stravinsky's Oedipus rex in 1931, and have appeared with other major American orchestras, the Philadelphia, the Cleveland and the Chicago Symphony Orchestras among them. They have also taken part in many recordings by the Boston Symphony of choral works for RCA. Their conductor Elliot Forbes, a former assistant conductor of the Glee Club, is now Professor of music at Harvard University.

57

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

APR 25 1970 New

Thomas conducts BSO in Mahler's 9th Symphony

785

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

Last October, Michael Tilson Thomas described Mahler's 9th Symphony to an interviewer as his current candidate for "the all-time great piece of music." Now, yesterday afternoon, at the end of the Boston Symphony season that brought the 25-year old Assistant Conductor (just promoted to Associate Conductor, effective this Summer) the unforseen opportunity to lead the orchestra through over 30 concerts, Thomas put the Mahler 9th on a program of his own.

Mercilessly demanding on performers and listeners, the 9th is not what they call in the trade a guaranteed piece. Had Thomas been thinking primarily of a sure success for himself at season's close, he had a hundred easier routes open to him. How often has it happened that the last concert of an orchestral season anywhere has ended pianissimo?—a trivial question in a way, but one that does call attention to something important about the concept of success and its place in our concert life. And the most encompassing characteristic of Thomas's performance Friday was a kind of selflessness. The experience for me was one that hardly involved awareness of a performance, an interpretation, at all: there was only contact with the music itself, to which I should perhaps add that Thomas does not by much overestimate the symphony's greatness.

There is no such thing, in the Mahler 9th, as "letting the music play itself," and of course the playing yesterday was powerfully and purposefully shaped. The performance was, in fact, mature, intelligent, technically competent, and all those to a remarkable degree.

It was also a performance that moved me powerfully and disturbingly, though I thought at first that it was going to turn into a rather cool projection with a certain "objective" clarity as its principal goal. What I was hearing, though, was not lack of warmth, but the presence of more control than most Mahler conductors command. The first movement, for example, had a climax, a shattering ure 47, after which the others, and just where Mahler placed it: most performances, however, have already exhausted themselves in an orgy over the upbeat to measure 47, after xhich the movement is apt to fall apart into a shapeless series of climaxes in mutually frustrating competition.

The end of the Adagio, a farewell, a death still more agonizing than the one in "The Song of the Earth" because the accumulation of pain has been so much greater in the symphony, that, too, for once had the impact we all know it is supposed to have (we read about it in the program notes and we can recognize the musical gestures even when we cannot feel them), but which it hardly ever achieves in actual concert.

The performance was (or seemed) quick, which failed to convince me only in the second movement, where I thought the opening tempo too fast not only for the character right there, but also to accommodate the necessary later change to the faster "tempo II." It was, more than any other I have heard, an "in tempo" performance, one in which Thomas made no large modifications of speed other than those specifically prescribed and in which he tended to observe even those to an almost minimal degree. That contributed to the cohesiveness of the experience, and it was all so much alive rhythmically that there was no suggestion whatever of rigidity. Dynamics and accent, too, were treated subtly rather than emphatically, and with remarkable effectiveness in clarifying the texture and giving life to the succession of events.

Not least, it was a performance in which Thomas made extraordinary and knowing use of the orchestra's capabilities. the orchestra, on its part, responded with beautiful playing, whether in the quiet closing pages for strings alone, the virtuoso writing for full band at the end of the Burlesque, or in beautifully played solos by, among others, Joseph Silverstein (violin, Burton Fine (viola), Jules Eskin (cello), Lois Schaefer (piccolo), Peter Hadcock (E flat clarinet), James Stagliano (horn), Armando Ghitalla (trumpet). The audience's response, to it all was an unusual, if not yet ideal, concentration, and a great ovation afterwards. And indeed, it really was something very special.

The performance of Bach's Cantata 140, "Wachet auf," with which Thomas began the concert, was on the whole a disappointment. There was enough good in it to suggest that by affinity and education Thomas could do such a piece very well, but more went wrong than right. There was beautifully fluid and expressive singing by the soprano Bethany Beardslee, elegant violin playing by Silverstein, and lively transparent singing by the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society (but in bad German); on the other hand, there was an awfully "beaty" quality to much of Thomas's conducting, the orchestra was much too small for the huge chorus (assuming the latter as a necessary evil, why the former?), the grey-voiced bass soloist was wooden in his phrasing, both his and the tenor's recitatives were ungainly, the oboe solo lurched, and the instrumentalists playing the bass line disgraced themselves with their mindless whoof - whoof - whoofing through their part.

BOSTON AFTER DARK
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 7,500

MAY 6 1970

Thomas conducts Mahler's Ninth

785

Michael Tilson Thomas, who began the Boston Symphony season as a relatively unfamiliar name in small print on the Symphony Hall program, concluded the orchestra's winter season here with top billing, conducting Mahler's Ninth, no less. As is well known by now, he stepped in (which is what assistant conductors are for) when music director William Steinberg became ill in mid-season, and has since borne a veteran's burden on his 26-year-old shoulders with unquestionable distinction and apparent ease. The fact that he has been named the BSO's associate conductor next season when Mr. Steinberg returns, is well-merited recognition of these solid accomplishments.

There were more of the same in this final program. With soloists, the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, and a much reduced orchestra, he conducted a moving performance (the first in Boston by the BSO) of Bach's Cantata No. 140, "Wachet auf." Balances between the large singing forces and the small instrumental group were carefully maintained, and the soloists received similar consideration. Soprano Bethany Beardslee and tenor Robert Gartside sang with clarity and style. Vern Shinall, the baritone, however, seemed less comfortable in this kind of music. Solos, accompanying the two soprano and bass arias, by concertmaster Joseph Silverstein and oboist Ralph Gomberg were sound perfection, and the choral work bespoke both freshness and musicianly discipline.

The Ninth Symphony in D of Mahler was last played by the BSO in 1967, and because of the magnitude of the work, its performance represents an achievement of impressive proportions for Mr. Thomas.

Such a personal, broodingly romantic kind of work offers pitfalls for sentiment or self-indulgence, but these were avoided in a concept that had sinuous strength and emotional restraint. Its sweep and songfulness, punctuated with bitter jokingly ironic touches, were magnificently conveyed by the orchestra which became an instrumental wonderland under Mr. Thomas's enveloping arms. His personal involvement with this music, as with everything musical to which he has lent his hand this year, brought forth a fervent thank-you ovation from Friday's capacity house, in which the musicians of the orchestra enthusiastically joined.

L. Sn.

Symphony at Finest In Season's Finale

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

APR 27 1970

H.T. 4/25/70

By HARRY NEVILLE
HT Music Critic

The Boston Symphony brings its winter season to a close tonight with a repeat of the program given yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall: Bach's Cantata No. 140 ("Wachet auf, ruft uns die Stimme") and Mahler's Symphony No. 9. Anyone who loves fine music should attempt to attend this concert, for not only are these works great masterpieces but also Michael Tilson Thomas and the BSO have outdone themselves in these particular interpretations.

The Friday afternoon audience is not ordinarily given to noisy demonstrations of approval, but on this occasion it rendered a heartwarming ovation to the orchestra and to the young man who this week was appointed its associate conductor. Undoubtedly the excitement was generated in part by the finality of the event, but of course the major factor was Mahler's music, which Thomas and the BSO players projected with an intensity and conviction that made it an extraordinary moving experience.

Technically the playing was some of the finest this writer has heard from the orchestra, and Thomas did a superb job of clarifying the structural unity and the flow of ideas in each of the four movements. The final movement is one of those Adagios of other worldly beauty which only Mahler could write, and the ethereal effect of the final notes was a stunning and altogether fitting conclusion to the season.

At the beginning of the program the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society joined the orchestra, along with soprano Bethany Beardslee, tenor Robert Gartside and bass Vern Shinall, to perform Bach's Cantata No. 140. On other occasions when the BSO has played Bach, the performances have seemed dutiful rather than inspired but yesterday's was an absolutely first-rate reading.

Herald Traveler
4-25-'70

BSO

by Lawrence P. Katzenstein

The Boston Symphony Orchestra finished the season in fine fashion Saturday night in Symphony Hall with a program of Mahler and Bach. Michael Tilson Thomas, the orchestra's brilliant 25-year old assistant, conducted. It has been a momentous year for Thomas, who has performed all of the season's concerts since the illness of regular conducter William Steinberg.

Mahler's enormous 9th Symphony was the program's major attraction, that wonderful amalgam of Vienese schmaltz, rough Austrian humor, and a few moments of rare beauty. And, like the contemporary scores of Richard Strauss, it is a tough piece to play, calling for complete technical mastery by all players. My preference is for the lighter, more containable Mahler of the 4th Symphony and some of the song cycles, but the 9th has many magnificent ideas and it was good to hear it again.

Thomas and Company met almost all the challenges. The big problem with the 9th is to maintain a sense of coherence, which is not easy considering the great number of key changes and transitional passages. It can come out sounding like a patchwork if not handled carefully. (All of those key changes, some of them torturous, help explain why about the time Schoenberg threw up his hands and went 12-tone.) Thomas was almost successful, smoothing over all the changes in tempo and key, maintaining tension throughout. And sustaining that tension is most difficult in the last movement adagio, based on material derived from the rondo-burlesque preceding it. Here Thomas avoided some of the pitfalls by taking it slightly faster than usual, which helped considerably. It was only a bit forced at times, but the movement is an awesome conducting chore. Only a few persistent woodwind intonation difficulties detracted from the superb playing of the Orchestra. The Mahler was clearly one of the highlights of the season, perhaps surpassed only by the superlative Sibelius fourth of some weeks ago.

About the opening Bach Cantata, "Wachet Auf", (in, would you believe, its first Boston performance by the BSO!) the less said the better. The Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society sang well, but the chorus was much too large for the reduced orchestra. It ought to have been cut by half or two thirds. The soloists were not well-matched and bass Vern Shinall continually overpowered soprano Bethany Beardslee. Contemporary music is really Miss Beardslee's forte. Thomas' conducting here was dutiful at best, generally plodding and lifeless.

Musically, the BSO has had some real triumphs this season. And now is the time to buy season tickets for 1970-71.

BSO Away

55

The News American
BALTIMORE, MD.
D. 219,580 SUN. 318,425
APR 29 1969

Lyric To Celebrate

Anniversary Concert By Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play a concert in Baltimore's Lyric Theater on the evening of Oct. 21, as part of the Lyric's 75th anniversary celebration. This announcement was made yesterday in a joint statement issued by W. Russell Mules, president of the Lyric Foundation, and Thomas D. Perry, manager of the Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony opened the Music Hall, as the Lyric was known then, with a concert on Oct. 30, 1894, conducted by Emil Paur and with soloists Nellie Melba, soprano; Emma Scalchi, contralto; Henri Maugiere, tenor and Pol Piancon, bass-baritone.

THE COMING anniversary concert, according to Mr. Mules, will be a fund-raising project of the Lyric Foundation, Inc., a non-profit, non-stock corporation dedicated to the preservation and improvement of the Lyric Theater.

Mr. Perry made the following statement: "I'm particularly attracted to this, not only because of the history, but because I've always been so great an admirer of the Lyric Theater, which it seems to me is one of the few halls in this country not only with good sound, but with a certain style and atmosphere and a tradition, if you will, that I hope we can help preserve."

William Steinberg, newly appointed music director of the Boston Symphony, will conduct the concert at the Lyric. The program will include: The "Meistersinger" Prelude by Wagner, which was the first piece of music ever played in the Lyric, the Symphony No. 2 by Brahms, the Concerto for Violin and 'Cello by Starer with Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster, and Jules Eskin, first cellist of the Boston Symphony, as soloists; it will close with "Till Eulenspiegel" by Richard Strauss.

SINCE THAT first concert by the Boston Symphony in '94, every succeeding conductor of that Orchestra has conducted concerts in the Lyric: Karl Muck (1906-1917); Henri Rabaud (1917-1919); Pierre Monteux (1919-24); Serge Koussevitzky (1924-1949); the late Charles Munch (1949-1962) and Erich Leinsdorf (1962-1969).

The last concert of the Boston Symphony in the Lyric was with Mr. Leinsdorf conducting on Feb. 28, 1965 and was sponsored by the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra Association, Inc. Mr. Steinberg has also appeared as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony at the Lyric.

THE EVENING SUN
BALTIMORE, MD.
D. 209,655
APR 29 1969

Boston Concert Here In Oct.

By Francis Rackemann

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which opened Baltimore's Music Hall October 30, 1894, returns to the Lyric next fall as part of the seventy-fifth anniversary celebration of the Lyric Theater.

Announcement of the benefit concert October 21 was made today by W. Russell Mules, president of the Lyric Foundation, Inc., and Thomas D. Perry, manager of the Boston Symphony.

Mr. Mules said the concert would be a fund-raising project of the Lyric Foundation, a nonprofit, nonstock corporation dedicated to the preservation and improvement of the Lyric Theater.

The Boston Symphony opened the Lyric, then known as the Music Hall, in 1894. The orchestra was conducted by Emil Paur with Nellie Melba, soprano; Emma Scalchi, contralto; Henri Maugiere, tenor, and Pol Plancon, bass-baritone, as soloists.

Admirer Of Lyric

"I've always been a great admirer of the Lyric Theater which is one of the few halls in this country not only with good sound but a certain style and atmosphere and a tradition that I hope we can help preserve," said Mr. Perry.

William Steinberg, newly appointed music director of the Boston Symphony, will conduct the 8.30 P.M. concert in Baltimore. The program will include the "Meistersinger" Prelude by Wagner, the first work ever performed at the Lyric; Symphony No. 2 by Brahms; Concerto for Violin and Cello by Starer with Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster, and Jules Eskin, first cellist, as soloists and "Till Eulenspiegel" by Richard Strauss.

Mr. Mules said today that the new Lyric Foundation is working on plans to designate the Lyric an historic monument and improve the famed theater by enlarging the stage, increase dressing room facilities, lobby and parking spaces and renovate the facade.

Beethoven's 'Missa Solemnis' To Highlight Rutgers Series

NEW BRUNSWICK — A performance of Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Rutgers University Choir will be the highlight of the 53rd concert season at Rutgers University next Fall.

The special gymnasium concert featuring the Boston Symphony under the baton of William Steinberg and the choir under the direction of F. Austin Walter is scheduled for April 2.

In addition to the special concert there will be four major series for which subscriptions may be purchased. They are the regular Gymnasium Series, the Voorhees Chapel Series, the "Jazz-the Personal Dimension" series, and a three-part Festival of Three Cities, which will feature the Princeton Chamber Orchestra performing great music identified with Vienna, London and Paris.

Series subscription tickets and tickets for individual concerts may be ordered through the University Concerts office, 542 George street. New subscribers may place orders no later than September 26.

The Gymnasium Series will consist of the Royal Philharmonic, conducted by Rudolf Kempe, October 28; soprano Felicia Weathers, December 11; the Cleveland Orchestra under George Szell, February 10; Ivan Moravec, Czech pianist, March 9; and the Zurich Chamber Orchestra, directed by Edmond de Stoutz, April 7.

The first performance in the Voorhees Chapel Series will be the Quartetto Italiano, November 13. Others will be Miriam Fried, Israeli violinist, December 15; Jean-Pierre Rampal, flutist, February 24; the Amati Ensemble, March 16, and Bernard Kruysen, French baritone, April 30.

The Festival series will consist of the music of Vienna, February 4; London, February 18; and Paris, March 11. The series represents the third annual festival presented at Rutgers by the Princeton Chamber Orchestra, conducted by Nicholas Harsanyi.

The fourth subscription series, "Jazz — the Personal Dimension," will begin in the Winter and will bring to the Rugers campus the Billy Taylor Trio, February 3; the Herbie Hancock Sextet, March 3; the Freddie Hubbard Sextet, March 31, and the Jaki Byard Quartet, April 28.

SOMERSET MESSENGER GAZETTE
SOMERVILLE, N.J.
W. 14,000
MAY 22 1969

Announce Rutgers 1969-70 Concerts

A performance of Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Rutgers University Choir will be the highlight of the 53rd concert season at Rutgers University, beginning next Fall. The special gymnasium concert featuring the Boston Symphony under the baton of William Steinberg and the Choir under the direction of F. Austin Walter is scheduled for Apr. 2.

In addition to the special concert there will be four major series for which subscriptions may be purchased. They are the regular Gymnasium Series, the Voorhees Chapel Series, the "Jazz - The Personal Dimension" series, and a 3-part Festival of Three Cities, which will feature the Princeton Chamber Orchestra performing great music identified with Vienna, London and Paris.

The Gymnasium Series will consist of the Royal Philharmonic, conducted by Rudolf Kempe, Oct. 28; soprano Felicia Weathers, Dec. 11; the Cleveland Orchestra under George Szell, Feb. 10; Ivan Moravec, Czech pianist, Mar. 9; and the Zurich Chamber Orchestra, directed by Edmond de Stoutz, Apr. 7.

The first performance in the Voorhees Chapel Series will be the Quartetta Italiano, Nov. 13. Others will be Miriam Fried, Israeli violinist, Dec. 15; Jean-Pierre Rampal, flutist, Feb. 24; the Amati Ensemble, Mar. 16, and Bernard Kruysen, French baritone, Apr. 30.

The Festival series will consist of the music of Vienna, Feb. 4; London, Feb. 18; and Paris, Mar. 11. The series represents the third annual festival presented at Rutgers by the Princeton Chamber Orchestra, conducted by Nicholas Harsanyi.

The fourth subscription series, "Jazz - The Personal Dimension," will begin in the Winter and will bring to the Rutgers campus the Billy Taylor Trio, Feb. 3; the Herbie Hancock Sextet, Mar. 3; the Freddie Hubbard Sextet. Mar. 31, and the Jaki Byard Quartet, Apr. 28.

In addition to the paid concerts the season will again include the Naumberg Memorial Series, Jeunesses Musicales recitals, a Sunday Organ series and a number of mid-day concerts.

NEW JERSEY MUSIC AND ARTS
CALDWELL, N. J.
CIR. N. AVAIL.
JUN 1969

THE SUN
BALTIMORE, MD.
(MORNING)
D. 180,656 SUN. 347,939
MAY 28 1969

The Lyric To Observe Birthday

W. RUSSELL MULES, president of the Lyric Foundation, Inc., and Thomas D. Perry, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have announced that the Boston Symphony is to play a concert in Baltimore's Lyric Theater Tuesday evening, October 21, at 8.30 P.M. as part of the theater's 75th anniversary celebration.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened the "Music Hall," as the Lyric was known then, with a concert on October 30, 1894, conducted by Emil Paur and with soloists Nellie Melba, soprano; Emma Scalchi, contralto; Henri Maugiere, tenor, and Pol Plancon, bass-baritone.

Mr. Mules said that the concert would be a fund-raising project of the Lyric Foundation, Inc., a non-profit, nonstock corporation dedicated to the preservation and improvement of the Lyric Theater.

Mr. Perry made the following statement:

"I'm particularly attracted to this, not only because of the history, but because I've always been so great an admirer of the Lyric Theater, which it seems to me is one of the few halls in this country not only with good sound, but with a certain style and atmosphere and a tradition, if you will, that I hope we can help preserve."

First Piece Played

William Steinberg, newly appointed music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct the concert in Baltimore.

The program will include: The "Meistersinger" prelude by Wagner, which was the first piece of music ever played in the Lyric: the Symphony No. 2 by Brahms, the Concerto for Violin and Cello by Starer, with Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster and Jules Eskin, first cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as soloists, and "Till Eulenspiegel," by Richard Strauss.

Since that first concert by the Boston Symphony in 1894, every succeeding conductor of the orchestra has conducted concerts in the Lyric Theater —Karl Muck (1906-1917); Henri Rabaud (1917-1919); Pierre Monteaux (1919-1924); Serge Koussevitzky (1924-1949); the late Charles Munch (1949-1962), and Erich Leinsdorf (1962-1969).

The last concert of the Boston Symphony in the Lyric was with Mr. Leinsdorf conducting on February 28, 1965, and was sponsored by the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra Association, Inc. Mr. Steinberg has appeared as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony at the Lyric.

Mr. Steinberg, who is also conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra and will remain as that orchestra's music director as well as the Boston, gave a concert in Carnegie Hall with the Pittsburgh Symphony last April 23.

The Home News
NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.
D. 50,727 SUN. 52,421
MAY 21 1969

Boston Symphony to Present Concert in Rutgers Series

A performance of Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Rutgers University Choir will be the highlight of the 53rd concert season at Rutgers University, beginning next fall.

The special gymnasium concert featuring the Boston Symphony under the baton of William Steinberg and the choir under the direction of F. Austin Walter is scheduled for April 2.

In addition to the special concert there will be four major series for which subscriptions may be purchased. They are the regular Gymnasium Series, the Voorhees Chapel Series, the "Jazz-The Personal Dimension" series, and a 3-part Festival of Three Cities, which will feature the Princeton Chamber Orchestra performing great music identified with Vienna, London and Paris.

Series subscription tickets and tickets for individual concerts may be ordered through the University Concerts office, 542 George St., this city. New subscribers may place orders no later than Sept. 26.

All concerts will begin at 8:30 p.m.

The Gymnasium Series will consist of the Royal Philharmonic, conducted by Rudolf Kempe, October 28; soprano Felicia Weathers, Dec. 11; the Cleveland Orchestra under George Szell, Feb. 10; Ivan Moravec, Czech pianist, March 9; and the Zurich Chamber Orchestra, directed by Edmond de Stoutz, April 7.

The first performance in the Voorhees Chapel Series will be the Quartetto Italiano, Nov. 13. Others will be Miriam Fried, Israeli violinist, Dec. 15; Jean-Pierre Rampal, flutist, Feb. 24; the Amati Ensemble, March 16, and Bernard Kruysen, French baritone, April 30.

The Festival series will consist of the music of Vienna, Feb. 4; London, Feb. 18; and Paris, Mar. 11. The series represents the third annual festival presented at Rutgers by the Princeton Chamber Orchestra, conducted by Nicholas Harsanyi.

The fourth subscription series, "Jazz—The Personal Dimension," will begin in the winter and will bring to the Rutgers campus the Billy Taylor Trio, Feb. 3; the Herbie Hancock Sextet, March 3; the Freddie Hubbard Sextet, March 31, and the Jaki Byard Quartet, April 28.

In addition to the paid concerts the season will again include the Naumburg Memorial Series, Jeunesses Musicales recitals, a Sunday Organ series and a number of mid-day concerts.

57

NEW YORK
AND BROOKLYN DAILY
D. 35,348

AUG 8 1969

Erich Leinsdorf, above, will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Brooklyn Academy of Music on Thursday, December 11. The scheduled program is Webern's Symphony for 9 Instruments, Mozart's Piano Concerto in C Minor (Malcolm Frager, soloist), and Symphony No. 5 by Tchaikovsky.

Philadelphia Inquirer
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
D. 504,669 SUN. 935,458

JUL 6 1969

Boston, Pittsburgh, London orchestra visit

A trio of symphony orchestras will visit the Academy of Music in 1969-70 on the All Star-Forum Series.

The Boston Symphony under the "guest" direction of Erich Leinsdorf, who at that time will no longer be the BSO's musical director, plays Dec. 8, followed Jan. 14 by the London Symphony Orchestra under Andre Previn. The Pittsburgh Symphony, with a conductor to be announced, and with Lorin Hollander as piano soloist, plays April 14.

Woolsey Hall Series 1969-'70

Combining great orchestral and solo talent in the usual abundance, the 1969-70 Woolsey Hall Series announced for the first time today gives every promise of being the equal of any of the previous forty seasons of our nationally-known group of fine concert presentations.

Two of America's great orchestras, the Boston Symphony and Cleveland, will have their usual place on the Series, and be joined this season by the London Symphony Orchestra, London's oldest and, by general consent, one of Europe's greatest symphonic bodies, which beats Her Majesty the Queen as Patron and Sir Arthur Bliss, Master of the Queen's Musick, as Honorary President. Add to these Czechoslovakia's renowned Prague Chamber Orchestra of 36 virtuoso musicians and the orchestral portion of the Series is well taken care of.

Conductors of the three 100-piece orchestras will be Erich Leinsdorf for the Bostonians (in this case as guest conductor for he has resigned as Music Director), George Szell for the Clevelanders and Andre Previn for the British ensemble. Most unusual for a group organization, the Prague musicians perform without benefit of a conductor, thus achieving the highest form of artistic discipline.

The solo portion of the season's program is particularly intriguing, being headed by no less a musical personage than the great Soviet pianist Sviatoslav Richter, who will make one of his rare visits to the United States this season. The concert has been long in the making, for since his American debut in Carnegie Hall, New York, in 1960 (when his scheduled five concerts were sold out before he reached these shores) a local

See PROGRAM Page 7

London Symphony Orchestra, Andre Previn (Jan. 6)

Prague Chamber Orchestra (Nov. 18)

John Browning, pianist (Oct. 7)

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf (Dec. 9)

REGISTER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
(E) 107,575 (S) 125,175

SEP 7 1969

visit has been hopefully looked for.

Joining Richter is another piano soloist of great acclaim, John Browning, distinguished young American, whose concert demands are such that he divides his time equally between the United States and Europe.

The violinist of the season will be Polish-born Henryk Szeryng, now a citizen of Mexico who travels the world over on a diplomatic passport as that country's official cultural ambassador. As pianist Artur Rubinstein has commented about him "In the U.S. the masses go to concerts for entertainment. But real music lovers want emotion — great moments — which Szeryng's playing gives them."

All dates for the Series will be Tuesday evenings at 8:30 in the following order: Oct. 7 — John Browning, pianist; Nov. 18 — Prague Chamber Orchestra; Dec. 9 — Boston Symphony; Jan. 6 — London Symphony; Jan. 20 — Sviatoslav Richter, pianist; Feb. 17 Cleveland Orchestra; April 7 — Henryk Szeryng, violinist.

THE SUN
BALTIMORE, MD.
(MORNING)
D. 180,656 SUN. 347,939

SEP 14 1969

Benefit Concert

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of William Steinberg, its new conductor and music director, will present a concert at the Lyric Theater at 8.30 P.M. Tuesday, October 21.

This concert will mark the 75th anniversary of the Lyric Theater, which opened its doors October 31, 1894, with a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Emil Paur.

The program will include the first piece of music ever played in the Lyric, The Overture to Die Meister-singer by Richard Wagner: the Concerto for Violin and Orchestra by Starer with concertmaster Joseph Silverstein and first cellist Jules Eskin as soloists; Symphony No. 2 by Brahms, and Till Eulenspiegel by Richard Strauss.

This will be a benefit concert by the Lyric Foundation with proceeds going toward the restoration and improvement of the Lyric.

THE SUN
BALTIMORE, MD.
(MORNING)
D. 180,656 SUN. 347,939

SEP 17 1969

Baltimore Society

Lyric Event To Mark Birthday

IN commemoration of the 75th anniversary of the Lyric Theater, the Lyric Foundation will sponsor a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Tuesday, October 21, at the Lyric.

The Boston orchestra played the first concert in the theater October 30, 1894. Some selections from that opening presentation will be incorporated into the anniversary program.

By enabling the trustees to employ architects, engineers and other experts to survey the building and advise them, concert proceeds will help provide the answers to what should be done to improve and increase use of the Lyric.

Following the concert, a reception will be held at the Center Club.

Chairman Named

Chairman of the women's committee appointed by the board of directors to plan the reception is Mrs. Glenn C. Bramble. Dr. Janet Elaine Mules is her co-chairman.

Serving on the women's committee are Mrs. Hopewell H. Barroll 3d, Mrs. Jacob Blaustein, Mrs. Arthur M. Gompf, Mrs. Charles H. Whitby 3d, Mrs. Russell C. Wonderlic, Mrs. E. Grant Hood and Mrs. Edmund D. Meyers. Mrs. William M. Diehl, Mrs. Leonard L. Greif, Mrs. Joel G. D. Hutzler, Mrs. H. Irvine Keyser 2d, Mrs. Arnold J. Kleff, Jr., Mrs. Joseph Meyerhoff, Miss Rosa Ponselle, Mrs. Harry R. Slack, Mrs. Aber D. Unger, Mrs. E. Gordon Leatherman and Mrs. R. Charles Whiteford are others.

Mrs. Marvin Mandel and Mrs. Thomas J. D'Alesandro 3d are honorary chairmen.

Shown with invitations for the event commemorating the 75th anniversary of the Lyric Theater are (left to right) Mrs. Roger S. Whiteford, Dr. Janet Elaine Mules and Mrs. Jacob Blaustein. Boston Symphony Orchestra will present concert October 21.

Mrs. Glenn C. Bramble, chairman of the reception committee for the Lyric Theater's 75th anniversary commemoration (left) and Mrs. Joseph Meyerhoff (right) work on invitations to be mailed to prospective patrons.

Boston Symphony Will Play On Rutgers Concert Series

NEW BRUNSWICK -- Subscription sales for four major concert series of the 1969-70 season at Rutgers University are open to the public until Oct. 10.

The series to be offered on a subscription basis include the popular Gymnasium series, now in its 53rd year, and the five concert Voorhees Cahpel series, both beginning in the fall.

The remaining series, beginning in the spring, will be "Jazz-The Personal Dimension," and a Festival of Three Cities, featuring the Princeton Chamber Orchestra playing music identified with Vienna, London and Paris.

A subscription to the Gymnasium series will provide admission to the five regular concerts and an option to purchase the same seats for a special performance of Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis," on April 2.

The special concert will feature the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of William Steinberg and the Rutgers University Choir directed by F. Austin Walter.

The regular gymnasium series will include the Royal Philharmonic, Oct. 28; soprano Felicia Weathers, Dec. 11; The Cleveland Orchestra, Feb. 10; pianist Ivan Moravec, March 9, and the Zurich Chamber Orchestra, April 7.

The Voorhees Chapel Series, held at Douglass College, will consist of the Quartetto Italiano, Nov. 13; violinist Miriam Fried, Dec. 15; flutist Jean-Pierre Rampel, Feb. 24; the Amati Ensemble, March 16, and baritone Bernard Kruysen, April 30.

The jazz series, which brings to the campus smaller and more challenging groups usually dominated by a highly creative performer-composer, will feature the Billy Taylor Trio, Feb. 3; Herbie Hancock Sextet, March 3; the Freddie Hubbard Sextet, March 31, and the Jaki Byard Quartet, April 28, in Kirkpatrick Chapel.

The Princeton Chamber Orchestra, conducted by Nichaolas Harsanyi, will perform the music of Vienna Feb. 4; London, Feb. 18, and Paris, March 11, in Kirkpatrick Chapel.

Subscriptions for all series are available from the University Concerts Office, 542 George St., New Brunswick. Individual tickets only will be sold after Oct. 10.

PRINCETON, N. J.
LAWRENCE LEDGER
W. - CIRC. N. AVAIL.

SEP 17 1969

SOMERSET, N. J.
FRANKLIN NEWS-RECORD
W. 2,500

SEP 18 1969

MANVILLE, N. J.
NEWS
W. 2,000

SEP 18 1969

FOSTER'S
DEMOCRAT
DOVER, N. H.
(E) 15,450

SEP 23 1969

UNH Concert

DURHAM — The Boston Symphony Orchestra will present a concert Monday, October 6 at the University of New Hampshire Field House at 8 pm. The Symphony, now in its 89th season will be under the direction of William Steinberg. Tickets are available at Shaine's Men's Shop, Dover and Huddleston Hall, Durham. Admission is $3 non student and $2 student.

FOSTER'S
DEMOCRAT
DOVER, N. H.
(E) 15,450

SEP 25 1969

Boston Symphony Opens UNH Concert Series

DURHAM — The Blue and White Concert series of the University of New Hampshire begins its annual calender of events on a high note October 6 with a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the UNH Field House.

Marking the first appearance by the famed Boston Symphony on the Durham Campus and the first out-of-town performance of the orchestra since a recent change in its musical leadership, the concert introduces to New Hampshire audiences William Steinberg, newly appointed director, conducting the music of Beethoven, Schubert, Webern and Strauss. Steinberg is the successor to Erich Leinsdorf, well-known conductor of the orchestra for many seasons.

University Director of Cultural Events Ray Matheson reports a strong advance sale of tickets for the eight pm performance but said many excellent seats still remain. Tickets may be purchased through the campus advance sale ticket office in Huddleston Hall, Shaine's men's store in Dover, or the Jarvis Restaurant; Portsmouth. Cost is $2 for students, $3 for adults.

Five additional Blue and White events are planned between November and May and will present a cross-section of leading talents in the serious music field. Remaining concerts are scheduled for the Johnson Theatre in Paul Arts Center.

On November 3 Marilyn Horne, one of the nation's top sopranos, appears in recital followed by a performance February 13, of the Netherlands Chamber Choir. A performance March 3 by Julian Bream, one of the world's foremost classical guitarists, will be followed later that month by a visit to the Durham campus by Shamin Ahmed, sitarist, and disciple of Ravi Shankar, leading interpreter of Indian classical music.

The Blue and White series concludes its Spring program May 12 with a concert by Tsuyeshi Tsutsumi, a young Japanese cellist who will also perform with the UNH Symphony Orchestra that same evening.

Season tickets for all University music events, including the Boston Symphony concert, are priced at seven dollars for UNH students and nine dollars for non-students, and are available through the Huddleston Hall ticket office on the Durham campus. Reservations may be made by telephone at 868-5511, ext. 570.

A monthly listing of cultural activities at the university is published by the UNH News Bureau. Persons wishing to receive copies of the "Coming Events" brochure should send their names and addresses to the News Bureau, Schofield House, Durham.

Cultural Season To Open At UNH

DURHAM — The University of New Hampshire cultural events season officially opens Sept. 28 with the first of 16 scheduled musical and theater productions for 1969-70. A folk rock musical and symphony concert performance are planned for the first week of October.

On Sept. 28 the university's Allied Arts series introduces the Yugoslav Folk Ensemble to the Durham campus with its production of "Frula." This year's musical debut in the UNH Field House marks the start of the singing, dancing and instrumental company's second American tour.

"Your Own Thing," the New York Drama Critics' Circle Award - winning musical comedy version of Shakespeare's "Twelfth Night," bows with two performances the afternoon and evening of Oct. 3 in the university's Johnson Theater. After successful tours in major cities across the nation and in Europe, the off-Broadway production arrives at UNH intact with a New York cast.

The university's Blue and White music series opens Oct. 6 with a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Field House. The performance will mark the first UNH appearance of the orchestra under the direction of William Steinberg who succeeded retired Erich Leinsdorf recently. The program includes Beethoven's overture to "Consecration of the House," Schubert's Symphony 9, Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," and several pieces by Webern.

CHOPPERS NEWS
CONCORD, N. H.
WEEKLY 14,125

SEP 24 1969 New England

UNIONLEADER
MANCHESTER, N. H.
(M&E) 57,003

SEP 25 1969 New England

Hub Symphony To Play at UNH

DURHAM — The Blue and White Concert series of the University of New Hampshire begins its annual calendar of events on a high note Oct. 6 with a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the UNH Field House.

Marking the first appearance by the famed Boston Symphony on the Durham campus and the first out-of-town performance of the orchestra since a recent change in its musical leadership, the concert introduces to New Hampshire audiences William Steinberg, newly appointed director, conducting the music of Beethoven, Schubert, Webern and Strauss.

58

Insights and Outsights

By EDWIN SAFFORD

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
(M) 66,728 (S) 208,349

SEP 14 1969 New England

Boston Symphony program

YOU CAN'T PLEASE everybody, so they say. That is a truth orchestra conductors face every season as they arrange programs which interest them and which they hope will interest audiences.

But in audiences there are always those knots of carpers who, on one side, want more of the same immovable feast of staples—more Brahms, more Tchaikovsky—and, on the other, those looking for novelty after novelty.

Add to them young people for whom there is the responsibility of giving the broadest picture possible of music's literature. And add the numbers of standard works orchestras want to perform simply because they have not wrestled with them before. It is a juggling act not to be envied.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has had 88 seasons, under 11 music directors, to do all of this. Now with William Steinberg, its new music director, at the helm, and a new assistant conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas, it begins a new season next week. On Oct. 9 at Veterans Auditorium the orchestra will appear in the first of its five 1969-70 Providence concerts.

The happy and surprising news is that in every one of the programs here everybody ought to find interest. During last season there were only two works which were not strictly out of a list of the known and respected. The coming season offers something off the beaten path on each program.

There also was surprise, unfair perhaps because it was really pre-judging, that Mr. Steinberg would lead in bringing us music we just do not hear every day. Although he is a musician of considerable depth, on brief, live-concert acquaintance he has seemed a bit stolid. In advance, at least, it looks as if this reaction may not last.

We are to have Beethoven, Schubert, Mendelssohn and Tchaikovsky, as well as Strauss' Til Eulenspiegel and Dukas' Sorcerer's Apprentice, lest traditionalists worry. But look at the rest and, if you are in the opposite camp, be delighted.

First there is Anton Webern. Webern, whose influence on today's music now surpasses that of his associate, Schoenberg, belatedly is finding a place in the standard repertory. His Pieces for Orchestra, opus 6, dating from 1910, is promised for Mr. Steinberg's opening program.

Carlo Maria Giulini has the second Boston concert at Veterans on Nov. 6. He will bring composers of the distant and recent past, Antonio Francesco Bonporti, who invented the use of "invention" in music, and Ildebrando Pizzetti, A concerto gross in D by Bonporti and Pizzetti's overture to Fedra are scheduled.

When Mr. Steinberg returns, on Jan. 15, he will have an almost completely novel program featuring Robert Starer's concerto for violin and cello with Joseph Silverstein and Jules Eskin the soloists. Starer, Viennese-born, has composed much for ballet. Anna Sokolow, Martha Graham and John Butler being among collaborating choreographers.

An overture by Leone Sinigaglia, unheard by most of us since Toscanini died, and Tchaikovsky's infrequently played Manfred symphony, also a Toscanini favorite, complete that evening.

On the following one, March 5, Max Reger's Variations and Fugue on a Theme by Mozart, another work known mostly from recordings, is listed by the conductor. The soloist performing then will be pianist Theodore Lettvin, with Richard Strauss' Burleske.

Michael Tilson Thomas will direct the final Boston concert on March 26. Mr. Thomas comes bearing credentials, as you would expect. Among them is the 1969 Koussevitzky conducting prize from the Berkshire Music Center, of which he is a graduate.

The assistant conductor keeps to the season's blend by combining Charles Ives' Three Places in New England and Stravinsky's Variations (Aldous Huxley in Memoriam) with Hayden and Tchaikovsky. If you do not care to hear the latter's Romeo and Juliet yet another time, that comes at evening's end. If you do, it will be there for your pleasure.

* * *

CODA: This month's Associated Councils of the Arts Report, from New York, offers some observations on the growing arts income-expense gap. Not all the figures are exactly up to date, but most present interesting data on the national level.

In the 1962-63 season six U.S. symphony orchestras had budgets in excess of one million dollars. Four years later the number grew to 17.

While that looks pretty, read on. Between 1962 and 1967 orchestra earnings increased 58.6 per cent, but their operating deficit went up 114.2 per cent.

These percentage gaps reflect what has gone on in other areas, resident theater companies and museums among them. Support for the arts still comes largely from individual contributions. Corporations show increasing interest, as do city, state and even county governments. On the federal level the scene remains bleak.

Unexpected news: Within the past 15 years colleges and universities have accounted for over 60 per cent of the concert management business in this country.

WILLIAM STEINBERG conducts the Boston Symphony Thursday at 8:30 at Veterans Auditorium.

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
(M) 66,728 (S) 208,349

OCT 5 1969 New Engla

N. Y. EAST SIDE NEWS
Friday, October 17, 1969

Steinberg Directs Two Major Series At Carnegie Hall

William Steinberg will be appearing as music director and conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its Carnegie Hall Series opens October 25. Then, on November 12, Mr. Steinberg will open the Pittsburgh Symphony Series in the Hall, again as music director and conductor. In his long and varied career, William Steinberg has often steered the course of more than one orchestra at the same time. Between 1958 and 1960 he traveled between Pittsburgh and London, serving as music director of the London Philharmonic as well as the Pittsburgh, with which he has a lifetime contract.

The Boston Symphony Series has become a tradition at Carnegie Hall as it has in its home city where it is celebrating its 89th season. This year, for two of its four concerts the Orchestra will have guest conductors: Erich Leinsdorf on December 13 and Claudio Abbado on February 7. Mr. Steinberg will conduct the concluding concert on April 4.

For the Boston Symphony's opening program, three symphonies from diverse periods have been chosen: Joseph Haydn's No. 55 in E-flat ("Schoolmaster") Franz Schubert's No. 9 in C and Benjamin Lees' Symphony No. 2, written in 1958. Some tickets remain at Carnegie Hall box office for the concert, in prices ranging from $7.50 to $3.50 but not in all categories.

For further information contact Jane Sebastian. C17-1350.

UNIONLEADER
MANCHESTER, N. H.
(M&E) 57,003

OCT 4 1969 Et

N.H. Network To Celebrate Anniversary

DURHAM — The New Hampshire Network officially celebrates the 10th anniversary of Public Television in the Granite State with a dinner meeting capped by a performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Monday, Oct. 6.

Gov. Walter R. Peterson and John W. Macy Jr., president of the Corporation for Public Broadcasting, will be the featured speakers at the anniversary dinner.

The Rev. Charles Gross of the Durham Community Church will lead the members, staff, talent and guests of the New Hampshire Network in an invocation at 5:30 p.m. in the Strafford Room, the Memorial Union, Durham.

A welcome and recognition of special guests will be presented by William A. Oates, vice rector of St. Paul's School, and treasurer of the N.H. Educational Broadcasting Council.

Following the dinner, N.H. Network Gen. Mgr. Keith J. Nighbert will introduce members of the council and television talent in attendance

The evening will conclude with a performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by William Steinberg, at the University Field House. The performance will include Beethoven's Overture "Consecration of the House," Schubert's Symphony No. 9, Webern's Six Pieces and Till Eulenspiegel by Strauss.

Steinberg To Conduct At Lyric

WILLIAM STEINBERG

WILLIAM STEINBERG will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a concert at the Lyric Theater at 8.30 P.M., on Tuesday, October 21, as part of the Lyric's seventy-fifth anniversary celebration.

Mr. Steinberg was born in Cologne, Germany. Graduating from the Conservatory of his native city in 1920, he became assistant to Otto Klemperer at the Cologne Opera. Soon afterward he was appointed one of the company's principal conductors. He was engaged as first conductor of the German Theater at Prague in 1925, becoming opera director two years later. In 1929, he was invited to Frankfurt as music director of the opera and of the famous Museum concerts. There he conducted many contemporary operas for the first time.

The Nazis dismissed Mr. Steinberg from his post in 1933 and he then founded the Jewish Culture League in Frankfurt, and under its auspices conducted concerts and opera for Jewish audiences. He later did similar work for the Jewish community in Berlin. He left Germany in 1936. He was cofounder with Bronislav Huberman, of the Palestine Symphony Orchestra (now the Israel Philharmonic) becoming its first conductor after the inaugural concert, which was directed by Arturo Toscanini.

Mr. Steinberg came to the United States in 1938 at Toscanini's invitation, to assist in the formation and training of the NBC Symphony Orchestra. During this time Mr. Steinberg appeared as a guest conductor both with the major symphony orchestras and with the San Francisco Opera. He became music director of the Buffalo Philharmonic in 1945, and seven years later was engaged as music director of the Pittsburgh Symphony, with whom he now has a life-time contract.

Between 1958 and 1960, Mr. Steinberg traveled between Pittsburgh and London while he served as music director of the London Philharmonic Orchestra. In the 1964-1965 season he appeared as guest conductor with the Metropolitan Opera in New York.

Mr Steinberg was appointed music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra beginning with the 1969-1970 season.

THE SUN
BALTIMORE, MD.
(MORNING)
D. 180,656 SUN. 347,939

OCT 2 1969

Baltimore Society

Lyric Anniversary Reception To Be Held

INVITATIONS have been received from the 75th Anniversary Committee of the Lyric Theater to a black tie reception to be held Tuesday, October 21, at the Center Club following a birthday concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the theater.

Selections from the 1894 program of the Boston Symphony in the first concert to take place at the Lyric will be incorporated into this month's benefit presentation. The event is to raise funds to employ architects, engineers and other experts to survey the building and advise the trustees on improvements to increase its use.

Honorary chairmen of the committee are Mrs. Marvin Mandel and Mrs. Thomas J. D'Alesandro 3d. Dr. Janet Elaine Mules and Mrs. Glenn C. Bramble are cochairmen of the committee.

Mrs. Hopewell H. Barroll 3d, Mrs. Jacob Blaustein, Mrs. William K. Diehl, Mrs. Arthur M. Gompf, Mrs. Leonard L. Greif, Mrs. E. Grant Hood, Mrs. Joel G. D. Hutzler, Mrs. H. Irving Keyser 2d and Mrs. Arnold J. Kleff, Jr., are members of the anniversary committee.

So are Mrs. E. Gordon Leatherman, Mrs. Joseph Meyerhoff, Mrs. Edmund D. Meyers, Miss Rosa Ponselle, Mrs. Henry R. Slack, Jr., Mrs. Aber D. Unger, Mrs. Charles H. Whitby 3d, Mrs. Roger S. Whiteford and Mrs. Russell S. Wonderlic.

The president of the Lyric Foundation, Mr. W. Russell Mules, will entertain at a cocktail party Saturday at his home on St. Martins road.

Mr. D. K. Este Fisher, Jr., and Mr. H. Irvine Keyser 2d are vice presidents of the foundation, of which Mr. William D. Crump is secretary and Mr. William R. Phelan is treasurer.

THE SUN
BALTIMORE, MD.
(MORNING)
D. 180,656 SUN. 347,939

OCT 5 1969

The Woolsey Hall Series continues with the Prague Chamber Orchestra on November 18, the Boston Symphony December 9, the London Symphony January 6, Sviatoslav Richter, Soviet pianist, January 20, Cleveland Orchestra, February 17, and Henryk Szeryng, violinist, April 7.

REGISTER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
(E) 107,575 (S) 125,175

OCT 5 1969

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
(M) 66,728 (S) 208,349
New England Newsc
OCT 1 0 1969

Music Last Night

Steinberg Conducts Boston Symphony

By RUTH TRIPP

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its 89th season in Providence last evening with the new music director, William Steinberg, conducting. The audience was enthusiastic in the reception which they accorded the musicians. The program was a fine preview of what we may expect from the well-practiced hand of Mr. Steinberg.

His reputation has preceded him here by means of the many recordings which we have been hearing over the years. It was a pleasure to watch his effortless conducting which produced the same total effect of secure musicianship which has always pervaded the recordings.

The opening work, Beethoven's "Overture to the Consecration of the House," is a favorite choice for an important occasion and as the evening wore on, it was apparent that the coming of William Steinberg to this new assignment marks just such an occasion. His careful interpretation made the listener aware of the fine texture of the sounds from the several sections. The variety of tone color was impressive.

Schubert's Symphony No. 9, one of his longest, was the main offering. Its variety of melodic content and the interesting manner of its combination made easy listening. The graceful contour of the Schubert phrases, especially in the third movement, made pleasant listening. The rhythmic pulse of each section was carefully established and beautifully maintained. This work was given a fine interpretation.

It was in the Webern score, "Six pieces for Orchestra," Op. 6, that the audience was tested for tolerance. These miniatures have not been played here in some time and it was no wonder that the listeners were not sure that the piece was ended. Mr. Steinberg's gestures did not announce a final chord. The Webern score sends one's thoughts far away and it was almost as if the audience had to return from outer space before applauding.

There were some rarely beautiful sounds, of extreme delicacy, heard throughout the score. The battery was especially effective. Brass instruments, even the tuba, were muted and fragile phrases from the other choirs, added up to an inexplicable listening experience. It was amazing to watch the conductor assemble his forces at the outset of each section, and, as in the other parts of the program, entirely without score.

The program closed with a gayly descriptive rendition of "Till Eulenspigel's lustige Streiche." His merry pranks were never merrier and it was exactly in keeping with the fantasy, that his death on the gallows was not made so harrowing an experience as it sometimes has been. Here again tone color was extraordinary in its variety. It was apparent that the orchestra enjoyed the program and several recalls for the conductor were evidence that the audience also enjoyed the evening.

TIMES
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
(E) 38,693
OCT 1 0 1969

Music In Review

New Director Maintains Boston Symphony 'Class'

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played its 401st concert in Providence Thursday evening to open the new season with a new director at Veterans Memorial Auditorium.

William Steinberg, the new conductor, is a musician of top rating, and the music he produces with this great orchestra demonstrates that the musicians are giving him their best.

His podium mannerisms are admirable without distracting histrionics, and it's interesting to observe how he calls in the various choirs with a beckoning gesture of his left hand or forefinger. And his accent cues are explosive, sometimes with a clenched fist jab and a stamp of the foot. Or again with sabre-like thrust, cut or parry with the baton. And they give him what he wants.

The program was pleasing diversified. Opening with the dignified, ceremonial march music of Beethoven's "Overture to 'the Consecration of the House'," with its midway trumpet fanfare like clarions of the royal court, it swept into the peaceful, gently moving "Symphony No. 9 in C" by Schubert.

The after-intermission opener was Anton von Webern's "Six Pieces For Orchestra" that way back in 1909 was deemed a "screwball" composition even before that appellation meant what it does today. According to the program notes, Webern even then "suffered the castigation of uncomprehending critics" because of this and most of his works. The 1928 revision of the "Six Pieces" merits my castigation also, even if I am accused of being an "uncomprehending critic." It was a silly complication of discord that suffered now and then from spasms of pure, intelligible harmony.

And the final work, Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's lustige Streiche (Merry Pranks)" led the large and enthusiastic audience back to a happy, homegoing mood. It was the musical narrative of some ancient playboy and his carousing, flirtations, fights and mischief experienced in one day. It was musically refreshing, and it was clearly apparent that Maestro Steinberg, who seems to savor every note, every phrase no matter how tiny, and to lovingly embrace every chord, will continue, as other conductors preceding him have done to bring us the sublime music that this superb orchestra always presents.

C. H. L.

The News American
BALTIMORE, MD.
D. 219,580 SUN. 318,425
OCT 1 5 1969

75th Anniversary Near

Foundation Acquires 56% of Lyric Stock

Fifty-six percent of the stock of the Lyric Theater has now been acquired by the Lyric Foundation, accordcng to W. Russell Mules, president of the tax-exempt, non-profit organization.

With promises of 10 percent more, the Foundation should soon have the 66 percent required under Maryland law to enable the Lyric corporation to tranfer ownership to the Lyric Foundation, he said.

THE OBJECT of the Lyric Foundation is to raise funds for the renovation of the venerable theater which since 1894 has been the scene of nearly all of Baltimore's symphony orchestra concerts, ballet and opera performances. Many stockholders have already contributed their shares to the Foundation.

Celebrating the 75th anniversary of the Lyric, the Foundation has scheduled a performance on Tuesday, Oct. 21, at 8.30 P. M. by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The first performance at the concert hall, when it was brand new, was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The present Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by William Steinberg, will have as its guest artists Joseph Silverstein, violinist, and Jules Eskin, cellist, in Starer's Concerto for Violin, Cello and Orchestra. The orchestral program will include Wagner's Prelude to "Die Meistersinger," Brahms Symphony No. 2, and "Till Eulenspieged' 'by Richard Strauss.

FOR THIS anniversary concert, all the Lyric boxes have already been sold, at $50 a seat. Most of the $25 orchestra seats have also been sold, although there are still obtainable some very good seats at much lower prices.

As his guest of honor Mr. Mules will have the Hon. George L. Radcliff.e who at the age of 19 attended that first Lyric concert played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Making a special concession because of the non-profit, anniversary aspect of the concert, the Boston Symphony has reduced its usual $10,000 by $1,000.

A portion of each ticket sold is tax deductible, Mr. Mules pointed out. On a $25 ticket, the deduction would be $18; on a $15 ticket, $10, and so on down proportionately.

IMPROVING the Lyric would entail enlargement of the stage, a stage elevator, new dressing rooms, refurbishing of the concert hall itself, increased seating capacity, additional room for use by the Baltimore Symphony and Baltimore Civic Opera, and—hopefully, if sufficient funds can be raised—completion of the front of the building according to the original architectural design.

—R.P.H.

Music

Boston Symphony In Benefit Concert

By Francis Rackemann

THE EVENING SUN
BALTIMORE, MD.
D. 209,655
OCT 1 7 1969

The Boston Symphony, under the direction of William Steinberg, its new music director and conductor, will present a benefit concert at 8.30 P.M. Tuesday at the Lyric in celebration of the 75th anniversary of the theater.

The orchesra opened the Lyric then known as the Music Hall, October 31, 1894.

Tuesday's concert is being sponsored by the Lyric Foundation, Inc., which hopes to raise money to restore the venerable concert hall. A reception will follow at the Center Club. tickets are tax-deductible.

The program will include Overture to "Die Meistersinger", by Wagner; Symphony No. 2, by Brahms; Concerto for Violin and Cello, by Starer with Joseph Silverstein, violinist, and Jules Eskin, cellist as soloist, and "Till Eulenspiegel" by Strauss.

Baltimore Symphony

The Baltimore Symphony, under the direction of Allan Miller, opens its series of youth concerts at 2 P.M. tomorrow at the Lyric with Halloween Magic.

Children are invited to attend in costume and prizes will be awarded for the most frightening and most clever.

The program includes "Witches Ride," by Humperdinck; "When the Wind Howls," by Gilbert and Sullivan; "Night on Bald Mountain," by Moussorgsky; "Story of a Soldier," by Stravinsky, and "Dream of a Witches Sabbath," from Berlioz's Symphonic Fantastique.

The orchestra's mid-week subscription concert Wednesday at the Lyric will be conducted by Sergiu Comissiona with the Soviet pianist Vladimir Ashkenazy performing Piano Concerto No. 2 by Brahms.

Mr. Ashkenazy, 1956 winner of the Queen Elisabeth of Belgium Prize, now living with his wife and family in Iceland, gave a recital October 4 at Mount St. Agnes College.

Wednesday's program will also include Les Francs Juges Overture by Berlioz and Jeu des Cartes by Stravinsky.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EAST SIDE NEWS
W. - CIRC. N. AVAIL.
OCT 17 1969

Steinberg Directs Two Major Series At Carnegie Hall

William Steinberg will be appearing as music director and conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra when its Carnegie Hall Series opens October 25. Then, on November 12, Mr. Steinberg will open the Pittsburgh Symphony Series in the Hall, again as music director and conductor. In his long and varied career, William Steinberg has often steered the course of more than one orchestra at the same time. Between 1958 and 1960 he traveled between Pittsburgh and London, serving as music director of the London Philharmonic as well as the Pittsburgh, with which he has a lifetime contract.

The Boston Symphony Series has become a tradition at Carnegie Hall as it has in its home city where it is celebrating its 89th season. This year, for two of its four concerts the Orchestra will have guest conductors: Erich Leinsdorf on December 13 and Claudio Abbado on February 7. Mr. Steinberg will conduct the concluding concert on April 4.

For the Boston Symphony's opening program, three symphonies from diverse periods have been chosen: Joseph Haydn's No. 55 in E-flat ("Schoolmaster"), Franz Schubert's No. 9 in C and Benjamin Lees' Symphony No. 2, written in 1958. Some tickets remain at Carnegie Hall box office for the concert, in prices ranging from $7.50 to $3.50 but not in all categories.

For further information contact Jane Sebastian. C17-1350.

THE JERSEY JOURNAL
JERSEY CITY, N. J.
D. 86,224 SAT. 79,066
OCT 1 0 1969

Steinberg Leads Boston Symphony

William Steinberg will appear as music director and conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra when its Carnegie Hall Series opens October 25. Then, on Nov. 12, Steinberg will open the Pittsburgh Symphony Series in the Hall, again as music director and conductor.

In his long and varied career, Steinberg has often steered the course of more than one orchestra at the same time. Between 1958 and 1960 he traveled between Pittsburgh and London, serving as music director of the London Philharmonic as well as the Pittsburgh, with which he has a lifetime contract.

WAYNE, N. J.
VALLEY RECORD
W.-CIRC. N. AVAIL.
OCT 1 5 1969

WILLIAM STEINBERG TO APPEAR WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

William Steinberg will be appearing as music director and conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra when its Carnegie Hall Series opens October 25. Then, on November 12, Mr. Steinberg will open the Pittsburgh Symphony Series in the Hall, again as music director and conductor. In his long and varied career, William Steinberg has often steered the course of more than one orchestra at the same time. Between 1958 and 1960 he traveled between Pittsburgh and London, serving as music director of the London Philarmonic as well as the Pittsburgh, with which he has a lifetime contract.

The Boston Symphony Series has become a tradition at Carnegie Hall as it has in its home city where it is celebrating its 89th season. This year, for two of its four concerts the Orchestra will have guest conductors: Erich Leinsdorf on December 13 and Claudio Abbado on February 7. Mr. Steinberg will conduct the concluding concert on April 4.

PASSAIC-CLIFTON, N. J.
PROSPECT PARK
HERALD
(NEWARK-NYC MARKET AREA)
W. 2,000
OCT 1 5 1969

NEWARK, N.J.
RECORD
W. CIRC. N. AVAIL.
OCT 1 6 1969

William Steinberg Will Be Leader Of Boston Symphony

William Steinberg will be appearing as music director and conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra when its Carnegie Hall Series opens October 25. The, on November 12, Steinberg will open the Pittsburg Symphony Series in the Hall, again as music director and conductor.

BELLEVILLE, N. J.
TIMES NEWS
(NEWARK-NYC MARKET AREA)
W. 4,000
OCT 1 6 1969

DAILY NEWS
NEW YORK'S PICTURE NEWSPAPER
D. 2,080,906 SUN. 3,221,849
OCT 1 1 1969

Double Duty

William Steinberg will be appearing as music director and conductor of both the Boston Symphony and Pittsburgh Symphony during their Carnegie Hall series. The former opens its series on Oct. 25, the latter on Nov. 12.

WAYNE, N. J.
WAYNE TODAY
DAILY - CIRC. N. AVAIL.
OCT 1 5 1969

Symphony's Season

The Boston Symphony's first tour of 1969-1970 season includes concerts at Philharmonic and Carnegie Halls, University of Virginia, Baltimore's Lyric Theatre, and Villanova University. William Steinberg will conduct all concerts.

The programs will include Beethoven, Brahmns, Lees, Schubert and Haydn.

The program when the orchestra opens its Carnegie Hall series on Saturday evening, October 25, at 8:30 pm, is the first of five Carnegie concerts this season. One of them is part of the Hall's International Festival of Visiting Orchestras.

BEE
NEWTOWN, CONN.
WEEKLY 11,000
OCT 17 1969

Continued From Page 3

ences, who remember her performances in "La Sonnambula," "Madama Butterfly," "I Capuleti e i Montecchi" and "Rigoletto" here in past seasons.

Dimitri Nabokov will sing the role of Sparafucile in his first Lyric appearance. Joann Grillo will be the Maddalena. The cast is rounded out with Joseph Fair as Count Monterone. Adrii Dobriansky as

The Sunday Bulletin
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
SUN. 697,004
OCT 19 1969

WITH THE Philadelphia Orchestra away on a short tour, the Boston Symphony and the Philharmonia (formerly Camden) Orchestra will pay visits.

William Steinberg will make his first appearance here as new music director of the Bostonians — he replaces Erich Leinsdorf — when the orchestra gives a concert at the Villanova University Field House on Thursday evening.

Steinberg, who still heads the Pittsburgh Symphony also, will offer the same program this week with which he will make his debut wtih the Boston orchestra at Carnegie Hall: Haydn's Symphony No. 55 ("The Schoolmaster"), Schubert's Seventh Symphony and the Second Symphony by American composer Benjamin Lees.

William Steinberg
. . . conducts the Boston

• • •

THE Philharmonia Orchestra will celebrate its fifth anniversary at the Academy of Music on Wednesday evening. Chinese-born conductor Ling Tung will again be on the podium. It was Tung who founded the professional ensemble as the Camden Symphony.

The orchestra has found a "home" as a resident associate on the Rutgers University Camden campus, and gives other concerts in the Southern New Jersey area.

Tung, a resident of Bethayres, will have one of his neighbors, pianist John Pennink, of Bryn Athyn, as soloist in Ravel's Piano Concerto in G. Pennink has been heard at the Academy in other seasons with the Philadelphia Orchestra and the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra.

Completing the concert will be Berlioz' "Benvenuto Cellini" overture, Faure's "Pelleas and Melisande," and Dvorak's Symphony No. 6.

60.

By ELLIOTT W GALKIN

On Tuesday evening at 8.30, the 75th anniversary of the Lyric Theater will be celebrated with the appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of William Steinberg.

One of the world's most distinguished orchestras, the Boston Symphony has been under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf for the last eight years. Mr. Steinberg was appointed its music director at the beginning of this season.

Mr. Steinberg, one of the Twentieth Century's eminent conductors for more than 50 years, was born in 1899 in Germany. He became assistant conductor to Otto Klemperer in 1924, and enjoyed a distinguished career in his native land until the beginnig of the era of the Third Reich.

In 1936 he left Germany and became one of the organizers and conductors of the Palestine Symphony Orchestra, preparing it for Arturo Toscanini, who subsequently engaged him as assistant conductor of the NBC Symphony Orchestra.

In 1945, he was named conductor of the Buffalo Philharmonic; in 1952, he was appointed music director of the Pittsburgh Symphony, which he has developed into one of this country's foremost symphonic ensembles.

The program will also feature Joseph Silverstein, the orchestra's concertmaster and Julius Eskin, its solo cellist.

The program:

Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nuernberg" .....Wagner
Symphony No. 2 in D, Op. 73 .....Brahms
Concert for Violin, Cello and Orchestra.....Starer
Julius Eskin, cellist
Joseph Silverstein, violinist
Till Eulenspiegels Lustige Streiche, Op. 28.....Strauss

THE SUN
BALTIMORE, MD.
(MORNING)
D. 180,656 SUN. 347,939
OCT 19 1969

THE SUN
BALTIMORE, MD.
(MORNING)
D. 180,656 SUN. 347,939
OCT 20 1969

WILLIAM STEINBERG

EMIL PAUR

WILHELM GERICKE

KARL MUCK

MAX FIEDLER

HENRI RABAUD

PIERRE MONTEUX

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

CHARLES MUNCH

Lyric Theater To Celebrate 75th Anniversary Tomorrow

IN CELEBRATION of the 75th anniversary of the opening of the Lyric Theater, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of William Steinberg, its new music director, will play a concert at 8.30 P.M. tomorrow at the Lyric.

Proceeds from the benefit concert are to be used to employ architects and engineers to survey the building and advise the trustees of the Lyric Foundation about what can be done to increase the use of the venerable theater.

Maestro Steinberg has included in tonight's concert the overture to "Die Meistersinger," which was performed at the formal opening of the Lyric Theater October 31, 1894, when it was known as the Music Hall.

The opening was a gala occasion that included a concert by the Boston Symphony, under the direction of Emil Paur, conductor, and such soloists as Nellie Melba, soprano; Emma Scalchi, contralto; Henri Maugiere, tenor, and Pol Plancon, bass.

Every conductor of the Boston Symphony since Mr. Paur has conducted at least one concert at the Lyric. Mr. Paur conducted from 1893 to 1898, followed by Wilhelm Garicke, 1898 to 1906; Karl Muck, 1906 to 1908 and again from 1912 to 1918; Max Fiedler, 1908 to 1912, and Henri Rabaud, 1918 to 1919.

Others were Pierre Monteux, 1919 to 1924; Serge Koussevitsky, 1924 to 1949; Charles Munch, 1949 to 1962, and Erich Leinsdorf, 1962 to 1969. Mr. Steinberg has previously been a guest conductor at the Lyric.

The program tonight includes Symphony No. 2 by Brahms; Concerto for violin, cello and orchestra by Starer, with Joseph Silverstein as concert-master and Jules Eskin, first cellist, as soloist; and "Till Eulenspiegel," by Richard Strauss.

—0—

Following is the program from the 1894 formal opening of the Lyric:

Prelude, "Die Meistersinger" ..... Wagner
Aria from "Don Carlos" (Mr. Maugiere)..... Verdi
"Sweet Bird" (Miss Melba) ..... Handel
Prelude, Act II, "Gwendoline" ..... Chabier
"Che Faro" from "Orpheus" (Miss Scalchi) Gluck
"The Two Grenadiers" (Mr. Plancon) ....Schumann
Waltz, "De Saran Rose" (Miss Melba).....Arditi
Excerpts, "A Midsummer Night's Dream" ..... Mendelssohn
Quartet, "Rigoletto" (Melba, Scalchi, Maugiere, Plancon) ..... Verdi
"Academic Festival" Overture ..... Brahms

ERICH LEINSDORF

The News American
BALTIMORE, MD.
D. 219,580 SUN. 318,425
OCT 19 1969

Boston, Baltimore Symphonies in a Gala Week

Besides the opening concert of the Chamber Music Society and the first production by the Chamber Opera Society, this week's schedule offers concerts of unusual interest by the Boston Symphony and the Baltimore Symphony.

To take the symphonic evenings in sequence, the first will be the Lyric Theater's 75th anniversary concert on Tuesday night at 8.30. When the venerable hall opened in 1894, it presented as its first event a concert by the Boston Symphony of that time. Now it will present a concert by the Boston Symphony of today.

THE PRESENT Boston Symphony, under its new music director, William Steinberg, who has just begun his tenure with the 1969-70 season, will have as guest artists for the Lyric concert Tuesday night: Joseph Silverstein, violin; Jules Eskin, cello. They will perform with the orchestra in the double concerto by Robert Starer, a contemporary composer whose "Dybbuk" ballet suite was performed here last week by the Baltimore Symphony.

The orchestral works scheduled on the Boston Symphony program are: Wagner's Prelude to "Die Meistersinger;" the Second Symphony of Nrajms; "Till Eulenspiegel" by Richard Strauss.

STEINBERG

Joseph Silverstein has been concertmaster of the Boston Symphony since 1962, having joined the orchestra seven years earlier at the age of 23, the youngest member at that time. Born in Detroit, he studied at the Curtis Institute in Philadelphia, and later with the famous Mischa Mischakoff, who is now concertmaster of the Baltimore Symphony.

Jules Eskin is principal cello of the Boston Symphony. He came to Boston in 1964 from the Cleveland Orchestra, where he held the same chair. He was born in Philadelphia and studied at the Curtis Institute with Leonard Rose. His other teachers were Gregor Piatigorsky and Janos Starker.

FOR THE THIRD mid-week subscription concert of the Baltimore Symphony season, on Wednesday night at 8.30 in the Lyric Theater, the esteemed Soviet pianist Vladimir Ashkenazy will be featured as soloist in a performance of Brahms' Piano Concerto No. 2.

Conducted by Sergiu Comissiona, the concert will begin with "Les Francs Jugse" Overture by Hector Berlioz, for whom the year 1969 represents the 100th anniversary of his death. Berlioz retained only the score of this stirring overture after abandoning the idea of completing his unfinished opera of that name. The second work of the evening will be Stravinsky's Peu des Cartes.

Brahms' B flat Concerto for piano and orchestra will follow intermission. This staple item of concert fare had its first public performance by Brahms himself, eighty-eight years ago. The pianist who will play it Wednesday, Vladimir Ashkenazy, has received international recognition as one of the major keyboard interpreters of today. Since winning the famed Queen Elisabeth of Belgium Prize in 1956, he has appeared in recital and as concert guest-artist throughout the world. Mr. Ashkenazy and his family now make their home in Iceland.

THE NEXT scheduled Lyric performance by the Baltimore Symphony will be a Saturday pop concert on Oct. 25 at 8.30 P. M. conducted by the orchestra's new assistant conductor Rainer Miedel. Charlie Byrd, guitarist, and his Trio will be the featured artists.

German-born, the conductor, Rainer Miedel, has won critical acclaim for his appearances as resident conductor of the Gavleborgs Symphony Orchestra in Sweden; as a guest conductor throughout Scandinavia, and as assistant conductor of the Stockholm Philharmonic.

MR. MIEDEL is also an accomplished cellist and in that capacity has served as alternating principal of the latter orchestra.

STEINBERG was born in Cologne in 1899. Graduating from the Conservatory of his native city in 1920, he became assistant to Otto Klemperer at the Cologne Opera. Later he became director of the Frankfurt Opera, from which post he was dismissed when the Nazis came to power.

He became music director of the Buffalo Philharmonic in 1945, and seven years later of the Pittsburgh Symphony.

MUSIC LOVERS—President of Goucher College Marvin B. Perry (l.) and Mrs. Perry (r.) talk over the exciting concert with Mrs. Hugh Dalsheimer during the reception sponsored by the Lyric Foundation.

Celebrating the Lyric's 75th

FROM BOSTON — Manager of the Boston Symhpony Thomas D. Perry and Mrs. Perry (center) are welcomed to the post-concert reception by committee members. Mrs. George C. Alderman (l.) and Mrs. Richard Sindler.

—News American Staff Photos by Andrew Keen Jr.

Smart Set

By LOUISE INGALLS
Society Editor

For the second time in a week the Lyric was the setting for an elegantly gowned, black tie audience, the first having been the opening of the Philadelphia, last Tuesday evening. On this second occasion the Lyric itself was the star of the evening, for the building, a copy of the acoustically perfect Gewandthaus Concert Hall in Leipzig, Germany, was celebrating its diamond jubilee.

Sharing honors with the Lyric was the Boston Symphony Orchesta under the baton of William Steinberg. As everyone knows it was a concert by the Boston Symphony on which the Lyric's curtains were opened for the first time, and Tuesday evening, just as on that Oct. 31, 1894, the performance began with the prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurenberg."

Following the performance a large contingent of the audience adjourned to the Center Club for the reception honoring the occasion.

Mr. W. Russell Mules, president of the Lyric Foundation greeted the several hundred guests, unfortunately without Maestro Steinberg, whose commitments had necessitated his return to New York immediately after the concert. The latter wears two hats, one as conductor of the Boston Symphony, the other as conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony.

However Manager and Mrs. Thomas D. Perry were on hand to represent the Boston, an attractive and affable couple.

Mr. Mules' daughter, Dr. Janet Mules, was another who missed Tuesday evening. A member of the reception committee, she unfortunately had to be in Puerto Rico at the time.

An especially warm welcome was accorded Senator George L. Radcliffe, arriving with his son and daughter-in-law Mr. and Mrs. George M. Radcliffe and Mr. and Mrs. Samuel B. Hopkins. Sen. Radcliffe was

Turn to Page 2D, Column 1

EARLY ARRIVALS — Judge and Mrs. Dulany Foster and Mr. Joel G. D. Hutzler (l.) were among guests arriving at the Center Club to celebrate the Lyric's diamond jubilee.

VERY, VERY, VIPS—Sen. George L. Radcliffe, seated, is greeted by Diva Rosa Ponselle and President of the Lyric Foundation, Mr. W. Russell Mules, at Tuesday evening's reception at the Center Club following the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The News American
BALTIMORE, MD.
D. 219,580 SUN. 318,425

OCT 22 1969

Boston Symphony

The Lyric Celebrates Its 75th Anniversary

By R. P. HARRISS

Like a grande dame who retains her hauteur even when her clothing has become dowdy, the Lyric Theater last night proudly celebrated its 75th anniversary with a command performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony of 1894 opened Baltimore's then brand-new music hall. The Boston Symphony of 1969, conducted by its new music director, William Steinberg, marked the passage of three-quarters of a century of music at the hall with a concert featuring as soloists its concertmaster and principal cellist.

THE PROGRAM consisted of:

Wagner: "Die Meistersinger" Prelude.

Brahms: Symphony No. 2 in D Major.

Starer: Concerto for Violin, Cello and Orchestra, with Joseph Silverstein, violin; Jules Eskin, cello.

R. Strauss: "Till Eulenspiegel."

PUTTING Wagner and Brahms on the same program might have been to chance precipitating a riot, at one period in Vienna.

Brahms really was a romantic at heart, but one who deeply respected classical forms. To Wagnerians, as full of themselves as youthful activists are today, Johannes seemed old-hat, an upholder of the Establishment, a square. Nowadays, of course, Brahms gets more hearings than Wagner and a conductor has no compunction about programming the two together.

As a matter of fact, works by both were played on that opening concert of 1894. It began with Wagner's "Die Meistersinger" Overture, with Brahms' Academic Festival Overture coming later.

That earlier "Meistersinger" performance probably was not the equal of last night's, what with the omprovements which have come in the manufacture of wind instruments and in overall orchestral musicianship. Mr. Steinberg conducted it with austere authority, without excesses of any kind.

BRAHMS' Second, most consistently optimistic of his symphonies, received a straightforward, unmannered and nicely balanced reading in which all of the composer's delightful invention and development received a bright and sunny rendering. Steinberg showed no overt intent to impose his own ideas upon either the work or the musicians, the performance proceeding with an air of geniality and assured competence.

Robert Starer's concerto introduced a contemporary mood that caused some squirming in the predominantly conservative audience. Its opening movement is extremely dissonant, the three succeeding movements are often joltingly percussive. Nowhere is there an engaging lyric line. Nevertheless the concerto does provide numerous brief opportunities for virtuoso work by both solo instruments, which Messrs. Silverstein and Eskin did not fail to exploit with admirable artistry.

THIS was the second time this season that music by Starer has been heard, his "Dybbuk" ballet suite having been performed two weeks ago by the Baltimore Symphony. Though more melodic, that suite is less interesting structurally than the concerto, which is tart, tensile, full of complicated rhythms.

Till Eulenspiegel's merry pranks and rather gay hanging always send an audience away pleased, provided the performance is passable. Last night's was memorable, revealing the Boston's Symphony's many virtues, which include as fine a brass section as a conductor could reasonably wish, and superb woodwinds, also.

For this anniversary concert the first floor of the Lyric was well filled by patrons who bothered to dress up for the occasion; but there were many vacant seats in the balcony.

Continued from Page 1D

present at the opening of the Lyric!

Miss Rosa Ponselle, in a long brown lace gown trimmed with gold, arrived with Mr. and Mrs. C. A. Webb Cromwell and Mrs. Stanley Rosoff, both the latter in perenially smart black. A special treat was in store for guests remaining into the wee small hours, for as the evening wore on Miss Ponselle succumbed to the urging of friends clustered around her and gave forth with several songs including lovely "Annie Laurie."

Among guest glimpsed during the gathering were Mr. and Mrs. H. Irvine Keyser 2d, Mrs. Clarence W. Miles, who was with Mr. and Mrs. Sol Kann, both ladies in turquoise, Mrs. Kann's fur cape of dark dark sable, Mrs. Miles' of white ermine. Also Judge and Mrs. Dulany Foster, Mrs. Clyde A. Clapp, President of Goucher, Mrs. Marvin B. Perry and Mrs. Perry, Mrs. Henry A. Rosenberg, Mr. and Mrs. George C. Alderman (She was one of the busy hostesses as was Mrs. Richard Sindler), Mrs. Harold Duane Jacobs, Mr. and Mrs. L. Patrick Deering, Mr. and Mrs. James M. Hepbron, Dr. Hammond Johnston, and Dr. and Mrs. Alan C. Woods Jr. who were also celebrating their twenty-fifth wedding anniversary.

Others crowding the room, centered with a long buffet table laden with hot hors d'oeuvers, were Mr. and Mrs. Allen W. Morton, Mr. and Mrs. E. Grant Hood (she was another busy committee member), Mrs. C. Grant Bramble, chairman of the gala, Miss Elayne Duke, Mr. and Mrs. Joel G. D. Hutzler (she too a busy hostess), Mr. and Mrs. Howard E. de Muth, Dr. Dragi Jovanovxki and Mr. and Mrs. Arthur M. Gompf.

The News American
BALTIMORE, MD.
D. 219,580 SUN. 318,425

OCT 23 1969

Boston Group To Play

Orchestra Will Perform

RADNOR — The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be featured in concert as the second of a series of musical presentations by The Villanova Arts Forum at 8 tonight in the university's field house.

The Boston musicians will be directed by William Steinberg, who took the baton this year. The Boston orchestra previously was directed by Erich Leinsdorf. Steinberg has been conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony since 1962.

Villanova's arts forum opened in September with the Philadelphia Orchestra concert.

Futue programs this year will feature the Cleveland Symphony and a Beethoven Festival.

The Villanova Forum also includes a lecture series, which brings prominent figures from the world of art, music, politics, literature and the news media to the campus. All events are open to the public.

CHESTER, PA.
TIMES
D. 46,500

OCT 23 1969

Boston Symphony To Give Concert At Villanova U.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a concert at Villanova University tonight (Thursday, Oct. 23) in the second of a series of musical presentations by the Villanova Arts Forum. The series opened in September with the appearance of the Philadelphia Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony will be making its first appearance on the university field house stage.

After many years under the musical direction of Erich Leinsdorf, the Boston organization is now conducted by William Steinberg, conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony for the past seven years.

Later in the season, the Arts Forum will present the Cleveland Symphony and also a Beethoven festival.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
CATHOLIC STANDARD AND TIMES
W. 81,759

OCT 23 1969

WAYNE, PA.
SUBURBAN AND TIMES
W. 7,796

OCT 23 1969

Boston Symphony Appears Tonight In Villanova Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will perform at Villanova University tonight, October 23, in the second of a series of musical presentations by the Villanova Arts Forum.

The 1969-70 cultural affairs series opened in September with the appearance of the Philadelphia Orchestra. It was the opening of the Orchestra's 70th season, as well as the sixth season for Villanova's fast-growing cultural program.

While the appearance of the Philadelphia musical group was not the first for them at Villanova, the Boston Symphony will be making its first appearance on the University Field House stage. Later in this series, Villanova will present the Cleveland Symphony and also a "Beethoven Festival."

In addition to its musical presentations, the Villanova Arts Forum conducts a lecture series which periodically brings prominent figures from the world of art, music, politics, literature and the news media, to the campus.

All events presented by the Villanova Arts Forum are open to the public and are held in the Villanova Field House.

62.

Music: Steinberg Ill at Concert; Assistant, 24, Takes Over

By HAROLD C. SCHONBERG

WILLIAM STEINBERG started last evening on the podium of the Philharmonic Hall stage, and ended it in Roosevelt Hospital. At the end of the intermission Thomas D. Perry Jr., manager of the Boston Symphony, told the audience that Mr. Steinberg had been taken ill, and that the assistant conductor Michael Tilson Thomas, would complete the concert.

Mr. Steinberg underwent an operation last summer. At the concert he felt tired, and after the Brahms Second Symphony was unable to continue. An official of the Boston Symphony said last night that the conductor had been released from the hospital, was resting comfortably, and that there was no cause for concern.

Young Mr. Thomas, 24 years old, had his golden opportunity and made the most of it. He conducted Robert Starer's Concerto for Violin, Cello and Orchestra, and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel." A tall, thin young man, he came on stage with an air of immense confidence and authority, and showed that his confidence was not misplaced.

•

The Starer score is not easy. It is dissonant, full of leaping melodies and Bartókian kinds of rhythm, and is heavily scored. Granted that Mr. Steinberg had rehearsed the orchestra in the work, and granted that the two soloists were those first-desk stalwarts of the Boston Symphony — Joseph Silverstein, violin, and Jules Eskin, cello. Nevertheless, Mr. Thomas had to hold everything together and make sense of the music. And he did. Everything sounded clear, propulsive and vital.

He takes naturally to this music, as might be expected of a Tanglewood graduate and a pupil of Pierre Boulez. He also took naturally to "Till Eulenspiegel," which received a buoyant and enthusiastic reading. Mr. Thomas knows his business, and we shall be hearing from him again.

•

Before Mr. Steinberg was stricken, he had led the Boston Symphony through Beethoven's "Consecration of the House" Overture and the Brahms D major. It was his first appearance in Philharmonic Hall as the newly appointed music director of the Boston Symphony.

Was it imagination, or did the strings sound more mellow, the playing of the entire orchestra more relaxed, than it has sounded in recent seasons? Mr. Steinberg comes from much the same background as his predecessor, Erich Leinsdorf, but temperamentally there is a chasm between those two conductors.

Mr. Leinsdorf leans toward an antiseptic kind of modern hypertension. Mr. Steinberg represents an older tradition. In the first two movements of the Brahms, it was almost as though he were going out of his way to prove something. Tempos were deliberate, and Mr. Steinberg conducted with a heavier hand than usual, even letting the line sag—something unusual with him. Of course he may have been in physical pain. Yet in the final two movements he picked up, and the interpretation was much more orthodox, without in any way being impersonal.

One thing is certain. The Boston Symphony under Mr. Steinberg is going to have still another set of tonal characteristics, following the rather harsh brilliance of Mr. Leinsdorf, the lean but colorful sound of Charles Munch and the Franco-Russian exoticism of Serge Koussevitzky.

The Program

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, William Steinberg conducting; with Joseph Silverstein, violin, and Jules Eskin, cello. At Philharmonic Hall.

Overture, The Consecration of the House ..... Beethoven
Symphony No. 2 ..... Brahms
Concerto for Violin, Cello and Orchestra ..... Starer
Till Eulenspiegel ..... Richard Strauss

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 895,505 SUN. 1,445,507
OCT 23 1969

TIMES (M)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
CIRC. 959,600
OCT 24 1969

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 895,505 SUN. 1,445,507
OCT 24 1969

Thomas, Steinberg's Aide, Will Lead 2 Concerts Here

Michael Tilson Thomas, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct its concerts in Philharmonic Hall tonight and Carnegie Hall tomorrow night.

William Steinberg was forced by illness to stop conducting the orchestra Wednesday night, after the first half of the concert. Mr. Steinberg is in Roosevelt Hospital, where he is reported to be resting comfortably.

Tonight's program will remain unchanged.

New York Post
D. 708,180 SAT. 369,902
OCT 24 1969

Thomas to Replace Steinberg

Michael Tilson Thomas, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony, will replace music director William Steinberg tonight in Philharmonic Hall and tomorrow night in Carnegie Hall. Steinberg, who is recuperating from an operation, will rest over the weekend and resume his duties next week.

NEW YORK TIMES, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 25, 1969

Scientist-Musician, 24, Takes Steinberg Baton

By ALLEN HUGHES

Since Michael Tilson Thomas comes from what he calls a "show biz" family, stories of understudies springing to fame by replacing stars on short notice are part of the tradition into which he was born.

Nevertheless, since Wednesday night, when he was called upon in mid-concert to replace William Steinberg on the podium of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Philharmonic Hall, the 24-year-old conductor from North Hollywood, Calif., has had moments of disbelief about what has happened to him so suddenly.

If there haven't been many of them, it's because there hasn't been much time. Besides, Mr. Thomas has been conducting professionally since he was 19, and just two weeks ago he led the Boston Symphony in two regularly scheduled concerts at Symphony Hall in Boston.

He is by no means a wide-eyed unknown getting his first big chance. What is special here is the fact that the performances were unplanned, and thus focus attention upon him in an important setting.

Because Mr. Steinberg's physical condition demands that he rest for a few days, Mr. Thomas is conducting the Boston Symphony in all its concerts this weekend. There was one at Villanova University in Pennsylvania on Thursday night, a second Philharmonic concert last night and a Carnegie Hall concert tonight.

Praise for Orchestra

Yesterday afternoon he was full of praise for the orchestra. "You cannot imagine how flexible it is," he said. "The way I conducted Brahms's Second at Villanova differed from the way Mr. Steinberg did it on Wednesday night, but the orchestra was with me all the way. I will be eternally grateful for the faith and confidence Mr. Steinberg and the players have shown in me."

Coincidence seems to have had a lot to do with Mr. Thomas's brief, action-packed career in music, but it is obvious that he has been prepared to succeed.

Although he is a grandson of Boris Tomashefsky, a pioneer in Yiddish theater in the United States, and the son of Ted Thomas, a writer and director of film and television, he did not gravitate to theater.

His activities were divided about equally between science and music until he entered the University of Southern California as a music major at 17. By that time he had won prizes at science fairs for projects and experiments he had done and had studied piano for seven years.

At 19 he was appointed conductor of the Young Musicians Foundation Debut Orchestra in Los Angeles.

Aide to Boulez

This led to the Ojai (Calif.) Festival, where Pierre Boulez was conducting, and much new music was played. Mr. Thomas went to Bayreuth in 1966 to study in Friedelind Wagner's classes and had been there only five days when a coach became ill. The young man was auditioned and hired. His job was to work with Mr. Boulez on Wagner's "Parsifal."

In 1968, he was invited to be a guest conductor of the Boston Philaharmonia (a cooperative orchestra) where he was heard by Mr. Steinberg and engaged to fill an opening as assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony.

Because Mr. Thomas has a lively mind and has pursued many interests and activities simultaneously all his life, he hopes that his career will not be confined to what he calls "a single format." He would like the kind of musical life in which he could, for example, work with a symphony orchestra but also have the chance to do Monteverdi vocal music.

Even now, when he has conducted a lot, he thinks he wants to be a pianist, and when he has played a lot he wants to get back to conducting.

"I'm in a stage of oscillation," he said. "I change a lot."

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 895,505 SUN. 1,445,507
OCT 25 1969

Words and Music

By Harriett Johnson

A New Conductor at Intermission

The Boston Symphony opened its season last night in Philharmonic Hall with not one but two new conductors. William Steinberg, who began his tenure as music director this fall, led the first half of the concert, but at intermission the announcement came that he was ill and that the second half would be led by 24-year-old assistant conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas.

Steinberg, who reached 70 years Aug. 1, (but who looks ten years younger), is suffering from the aftereffects of a recent operation. Though he wasn't seriously ill, he became uncomfortable and his doctor advised against his continuing on the podium.

Silverstein, Eskin in Starer

Young Thomas, a tremendous talent but unknown to most of the audience before the emergency, took charge like the veteran he turned out to be. He won a musical triumph and the audience as well. Many yelled "Bravo" as he concluded two very difficult works which he had never before conducted, even in rehearsal. He led the orchestra last Oct. 10 and 11 in Boston, but not in these compositions.

First there was "Concerto for Violin, Cello and Orchestra" by Robert Starer, a highly complex score. It reaches for sentiment with melodies which seem out of context among the speared chords, rhythms and harmonies that gash them. The Concerto is well scored and skillfully composed. There are moments of fragmentary beauty. Yet as a whole the piece comes through strong in intellectualized invention, weak in emotion expressiveness. For Thomas to lead it with such authority was most impressive, to say the least. Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein and first cellist Jules Eskin were the expert soloists.

Thomas followed with Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegels lustige Streiche," a jolly, puckish work to hear, but tricky to conduct.

Sensitive and handsome in appearance, Thomas for his years has had extensive experience some of it on the highest level. To cite a few examples. Born in California, he prepared the orchestra for the Heifetz-Piatigorsky concerts. He was assistant conductor to Pierre Boulez during the 1966 Bayreuth Festival. At Tanglewood, among his many activities, he was involved in the musical preparation of Berg's "Wozzeck." In 1968 and '69 he was conductor of the Ojai Festival.

His beat was exemplary, he achieved good balance among the choirs, and with his dynamic personality he made the Strauss work vividly alive. With rehearsal, naturally some sections would have been smoother and more spontaneous, but considering the circumstances, his achievement was extraordinary.

Steinberg opened the program with a spirited performance of Beethoven's Overture to "The Consecration of the House," Op. 124, and followed with Brahms' Symphony No. 2 in D Major.

POST
NEW YORK, N. Y.
(E) 708,180
OCT 23 1969

Conductor, 24, Is at Ease With Steinberg's Baton

By ALLEN HUGHES

Since Michael Tilson Thomas comes from what he calls a "show biz" family, stories of understudies springing to fame by replacing stars on short notice are part of the tradition into which he was born.

Nevertheless, since Wednesday night, when he was called upon in mid-concert to replace William Steinberg on the podium of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Philharmonic Hall, the 24-year-old conductor from North Hollywood, Calif., has had moments of disbelief about what has happened to him so suddenly.

If there haven't been many of them, it's because there hasn't been much time. Besides, Mr. Thomas has been conducting professionally since he was 19, and just two weeks ago he led the Boston Symphony in two regularly scheduled concerts at Symphony Hall in Boston.

He is by no means a wide-eyed unknown getting his first big chance. What is special here is the fact that the performances were unplanned, and thus focus attention upon him in an important setting.

Because Mr. Steinberg's physical condition demands that he rest for a few days, Mr. Thomas is conducting the Boston Symphony in all its concerts this weekend. There was one at Villanova University in Pennsylvania on Thursday night, a second Philharmonic concert last night and a Carnegie Hall concert tonight.

Praise for Orchestra

Yesterday afternoon he was full of praise for the orchestra. "You cannot imagine how flexible it is," he said. "The way I conducted Brahms's Second at Villanova differed from the way Mr. Steinberg did it on Wednesday night, but the orchestra was with me all the way. I will be eternally grateful for the faith and confidence Mr. Steinberg and the players have shown in me."

Coincidence seems to have had a lot to do with Mr. Thomas's brief, action-packed career in music, but it is obvious that he has been prepared to succeed.

Although he is a grandson of Boris Tomashefsky, a pioneer in Yiddish theater in the United States, and the son of Ted Thomas, a writer and director of film and television, he did not gravitate to theater.

His activities were divided about equally between science and music until he entered the University of Southern California as a music major at 17. By that time he had won prizes at science fairs for projects and experiments he had done and had studied piano for seven years.

At 19 he was appointed conductor of the Young Musicians Foundation Debut Orchestra in Los Angeles.

Aide to Boulez

This led to the Ojai (Calif.) Festival, where Pierre Boulez was conducting, and much new music was played. Mr. Thomas went to Bayreuth in 1966 to study in Friedelind Wagner's classes and had been there only five days when a coach became ill. The young man was auditioned and hired. His job was to work with Mr. Boulez on Wagner's "Parsifal."

In 1968, he was invited to be a guest conductor of the Boston Philaharmonia (a cooperative orchestra) where he was heard by Mr. Steinberg and engaged to fill an opening as assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony.

Because Mr. Thomas has a lively mind and has pursued many interests and activities simultaneously all his life, he hopes that his career will not be confined to what he calls "a single format." He would like the kind of musical life in which he could, for example, work with a symphony orchestra but also have the chance to do Monteverdi vocal music.

Even now, when he has conducted a lot, he thinks he wants to be a pianist, and when he has played a lot he wants to get back to conducting.

"I'm in a stage of oscillation," he said. "I change a lot."

NEWS
NEW YORK, N. Y.
(M) 2,080,096
OCT 25 1969

Thomas, Steinberg's Aide, Will Lead 2 Concerts Here

Michael Tilson Thomas, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct its concerts in Philharmonic Hall tonight and Carnegie Hall tomorrow night.

William Steinberg was forced by illness to stop conducting the orchestra Wednesday night, after the first half of the concert. Mr. Steinberg is in Roosevelt Hospital, where he is reported to be resting comfortably.

Tonight's program will remain unchanged. Tomorrow's has been altered to offer Haydn's Symphony No. 98, Charles Ives's "Three Places in New England," Stravinsky's "Huxley Variations" and Debussy's "La Mer."

TIMES (M)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
CIRC. 959,600
OCT 24 1969

Steinberg ill, cancels concerts

William Steinberg, new music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who was taken ill at the podium at New York's Philharmonic Hall Wednesday evening, has been forced to cancel three other concerts scheduled for the remainder of this week.

Steinberg, who underwent an operation last Summer, suffered a slight "aggravation" as a result of the operation, according to officials at Boston Symphony Hall.

Wednesday night he was taken to New York's Roosevelt Hospital where he was treated and released. He will rest for the remainder of the week.

Michael Tilson Thomas, assistant conductor, who took over when Steinberg became ill, will conduct the Boston Symphony tonight at Villanova, Pa., Friday in Philharmonic Hall and Saturday in Carnegie Hall.

Steinberg, who is also conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony, is not scheduled to conduct in Boston until Dec. 19. He will be in Pittsburgh until then.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,70
(S) 566,377
OCT 24 1969
New Engl

At Villanova

Boston Conductor, 24, Gets His Big Break

By JAMES FELTON
Of The Bulletin Staff

MICHAEL Tilson Thomas, 24, got one of those breaks last night that many a young conductor must dream of.

He conducted the great Boston Symphony Orchestra in a full public concert for the first time in his life, at the Villanova University Field House.

The orchestra is now on a tour under its new principal conductor, William Steinberg. Steinberg was taken ill in the middle of a concert at Philharmonic Hall in New York on Wednesday night and Thomas completed it on the podium, winning critical approval.

Last night Steinberg was still indisposed and Thomas had the whole show to himself. Among other things he led the Brahms Second Symphony which he had never led or even rehearsed with an orchestra in his life before. Of course he is the new assistant conductor in Boston this season and is expected to stand in any time.

• • •

A GRACEFUL young man with soft hair that falls like a bell, Thomas had the unflappable confidence of a prodigy. And indeed this native of Hollywood is a prodigy. He graduated from the University of California when he was 14, and is one of the brilliant pianists on the recent phonograph recording of Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring" in its original two-piano version.

Though he referred to printed scores, he was always at ease, never dependent on them. There was always some luminous point he wanted to make no matter how excited or complicated things got, and that included the marvelous but staggering "Three Places in New England" by Charles Ives.

• • •

IVES ALWAYS has about ten ideas going on at the same time, when he can manage it (he used to hear clashing football bands and put that effect in with "Columbia, Gem of the Ocean" and many other tunes, all going wild together). But the commotion is dissolved over and over into soft, sustained tones.

Thomas lashed the "Putnam's Camp" section into a frenzy, but he knew when to change gear too. As if changing blurred water into a still pool he was ready for the poetry of quietness, and asked for it.

He was also very much at home with the loose-jointed and intensely cerebral "Variations, in Memoriam Aldous Huxley," whose difficulties he glossed into a smooth mold.

• • •

A DELIBERATE and open reading of Haydn's Symphony No. 98 showed a few tentative beats at the opening of the concert, which then hummed on with enough time for the merry inner voices to scoot and dart their appointed ways.

But it was the Brahms Second that revealed Thomas' potential for shaping a mighty classic work. If he had never led or rehearsed it before he was at the very least in firm control of its rhythms, which were unhurried and majestic. And the orchestra breathed beautifully. There was no undue stress on the strings; the winds had their chance too.

The Boston Symphony is still a magnificent instrument. Its leadership has passed hands recently from Erich Leinsdorf to Steinberg, and even without Steinberg it is a wonderfully responsive, virtuoso organization. This subtracts not a whit from the promising achievement of its assistant conductor last night.

The Evening Bulletin
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
D. 654,741
OCT 24 1969

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 110,850
OCT 25 1969

Thomas conducts BSO

Tonight's concert by the Boston Symphony at Carnegie Hall in New York will be directed by Michael Tilson Thomas, assistant conductor of the orchestra, who will repeat the program with which he made his BSO debut in Boston on Oct. 10. During the past week's tour by the orchestra, Mr. Thomas has conducted in Villanova, Pa. and at New York's Philharmonic Hall, where he took over after intermission at Wednesday's concert when music director William Steinberg became indisposed.

NEW YORK TIMES, MONDAY, OCTOBER 27, 1969

Thomas, Young Steinberg Aide, Displays Brilliance of His Own

By ALLEN HUGHES

If Michael Tilson Thomas maintains throughout his career the levels of imagination and excellence he exhibited in the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert he conducted at Carnegie Hall Saturday night, his contributions to musical life should be uncommonly rewarding.

The 24-year-old assistant conductor of the orchestra, made his Boston debut with the venerable organization only two weeks ago, but this concert was brought off with poise and control of a veteran.

Mr. Thomas replaced William Steinberg on the podium following intermission in the orchestra's Philharmonic Hall concert last Wednesday and conducted a repeat concert there on Friday night, but this Carnegie Hall event was really a Thomas concert in that the program was of his own devising.

It was his Boston debut program, and he will be repeating it there in several series this season. Its content is obviously important to him.

It consisted of Haydn's Symphony No. 98 in B flat, Ives's "Three Places in New England," Stravinsky's Variations (Aldous Huxley in memoriam) and Debussy's "La Mer."

Mr. Thomas's approach to everything was businesslike. His gestures were precise and economical in most cases, he stayed pretty much in one place on the podium, he used a baton and he conducted from scores.

The Haydn, played with a reduced ensemble and harpsichord, was a delight. Mr. Thomas's ear for the instrumental duets and doublings was acute, and his handling of the impish final movement was deft and witty.

All the Ives pieces came out beautifully. To Mr. Thomas they are not curios, nor novelties to be done tongue-in-cheek, but just beautiful music.

Symphony season: a Thomas triumph

10/29/69 CSM

By Miles Kastendieck

New York

Quite unexpectedly the fourth orchestra to open its subscription series here this season provided the most excitement. When William Steinberg became indisposed during the Boston Symphony's first program in Philharmonic Hall, young Michael Tilson Thomas, the assistant conductor, stepped in and captured the spotlight dramatically.

Since he also substituted for Mr. Steinberg in succeeding concerts, his story may grow as sensationally as Leonard Bernstein's feat with the Philharmonic just over a quarter century ago. The bravos that rang out after he had conducted the second half of the first program clearly indicated a triumphant debut.

New leaders

Here is a young conductor innately musical, confident, and vital. He had conducted the Bostonians in a regular concert about a fortnight ago but in neither Robert Starer's Double Concerto nor Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel." Both scores are exacting, yet he showed a grasp of them that belied both the surprise of his debut and his lack of rehearsal with the orchestra.

In injecting excitement into the performances, he found a responsive orchestra that even refused to share with him the spontaneous outburst of applause which he had so deservedly won. His prospects would appear stratospheric.

The advent of Steinberg as head of the Boston Symphony also qualified as news not only for the different sound of the orchestra but also for the interpretation of Brahms's Second Symphony, which he conducted before the intermission. Steinberg himself has mellowed in recent years, but his way with the musicians also drew a richer quality of musicmaking. His association with the Boston Symphony augurs well.

Unscheduled Bow. Michael Tilson Thomas, 24, didn't expect to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York City last month. But came the intermission of a BSO concert, and conductor William Steinberg found himself unable to continue (Steinberg had undergone surgery just two months before). As Steinberg was whisked off to a hospital, Thomas was given about 10 minutes to prepare for the second half of the concert—and then it was "On stage!" After his last bow to an enthusiastically cheering audience, Thomas told Scholastic Magazines: "It's unbelievable! I don't believe it really happened—that I was really out there." In 1968-69 the youthful conductor-pianist was a principal conductor of the Los Angeles Philharmonic's youth concerts. Last year he scored a hit at the Tanglewood summer music festival, conducting a student performance of a part-rock opera, Elephant Steps. He became assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony in September. Following his unscheduled New York debut, Thomas conducted several more concerts during Steinberg's illness. The general critical verdict: one of the most exciting young talents in years.

Thomas

BILLBOARD
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 24,000

NOV 8 1969

Thomas, Steinberg Fill-In, Steps Ably Into Spotlight

NEW YORK—Michael Tilson Thomas! That name meant little here until Oct. 22, when the new 24-year-old assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony, replacing William Steinberg, who became ill, gained critical acclaim for conducting the second half of a Philharmonic Hall concert by that orchestra.

On Oct. 24, conducting the full program in place of Steinberg, Thomas lived up to the raves and gained more. He is a conductor with authority, whose tempos were crisp and whose presence is exciting.

He started out with two other assets: the abilities of the members of one of America's finest orchestras, and the expert preparation the orchestra had received from Steinberg, its new music director. The Boston, which records for RCA Records, will become Deutsche Grammophon artists.

Thomas' command was evident from the outset, which was Beethoven's overture to "The Consecration of the House." Thomas ably led Starer's "Concerto for Violin, Cello and Orchestra" with two Boston deskmen, concertmaster Joseph Silverstein and cellist Jules Eskin as the superb soloists.

The conductor's readings of Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" and Brahms' "Symphony No. 2" were outstanding. A better gauge of Thomas' ability will doubtless be gained next season, when he's sure to receive conducting assignments on his own, but, at first blush, he appears to have the goods.

FRED KIRBY

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 473,000

NOV 1 1969

BY Wednesday night, I had to get back to my usual beat. William Steinberg brought the Boston Symphony to Philharmonic Hall for its first concert here under his baton since he became its new musical director, and it was important to hear how the famous orchestra would sound under him. Sure enough, its tone had become transmuted into a more robust, sombre sound, with brass instruments retrained in the big, round embouchure. These are earmarks of the Steinberg style, and I had expected them. They were demonstrated in Beethoven's slightly incoherent (for him) "Consecration of the House" Overture, Opus 124, and in Brahms' inevitable Second Symphony. After that, an announcement was made that Mr. Steinberg was ill, and while he was being taken off to the hospital (nothing serious, it turned out), the orchestra's assistant conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas, took over the rest of the program, and became the sensation of the week. His assignments were Robert Starer's complicated atonal Concerto for Violin, Cello, and Orchestra, with Joseph Silverstein, violinist, and Jules Eskin, cellist, as soloists, and Strauss's familiar tone poem "Till Eulenspiegels Lustige Streiche." Mr. Thomas is a tall young man with dark hair and a prominent nose, and his conducting has a bit of that appearance of disorganized flapping so often found among young American conductors (he is twenty-four). But he tackled both scores with the assurance of a master, getting everything out of the Starer composition that was in it, and doing the Strauss work not only accurately but with a certain amount of easy relaxation. Here is a young American conductor with extraordinary talents—the sort of "beat" that means something to an orchestra as well as a thorough knowledge of the scores he is conducting. Later on, I was informed that Mr. Thomas had never conducted either work with the orchestra before, even in rehearsal. That made things still more impressive. It may be that a new Leonard Bernstein is in the making.

Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung

ER STRAUSS: MUSIK IN NEW YORK

Zwei Tage später spielte William Steinberg dasselbe Werk in seinem ersten Konzert als Leinsdorfs Nachfolger mit den Boston-Symphonikern. Nach der Pause wurde angekündigt, daß Steinberg, der vor kurzem operiert wurde, sich nicht wohl fühle und daß daher der zweite Teil von seinem 24 Jahre alten Assistenten Michael Tilson Thomas übernommen werde. Dieser Teil bestand aus einem modernen Werk, dem Konzert für Violine, Cello und Orchester von Robert Starer und Strauss' „Till Eulenspiegel". Thomas hatte in den letzten zwei Jahren einige Male das Schülerorchester in Tanglewood geleitet und war Assistent von Boulez für die Bayreuther „Parsifal"-Aufführungen 1966. Es war erstaunlich, zu sehen, mit welcher Sicherheit und Selbstverständlichkeit dieser junge Mann das Orchester nicht nur leitete, sondern tatsächlich befeuerte. Er hatte einen Riesenerfolg, und das Orchester weigerte sich wiederholt, daran teilzunehmen. Viele Hörer erinnerten sich, wie der damals 25-jährige Leonard Bernstein vor 25 Jahren für den erkrankten Bruno Walter als Assistent der New Yorker Philharmoniker einsprang und dadurch berühmt wurde.

SATURDAY REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 413,000

NOV 8 1969

63.

Music to My Ears

Irving Kolodin

Thomas for Steinberg; Stokowski for The Juilliard

WHAT BEGAN in Philharmonic Hall as an auspicious evening for the familiar figure of William Steinberg in his new guise as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra ended with the debut of the unfamiliar Michael Tilson Thomas as his deputy. After a somewhat protracted intermission, the orchestra took its place, followed by Manager Thomas Perry. He announced that Steinberg was not feeling well enough to continue, and Michael Tilson Thomas, his assistant, would conduct the remainder of the program.

This was an inferential tribute to the thoroughness of Bostonian staff methods, for the first work Thomas (a second-generation descendant of the famous East Side theatrical family of whom the patriarch was Boris Thomashefsky) was called upon to direct was Robert Starer's new Concerto for Violin and Cello. Thomas, a slender young man with an engagingly modest manner (he took his first New York bow standing beside soloists Joseph Silverstein, violin, and Jules Eskin, cello, then hopped onto the podium), gave ample evidence of familiarity with the score—doubtless gained by doing his homework at rehearsals—and a capable plan for dealing with it.

This was no easy assignment, for Starer (of Israeli background and American citizenship) is a composer with an unconventional mind and a personal sense of tonal combinations. Furthermore, a concerto with two soloists poses rather more than twice the difficulties of the ordinary sort. Wise performers that they are, the Bostonians—which includes the soloists, who are leaders of their respective sections of the orchestra—gave no indication of special attention in the special circumstances. Doubtless there was a more than normal amount of sidelong glances from the corners of the eyes, and careful counting during rests. In all, the results did not deviate from expectable BSO excellence.

Starer's previously noted unconventional mind and personal sense of tonal combinations did, however, produce something of an inversion of expectable values. Rather than stating his premises clearly and then proceeding to argue their validity, he began with a rather fragmentary, non-consecutive kind of (seemingly) improvisatory rumination. It gathered organic unity as the first movement progressed, and added laughter to its virtues in a sprightly Scherzo with some jazz-derived elements. Artfully, Starer put the expressive emphasis just where it should be, in a well-formulated Andante that was joined without pause to the finale.

The Andante abounded in long-flowing lines for the two solo strings that evolved into a persuasive kind of nocturnal reverie. Here the fluttering background for muted strings in their highest registers suggested faint, cricket-like chirpings in the distance. It is difficult to recall anything as imaginative in this vein since Bartók wrote into the slow movement of his Piano Concerto No. 3 the sounds of the birds he heard twittering during a visit to the lulling surroundings of Asheville, North Carolina, in 1944. Starer's invention reached its height here, and it may be enough to keep interest in the work alive until all the ingenuities of his writing and the skill with which the work is constructed have a chance to assert their more subtle appeals. As a performance, it profited from the discipline of the soloists and their relationship to the orchestra as well as from the musicianly resource of Thomas.

Appeals to hindsight are always difficult to resist, and the facts of Steinberg's indisposition may or may not have been involved in some characteristics noted in the evening's opening works. These (Beethoven's Consecration of the House Overture and the Second Symphony of Brahms) were polished and full of finely drawn details, but with not quite the vitality that the orchestra and its conductor have produced in other circumstances. The rousing applause for the tumultuous climax of the last movement of the Brahms may belie this statement, but it could be interpreted as an effort of the will to provide a lift where it had not been present previously. It was achieved with seasoned professionalism.

By the Saturday night program in Carnegie Hall, Thomas was also further on the way to seasoned professionalism than he had been on Wednesday, as Steinberg's physician decreed a period of rest before he resumed conducting (it was said that he had had an operation during the summer and was not yet at top strength). Thus Thomas carried on at a Thursday-night concert in Villanova, Pennsylvania, with a repetition of Wednesday's program in Philharmonic Hall on Friday night. This was followed by his first appearance in Carnegie Hall, which involved not merely a change of locale, but a total change of content: a sequence of symphonies by Benjamin Lees (No. 2), Haydn (No. 55), and the Schubert C-major.

Or, it should be added, that was what the audience expected. What it received was a mixture of elements included in a program conducted by Thomas in Boston several weeks before: Ives's Three Places in New England, Stravinsky's Variations ("Aldous Huxley in Memoriam"), the Haydn Symphony No. 98 (in B flat), and Debussy's La Mer. Here, with the benefit of a pre-concert rehearsal, Thomas was more on his own resources, which provided more variable results. Best of them, to this taste, came in the brief Stravinsky tribute, which was concise, well articulated, and effectively controlled. The Ives tended to the bombastic (especially in the middle section called "Putnam's Camp, Redding, Connecticut"), the Haydn to the laconic and impersonal. (La Mer I did not hear.) On the whole, Thomas earned honors for resourcefulness in a situation where some might have panicked.

tionen) überzeugte durch die klare Linienführung, und am Ende war man überwältigt von der Darbietung der Zweiten von Brahms, die man noch selten so stimmungsvoll, erfüllt von herber Schönheit und herbstlicher Resignation gehört hat.

the village VOICE, November 13, 1969

On October 24, as assistant, Michael Tilson Thomas, took over the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the convalescing William Steinberg at Philharmonic Hall and proved himself a real conductor. Robert Starer's Double Concerto for Violin and Cello, with Joseph Silverstein and Jules Eskin as the respective soloists, is an almost-new work of bristling complexity as well as sustained, jagged power, and Mr. Thomas handled it with gratifying aplomb. He also offered a vigorous, healthy, and altogether engrossing Brahms Second Symphony, and when was the last time this warhorse was altogether engrossing? Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" was full of sparkle and orchestral elan, and the final cheers were more than justified.

—Leighton Kerner

INTERNATIONAL MUSICIAN
NEWARK, N. J.
MONTHLY 245,100

DEC 1969

If throughout his career Michael Tilson Thomas displays the imagination and brilliance he showed during the conducting of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its Philharmonic Hall concert on October 23, his contribution to music should be exceptionally rewarding.

The twenty-four-year-old assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra stepped in to replace William Steinberg on the podium when the regular music director was taken ill. Making his Boston debut only two weeks previously, Mr. Thomas completed the program with confidence and precision.

64.

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
(M) 66,728 (S) 208,349

NOV 7 1969

Music Last Night

Boston Symphony Gives Second Concert of Series

By RUTH TRIPP

Carlo Maria Giulini was guest conductor for the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra series here last evening at Veterans Memorial Auditorium. A large and enthusiastic audience gave the conductor a standing ovation at the close of the concert.

The program was interesting, the playing was superior on all counts and the evening was a tremendous musical success. What we heard was the result of creative conducting, the sort which inspires the musicians to play as they did and the sort which leaves the audience spellbound.

The opening work was a "Concerto a quattro" in D, Op. 11, No. 8, by Francesco Bonporti. It is wholesome music, written with skill and interpreted with exactly the right style for the era. The small ensemble of strings, with harpsichord for the continuo, provided an excellent background for the first desk soloists. The three movements were well contrasted and the beautiful Largo had a spiritual quality about it. It was in this work that the effective results of the conductor's expressive and well-controlled gestures first became apparent.

A splendid interpretation of Schubert's Symphony No. 4 in C minor came next and for color contrast and expert phrasing, it was captivating. The beauty of the Andante was outstanding and all the while its melodious measures were unfolding, thoughts of Schubert's great gift made the playing all the more absorbing. There was not a tiresome moment in the entire symphony.

The Prelude to Ildebrando Pizzetti's opera, "Fedra" was new to this listener. The composer, an Italian of contemporary fame, died in 1968, at the age of 88. His style is agreeable and not too dissonant and the conductor made the most of the beautiful content.

The final offering was Ravel's orchestration of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition." The Promenade theme, and each of the pictures in succession, came to life vividly for us and of all the innumerable times we have heard this piece there never has been a better interpretation of the "Ballet of the Chicks." Without doubt, the finale, "The Great Gate at Kiev" was a brilliant display of the virtuosity of these musicians. Giulini gave it a splendid performance and the audience appreciated every note of it.

Music In Review

Boston Symphony Exciting Under Roman Director

Carlo Maria Giulini, guest conductor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Thursday evening in Veterans Memorial Auditorium, Providence, may come back to Providence at any time and he will undoubtedly be rewarded with the same vociferous acclaim that he received Thursday.

The former director of the Rome Opera Company, tall, slender and emotionally persuasive, has the delicate gift of translating the imagery and moods of the composer and presenting them in luminous eloquence without it seeming to be a performance.

Without ostentatious motions, gesticulations and posturing, his podium mannerisms are readable and admirable to his musicians and audience alike.

This was thrillingly evident in his evoking the marvelous melodies and themes in Pizzetti's "Prelude to 'Fedra' " and in the tonal coloring and shading of Mussorgsky's "Pictures At An Exhibition" with its grotesque, distorted chords in "The Gnome," the gay, laughter and brilliance of "Children In The Tuileries," the ponderous rumbling and plodding pace of "The Oxcart," and the macabre chords "The Catacombs."

These built up with the dissonances, clatter and haggling of the marketplace to the grandeur of the sound and fury of the "Great Gates of Kiev," a majestic interpretation that brought the audience to its feet with cheers and prolonged handclapping.

Other works, that served only to build up the intensity of the grand climax were Bonporti's "Concerto A Quattro In D" and Schubert's "Symphony No. 4 in C-Minor" that was trite in the opening movement, sorrowful in the second, animated in the menuetto and almost gay in the closing movement.

C. H. L.

TIMES
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
(E) 38,693

NOV 7 1969

Across the Podium, Darkly

One of the most interesting pieces of carpeting in Providence is that which goes edge-to-edge on the podium used by the baton twirlers who lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Veterans Auditorium. You can accurately gauge the force and tempo and decibel volume simply by closing your ears and watching the clouds of dust come out of the rug as the conductors foot out the beat.

The other evening, when Carlo Maria Giulini was cranking up the Bostons for the rousing climax of the Ravel-Moussorgsky Pictures at an Exhibition, the effect was that of a dust storm in Kansas. Something might go out of the excitement of the performance, especially for those in the front rows, but after all, there are vacuum cleaners.

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
(M) 66,728 (S) 208,349

NOV 13 1969

RECORD, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 19, 1969 Page 5

Boston Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra can play stunningly at times, and its last concert in Providence was-a frustrating combination of relatively uninteresting music played well and familiar music, given new shape, played either excellently or relatively poorly. The program included Francesco Bonporti's Concerto a quattro in D major (op. 11, no. 8; c. 1715), Franz Schubert's Symphony no. 4 in C minor ("Tragic"; 1816), Ildebrando Pizzetti's Prelude to the opera, Fedra (1915), and the Ravel orchestration of Mussorgsky's Pictures at an Exhibition.

Bonporti's Concerto is, frankly, boring music, although pleasant. Nevertheless, it was played beautifully with some stunning solo work by Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster, with his concertino colleagues from the other string sections. The orchestration was too heavy to allow the keyboard continuo to emerge clearly as would be stylistically accurate, but this did not detract from the clarity with which the strings phrased, contrasted, and passed their lines from one section to another or from the larger ripieno orchestra to the members of the concertino quartet.

As a boy of nineteen, Schubert wrote his Fourth Symphony for an amateur group to which he belonged. As one might suspect, it does not merit the description of "Tragic". Rather, it seems imprecise, musically verbose, and lacking in the controlled intensity we were to receive from Schubert eleven years later in the great C major symphony. The orchestra, again, played beautifully, and the audience was pleased — but then who can say no to Schubert's ingenuous charm even when he says nothing?

It should be noted here that the conductor of this concert was Carlo Maria Giulini who, previous to his recent appointment as principal guest conductor of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, has been primarily an opera conductor with the La Scala and Rome companies. The first half of the program, which we have discussed, did not bear what could be recognized as his "stamp". But is was obvious that this tall, lorg-armed, sometimes awkard looking conductor (reminiscent of Liszt and Paganini) both knew the music and commanded the warm respect of the orchestra.

The second half of the concert began with the prelude to Pizzetti's opera, Fedra. The piece began with a beautiful recitive for the violas, magnificently played. The music is more related to Debussy via Resphigi than to the Austrian contemporary school after Mahler, with melodic rather than harmonic cadences and a comparative lack of thematic development. Unfortunately, I do not know the opera and can not discuss the musical relation of prelude to opera. Pizzetti, who died in February of last year, is among the front rank of twentieth-century Italian composers, and this first exposure to him was stimulating.

It was during the Mussorgsky that the most irritating and most rewarding moments came: irritating in that the woodwinds and horns were often out of tune, the usually excellent alto saxophonist appeared to have a bad reed, and the orchestra c'd not always appear settled in the broader,more sustained approach called for by Giulini. When the orchestra and conductor were together, however, his concepts were beautifully expressed, particularly in the opening trumpet promenade, the tuba's solo depicting the passage of the ox-cart, and in the delicately playful (not frantic) ballet of chicks in their shells. There was a falling off from this standard during the dialogue between Samuel Goldenberg and Schmuyle, but all was back in place for the market scene in Limoges. From this point on the playing was excellent, particularly in the sublime impression of the drawing of the proposed Great Gate of Kiev. This interpretation was worth every bit of frustration caused by the less well played section. Giulini and the BSO moved far beyond the notes in their recreation of the impressions Mussorgsky felt when he saw Hartmann's drawings exhibited. At this point criticism is damned. This was the most convincing concept of Pictures that I have heard.

It would be nice to have more substantial fare on these concerts than was represented in the first three pieces, but one cannot always have what he wants in a money world. Apparently, also, we are going to have to wait until March for a good shot of twentieth-century music. Others have argued these causes, so I will only second them here. Nevertheless, this orchestra, despite some reports, can play (when it wills) in a class by itself. We were fortunate to have one such moment in this concert.

—John Duffy

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's second tour of the 1969-70 season opens Monday evening with a concert at the Academy of Music, Philadelphia.

Erich Leinsdorf, who retired as the orchestra's music director last August at the end of the 1969 Tanglewood season, will conduct an all-Beethoven program including Symphony No. 6 "The Pastoral" and Symphony No. 3 "Eroica." This marks the final week of Leinsdorf's three-week guest appearance with the orchestra. Tuesday evening he will conduct in a concert at Woolsey Hall, New Haven, and on Wednesday and Friday evenings at New York's Philharmonic Hall. The Thursday night concert will be at the Brooklyn Academy of Music and Saturday night at Carnegie Hall, New York City.

ITEM
LYNN, MASS.
(E) 38,000

DEC 4 1969

THE BOSTON Symphony's second tour of the 1969-70 season opens Monday evening in the Academy of Music with Erich Leinsdorf guest conducting in an all-Beethoven program. On Tuesday the orchestra will be in New Haven, Wednesday and Friday the Philharmonic in New York City, Thursday at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, and Saturday at Carnegie Hall. Solosits will be soprano Evelyn Lear, and pianist Malcolm Frager.

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901

DEC 5 1969

Boston Symphony in B'klyn

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Erich Leinsdorf conducting, will perform works by Berg, Beethoven and Tchaikovsky in the Academy Orchestra Series at the Brooklyn Academy of Music Thursday at 8:30.

New York Post
D. 708,180 SAT. 369,902

DEC 5 1969

Eric Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony will take over the Academy on the 8th as part of the All-Star Forum Series, which will also be presenting the young Soviet pianist, Alexander Slobodyanik on Dec. 7 at 3.

CENTER CITY
PHILADELPHIAN
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
MONTHLY - CIRC. N. AVAIL.

DEC 29 1969

The Boston Symphony visits Philadelphia for a guest appearance at the Academy of Music, December 8 at 8:30 p.m., with Erich Leinsdorf conducting. This concert is sponsored by All Star-Forum. Instrumental concerts elsewhere this week include one by the Munier Mandolin and Guitar Orchestra, sponsored by the American Institute for Italian Culture, December 7 at 2 p.m., in the Museum of the Civic Center; and another by violinist Geoffrey Michaels and pianist Vladimir Sokoloff, on Dec. 10 at 8:30 p.m. at

WHERE MAGAZINE
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
W. - CIRC. N. AVAIL.

DEC 13 1969

WHERE MAGAZINE
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
W. - CIRC. N. AVAIL.

DEC 6 1969

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EAST SIDE NEWS
W. - CIRC. N. AVAIL.

DEC 5 1969

Three Events At Carnegie Hall

The Composers String Quartet will perform at Carnegie Recital Hall Sunday, Dec. 7 at 8:30 P.M. All seats to the program, "The Continuing Avant-Garde," are $3.00.

"Music and Motion" is the opening event in the series, "Ideas from Interlochen," scheduled for Carnegie Recital Hall Monday, Dec. 8 at 8:30 P.M. Participating artists include dancers and instrumentalists from the Interlochen Arts Academy. All seats are $3.00.

The Boston Symphone Orchestra, Erick Leisdorf conducting, will perform in the second concert of a series of four at Carnegie Hall. Remaining seats are $7.50, $7.00, $6.00, $4.50 and $3.50.

Tickets for all three programs are available in advance at Carnegie Hall or on the night of the concert. For further information call 247-1350.

PHILADELPHIA DAILY
NEWS
D. 231,762

DEC 6 1969

ERICH LEINSDORF
. . . Beethoven concert

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY, under Erich Leinsdorf's direction, will give an all-Beethoven program at 8:30 P. M., Monday. The program will consist of Symphony No. 6 in F major, Opus 68, "The Pastorale," and Symphony No. 3 in C minor, Opus 37, "The Eroica." The concert is in recognition of the 200th anniversary of the Bonn master's birth.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra had an unusual beginning. Whereas most of this country's orchestras have been organized by a committee of interested citizens, Boston's orchestra was started by one man. This same man — Major Henry Lee Higginson — guided it personally and paid all its debts from his own pocket for nearly 40 years.

THE FIRST CONCERT, under the direction of Georg Henschel, took place in the Boston Music Hall on Oct. 22, 1881. Leinsdorf began his term as music director in the fall of 1962. He remained at the helm until the end of last season, when he was succeeded by William Steinberg. He will guest conduct the orchestra during its local engagement.

HERALD
FAIRFIELD, CONN.
(S) 35,000

DEC 7 1969

Dec. 9 - 8:30 p.m. Concert. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Eric Leinsdorf, conductor. Woolsey Hall, New Haven.

65.

Beethoven To Get Boston Symphony Treatment

PHILADELPHIA —The Boston Symphony under Erich Leinsdorf's direction will give an all-Beethoven program at the Academy of Music, Monday, Dec. 8, at 8:30 p.m., on the All Star-Forum Series.

The program will consist of Beethoven's Symphony No. 6 in F Major, Opus 68, "The Pastorale," and the Symphony No. 3 in C minor, Opus 37, "The Eroica." This focus on the Bonn master takes recognition of the 200th anniversary (in 1970) of Beethoven's birth.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra had an unusual beginning. Whereas most of this country's orchestras have been organized by a committee of interested citizens, Boston's orchestra was started by one man. This same man guided it personally and paid all its debts from his own pocket for nearly 40 years.

Major Higginson

The Orchestra's founder was Major Henry Lee Higginson. He has been called a typical Bostonian, with regard to his strong convictions and ideals, his love of music, his loyalties and personal courage.

He was thwarted from becoming a pianist himself by a hand injury during his student days. For 20 years afterward he labored in the Boston financial world, losing one fortune and amassing another, always nourishing a dream to provide Boston with a great symphony orchestra like those of the European capitals he knew so well.

The first concert took place in the Boston Music Hall on October 22, 1881.

The Orchestra's Boston concerts were played in the Music Hall for nearly 20 years, until the present Symphony Hall was opened in 1900.

Tradition

In those years the German tradition in music prevailed, with its devotion to Beethoven, Mozart and Schubert, and the early Boston Symphony conductors were German.

Georg Henschel was its first conductor, from 1881-1884. Then followed Wilhelm Gericke, 1884-1889 and again from 1898-1906; Artur Nikisch, 1889-1893; Emil Paur, 1893-1898; Karl Muck, 1906-1908; Max Fiedler (no relation to Arthur Fiedler), 1908-1912; and again Karl Muck, 1912-1918.

The First World War brought enormous changes to the Orchestra. The strong anti-German feeling which was then prevalent resulted in the unfortunate dismissal of Doctor Muck and some of the players.

At this time Major Higginson was then in his eighties and he recognized the burden of carrying the Orchestra was too much for him.

In 1918 he entrusted the Boston Symphony Orchestra to a Board of Trustees for the first time, and in so doing handed over a greater measure of responsibility to the citizens of Boston.

Devoted Patrons

Several devoted patrons immediately came to the financial rescue, and the Trustees engaged the French conductor Henri Rabaud to lead the Orchestra through the season of 1918-1919. In the five seasons following, 1919-1924, Pierre Monteux undertook the rebuilding of the ensemble. At the end of his term he had received much critical acclaim for having restored the Orchestra to its former capabilities.

A new era began with the advent of Serge Koussevitzky. His particular combination of intellect, dramatic flair, electric enthusiasm, and cosmopolitan taste in music proved to be so enduring that he served an unprecedented term of twenty-five years, 1924-1949. During his tenure the Orchestra responded to the challenges of a rapidly changing world.

Esplanade Concerts

In 1930 the free Esplanade Concerts on the Charles River embankment began under the leadership of Arthur Fiedler. In 1936 Koussevitzky and the Orchestra played their first summer concerts in the Berkshire Hills, and in 1938 they began their annual summer residence at the now famous estate of Tanglewood, in Lenox, Mass. In 1940 Doctor Koussevitzky realized his dream of many years when the Orchestra founded Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood.

LEVITTOWN, PA.
COURIER TIMES
D. 50,000

DEC 3 1969

COMING TO PHILADELPHIA — Eric Leinsdorf conducts the Boston Symphony next week at the Academy of Music in a program of Beethoven, marking the composer's 200th birthday anniversary.

Koussevitzky retired as Music Director of the Orchestra in 1949 but continued as Director of the Berkshire Music Center until his death in the summer of 1951. Charles Munch began his thirteen-year tenure as Music Director in the 1949-50 season. He continued the policy of giving strong support to the music of contemporary composers, and introduced much music from the French repertoire to this country. During Doctor Munch's term the Orchestra made its first tours abroad, under the auspices of the United States Government.

Munch retired at the end of Leinsdorf began his current term in the fall of 1962.

Leinsdorf remained at the helm until the end of last season. The new music director of the Boston Symphony is William Steinberg. But Leinsdorf will conduct the Philadelphia concert as guest.

Leinsdorf came to Boson with a brilliant record in the opera. As music consultant and conductor of the Metropolitan Opera, Leinsdorf established an eminent reputation as a conductor of German opera. In addition, in the period of nine years priord to returning to the Metropolitan in 1957, Erich Leinsdorf brought the Rochester Philharmonic into prominence among the country's orchestras.

Before coming to this country the Vienna-trained conductor studied with Bruno Walter and Arturo Toscanini.

An appointment as music director and conductor of the Cleveland Orchestra in 1943 was interrupted by service in the United States Army following which he accepted appointment as conductor in Rochester. In 1956 Mr. Leinsdorf returned to New York as director of the New York City Opera before resuming his career with the Metropolitan.

Man Founded, Guided Boston Symphony Orchestra's First 40 Years

The Boston Symphony under Erich Leinsdorf's direction will give an all-Beethoven program at the Academy of Music in Philadelphia, Monday, Dec. 8, 8:30 p.m., on the All Star-Forum Series.

The program will consist of Beethoven's Symphony No. 6 in F Major, Opus 68, "The Pastorale," and the Symphony No. 3 in C minor, Opus 37, "The Eroica." This focus on the Bonn master takes recognition of the 200th anniversary (in 1970) of Beethoven's birth.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra had an unusual beginning. Whereas most of this country's orchestras have been organized by a committee of interested citizens, Boston's orchestra was started by one man. This same man guided it personally and paid all its debts from his own pocket for nearly 40 years.

The Orchestra's founder was Major Henry Lee Higginson. He has been called a typical Bostonian, with regard to is strong convictions and ideals, his love of music, his loyalties and personal courage. He was thwarted from becoming a pianist himself by a hand injury during his student days. For 20 years afterward he labored in the Boston financial world, losing one fortune and amassing another, always nourishing a dream to provide Boston with a great symphony orchestra like those of the European capitals he knew so well.

German Tradition

The first concert took place in the Boston Music Hall on Oct. 22, 1881. The Orchestra's Boston concerts were played n the Music Hall for nearly 20 years, until the present Symphony Hall was opened in 1900. In those years the German tradition in music prevailed, with its devotion to Beethoven, Mozart and Schubert, and the early Boston Symphony conductors were German. Georg Henschel was its first conductor, from 1881-1884. Then followed Wilhelm Gericke, 1884-1889 and again from 1898-1906; Artur Nikisch, 1889-1893; Emil Paur, 1893-1898; Karl Muck, 1906-1908; Max Fieddler (no relation to Arthur Fiedler), 1908-1912; and again Karl Muck, 1912-1918.

The First World War brought enormous changes to the Orchestra. The strong anti-German feeling which was then prevalent resulted in the unfortunate dismissal of Doctor Muck and some of the players. At this time Major Higginson was then in his eighties and he recognized the burden of carrying the orchestra was too much for him. In 1918 he entrusted the Boston Symphony Orchestra to a Board of Trustees for the first time, and in so doing handed over a greater measure of responsibility to the citizens of Boston.

Several devoted patrons immediately came to the financial rescue, and the Trustees engaged the French conductor Henri Rabaud to lead the Orchestra through the season of 1918-1919. In the five seasons following, 1919-1924, Pierre Monteux undertook the rebuilding of the ensemble. At the end of his term he had received much critical acclaim for having restored the Orchestra to its former capabilities.

A new era began with the advent of Serge Koussevitzky. His particular combination of intellect, dramatic flair, electric enthusiasm, and cosmopolitan taste in music proved to be so enduring that he served an unprecedented term of twenty-five years, 1924-1949. During his tenure the Orchestra responded to the challenges of a rapidly changing world.

In 1930 the free Esplanade Concerts on the Charles River embankment began under the leadership of Arthur Fiedler. In 1936 Koussevitzky and the Orchestra played their first summer concerts in the Berkshire Hills, and in 1938 they began their annual summer residence at the now famous estate of Tanglewood, in Lenox, Mass. In 1940 Doctor Koussevitzky realized his dream of many years when the Orchestra founded Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood.

Koussevitzky retired as Music Director of the Orchestra in 1949 but continued as Director of the Berkshire Music Center until his death in the summer of 1951. Charles Munch began his thirteen-year tenure as Music Director in the 1949-50 season. He continued the policy of giving strong support to the music of contemporary composers, and introduced much music from the French repertoire to this country. During Doctor Munch's term the Orchestra made its first tours abroad, under the auspeices of the United States Government.

Munch retired at the end of the 1961-62 season, and Erich Leinsdorf began his current term in the fall of 1962.

Leinsdorf remained at the helm until the end of last season. The new music director of he Boston Symphony is William Steinberg. But Leinsdorf will conduct the Philadelphia concert as guest.

Leinsdorf came to Boston with a brilliant record in the opera. As music consultant and conductor of the Metropolitan Opera, Leinsdorf established an eminent reputation as a conductor of German opera. In addition, in the period of nine years prior to returning to the Metropolitan in 1957, Erich Leinsdorf brought the Rochester Philharmonic into prominence among the country's orchestras.

Before coming to this country the Vienna-trained conductor sutdied with Bruno Walter and Arturo Toscanini.

An appointment as music director and conductor of the Cleveland Orchestra in 1943 was interrupted by service in the United States Army following whch he accepted appointment as conductor in Rochester. In 1956 Mr. Leinsdorf returned to New York as director of the New York City Opera before resuming his career with the Metropolitan.

Boston Symphony's Erich Leinsdorf

WILLINGBORO, N. J.
TIMES
(PHILA.-CAMDEN MARKET AREA)
D. 27,500

DEC 3 1969

BSO Here Tuesday

Marking the third event of the current Woolsey Hall Series, the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to Woolsey Hall Tuesday evening for its annual local appearance. Although he retired last season as Music Director of the 110-member musical body, Erich Leinsdorf will be on the podium for this concert, he being the guest conductor for a number of concerts by the Bostonians this month including the three New York appearances later this week.

Tuesday's program will be one of the most interesting the famed orchestra has presented here. Mozart's Overture to "Die Entfuhrung aus dem Serail" will open the evening of great music. Next to be heard will be Berg's Altenberg Lieder, op. 4, and excerpts from 'Wozzeck,' bringing to a close the first half of the program. Evelyn Lear, soprano, will be the artist in the Berg selections. After intermission Beethoven's Symphony No. 3 ("Eroica") will conclude the performance.

The Woolsey Hall Series programs resume on January 6, when the London Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Andre Previn makes its first visit to New Haven. Then in the following order come Sviatoslav Richter, Soviet pianist, January 20, the Cleveland Orchestra on February 17, and violinist Henryk Szeryng on April 7.

REGISTER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
(E) 107,575 (S) 125,175

DEC 7 1969

66

Boston Symphony at Academy of Music

Leinsdorf Leads Salute to Beethoven's 200th Year

By DANIEL WEBSTER
Of The Inquirer Staff

The Boston Symphony Orchestra missed its scheduled concert last year but made up for it Monday when it returned with a Beethoven program at the Academy of Music.

Erich Leinsdorf came back, too, though no longer as music director but as guest conductor for a dozen concerts.

The program, made to honor Beethoven, whose 200th year begins Dec. 16, made the point rather than Beethoven should be honored with a single work. Leinsdorf led the Symphony No. 6 and the Symphony No. 3. They could hardly be more different in mood, but in these performances there was a weighty sense of sameness through the evening that made some in the audience view the anniversary date with resignation.

Leinsdorf's approach Monday was ebullient, yet his interpretations were tightly held, the notes tended to be clipped and the phrasing terse. It was an approach that avoided the excesses that Beethoven as fallen victim to, but it also robbed the "Pastoral" Symphony of its expansiveness.

In that work, the Symphony was troubled, too, by faltering ensemble in the usually unshakable wind choir. The oboe was problematical through the exposed solos, and a feeling of tension rose in the other winds that expressed itself clearly across the apron.

Leinsdorf developed clear, cool tempos for the piece, some of which were refreshing for the way they opened a familiar score to an untraditional reading. He kept a firm hand on dynamics through the early movements to allow the winds to speak clearly through the strings. It was successful through two movements.

veloped in the third, and Leinsdorf presided over some tattered playing during the storm section.

The "Eroica" proved the better of the symphonies. Leinsdorf was still in a didactic mood, an dhe formed the work from laconic phrases and clipped chords — even those tow at the outset. It was characteristic that he hurried from important moment to important moment with only cursory attention to the playing in between.

The orchestra was kept bright, the strong tone a surface tone and the winds and brass brilliant. In the first movement's development, where chords announce a series of new keys, the conductor bit them off very short. The effect was one of Beethcosmic.

The Funeral March, on the other hand, was a big conception, and the playing was long-lined, brooding, broadly expresssive.

The fugue at the end was played with dry correctness, but it salvaged the structure and contour intact.

The final two movements missed the broad approach of the second. In them, the horns lacked assertiveness and even close ensemble, and the conductor tended to rim off the high and low points of this heroic score. Presumably Leinsdorf finds the Symphony much as he knew it as music director, but this performance left room for doubt that the Symphony is thriving under its caretaker kind of interim administration.

Philadelphia Inquirer
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
D. 504,669 SUN. 935,458
DEC 9 1969

The Evening Bulletin
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
D. 654,741
DEC 9 1969

This Week's Music

New Russian Pianist in Solo Recital; Boston Symphony Led by Leinsdorf

A RUSSIAN pianist in solo recital and the Boston Symphony in an all-Beethoven program will join the Philadelphia Orchestra as the leading attractions at the Academy of Music this week.

Alexander Slobodyanik, 27, is the latest pianist to join a hit parade from Russia that began with Emil Gilels and continued with Sviatoslav Richter and Vladimir Ashkenazy. He won praise on his first American tour last year and will appear in his local debut here this afternoon in the All Star-Forum keyboard series.

A native of Kiev, Slobodyanik's success in America could hardly have surprised his countrymen. Within a short time he won a position as one of the Soviet Union's most exciting young musicians. His mentor at the Moscow Conservatory, the distinguished Prof. Heinrich Neuhaus, described him as "endowed with enormous innate talent," and the Soviet press has acclaimed his brilliant technique and his "striking passionate temperament."

Something of a maverick, Slobodyanik has, from his teens, created a stir in Russian music circles by his individual approach to the wide range of music in his repertoire, going so far as to argue heatedly with the celebrated musicians who were his teachers.

Alexander Slobodyanik

Eric Leinsdorf

After studying the piano under his mother's guidance at age five, he was sent to the Central Music School in Moscow at 12 to prepare for the Conservatory.

At 16 he was determined to compete against many of the world's outstanding pianists in the Warsaw Competition and, on his own, prepared a difficult program and won the right to participate. In that distinguished company, he placed seventh.

Deeply discouraged and disappointed, the youngster refused to practice even for Prof. Neuhaus and was expelled from the Conservatory. But his deep love for the piano won out and he was readmitted to the Conservatory to study with Vera Gornostayeva with whom he still works.

Three years ago, with his self-confidence restored, he gave concerts in the Soviet Union and in 1967 made his first appearances in Western Europe where he was hailed roundly. During this period impresario Sol Hurok, met him at the home of Sviatoslav Richter, heard him and arranged to bring him to this country in the fall of 1968.

Following his American success he returned to the Soviet Union for concerts and also made a tour of Italy.

His program this afternoon consists of Haydn's Sonata No. 48 in C, Chopin's Polonaise in E-flat minor, also a group of Etudes and Mazurkas by Chopin, Bartok's Sonata (1926) and Liszt's Sonata in B Minor.

• • •

WHEN the Boston Symphony plays here tomorrow night Erich Leinsdorf will be on the podium, although he is no longer its principal leader.

After quitting as permanent conductor at the end of last season (he said there were too many concerts for one man to conduct), Leinsdorf was succeeded at least temporarily by William Steinberg, who also retains his post as conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony.

To compound confusion slightly, Steinberg took ill while leading the Boston Symphony in New York this fall. A few days later The Bostonians played at Villanova University under their new assistant conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas, 24, who made a bril-

Continued on Page 6, Col. 1

The Sunday Bulletin
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
SUN. 697,004
DEC 7 1969

Pianist, Leinsdorf at Academy

Continued From Page 3

liant impromptu debut at that time.

Ever since its founding in 1881 by philanthropist Henry Lee Higginson, the orchestra has been influenced by the nationality of its conductors. Thus a "German" period was felt under Georg Henschel, Wilhelm Gericke, Artur Nikisch, Emil Pauer, Max Fiedler and Karl Muck.

The "French" influence began with Henri Rabaud and Pierre Monteux. It continued under the Russian Serge Koussevitzky, whose 25-year tenure from 1924 to 1949 was invigorating and glamorous. Charles Munch continued in the same vein until 1962, when Erich Leinsdorf brought back a Germanic slant that continues to this day under Steinberg.

Leinsdorf came to Boston with an excellent background in opera. As a conductor at the Metropolitan Opera he established a reputation as a conductor of German opera. Before coming to the Met from Vienna he had studied with Bruno Walter and Arturo Toscanini.

He led the Cleveland and Rochester orchestras before going to Boston. He returns this week as a guest conductor.

The all-Beethoven program, consisting of the Symphony No. 3 ("Eroica") and Symphony No. 6 ("Pastorale"), takes recognition of the 200th anniversary — in 1970 — of the Bonn master's birth.

• • •

ZUBIN MEHTA concludes his present term as guest conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra at subscription concerts this Friday and Saturday evenings.

The 33-year-old director of the Los Angeles Philharmonic will offer his own interpretation of Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, as well as Mozart's Symphony No. 36 ("Linz") and Anton Webern's Six Pieces for Orchestra (Op. 6).

• • •

BARBARA NISSMAN, talented young Philadelphia pianist who will make her first European tour next year, will be heard in recital on Sunday afternoon, Dec. 14, at the Settlement Music School, 4th and Queen sts.

She is appearing for the third time for benefit of the University of Michigan Club of Greater Philadelphia's scholarship fund, of which she was a recipient.

Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a special concert at Woolsey Hall tonight at 8:30. The retired conductor will make a guest appearance to lead a program which will feature works by Mozart, Berg, and Beethoven.

Boston Symphony Plays Tonight In Woolsey Hall

By RICHARD M. SCHWARTZ

One of the world's great orchestras, the Boston Symphony, will perform tonight at 8:30 in Woolsey Hall.

Erich Leinsdorf, retired music director of the Boston Symphony, will be guest conductor.

Leinsdorf will lead the orchestra in performances of the Overture to "Die Entfuhrung aus dem Serail" by Mozart, the Altenberg Lieder by Alban Berg, excerpts from "Wozzeck" by Berg, and the Symphony No. 3 by Beethoven.

Evelyn Lear will sing soprano in the Berg selections.

Leinsdorf is a well-known figure to most concert-goers. He began his conducting career over three decades ago, as assistant to Bruno Walter and Arturo Toscanini at the Salzburg Festival.

After moving to America, the Vienna-born conductor first appeared with the Metropolitan Opera, before joining the Cleveland Orchestra and then the Rochester Philharmonic.

He returned to the Met in 1957, becoming music consultant and conductor. In 1962 he was music director of the Boston Symphony, retiring at the conclusion of last summer's Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood.

Leinsdorf will conduct the orchestra tonight in a concert of German music.

"Die Entfuhrung aus dem Serail" is a three-act comic opera written by Mozart in 1782.

The overture is a short, brisk work which establishes the Turkish atmosphere of the setting and introduces the theme of the aria which directly follows the overture.

(continued on page 3)

YALE DAILY NEWS
NEW HAVEN, CONN
(E) 3,200
DEC 9 1969

Leinsdorf Conducts

(continued from page 1

The Altenberg Lieder is one of Five Orchestral Songs, Op. 4 by Berg. The work was written following rules of atonality developed by Berg's teacher, Arnold Schoenberg.

"Wozzeck" is Berg's greatest opera, standing in the Wagnerian tradition of German music drama.

"Wozzeck" tells the tragic story of an oppressed soldier who kills his sweetheart and then himself.

The final selection of tonight's concert will be the popular "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven, dedicated to the memory of a great man.

A Beethoven Concert

DEC 9 1969

Leinsdorf Conducts Bostonians

By MAX de SCHAUENSEE
Bulletin Music Critic

ERICH LEINSDORF is an intellectual man; therefore, he is also an intellectual conductor. He sees to it that every note is in its proper place and in its proper relation to the whole. You may differ with his interpretations, but you will also be aware that his is a far-reaching overall plan when it comes to shaping the music.

Last night, Mr. Leinsdorf brought his distinguished Boston Symphony Orchestra to the Academy of Music under the aegis of the All-Star Forum series. It is the Boston Symphony's 89th season of music-making.

The conductor presented two of Beethoven's longest symphonies, beginning with the No. 6 ("Pastoral") and ending with the No. 3 ("Eroica"). The big audience seemed to relish the program and to lavish applause on the Boston conductor.

• • •

PERSONALLY, I found Mr. Leinsdorf's "Pastoral" too matter-of-fact for my taste. The symphony was played with unrelenting speed and forward thrust so that even the lovely "at the brook's edge" (second movement) had little relaxation or poetry. This is the opposite type of interpretation from what one remembers of Bruno Walter's. Here was a case where more "spirit of the musiic" and less "letter of the music" might have been desirable.

Erich Leinsdorf

The "Eroica," on the other hand, was given a superb reading. The clarity of the music's texture, even in forte passages, not only showed Mr. Leinsdorf at his best but also what a great body of players are at his command. The Funeral March sounded impressive after the big build-up at the end of the first movement.

The scherzo proved masterly in execution and so were the arresting fugal passages of the wonderful fourth movement, which were admirably articulated. The conductor set himself a nice lilt in some of the measures that lead up to the heroic finale. There was no doubt as to the audience's pleasure in this all-Beethoven offering.

JOURNAL-COURIER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
(M) 32,350
DEC 10 1969

Woolsey Fans Treated By Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra paid its annual visit to New Haven Tuesday night with a full house to greet it in Woolsey Hall. Under the skillful baton of Erich Leinsdorf, the musicians presented a varied program which included a seldom-heard work by Mozart, excerpts from Berg's Opera "Wozzeck" and Beethoven's "Eroica," Symphony No. 3.

Music In Review

The "big" work of the evening was the "Eroica."

With special feeling for the eloquence of the famous Funeral March, Leinsdorf and his men moved majestically through the musical concept of sorrow and then burst into the brilliance of the welcome scherzo movement and the elaborate vibrations which close the work.

Up to a year or so ago the Boston paid New Haven two visits each year, but now it is a single performance in the Woolsey series — an event always looked forward to with relish by music lovers. Tuesday's program was one of the best, a bit of departure from the usual program, but heartily enjoyed.

D.B.J.

Leinsdorf Conducts

Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra captivated an over-capacity audience yesterday night in Woolsey Hall. The highlight of the evening was the performance of Beethoven's "Eroica Symphony Number 3." The concert opened with Mozart's "Overture toThe Abduction from the Serraglio" and was followed by several selections by Alban Berg, featuring Evelyn Lear as Soprano Solo. (There will be a complete review of the performance in tomorrow's NEWS.)

YALE DAILY NEWS
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
(E) 3,200

DEC 10 1969

REGISTER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
(E) 107,575 (S) 125,175

YALE DAILY NEWS
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
(E) 3,200

DEC 11 1969

Reviewer's Stand

Leinsdorf In Woolsey

By RICHARD M. SCHWARTZ

Under the brilliant direction of retired Music Director Erich Leinsdorf, the Boston Symphony Orchestra played competently, solidly and beautifully a diverse program of German music, Tuesday evening in Woolsey Hall.

Also featured in the concert was soprano Evelyn Lear, who sang two difficult excerpts from Berg's "Wozzeck" in addition to his "Altenberg Lieder."

The program opened with a sparkling performance of the Overture to the three-act comic opera "Die Entfuhrung aus dem Serail" K.384 by Mozart.

Leinsdorf is quite at home conducting Mozart opera. His interpretation of the Overture was sprightly and highly spirited, yet relaxed.

Dynamic Contrast

Use of dynamic contrast in the Overture was excellent, and the Orchestra played precisely and in perfect balance.

The presence of percussion instruments, employed by Mozart to establish the Turkish atmosphere of the opera, was highly pronounced and very effective.

The music of Berg comprised the middle section of the concert. The works heard were the five "Altenberg Lieder" Op.4 and excerpts from "Wozzeck" Op.7.

The "Altenberg Lieder" are a series of five brief poems set to music. They are intensely emotional poems, conceived of as a cycle but capable of being played independently of one another.

Miss Lear sung the "Lieder" articulately and emotionally.

"Wozzeck" stands as one of the most important works of the twentieth century. Musically, "Wozzeck" represents a synthesis of Wagnerian music drama with atonality.

The story is one of profound depression. Wozzeck, an ignorant soldier, is a complete victim of his environment.

The three excerpts performed Tuesday included the lullaby scene, the Bible reading scene, and the finale, which featured the voice of William Wright as boy soprano.

Miss Lear was consistently excellent in both her solo scenes. Her voice was intense, well-projected, and was very effective dramatically.

The Orchestra played well, especially in the prelude to the lullaby song, when they sounded like a marching band out of a Kurt Weill score, and in the finale, when the many different musical lines seemed well articulated.

The orchestral highlight of the evening was the performance of Beethoven's Symphony No. 3 Op.55, the "Eroica."

Strings Outstanding

The Boston Symphony's performance of the "Eroica" clearly indicated the superiority of the string section over any other section in the orchestra.

The strings were outstanding in the Scherzo movement in particular.

The Brass, however, especially the Horns were quite dissappointing until the last movement. The Horn trio in the Scherzo seemed out of balance as well as out of style.

Leinsdorf's supurb control of the Orchestra throughout the Symphony is a testimonial to his great skill as a conductor.

New York Post
D. 708,180 SAT. 369,902

DEC 11 1969

NEW YORK POST, THURSDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1969 78

Words and Music

By Harriett Johnson

Leinsdorf Leads Lear in Berg

Composer Alban Berg, conductor Erich Leinsdorf and soprano Evelyn Lear formed a persuasive trio last night for many at the Boston Symphony concert in Philharmonic Hall. For others the all-Berg part of the program before the intermission was puzzling and disconcerting.

"I like modern art but I don't like modern music," one listener said as he went up the aisle at intermission. "This music should be performed in a smaller hall," was another remark.

The Berg works heard were: Three movements from "Lyric Suite," arranged for string orchestra, originally composed as a string quartet, 1926; arranged for string orchestra, '28-'29 . . . Five Altenberg Songs, Op. 4, 1912 . . . Excerpts from the opera, "Wozzeck," composed 1917-21.

Thus the latest in date of composition was 40 years ago. There is no denying the emotional power of the music. It is revealing, however, that after this long a period the style and idiom remain, to some, esoteric.

The lack of a secure harmonic tonal center in all of his later music and the absence of tonality in some of it for whatever reasons, is still unsettling to the listener unaccustomed to a diet of these sounds.

Wozzeck's Hopelessness

Byron once said: "I have learned to love despair," and in a sense, Berg did too. There is a hopelessness in Wozzeck, the paranoid common soldier beaten by life, unable to meet his problems. Eventually he is maddened, murders his mistress, Marie, then drowns.

The music is far more noble than the story. It breathes mystery and melodic sensuousness. Leinsdorf knows its qualities very well and re-created them with a charity and blend of line which made the instrumental fabric a fascinating web of interacting lines.

Miss Lear's singing, both in the songs and in the opera, was stunning. Her voice was suspended for action every moment so that when she took a big leap from one note to another—leaps which could have sounded awkward—instead these came out naturally and easily.

The five short songs, to poems by Peter Altenberg, whose poetry has been called "over-sensitized, benefit in their portrayal of poignant moods by Berg's special genius. The composer's own super-sensitive nature understood depth in human, and subtlety in literary values so that his music vividly heightened the melancholy fantasy of the texts. Miss Lear sang them with quickened imagination and a vocalism reflecting the strangeness of it all.

Leinsdorf's exaggerated podium gestures were distracting, but his projection of the songs was masterful. Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique" Symphony No. 6 in B Minor, Op. 74, closed the program.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 895,505 SUN. 1,445,507

TIMES (M)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
CIRC. 959,600

DEC 11 1969 DEC 12 1969

Boston Symphony Stirs Emotion With Excerpts From 'Wozzeck'

By THEODORE STRONGIN

The atmosphere outside Philharmonic Hall last night was cool and dripping wet with rain. Inside it was dripping wet, too, but not from humidity—from emotion. Inside was the wringing - wet, superintense world of Alban Berg as played by the Boston Symphony led by Erich Leinsdorf and sung by the soprano Evelyn Lear.

Berg, when done at his best, as happened with the orchestra, Mr. Leinsdorf and Miss Lear last night, is a tremendously absorbing composer. The three movements from the "Lyric Suite" for string quartet arranged for orchestra are feverishly lyrical. The five "Altenberg Songs" for soprano and orchestra, rarely heard, are concentrated gems of romanticism.

Miss Lear sang them thrillingly, with full attention to their dense drama. She did the same for three excerpts from Berg's opera "Wozzeck," in which all forces at hand performed with supple agreement.

Mr. Leinsdorf, with his usual care for details of texture, fussed over every inner voice and every minute accent like a worried parent. Berg takes to this treatment.

The orchestra's strings sounded especially all of a piece during the "Lyric Suite" excerpts, which often becomes less individual and more bland when a lot of violins, violas and cellos play it rather than just one man to each part as in the original. Mr. Leinsdorf managed to keep the beautiful, big Boston strings from overwhelming Berg's restlessness and litheness. It was a most sensitive performance.

Tchaikovsky's "Pathétique" Symphony rounded out the evening.

DEC 10 1969

At The Concert

The Boston — And Berg

Erich Leinsdorf brought the Boston Symphony to New Haven Tuesday evening for the third concert in the current Woolsey Hall Series. The featured composer was Alban Berg with his "Five Altenberg Songs, op. 4" and "Excerpts from Wozzeck" appearing on the program. Evelyn Lear, soprano, was the soloist as she will be on Wednesday and Friday evenings when the orchestra repeats these selections in New York's Philharmonic Hall.

The "Altenberg Songs" are over a half century old (1912) yet they must have sounded quite modern to many in the audience. There were the usual grumps issuing from those who cannot abide anything post-Debussy. In actuality, the songs are excessively mild, and not terribly interesting. The orchestra tends to get in the way of the singer, both covering her dynamically and drawing attention from her solo line. Evelyn Lear has the voice for this type of dramatic, often "song-speech", style of music, but she failed to project the poetry, the personality, if you will, of the songs.

* * *

The "Wozzeck" excerpts fared better, and it is better music, matching as it does the intense, deeply tragic, even pathetic tale of a murder-suicide which leaves a child an orphan. The orchestra is even more overpowering here, but because its part is more familiar, and almost Wagnerian in scope, it seems to support the singer rather than vie with her for dominance. Even so, I think this music is best dramatized, the acting, scenery, and lighting would contribute significantly to Berg's intended effect.

As if to mollify any who might have been offended by the Berg, the symphony gave a spirited, sprightly paced "Eroica" after intermission. Beethoven will be much with us this year; his third symphony Tuesday and his ninth coming on Saturday are merely harbingers of a long bicentennial year in 1970.

Leinsdorf seems to enjoy his conducting. He pirouettes athletically, now facing the strings, now the brass, with elbows jutting horizontally and feet spread wide. Only at well spaced moments does one feel that he is really affecting the performance — the Boston musicians would sound extremely well even if someone just got them started. Be that as it may, Leinsdorf has polished the "Eroica" and it did shine brightly on Tuesday, and in fairness, his crisp and often exuberant conducting style is not distracting or offensive.

The concert opened with Mozart' "Overture from the Abduction from the Seraglio" which, being somewhat less familiar, was welcome and illustrated a faddish side of Mozart not commonly noted. His use of drums, cymbols, and triangle to produce a "Turkish" effect was catering to a practice in vogue at the time. Even so, it had the Mozartian charm and grace, and it was cleanly performed.

The long line of disappointed concert-goers waiting for tickets at the box office attests to the popularity and prestige of Boston's superior orchestra. Those of us fortunate enough to have heard it will now have a chance to compare it with both the London Symphony and the Cleveland Orchestra coming in January and February, respectively.

—Harmon Diers

Academy Orchestra Series Features Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, William Steinberg, Music Director, will perform in the Academy Orchestra Series at the Brooklyn Academy of Music on Dec. 11, at 8:30 p.m. Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the program which will include Two Movements from the "Lyric Suite" arranged for string orchestra by Alban Berg, Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 4 in G.Op. 58 with Malcolm Frager, soloist, and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 6 in B Minor, Op. 74, the "Pathetique."

Mr. Keinsdorf's tenure as Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra ended last August after seven years with the Orchestra. After his appearances this week with the Orchestra, Mr. Leinsdorf goes to Amsterdam, where he will conduct the Concertgebouw Orchestra for two months. Later plans include appearances in Milan, Warsaw and London.

Malcolm Frager has appeared with the world's major orchestras and given extensive recital tours in Europe, South America and the Far East. Before his most recent appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Berkshire Festival last August, he gave a series of concerts in Australia.

Future performances in the Academy Orchestra Series are on Thurs., Feb. 5, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Claudio Abbado, conducting, with Alexis Weissenberg, soloist; Thurs., Feb. 26, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Colin Davis, conducting, with Lukas Foss, Bernard Goldberg and Fritz Siegal, soloists.

Starting time for all Orchestra Series performances is 8:30 p.m. Ticket prices are $6.00, $5.00, $4.00, $3.00 and $2.50. Telephone reservations accepted. For further ticket information call the Box Office at the Brooklyn Academy of Music at 783-2434. For special buses and other travel information, call 857-1575

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
KINGS COURIER
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
W. 5,000

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
FLATBUSH LIFE
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
W. 16,000

DEC 13 1969 DEC 13 1969

Miss Lear, Boston Click

NEW YORK—Soprano Evelyn Lear shone with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony, which devoted the first half of their concert at Philharmonic Hall, Dec. 12, to Alban Berg. The second half, which consisted of Tchaikovsky's "Symphony No. 6 (Pathetique)," supplied a real surprise as Leinsdorf drove the warhorse, which has been recorded by the Boston for RCA, to an exciting peak. The third movement even drew heavy applause, which had to be cut short by Leinsdorf's beginning of the Finale.

Miss Lear, who records for Deutsche Grammophon, was in top form and voice as she sang Berg's "Five Altenberg Songs" and three excerpts from "Wozzek." She has recorded the opera for DGG, which next summer gains the Boston, which currently records for RCA. Leinsdorf, who resigned as the Boston's conductor effective this season, superbly conducted his old forces, beginning with Berg's "Three Movements from the 'Lyric Suite' arranged for String Orchestra." FRED KIRBY

DECEMBER 27, 1969, BILLBOARD

BILLBOARD
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 24,000

DAILY NEWS
NEW YORK'S PICTURE NEWSPAPER
D. 2,080,906 SUN. 3,221,849

DEC 27 1969

DEC 12 1969

Bostonians Here

Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a concert at 8:30 p.m. tomorrow at Carnegie Hall.

68.

ABRAHAM & STRAUS

Enjoy

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY TOMORROW NIGHT AT THE BROOKLYN ACADEMY OF MUSIC

Erich Leinsdorf

Malcolm Frager

Erich Leinsdorf
is the conductor . . . and Malcolm Frager,
is the piano soloist

PROGRAM AT 8:30

BERG, ALBAN—Two movements from "Lyric Suite"
BEETHOVEN—Concerto No. 4 in G for Piano and Orchestra
TCHAIKOVSKY—Symphony No. 6 in b minor "Pathetique"

Although Erich Leinsdorf is no longer music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, his guest appearance with that organization tomorrow night at The Brooklyn Academy of Music will delight local concert-goers. (By the way, this is the 82nd season that the Boston orchestra has appeared at the Brooklyn Academy!) Malcolm Frager, asuperb pianist, who has played as soloist with the world's major orchestras, has also done recital tours in Europe, South America, Asia and Australia. This will indeed be an evening to remember!

Tickets available at the box-office:
$6 Orchesta; $5, $4 Mezzanine; $3, 2.50 Balcony
For further information, call ST 3-2434

The Brooklyn Academy of Music is at 30 Lafayette Avenue . . . it is a department of The Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, which also operates the Brooklyn Museum, Children's Museum, and Botanic Garden.

FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE ZEITUNG

Mittwoch, 31. Dezember 1969 / Nr. 306 / Seite 11

Gastspiele und Debüts

Bemerkenswertes aus New Yorker Konzertsälen

Die New Yorker Carnegie Hall setzt in diesem Winter ihr „International Festival of Visiting Orchestras" fort und bringt hervorragende Ensembles und Dirigenten in die Stadt. [illegible] harmonisch beendet (er wird im Frühjahr nochmals auf vier Wochen kommen). Es gab u. a. Beethovens Neunte und Mahlers Sechste, die Wiedergaben [illegible] von minutiöser Klarheit und

Director Steinberg Sidelined

On doctors' orders William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has relinquished conducting some of his previously scheduled programs. One is the concert this evening at Veterans Memorial Auditorium.

The concert will be led by the orchestra's new assistant conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas, with the program altered somewhat. It opens with the prelude to Wagner's "Die Meistersinger" and Charles Ives' "Three Places in New England".

A work originally planned for this evening, Robert Starer's concerto for violin, cello and orchestra, follows. Joseph Silverstein and Jules Eskin are the soloists. "La Mer," by Debussy, brings the concert to a close.

BULLETIN
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
(E) 150,032

JAN 15 1970

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
(S) 208,349

JAN 11 1970

New England Newsclip

Insights and Outsights

By EDWIN SAFFORD

'Manfred'—a fresh horse from a tired stable

WE KNOW ALL too well orchestras have not given up Tchaikovsky. Audiences will not allow it. So William Steinberg will conduct his Manfred Symphony with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Thursday evening at Veterans Auditorium.

Yet there are numbers of music lovers who would just as soon chuck most of his works right out the window. They are tired to death of those last three symphonies and particularly of over-roasted chestnuts such as the 1812 Overture and the Marche Slav. They say there is no relevance in such composition in this post-serial, electronic age.

That is why conductors from Toscanini on down have looked for lesser performed works, Manfred, for instance. What this serves to do is convince us over again there were things in Tchaikovsky we need not feel ashamed of having loved way back when.

Manfred, like Schumann's score of the same name, is based on the poetic drama by Lord Byron. Nothing could be more 19th century gothic than its Faustian theme of an accursed tempest-tossed hero who makes a pact with the devil.

It may be worth remarking that Tchaikovsky, nearly at the end of that century (1885), was still using materials dear to the hearts of its first half. This is one reason he is hard to take seriously today. He dated himself so completely with his time modernists find him tiresome and even trivial.

Time has passed some more now, however. We are beginning to give the romantics a fresh eye and a fresh ear. Although it still is difficult to sit through most of the same old war horses, there are enjoyments to be discovered elsewhere.

Manfred is one. Has nobody choreographed this four-movement symphonic poem? Certainly there is continued interest, as evidenced by the popularity of John Cranko's Eugene Onegin, for the Stuttgart Ballet, which uses a lot of obscure Tchaikovsky.

But no record of a danced Manfred is to be found at quick glance. That is most surprising because the work is tailor-made for a romantic ballet. Examine a synopsis if you want proof.

The first section does not hedge in the slightest to proclaim despair with its opening chords. The entirety depicts Manfred's tormented soul rather than action from the drama, darkly and broodingly.

Movement two is a prime example of the 19th century affection for the fabulous. Manfred flings a handful of Alpine water into the air and the Fairy of the Alps appears, briefly, to interrupt his loneliness.

In part three, a pastorale of sorts, Manfred solitarily observes the Jungfrau at dawn. The finale has a bacchanal (not in Byron), a vision of the hero's unattainable beloved, Astarte, and his ultimate payment of death.

With orchestral coloring which suggests the Victorian age's garnet reds, plum purples and rich browns, you just cannot get this kind of music any better. It is not perfect, having the usual Tchaikovsky chains of echo writing for development. But it does have his genius for melody and emotionally dramatic climaxes.

Thus, in its own way Manfred is grand. We can be very thankful for it as a replacement for the Pathetique in concert halls and, perhaps, Swan Lake in ballet theater. Who could ask for anything more?

* * *

FRANCIS MADEIRA, music director of the Rhode Island Philharmonic Orchestra, is not often heard as a pianist. But that is what he started out to be, and as a fellowship student at Julliard he trained for a concert career with Olga Samaroff Stokowski.

In fact Maestro Madeira made the first televised piano recital in the U.S. back in 1941. And beside solo work, he has been accompanist to his wife, Jean Madeira, on tours of this country.

Friday evening, with the Philharmonic's Youth Orchestra, under Joseph Conte's direction, the conductor-pianist will perform Mendelssohn's G minor concerto. This annual winter concert, at Veterans Auditorium, is sponsored, as it has been for the past 10 years, by the Outlet Company. Tickets are free and available at each of the Outlet stores.

* * *

CODAS: Rhode Islander JOSEPH CONTI, a student at New England Conservatory, will have a joint percussion recital in Jordan Hall, Boston, Feb. 11 with Linday Raymond. . . . OPERA COMPANY of Boston announces soprano PHYLLIS CURTIN will sing Senta in Wagner's The Flying Dutchman, its first 1970 production, on Jan. 28. Others in the cast include Thomas Stewart and Giorgio Tozzi.

68.

ABRAHAM & STRAUS

Enjoy

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY TOMORROW NIGHT AT THE BROOKLYN ACADEMY OF MUSIC

Erich Leinsdorf

Malcolm Frager

Erich Leinsdorf
is the conductor . . . and Malcolm Frager,
is the piano soloist

PROGRAM AT 8:30

BERG, ALBAN—Two movements from "Lyric Suite"
BEETHOVEN—Concerto No. 4 in G for Piano and Orchestra
TCHAIKOVSKY—Symphony No. 6 in b minor "Pathetique"

Although Erich Leinsdorf is no longer music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, his guest appearance with that organization tomorrow night at The Brooklyn Academy of Music will delight local concert-goers. (By the way, this is the 82nd season that the Boston orchestra has appeared at the Brooklyn Academy!) Malcolm Frager, asuperb pianist, who has played as soloist with the world's major orchestras, has also done recital tours in Europe, South America, Asia and Australia. This will indeed be an evening to remember!

Tickets available at the box-office:
$6 Orchesta; $5, $4 Mezzanine; $3, 2.50 Balcony
For further information, call ST 3-2434

The Brooklyn Academy of Music is at 30 Lafayette Avenue . . . it is a department of The Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, which also operates the Brooklyn Museum, Children's Museum, and Botanic Garden.

FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE ZEITUNG

Mittwoch, 31. Dezember 1969 / Nr. 302 / Seite 11

Gastspiele und Debüts

Bemerkenswertes aus New Yorker Konzertsälen

Die New Yorker Carnegie Hall setzt in diesem Winter ihr „International Festival of Visiting Orchestras" fort und bringt hervorragende Ensembles und Dirigenten in die Stadt. Besonders gefeiert wurde zuletzt Rudolf Kempe mit dem Royal Philharmonic Orchestra. Vor Jahren lernte New York Kempe als einen ausgezeichneten Operndirigenten (Wagner, Strauss) kennen. Das Wiedersehen mit ihm als Leiter eines symphonischen Konzerts brachte ihm bei Hörern und Presse einen Erfolg, der als einzigartig zu bezeichnen ist. Die New York Times schrieb: „Er ist ein Meister — ein Dirigent mit Kontrolle und Gehör, ein schöpferischer Musiker." Kempe war in New York als Orchesterdirigent unbekannt. Ein weiteres Konzert brachte Erich Leinsdorf als Gastdirigenten des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters. Nach Mahlers Dritter Symphonie gab es die Achte von Bruckner. Bernstein hatte bis jetzt lediglich die Neunte gedeutet. [illegible] in der letzten Zeit [illegible] Bruckner sich hier durchgesetzt, früher klagte die Presse über die Länge der Sätze, und das Publikum [illegible]. Jetzt sind die Konzerte mit Symphonien von Bruckner ausverkauft, und jüngere Generation [illegible] Musikkritiker rühmt die mystische Tiefe und den [illegible] reißenden Jubel dieser Musik.

George Szell hat seine ersten [illegible] Wochen als Leiter der New York Philharmoniker beendet (er wird im Frühjahr nochmals auf vier Wochen kommen). Es gab u. a. Beethovens Neunte und Mahlers Sechste; die Wiedergaben waren von minuziöser Klarheit und vollendeter Technik.

Hervorzuheben ist auch der Klavierabend des amerikanischen Pianisten William Masseros in Carnegie Hall, der eine neue Form des Musikangebots zu erproben schien. Es gab fünf, durch Pausen getrennte Abschnitte des Programms. Das Konzert begann mit Musik von Rudhyar und Ives, vierzig Minuten später folgten Werke von Webern, Copland und Ben Weber; dann gab es Schumanns Davidsbündlertänze, gefolgt von Saties „Sports et Divertissements", nach der letzten Pause konnte man schließlich noch Chopins f-Moll-Konzert hören. Viele Hörer erschienen [illegible] Beethovens Konzerte, das als solches gut [illegible] war und den Hörer [illegible] und auf alle Fälle [illegible] bekannt [illegible].

Außerhalb gab es noch das New-[illegible] Kammerensemble Collegium [illegible] Konzertsaal Colgate [illegible] sich in der [illegible] Hall im Lincoln Center [illegible] das Quartett [illegible] Tons in Werken von Bach, Beethoven und [illegible] einen schönen Abend.

WALTER STRAUSS

Director Steinberg Sidelined

On doctors' orders William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has relinquished conducting some of his previously scheduled programs. One is the concert this evening at Veterans Memorial Auditorium.

The concert will be led by the orchestra's new assistant conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas, with the program altered somewhat. It opens with the prelude to Wagner's "Die Meistersinger" and Charles Ives' "Three Places in New England".

A work originally planned for this evening, Robert Starer's concerto for violin, cello and orchestra, follows. Joseph Silverstein and Jules Eskin are the soloists. "La Mer," by Debussy, brings the concert to a close.

JOURNAL PROVIDENCE R.I.
JAN 1970
New England Newsclip

Insights and Outsights

By EDWIN SAFFORD

'Manfred'—a fresh horse from a tired stable

WE KNOW ALL too well orchestras have not given up Tchaikovsky. Audiences will not allow it. So William Steinberg will conduct his Manfred Symphony with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Thursday evening at Veterans Auditorium.

Yet there are numbers of music lovers who would just as soon chuck most of his works right out the window. They are tired to death of those last three symphonies and particularly of over-roasted chestnuts such as the 1812 Overture and the Marche Slav. They say there is no relevance in such composition in this post-serial, electronic age.

That is why conductors from Toscanini on down have looked for lesser performed works, Manfred, for instance. What this serves to do is convince us over again there were things in Tchaikovsky we need not feel ashamed of having loved way back when.

Manfred, like Schumann's score of the same name, is based on the poetic drama by Lord Byron. Nothing could be more 19th century gothic than its Faustian theme of an accursed tempest-tossed hero who makes a pact with the devil.

It may be worth remarking that Tchaikovsky, nearly at the end of that century (1885), was still using materials dear to the hearts of its first half. This is one reason he is hard to take seriously today. He dated himself so completely with his time modernists find him tiresome and even trivial.

Time has passed some more now, however. We are beginning to give the romantics a fresh eye and a fresh ear. Although it still is difficult to sit through most of the same old war horses, there are enjoyments to be discovered elsewhere.

Manfred is one. Has nobody choreographed this four-movement symphonic poem? Certainly there is continued interest, as evidenced by the popularity of John Cranko's Eugene Onegin, for the Stuttgart Ballet, which uses a lot of obscure Tchaikovsky.

But no record of a danced Manfred is to be found at quick glance. That is most surprising because the work is tailor-made for a romantic ballet. Examine a synopsis if you want proof.

The first section does not hedge in the slightest to proclaim despair with its opening chords. The entirety depicts Manfred's tormented soul rather than action from the drama, darkly and broodingly.

Movement two is a prime example of the 19th century affection for the fabulous. Manfred flings a handful of Alpine water into the air and the Fairy of the Alps appears, briefly, to interrupt his loneliness.

In part three, a pastorale of sorts, Manfred solitarily observes the Jungfrau at dawn. The finale has a bacchanal (not in Byron), a vision of the hero's unattainable beloved, Astarte, and his ultimate payment of death.

With orchestral coloring which suggests the Victorian age's garnet reds, plum purples and rich browns, you just cannot get this kind of music any better. It is not perfect, having the usual Tchaikovsky chains of echo writing for development. But it does have his genius for melody and emotionally dramatic climaxes.

Thus, in its own way Manfred is grand. We can be very thankful for it as a replacement for the Pathetique in concert halls and, perhaps, Swan Lake in ballet theater. Who could ask for anything more?

* * *

FRANCIS MADEIRA, music director of the 19th century affection for the Rhode Island Philharmonic Orchestra, is not often heard as a pianist. But that is what he started out to be, and as a fellowship student at Julliard he trained for a concert career with Olga Samaroff Stokowski.

In fact Maestro Madeira made the first televised piano recital in the U.S. back in 1941. And beside solo work he has been accompanist to his wife, Jean Madeira, on tours of this country.

Friday evening, with the Philharmonic's Youth Orchestra, under Joseph Conte's direction, the conductor [illegible] will perform Mendelssohn's G[illegible] concerto. This annual [illegible] at Veterans Auditorium, is [illegible], as it has been for the past [illegible] by the Outlet Company. Tickets are free and available at each of the outlet stores.

* * *

CODAS: Rhode Islander JOSEPH CONTI, a student at New England Conservatory, will have a joint percussion recital in Jordan Hall, Boston, Feb. 11 with Linday Raymond. [illegible] OPERA COMPANY of Boston announces soprano PHYLLIS CURTIN will sing Senta in Wagner's The Flying Dutchman, its first 1970 production, on Jan. 28. Others in the cast include Thomas Stewart and George Tozzi.

Music Last Night

Hub Symphony Orchestra Conducted by Assistant

By EDWIN SAFFORD

Michael Tilson Thomas is the Boston Symphony Orchestra's new assistant conductor this year. More than once he has stepped in for William Steinberg, the orchestra's music director, owing to the latter's indisposition. Last evening Mr. Thomas did it again, at Veterans auditorium and under the same circumstances.

Although this meant changing the program more than a little, a disappointment for not being able to hear what Mr. Steinberg might deliver, there must have been few saddened hearts at the end. The younger man has an enormous amount of spirit and personality to offer.

The one scheduled work he included was Robert Starer's double concerto for violin and cello in which Joseph Silverstein and Jules Eskin were the soloists. Everything else was changed from previous plans for this third concert of the orchestra's Providence series.

Mr. Thomas' performance, of course, held the greatest interest, if only because it was his local debut. His assurance was all the time keenly evident. The podium manner he displays is not unrestrained, but it has few wasted gestures and he appears to be on top of what he expects all the time.

This made the prelude to Wagner's "Die Meistersinger," Charles Ives' "Three Places in New England" and "La Mer" of Debussy, the only work conducted without baton, all well proportioned. The concert opened with considerable impact and ending having impetus.

"La Mer," for example, was given a coloristic treatment that never showed a sign of dreamy mushiness. Details in the orchestration were most distinct, yet in a way that was impressionistically right. The whole thing fused, in other words, in its accumulated points.

The Starer concerto was given as careful a treatment. On first hearing in live concert it does not leave too strong an impression. Its effects are contemporary enough as it is tight thematically, almost constricted.

But its substance is not. The roots go right down to the 19th century, via brief suggestions of William Walton at one section. Joseph Silverstein and Jules Eskin played the piece with full bodied tone, each of them. This is the only manner for it, obviously, and they did not hesitate.

The big news of the evening, however, remains Michael Tilson Thomas. We may hope he will be assigned the final concert of the season here as well, and as scheduled, just to prove the good impression he leaves is correct.

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
(S) 208,349
New England Newsc
JAN 16 1970

TIMES
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
(E) 38,693
JAN 16 1970

Young Assistant Conductor Spurs Boston Symphony

Michael Tilson Thomas, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the absence of William Steinberg, directed the orchestra in a stirring concert Thursday evening in Veterans Memorial Auditorium.

Featured in the program were Joseph Silverstein, principal violinist, and Jules Eskin, cellist, in Starer's "Concerto for Violin, Cello and Orchestra," an ultra modern work that was marked (some said marred) by solid thuds of percussion, fragments of non-melody and an air of competition between the featured artists while the remaining 100 instruments shouted their own cheers and jeers. From the outset, the listeners' ears waited expectantly for the slightest bits of lyricism, and at the closing phrase, they were still waiting.

The more musical works remaining were brilliantly guided by the masterful direction and phrasing of Mr. Thomas who presented one of the finest performances of Debussy's "La Mer: trois esquisses symphoniques" it has been my good fortune to enjoy. The brilliance of the imagery in "Dawn to noon on the sea" was dazzlingly bright and merry and led to "Jeux de vagues" (playing on the waves) depicting in flowing and surging sound the chop of "whitecaps," the break of the rollers, the reach of the waves and the receding rush of foam. He climaxed this beautiful pictorial imagery with "Dialogue between the wind and the sea" with the deep-voiced ocean answering the piercing shrillness of the wind until, tiring, each subsided into the calm smoothness of both.

Another work, "Three places in New England" by Ives was three musical pictures, the St. Gauden's statue of Colonel Shaw and his colored regiment, that was heroic in mood; General Putnam's Camp at Reddington, Conn., a martial rhythm with themes like "Yankee Doodle" augmented and decorated to sound like the half-time show in the Rose Bowl, and the scenic pastorale, "From the Hoosatonic to Stockbridge."

The opening work, Wagner's "Prelude to Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg" completed a program of superlative music played by this superb orchestra under the inspired hands of a young musical genius.

C.H.L.

Journal-Providence 1-23-70

Housekeeping Note

The Journal's editorial page on November 13 last noted, not in ire but with charmed amusement, a trifling phenomenon observed at the November concert here of the Boston Symphony. It was a good concert and the band was led by an athlete named Carlo Maria Giulini, a guest conductor who, especially during the Ravel-Moussorgsky Pictures at an Exhibition, stamped about the podium with such vigor that he whomped up a dust storm. To whoever has charge of such matters, we suggested that maybe a vacuum cleaner could be used before the next concert.

Well, the next concert was just the other evening. The leader was an able youngster, Michael Tilson Thomas. He didn't tromp around on the podium with the elan of Maestro Giulini, but his footwork was sufficient to raise some dust from the podium carpeting if there had been any. There were no motes among the notes. Bravo. The January concert was an example of superb musicianship—and good housekeeping.

Brooklyn Academy of Music

CHORALE SOCIETY—Brooklyn Philharmonia. Meets at the Academy every Tues. at 7:45 p.m. Sidney Landau, director; Sidney Morrow, Asst. Conductor. Concerts planned. Interested invited to attend rehearsals. No. adm.

BROOKLYN PHILHARMONIA. 16th consecutive season. Siegfried Landau, conductor. Jan. 17 - all Beethoven program, featuring the Beaux Arts Trio. Feb. 21, violinist John Pintavalle as soloist. March 14 -"The Creation" by Haydn. May 9 (in Philharmonic Hall, Lincoln Center) - pianist Lili Kraus as guest soloist. For information, call ST 3-0482.

B'KLYN MUSIC TEACHERS GUILD—meetings in the Art Room of the Academy. Thurs., Jan. 22, 10 a.m., guest speaker - Burt Konowitz. Feb. 19, 10 a.m., guest speaker - Dennis Agay. March 19, 10 a.m., Edith Kornfeld, pianist and teacher; April 16, 10 a.m., Hilda Novick speaking on "Israeli Music." May 21, 10 a.m., Paula Stark, singer. Public invited to all sessions. No adm. charge.

ORCHESTRA SERIES. Thurs., Feb. 5, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Claudio Abbado, conducting; Alexis Weissenberg, soloist Thurs., Feb. 26, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Colin Davis, conducting; Ingrid Haebler, soloist. Thurs., April 16, Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, Lukas Foss conducting; soloists Lukas Foss, Bernard Goldberg, Fritz Siegal. 8:30 p.m. events. Call ST 3-6700.

LUNCHEON-LECTURE SERIES, sponsored by the Friends of the B'klyn Academy. "The Performing Arts." Jan. 16- Clive Barnes on Dance. Feb. 13 - William Woodruff on opera. March 13- Henry Butler on the creation of "Mourning Becomes Electra." April 10- Michael Kutza on films. Call 783-6700 ext. 18.

MERCE CUNNINGHAM and Dance Co.—final entry in Festival of Dance, Thurs., Jan. 15, 8:45 p.m. - Theatre Event - total "Canfield." Fri., Jan. 16, 8:30 p.m., "New Work I," "Crises," "New Work II." All performances in Opera House. Information: 783-6700.

CHELSEA THEATER CENTER—resident theater company of the Academy. 2nd season. Third Theatre. "The Brass Butterfly," a special production project. Fri. & Sat., Jan. 23, 24, 30, 31. Third Theatre. 8:30 p.m. Adm.-donation $1.50. Reservations-783-5111.

LITTLE ORCHESTRA SOCIETY — Sun., Jan. 25, 2:30 p.m., Opera House. Two atmospheric English operas - Holst's "At the Boar's Head" and Vaughan - Williams' "Riders to the Sea." General adm. - $2.00.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EAST SIDE NEWS
W. - CIRC. N. AVAIL.
JAN 30 1970

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
KINGS COURIER
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
W. 5,000
JAN 31 1970

Affado Conducts Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, William Steinberg, Music Director, will perform in the Academy Orchestra Series at the Brooklyn Academy of Music on Feb. 5, at 8:30 PM. Claudio Abbado will conduct the program which will include Donatoni's Puppenspiel (Puppet Show) No. 2 for flute, piccolo and orchestra with Doriot Anthony Dwyer, soloist; Bartok's Piano Concerto No. 2 with Alexis Weissenberg, soloist; and Schumann's Symphony No. 4 in D minor, Op. 120.

Born in Milan, Claudio Abbado attended the Berkshire Music Center, the summer academy maintained by the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood, during the summers of 1958 and 1959. As a scholarship student he studied conducting under Eleazar de Carvahlo and was awarded the Serge Koussevitzky Memorial Award for the outstanding conductor during the summer of 1958. In 1963 Mr. Abbado won the Dimitri Mitropoulos Competition in New York for which he conducted the New York Philharmonic. Since then he has conducted widely in the United States and Europe.

Alexis Weissenberg, born in Bulgaria, has apeared as soloist with most major orchestras including the Berlin Philharmonic, Philadelphia Orchestra, de Paris, Vienna Symphony, Royal Philharmonic, Bayerische Rundfunk and Milan's La Scala Orchestra.

Future performances in Academy Orchestra Series are on Thursday, February 26, 1970, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Colin Davis, conducting with Ingrid Haebler, soloist; Thursday, April 16, 1970, Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, Lukas Foss, conducting, with Lukas Foss, Bernard Goldberg and Fritz Siegal, soloists.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
BAY NEWS
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
W. 14,000
JAN 31 1970

Boston Symphony In Academy Series

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, William Steinberg, Music Director, will perform in the Academy Orchestra Series at the B'klyn Academy of Music on Feb. 5 at 8:30 p.m. Claudio Abbado will conduct the program which will include Donatoni's Puppenspiel (Puppet Show) No. 2 for flute, piccolo and orchestra with Dorlot Anthony Dwyer, soloist; Bartok's Piano Concerto No. 2 with Alexis Weissenberg, soloist; and Schumann's Symphony No. 4 in D, minor, Op.120.

Born in Milan, Claudio Abbado attended the Berkshire Music Center, the summer academy maintained by the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood, during the summers of 1958 and 1959. As a scholarship student, he studied conducting under Eleazar de Carvahlo and was awarded the Serge Koussevitzky Memorial Award for the outstanding conductor during the summer of 1958. In 1969, Mr. Abbado won the Dimitri Mitropoulos Competition in New York for which he conducted the New York Philharmonic. Since then, he has conducted widely in the United States and Europe.

Alexis Weissenberg, born in Bulgaria, has appeared as soloist with most major orchestras including the Berlin Philharmonic, Philadelphia Orchestra, Orchestre de Paris, Vienna Symphony, Royal Philharmonic, Bayerische Rundfunk and Milan's LaScala Orchestra.

Future performances in the Academy Orchestra Series are on Thurs., Feb. 26, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Colin Davis conducting, with Ingrid Haebler, soloist; Thurs., Apr. 16, Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, Lukas Foss conducting with Lukas Foss, Bernard Goldberg, and Fritz Siegal, soloists.

Starting time for all Orchestra Series performances is 8:30 p.m. Ticket prices are $6, $5, $4, $3, and $2.50. Student tickets at $1 each are available oxe half hour before curtain with student I.D. card. Telephone reservations are accepted. For further ticket information, call the Box Office at the Academy at 783-2434. For special buses and other travel information, call 875-1575.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
BROOKLYN HEIGHTS PRESS
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
W. 3,000
JAN 29 1970

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, William Steinberg, Music Director, will perform in the Academy Orchestra Series at the Brooklym Academy of Music, 30 Lafayette Ave., on Thurs., Feb. 5, at 8:30 p.m. Claudio Abbado will conduct the program which will include Donatoni's Puppenspeil (Puppet Show) No. 2 for flute, piccolo, and orchestra with Doriot Anthony Dwyer, soloist; Bartok's Piano Concerto No. 2 with Alexis Weissenberg, soloist; and Schumann's Symphony No. 4 in D minor, Op. 120.

Starting time for all Orchestra Series performances is 8:30. Ticket prices are $6, $5, $4, $3 and $2.50.

New York Post
D. 708,180 SAT. 399,902
JAN 28 1970

Boston Symphony In Brooklyn

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will perform in the Academy Orchestra Series at the Brooklyn Academy of Music Feb. 5 at 8:30 p.m. with Claudio Abbado conducting a program of works by Donatoni, Bartok and Schumann.

Concert on Way

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Claudio Abbado, will be on hand at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, 30 Lafayette Ave., on Thurs., Feb. 5, 8:30 p.m., in the Opera House. Soloist for the night will be Alexis Weissenberg. For information, call ST 3-6700.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
FLATBUSH LIFE
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
W. 16,000
JAN 24 1970

BROOKLYN CANARSIE DIGEST
Saturday, January 24, 1970

BROOKLYN KINGS COURIER
Saturday, January 24, 1970

BROOKLYN KINGS COURIER
Saturday, January 17, 1970

BROOKLYN CANARSIE DIGEST
Saturday, January 17, 1970

N. Y. EAST SIDE NEWS
Friday, January 30, 1970

Two Programs At Carnegie Hall

Friday, Feb. 6, 1970, 8:30 P.M. Carnegie Recital Hall. The Junior Mance Trio. Opening concert of the series, "Jazz—The Personal Dimnsion." All sats: $3. Tickts available in advance at Carnegie Hall box office or, on night of concert, at Carnegie Recital Hall box office.

Saturday, Feb. 7, 1970, 8:30 P.M. Carnegie Hall. Boston Symphony Orchestra ,Claudio Abbado, conducting. Third concert in the Boston Symphony Orchestra Series. Remaining sats: $7.50, $7.00, $6.00, $4.50, $3.50. Tickets available at Carnegie Hall box office.

70

Trenton Evening Times
TRENTON, N. J.
D. 81,853

JAN 30 1970

Boston Symphony To Perform

Rutgers Opens 2d Concert Season

NEW BRUNSWICK — The second half of the 1969-70 concert season at Rutgers University will begin next week with the opening performances of the popular "Jazz —the Personal Dimension" series Tuesday on Feb. 3 and another annual festival of music by the Princeton Chamber Orchestra, Wednesday, Feb. 4.

Both series are among the highlights of the concert season that will also include a major performance April 2 of Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of William Steinberg, and the Rutgers University Choir.

See notices on p. 73

Subscriptions are currently available for the four-part jazz program and the three-part Festival of Three Cities from the University Concerts Office, 542 George St., this city. Deadline for buying a jazz subscription is Feb. 2, while the Festival subscription drive closes Feb. 3. Concerts begin at 8:30 p.m.

The Junior Mance Trio will open the Jazz series Tuesday in Kirkpatrick Chapel. Headed by Pianist Mance, the trio includes Martin Rivera on the bass and Oliver Jackson on drums.

A Chicagoan, Mance began his career backing such artists as Charlie Parker, Coleman Hawkins and Lester Young. Later he worked with vocalist Dinah Washington and with the "Cannonball" Adderly quintet. After touring with the Dizzy Gillespie band and a stint with the Eddie Davis-Johnny Griffin quintet, Mance formed his own group and toured as accompanist to singer Joe Williams.

WILLIAM STEINBERG

The Princeton Chamber Orchestra, which will also perform in Kirkpatrick Chapel, opens its third annual festival at Rutgers. The series will salute the music of Vienna, London and Paris in successive concerts.

The opener will highlight Vienna with a nod toward Budapest. Assisted by pianist Evelyne Crochet, the orchestra will play Mozart's Divertimento in D Major, Bartok's Divertimento, five German dances by Schubert, and Mozarts's Concerto in A Major, all under the direction of Nicholas Harsanyi.

Remaining events in the jazz series are the Herbie Hancock Sextet March 3; the Freddie Hubbard Sextet March 31; and the Jaki Byard Quartet April 28. The Princeton ensemble will salute London Feb. 18 and Paris March 11.

Music: Boston Symphony

TIMES (M)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
CIRC. 959,600

FEB 6 1970

Abbado Gives Hearing to Donatoni Novelty

By HAROLD C. SCHONBERG

WEBERN's Five Pieces for orchestra had been scheduled, but Franco Donatoni's "Puppenspiel" No. 2 instead turned up. Claudio Abbado, guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Wednesday night in Philharmonic Hall, made the last-minute substitution.

Mr. Donatoni is a 43-year-old Italian composer of the post-Webern, as they say, persuasion. His "Puppenspiel" (puppet show) is scored for flute, piccolo and small orchestra. It is one of those let's-re-examine-our-resources kind of piece, making vague noises, occasionally breaking out of pianissimo patterns, and much too thin for its 12 minutes.

But it does have a virtuoso part for flute and piccolo, both played by the admirable Doriot Anthony Dwyer of the Boston Symphony. In this "Puppenspiel" the old "Dies Irae," for some reason, pops up toward the end. Add it to your list of pieces, from the Berlioz "Fantastique" on, that make use of the theme.

•

The big excitement of the evening came with Bartók's Piano Concerto No. 2, played by Alexis Weissenberg. This concerto does not turn up very often, and one wonders why. It has drive and color, a lot of flashy piano work, and all the ingredients for popular success. Bartók at this stage of his career had not broken entirely free from Stravinsky primitivism, and this work has echoes of "Petrouchka" and "Le Sacre," especially the "Russian Dance" of the former. But it is a Magyar Petrouchka that is heard here, full of Bartók's particular kind of driving rhythm and nationalistic melodies.

The Program

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Claudio Abbado conducting, with Alexis Weissenberg, piano. At Philharmonic Hall.

Puppenspiel No. 2 ..... Donatoni
Piano Concerto No. 2 ..... Bartok
Symphony No. 4 ..... Schumann

It would be hard to imagine a more athletic, sinewy performance than the one Mr. Weissenberg played. He is very successful in music like this, where his wonderful hands can create clear patterns, and where he does not feel the need to pause and reflect. There was never a doubt that he was complete master of the concerto. The playing had a combination of finesse and power, smoothness and elegance. At one point there was the fastest, most evenly articulated trill heard since the days of Levitzki or Lhevinne.

Mr. Abbado gave Mr. Weissenberg an alert collaboration in the concerto, and then the conductor was on his own in the Schumann D minor Symphony. This he conducted very well, in a traditional manner without much of a feeling of personality. Everything went logically and in the first movement warmly, but Mr. Abbado has not as yet put his mark on the music.

•

Perhaps he was wise to avoid too much personal involvement. The Schumann D minor Symphony has many pitfalls, and only the most experienced conductors can take liberties with it and yet retain its structure. Mr. Abbado is a talented conductor who sounds more mature each time he turns up, and he eventually will get to the point where he will be able to filter Schumann's personality through his own vision and instincts. In the meantime, this performance can stand as a faithful, literal reading, one in which the Boston Symphony followed him faithfully to the wire.

DAILY NEWS
NEW YORK'S PICTURE NEWSPAPER
D. 2,080,906 SUN. 3,221,849

FEB 7 1970

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will perform at Carnegie Hall at 8:30 tonight. Claudio Abbada will conduct.

NEW YORK NEWS
Sunday, February 8, 1970

Bostonians Here

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will appear at Carnegie Hall at 8:30 p.m. Saturday.

The Record
HACKENSACK, N. J.
D. & SUN. 147,484

FEB 17 1970

Boston Symphony Is Due Feb. 24

HACKENSACK — The Boston Symphony Orchestra will perform at Orrie deNooyer Auditorium Feb. 24 as part of the Fairleigh Dickinson University concert series.

Guest conductor Colin Davis will present Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony and Sir Michael Tippett's Second Symphony, which the Boston orchestra will premiere in this country Friday in Boston.

The same program will be repeated the following three days at Philharmnic Hall of Lincoln gcenter.

At the Brooklyn Academy Feb. 26, and Feb. 28 at Carnegie Hall, pianist Ingrid Haebler will be the soloist in another program featuring Mozart's Piano Concerto in D, Mozart's Idomeneo overture, and Elgar's Symphony No. 1.

The Carnegie Hall appearance Feb. 28 will be part of the Festival of Visiting Orchestras.

The Fairleigh Dickinson University concert was arranged by John Harms of Englewood.

RIDGEWOOD, N. J.
HERALD-NEWS
(NEWARK-NYC MARKET AREA)
W. 16,000

FEB 19 1970

Boston Symphony Will Perform In Hackensack

The Boston Symphony, conducted by Colin Davis, British conductor, will appear Tuesday at 8:30 p. m. at the Orrie de Nooyer Hall in Hackensack.

This is the third offering of the Fairleigh Dickinson University concert series, under the direction of John Harms and the third appearance of the Boston Symphony in Bergen County.

The program will consist of the five cherzo a la Russe by Stravinsky, Symphony No. 2 by Michael Tippett, the British composer, and the Fourth Symphony of Tchaikovsky.

Born in Weybridge, Surrey, Colin Davis studied at the Royal College of Music in London, then joined the profession as a clarinetist. He first conducted the Kalmar Orchestra, then the Chelsea Opera Group. Davis is now a frequent visitor to the United States, and has conducted the orchestras of Philadelphia, Montreal, Toronto, Los Angeles, and

COLIN DAVIS

New York, as well as at the Metropolitan Opera. He becomes musical director of the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, in the fall of '71. Davis records for the Philips label, and appears with the Boston Symphony for the third successive season.

For 17 years John Harms brought his chorus to Town Hall and Carnegie Hall for performances of Verdi's "Requiem," Bach's "St. Matthew Passion," Mendelssohn's "Elijah," the world premiere of Jaromir Weinberger's "Ecclesiastes," as well as programs of general choral literature. Now in its 30th season, the chorus has presented over 300 concerts and well over 1,000 soloists.

In 1958 John Harms brought to Bergen County the Philadelphia Orchestra under the direction of Eugene Ormandy, marking the first appearance of one of the nation's great orchestras in the county.

His full musical schedule at present consists of being director of music at Trinity School (21 years) in New York City; organist and choir director at Christ Episcopal Church, (9 years) in Ridgewood, and at Temple Emanu-El (18 years) in Englewood; director of the Fairleigh Dickinson University Concerts and the John Harms Concerts (22 years); founder and conductor of the John Harms Chorus (30 years); and summer organist and choir director of St. Mary's Episcopal Church at Northeast Harbor, Maine, where he also conducts the Mt. Desert Summer Chorale.

Harms has recently been appointed as director of music at the New York Cultural Center at Columbus Circle in New York City.

Concert Proves Superb

By WILLIAM NEWMAN
Music Reviewer

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Colin Davis gave one of its usual superb concerts last night at Orrie De Nooyer Auditorium in Hackensack. A large audience was lavish in its appreciation of the Fairleigh Dickinson University concert.

Colin Davis has an exceptionally fine group of musicians at his command and he gets the most possible from them by his firm and recognizable beat. A great understanding exists between conductor and orchestra, with both responsive to each other. Their finished product is vibrant, colorful, and penetrating.

Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4 was the big attraction for the evening and bright under the baton of Colin Davis.

His tempi were interesting and a bit on the fast side. He accentuated certain instruments to bring different tones to the fore. The scherzo undulated with shimmering shading and the first two movements were exceedingly smooth and effortless in their power. The finale was developed in such a way to build to a mighty climax.

The second major work was the Symphony No. 2 of Sir Michael Tippett. There was an impetuosity coupled with brilliant flashes of strange harmonics and colorations which never permitted attention to lag. In fact, after listening for a time, it seemed that various motifs stimulated thoughts of many 20th century schools of music. It was all very original and very palatable with romantic overtones.

Opening the evening was a crisp Scherzo a La Russe by Stravinsky.

The Record
HACKENSACK, N. J.
D. & SUN. 147,484

FEB 25 1970

BILLBOARD
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 24,000

MAR 14 1970

Davis Shows His Mastery

NEW YORK—Colin Davis was the masterful conductor of the Boston Symphony at Philharmonic Hall, Feb. 27. The program included Michael Tippett's "Symphony No. 2," which had received its New York premiere two days earlier with Davis and the Boston.

The symphony, which Davis has recorded for Argo Records with the London Symphony, is surprisingly conventional, but has interesting sections, especially in the last two movements. It was played beautifully.

Tchaikovsky's "Symphony No. 4," which the orchestra has recorded under its RCA Records contract, was excellently played as was the opening "Scherzo a la ruse" of Stravinsky. Davis, who now records primarily for Philips, also was boosted in a L'Oiseau Lyre Records program ad by London Records.

FRED KIRBY

New York Post
D. 708,180 SAT. 369,902

71.

FEB 26 1970

Words & Music

HARRIETT JOHNSON

Colin Davis Leads Bostonians

The Boston Symphony's concert on paper last night promised during the first half to be spirited, possibly convivial. Britain's Colin Davis, for the third successive season was guest maestro bringing with him Stravinsky's "Scherzo a la Russe," which the composer wrote originally for a projected film that never materialized.

Sir Michael Tippett's Symphony No. 2 in its first local hearing followed. Tippett's very name suggests something breezy and when the 38-minute piece began, the music took off with zest and clarity. A program note by the composer, however, carried with it a suggestion of foreboding: "I prefer to invent the work's form in as great a detail as I can before I invent any sounds whatsoever."

It would seem that the form of a piece should grow out of the ideas in it and be inspired by them to the point of inevitability which is, in essence, the base of all great musical architecture.

Stravinsky Like Russian Fair

The sense of spontaneity emerges from the feeling the composer gives that every theme goes its way because it can't go any other. This is an illusion which tests the degree of the composer's craft, and of course, more deeply, his art.

Tippett, born in London and a composer of considerable distinction, can arrange pure sound in an engaging manner. His use of the piano in combination with the harp and other instruments was bright and ingenious. But despite the clever orchestration, the development of the symphony's ideas lacked the inventiveness which should have made them lively.

Sammy Davis Jr. heads the twin performances tomorrow at 8:30 and midnight at Carnegie Hall with William B. Williams as emcee, plus Sunday's Child and a 25-piece orchestra conducted by George Rhodes.

Built around reiterated notes inspired by some Vivaldi music long before he wrote the symphony (completed in late 1957), the piece seemed endless and a considerable bore. David and the orchestra played it very well.

Stravinsky's "Scherzo," however, succeeded where Tippett failed. Reminiscent of a portion of "Petrouchka," it retained a pert individuality. Some of the transparent instrumental effects from the harp and piano were similar to those that Tippett used. The "Scherzo's" mood, reminiscent of a Russian Fair, conjured up a picturesque kaleidoscope of sights and sounds.

The program closed with Symphony No. 4 in F Minor by Tchaikovsky. The Bostonians will play tonight in the Brooklyn Academy of Music, tomorrow night in Philharmonic Hall, and Saturday night in Carnegie Hall. At the Brooklyn and Carnegie events, Ingrid Haebler, pianist, will be soloist in two different Mozart Concertos.

SATURDAY REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 443,000

MAR 14 1970

Music: Tippett Premiere

Colin Davis Conducts Briton's Symphony No. 2

By HAROLD C. SCHONBERG

It is expected that British conductors do something about British music, and Colin Davis did not disappoint, last night in Philharmonic Hall. He conducted the Boston Symphony in the New York premiere of Michael Tippett's Symphony No. 2, a half-hour-long work in four movements that was composed in 1947.

Mr. Tippett is one of the older generation of British composers. He was born in 1905, and thus represents a different approach to music than the current Young Turks of the British post-serial movement represent. His most famous work has been an oratorio called "A Child of Our Time." This dates back to 1944 and is a very individual treatment of the baroque form.

But the Second Symphony has none of that personality. It is a logical, bustling, well-written orthodox work, with well-defined tonal centers, which for all the world reminds one of a British Hindemith. This music represents manipulation rather than feeling, and is singularly inexpressive. Lines rise and fall, but there is little feeling of melody; elements are neatly juxtaposed, but there is little feeling of individuality. It is a dry, dry work, with the composer methodically munching on his material.

•

The performance sounded fine, much as one could judge from a first hearing. Mr. Davis is a very sound conductor, as he has demonstrated so many times in the past, and as he immediately demonstrated last night with the opening work, Stravinsky's little "Scherzo à la russe," all four minutes of it. The music itself is unimportant, sounding like a discarded sketch for "Petrouchka," but Mr. Davis conducted it with wonderfully supple rhythm, a good deal of wit and even more color.

The warhorse on the program was the Tchaikovsky Symphony No. 4, and Mr. Davis led this with a great deal of exuberance. It was a very literal reading that he gave, and in some spots in the first movement it was too literal. Here Mr. Davis got involved with defining the rhythmic problems of the text rather than attending to the over-all line, and the interpretation sounded a little picky.

On the whole, though, the symphony received a well-planned and handsomely executed performance. It was a modern kind of approach that Mr. Davis represented, meaning that the rhythms were straightforward and that no liberties were taken with the agogics. Even in places where most conductors—even the young ones—insert a ritard or some kind of expressive device, Mr. Davis went severely along.

What saved the interpretation was the genuine ebullience of the playing — the propulsive rhythm, the carefully built climaxes that sounded big and never hysterical, the drive that pushed the symphony along without altering its shape. Mr. Davis agoin proved that he is the most exciting British conductor to have appeared since the days of Sir Thomas Beecham.

Colin Davis

The Program

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Colin Davis, conductor. At Philharmonic Hall.
Scherzo a la Russe ..... Stravinsky
Symphony No. 2 ..... Tippett
Symphony No. 4 ..... Tchaikovsky

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 875,105 SUN. 1,415,507

FEB 26 1970 & 27

Los Angeles Times CALENDAR, SUNDAY 3-8-70

Youngish Guest Conductors

Meanwhile, at the recently refurbished Philharmonic Hall of Lincoln Center (better sound, uglier decor), the Boston Symphony and New York Philharmonic both play host to youngish guest conductors. Colin Davis coaxes clean, luxurious sounds from the noble Bostonians, and Claudio Abbado stresses elegant theatricality with the New Yorkers.

The Davis program begins with the frisky charm of Stravinsky's four-minute Scherzo à la Russe and ends with a gratefully understated Tchaikovsky Fourth. The raison d'etre for attendance, however, is the New York premiere of Sir Michael Tippett's 13-year-old Second Symphony. It is a conservative, superbly crafted, essentially cerebral essay. The final allegro may be a bit forced, and the lyric expansion of the adagio may seem a bit inhibited, but Tippett's refinement and imagination are striking. His general neglect in America is hard to explain.

Abbado chose an all-Viennese program embracing such interesting disparities as a Mozart concert aria (the ornate "Vorrei spiegarvi o dio"), Berg's "Lulu" Suite, and Bruckner's First Symphony. The orchestra played with exceptional lucidity and fine emotional tension, especially in the Berg. The soprano soloist, Catherine Gayer, a UCLA graduate now active in Germany, brought melting lyricism and a few squeaks in altissimo to the Mozart, dramatic thrust and accuracy to the Berg.

England's Colin Davis celebrated his third year as an adopted cousin of New England by directing the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a Philharmonic Hall visit that beamed particular attention on the Second Symphony of Michael (now Sir Michael) Tippett. Previously unheard in New York, it gradually established a series of identities with other works (including the opera King Priam) heard here and abroad, or from recordings, that defined Tippett as a creator of consistency with a recognizable musical imprint.

No large work of Tippett I have encountered has aroused more than a healthy respect for his command of musical materials and his sense of structure. The Second Symphony sustains consistency in this respect also. Its plan and logic are clearly defined, but the content and substance convey somewhat the aspect of a well-built house still awaiting tenants. Tippett's words in the program book about inventing the work's form before inventing any sounds invite the invidious, but, with or without them, the totality of the work, with its widely spaced string writing, high woodwinds supported by deep brass, involved my attention more than the ideas being expounded. At times, especially in the finale, the sound of the playing gave an impression of an orchestra not absolutely sure of what it was doing, but Davis appeared highly satisfied with the outcome. The evening began with Stravinsky's Scherzo à la russe and ended with the Fourth Symphony of Tchaikovsky.

72.

New York Post
D. 708,180 SAT. 369,902
FEB 20 1970

Ingrid Haebler Returns

Ingrid Haebler, Vienna-born pianist who made her American debut in 1959, returns here as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, William Steinberg director, in the Academy Orchestra Series at the Brooklyn Academy of Music Feb. 26 at 8:30. Colin Davis will conduct the program which will include Mozart's Overture to "Idomeneo," Mozart's Piano Concerto in D. K.537, "Coronation" with Miss Haebler, soloist, and Elgar's Symphony No. 1 in A Flat Op. 55.

Haebler at Academy

Pianist Ingrid Haebler will appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Colin Davis conducting, at 8:30 p.m. next Thursday at the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

DAILY NEWS
NEW YORK'S PICTURE NEWSPAPER
D. 2,080,906 SUN. 3,221,849
FEB 20 1970

Leon Bates, Pianist, Is Soloist With Symphony of New World

Rachmaninoff's "Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini" is the ideal introduction piece for a young pianist: tender and rugged by turns technically demanding in a flashy and crowd-pleasing way, full of Romantic hit tunes.

Leon Bates, a 20-year-old Temple University student, ripped into the work confidently yesterday afternoon at Philharmonic Hall and performed it with individuality and flair, an affecting lyrical impulse and enough sensitivity to make one curious about what he might do in more substantial music.

Mr. Bates, who may be the next black concert hero, soloist with the Symphony of the New World under Benjamin Steinberg's direction. He did not project a rich tone in this hall, and one would like to have heard him dig into the keys more deeply in scales and extended arpeggios. But his was an assured, musical performance.

Orchestra 1/3 Black

The Symphony of the New World is an integrated orchestra (about one third black), and it regularly demonstrates the validity of is position in a largely lily-white symphonic world.

For the Brahms Double Concerto for Violin, Cello and Orchestra, Mr. Steinberg dipped into his orchestra and drew out two excellent young soloists, Marilyn Dubow, who is white, as violinist, and Ronald Lipscomb, ho is black, as cellist. Individually and in tandem, they played with artistry and technical distincition. Mr. Steinberg's conducting, which seemed to aim at good housekeeping rather than knitting together a dramatic performance, proved the weakest link in the Brahms.

The program also contained the world premiere of Howard Swanson's Third Symphony, commissioned by the orchestra. Mr. Swanson, a 60-year-old black composer, strung out his material to greater length than was best for the work's success. Written in an academic style much admired 20 years ago, the work was weak in its ideas and uninventive in its workings-out.

DONAL HENAHAN.

Ingrid Haebler Heard With Boston Symphony

Ingrid Haebler, the Austrian pianist, played Mozart's "Coronation" Concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall Saturday night, in a concert conducted by Colin Davis. Since she is often identified as a Mozart specialist, and has made numerous recordings of his music, her interpretation on this occasion was disappointing for this listener who found nothing special about it.

It was acceptable as a literal, four-square performance in which the playing was generally crisp and precise, but it offered nothing in the way of extra brilliance, excitement, warmth or insights into the music.

Since the concerto, which was rather dry, was preceded by the Overture to Mozart's "Idomeneo," a work that is hardly the most beguiling in the repertory, the magnificent broad melody that opens Elgar's Symphony No. 1 came as a welcome relief, when that work began following intermission.

Mr. Davis's interpretation of the Elgar was as fervent and cogent as one could wish for, and those who did not tire of the composer's discursive ruminations, which stretch the Symphony No. 1 to uncommon length, must surely have been gratified by the performance.

ALLEN HUGHES.

Piano Debut Is Made By Eddy Kronengold

Although Eddy Kronengold has participated in New York ensemble programs for some years, the Belgian-born pianist only yesterday came around to making his solo debut at Carnegie Recital Hall. It was a somewhat unsettling event, because Mr. Kronengold has so many positive attributes and so few of them were fully realized.

The opening Allemande of Bach's French Suite in G made it clear he can produce a warm, mellow keyboard sound, and play with considerable dynamic sensitivity. Already in the second-movement Courante, however, the tempo became erratic, the feeling of line was lost.

It was like that all afternoon. Moments of genuine lyricism would be followed by a scramble; bright passages would turn nervously disjointed; sometimes, as in the Scherzo of the Brahms Sonata in F sharp Minor, the rhythmic pulse all but disappeared.

This lack of discipline was least harmful in a pair of compact 20th-century suites: Schoenberg's six Little Pieces (Op. 19), and three Piano Miniatures, written in 1963 by Joan Franks Williams. Here, sound, rather than form, is of the essence, and especially in Miss Williams' pointillistic etudes, Mr. Kronengold played with understanding and assurance.

ROBERT SHELTON.

THE SUNDAY RECORD, MARCH 8, 1970

Sex Appeal Bows At Carnegie Hall

The Classics

Mark Stuart

There was enough sex appeal on stage at Carnegie Hall last Saturday night to charge up a Hollywood sound studio.

Colin Davis, suave, sleek, darkly handsome, and dynamic led the Boston Symphony in a warmup performance of Mozart's overture to "Idomenco, King of Crete." It was workmanlike, a nice showing of a rarely played piece.

Then came Ingrid Haebler, and boy, is she stacked. She has to be the Raquel Welch of the piano virtuosae. When she walked out in a handsome greenish sort of gown, her blonde hair piled up in a becomingly modish bun, her svelte figure caused the young cats in front of me to sit bolt upright in their seats.

Then she sat down to Mozart's "Coronation" concerto. She plays every bit as well as she looks.

Miss Haebler seems to have Mozart bred in her bones, and it's no wonder. Born in Vienna, she grew up partly in Lodz, Poland, but her formative years were spent in Salzburg where she attended the Mozarteum. In the showy shadow of Wolfgang Amadeus's castle you absorb the Mozart flavor. If you have the technical equipment to produce what is bred in, you have to be good.

Miss Haebler is good.

There is feeling, understanding, poise, and depth to her playing, rare in one so young. Some have it, some try but don't. Miss Haebler has it.

There have been critics who carp that Miss Haebler doesn't give them anything new when she plays Mozart. Isn't it better to have the tried and true played well and truthfully rather than poorly, but with showmanship?

To get the full flavor of her understanding of Mozart one has only to listen to a recording (Philips PHS2906) Miss Haebler did of four concertos, including the famous background music for the film, "Elvira Madigan", the concerto No. 21. The others, Nos. 20, 23, and 26 may not be as familiar to the average listener as the "Elvira Madigan" concerto, but if you've heard them played before you've seldom heard them played better.

Colin Davis is no stranger to Mozart either. He had his first big conducting hit substituting on short notice for Sir Thomas Beecham at Glyndebourne for "The Magic Flute", and his Angel recording of nine Mozart opera overtures (S 60037) is another dilly.

Davis is one of those exciting Englishmen who can move a crowd the way Leonard Bernstein can capture a children's audience. He showed in doing Elgar's First Symphony that night, after Miss Haebler departed, that he can offer the big sound as well as the delicate. But anyone who saw him conduct an Albert Hall full of teen-agers in "Rule Britannia" on a recent TV program knew all about that.

* * *

The musicians are given a pension benefit concert every year in New York, and Tuesday night they caught the big prize. Davis Oistrakh came over to do both the Mozart and Beethoven violin concertos in D major. It was an experience.

When Oistrakh finished the Mozart the crowd broke into frenzied applause. As one listener said: "I knew he was great. I didn't know if he was great enough to play the Mozart well. Now I know."

When the chubby little Russian (he looks so much like Ed Begley playing William Jennings Bryan in "Inherit the Wind"), finished the Beethoven the crowd jumped up with a roar that sounded like nothing else but the crowd coming to its feet after a game-winning World Series home run.

Oistrakh is older, more mellow; he even smiles benignly now at the audience instead of scowling all the time. In the old days you could forgive him the scowl because his playing would melt your heart. With his new blander mien he kills the people.

Claudio Abbado substituted for an ailing George Szell as conductor, and the fiery young Italian did remarkably well, especially in the Hindemuth "Symphonic Metamorphoses of Themes by Carl Maria von Weber". This is a Hindemuth that few people are familiar with—jazzy, syncopated, tuneful, playful, and great. Abbado, who strides to the podium, plants his feet like Atlas holding up the world, and launches right into the business at hand, did well.

TIMES (M)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
CIRC. 959,600
MAR 2 1970

Music In Review

Young Man With Baton Extracts Fine Music

Michael Tilson Thomas, young "assistant-assistant" conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted a splendid program of Beethoven, Sibelius, Schoenberg and Wagner Thursday night in Veterans Memorial Auditorium, Providence.

From the opening "Egmont Overture" by Beethoven to the closing "Dawn" and "Siegfried's Rhine Journey" by Wagner, the concert progressed from pleasing to magnificent.

Maestro Thomas is a fine, unostentatious conductor who asks for, and gets, the best in tone, precision and force of utterance from these matchless musicians.

The Sibelius Fourth Symphony was brooding in mood in the beginning, then balanced by bright and perfect chords in the brasses and woodwinds, expansive volumes of pure harmonies, enlarged to surges that seemed to overwhelm, then retreating to a pin point perspective, then returning with tender caressing sounds that embraced the listener.

The vast spaciousness of its range made it a massive canvas of tone painting of shadow and sunshine.

The "Five Pieces for Orchestra" by Schoenberg had two redeeming features — they were miniatures and there were only five. The twelve-tone harmonics were torutous, too absurd to be worthy of jeers, too weird to even be musical caricatures.

But the Wagner works were glowing with a richness of golden chords in the brasses, rapturous with woodwind melody and counterpoint, and clothed with the colorful and silken sounds of the strings, shaped and molded into a sculpture of magnificent sound by the hands and baton of a young master.

C.H.L.

TIMES
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
(E) 38,693
MAR 6 1970

Music Last Night

Boston Symphony Conducted By Michael Tilson Thomas

by RUTH TRIPP

Michael Tilson Thomas, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made his second visit to Providence last evening to preside over the fourth concert of the series here. His conducting was easy to watch and fascinating to hear. The audience at Veterans Memorial Auditorium heard nothing louder than a full, resonant forte, until the Wagnerian finale. But we heard every variety of tone color in between.

In the opening Beethoven Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," every phrase was drawn with artistic devotion and the interpretation was subdued and appealing. The presentation was a gentle one for a Beethoven overture.

The Sibelius Symphony No. 4, a seldom heard work, at least in this area, was given an inspired performance. The cold, forbidding themes, repeated with the insistence of a Sibelius score, was warmed by the beauty of tone from the solo instruments, cello and flute. The deeply introspective mood of the first movement was lightened somewhat in the rhythmic change of the second but the overpowering feeling of an unending search, with fragments of unanswered questioning, held one's interest throughout. The last time I heard this work was in Symphony Hall with Koussevitzky conducting. It was enigmatic then, as now.

The tone color and mood of the Sibelius carried over into the five Schoenberg Pieces for Orchestra, his Opus 16. Here the orchestral tone color was magnificently contrasted. Patterns were as unpredictable as those in a batik-dyed scarf. The color was as exotic. Thomas was completely absorbed in his artistic task and if this work was provocative now, think what it must have been when it was written in 1909. Thomas used the score revised by the composer for a 1922 performance.

The finale of the concert was the familiar, melodious "Dawn" and "Siegfried's Rhine Journey" from "Die Goetterdaemerung." We had brilliant brass ensemble themes and several passages for full orchestra. It was fitting to have a Wagnerian work close this colorful program. It was his controversial writing which upset many of the well-known sounds of his era.

Young musicians are completely absorbed with variety and depth of sounds. Michael Thomas has shown us many delicate sound effects, with this concert. It will be interesting to hear him when he can afford to let the music have full sway and come over to the listeners not so completely chaperoned by his studious baton.

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
(M) 66,726 (S) 208,340
MAR 6 1970 New

Symphony Drops Out but Show to Go On

Despite the cancellation of the "Missa Solemnis" concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Rutgers University Choir has decided that the performance must go on.

The choir will perform the Beethoven work in a special two-piano version on Thursday, April 2, at 8:30 p.m. in the Rutgers Gymnasium. The concert will be free and open to the public.

The Boston Symphony was forced to cancel its part in the scheduled performance because of the continued illness of William Steinberg, its musical director.

The University Choir, which has been preparing for the performance for more than a year, will perform the work accompanied by two pianists and local soloists.

Joseph Bloom, the choir's regular accompanist, has prepared a special piano transcription of the orchestral parts of the great choral work. Bloom and Arlene Portney will accompany the choir during the performance.

Soloists will include three members of the faculty of the Douglass College Department of Music: Valerie Goodall, soprano; John Powell, bass, and Joseph Kovacs, violin. Other soloists will be Ruth Mattern, contralto, and Martin Lies, tenor.

The choir will be conducted by Dr. F. Austin Walter.

While the performance will be free, voluntary contributions will be accepted after the concert.

Newark Sunday News
NEWARK, N. J.
SUN. 429,830

MAR 29 1970

Concert Slated At Rutgers Gym

NEW BRUNSWICK — Despite the cancellation of a performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a concert will be held Thursday at the Rutgers gymnasium as scheduled at 8:30 p.m.

The Rutgers Choir will perform a special two-piano version of Beethoven work, for which the pianists and soloists have been preparing for a year.

The Boston Symphony was forced to cancel its part in the performance because of the illness of Director William Steinberg.

The Home News
NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.
D. 50,927 SUN. 52,421

MAR 26 1970

on the billboard

By GEORGE PHILCOX

Despite the cancellation of the "Missa Solemnis" concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Rutgers University Choir has decided that the performance must go on.

The Choir will perform the Beethoven work in a special two-piano version Thursday at 8:30 p.m. in the Rutgers gym. The concert will be free and open to the public.

The Boston Symphony was forced to cancel its part in the scheduled performance because of the continued illness of William Steinberg, director.

EAST BRUNSWICK, N. J.
SENTINEL
(NEWARK-NYC MARKET AREA)
W. 1,000

APR 1 1970

Michael Tilson Thomas, only 25, will be conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its concerts here Monday and Tuesday nights.

The Washington Post
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 479,644 SUN. 626,111

NEWS
WASH., D. C.
(E) 217,494

STAR
WASH., D. C.
(E) 318,026 (S) 362,408

MAR 27 1970 MAR 28 1970

MAR 31 1970

Boston Symphony's Young Conductor

One of the youngest conductors ever to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra made it clear last night in Constitution Hall that he is old enough and good enough to lead one of the world's great orchestras.

The newcomer is Michael Tilson Thomas, whose good fortune this season began with his being assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony the year that its new music director, William Steinberg, was forced by ill health to forego a substantial percentage of the concerts he was scheduled to conduct with the Boston and the Pittsburgh Orchestras, both of which are in his charge.

At 25, Thomas is a graduate of the University of Southern California, a pianist and a conductor with four or five years experience on the west coast. Last night's program demanded a wide range of stylistic awareness from Thomas as well as the particular skill of accompanying a soprano in Mozart's solo motet, "Exsultate, Jubilate."

Opening with Stravinsky's Symphony in Three Movements and closing with the First Symphony of Tschaikowsky, it tested Thomas in a contemporary masterwork, in early Mozart and in a symphony whose unabashed romantic flavor needs equally unabashed fervor from the conductor.

Thomas came off well in every department. True, the players of the Boston Symphony are experts of the highest caliber, capable of playing handsomely if given even the barest cues. But there is a great difference between minimal playing and the poised, informed and strongly directed music-making heard throughout last night's program.

The Stravinsky Symphony was introduced to Constitution Hall by the composer himself in 1948 on the National Symphony series. So had an early Tschaikowsky symphony been. Thus the pairing of these pieces last night had fine historic precedent.

More than that, they enjoyed something of the same kind of clear, beautifully proportioned readings Stravinsky gave them, allowing for the difference between today's Boston Symphony and the National Symphony of 1948. Thomas touched every essential key in unlocking both spirit and feeling of the elusive Stravinsky symphony. With beautifully pointed work from the orchestra's pianist and harpist, and indeed from the entire ensemble, he read into the music the glow that is its rightful property, but of which it is often robbed.

Benita Valente was the Mozart soloist, lustrous in sound, fluent in technique and radiant in style. The reduced orchestra, buoyed by a fine Marshall Stone organ, offered the finest support.

The Tschaikowsky is a tough piece. It is made of lovely stuff, full of wistful thoughts, brash asseverations and little structural steel. Called "Winter Dreams," it carries subtitles like "Daydreams on a winter road." It has to be allowed great latitude in mood, but must not be permitted to sag, lest it fall apart.

Thomas carried it through with fine poetry in the slow movement, an excellent brightness in the scherzo and all the bigness its finale can stand. Only the first movement could have carried more drama in the trumpet calls, which are, after all, just as exciting as those in later, more famous pages.

The Boston is here to repeat the program on Tuesday night. If you can get a seat, you are lucky.

—Paul Hume

NEWS OF MUSIC

Boston's Conductor, 25, Is Viewed as a Comer

By IRVING LOWENS
Music Critic of The Star

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Michael Tilson Thomas, conductor. Soloist: Benita Valente, soprano. Constitution Hall. Presented by the Washington National Symphony. Program: Symphony in Three Movements, Stravinsky; Exsultate, jubilate, K. 165, Mozart; Symphony No. 1 in G minor, Op. 13 (Winter Daydreams), Tchaikovsky.

It's still the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but last night at Constitution Hall, there were several other things for listeners to focus their attention on.

For one thing, there was young Michael Tilson Thomas, the 25-year-old assistant conductor of the orchestra, who was thrust into sudden prominence this year when music director William Steinberg was incapacitated by illness. Washingtonians were getting their first look at him.

For another, there was a rather unusual program, put together in a rather unusual way — a Stravinsky symphony to start out with, a virtually unknown Tchaikovsky symphony to finish with and in the most prominent spot, the well known "Exsultate, jubilate," written by Mozart when he was a lad of 16 as a display piece for a famous castrato of the time.

And for a third, there was soprano Benita Valente (who is not unknown locally) to sing the Mozart.

Miss Valente sang the "Exsultate, jbuilate" prettily, for the most part, but without any real brilliance or conviction. This is not a church work, to be approached with reverence. It is a flashy concerto for voice. The soloist missed the point, and as a consequence, the motet seemed like something of a valley between two smallish hillocks.

I hesitate to call the Tchaikovsky Symphony No. 1 a mountain-peak of the literature, since for all the anguish it costs the composer, it is one of his weakest orchestral compositions.

As for the Stravinsky Symphony in Three Movements, that,too, has never struck me as one of its composer's finest achievements. With its short-winded, fragmented and asymmetrical themes, it is a cold, edgy and nervous work, using the idiom that Stravinsky was to bring to a peak of expressiveness half a dozen years later in "The Rake's Progress."

Thomas is plainly a gifted musician, and it was evident that he was enjoying himself hugely on the podium. However, he is not yet a master of his craft, and I found the entire evening unpleasantly lacking in chiaroscuro. The general outlines were there all right, but the internal shadings, the subtleties of phrasing were absent, and I have an idea that the Boston could have done almost as well with an automaton programmed to give correct cues and to beat time accurately.

There is one technical flaw in Thomas' equipment that bothered me — he accentuates with a horizontal rather than a vertical beat, something that is very conducive to ragged releases, as the players cannot perceive the end of the beat as clearly as they should. This seemed to bother the Bostonians less than it bothered me, to tell the truth, and this is testimony to the quality of the individual players in that ensemble.

And I wouldn't give up on Thomas on the basis of this appearance, even though it leads me to believe that he is a few years away from the top rank. He'll be there, especially with such valuable experience as he is now getting with the Boston.

THE WASHINGTON DAILY NEWS
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 217,494 SAT. 169,405

MAR 31 1970

The Evening Star
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 316,026 SUN. 362,408

MAR 31 1970

Youthful conductor scores

Michael Tilson Thomas, 25-year-old assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony, made a strongly favorable impression in his Washington debut at Constitution Hall last night.

Substituting for the orchestra ailing musical director, William Steinberg, Mr. Thomas was completely authoritative in a program that had no sure-fire items.

It consisted of two infrequently performed symphonies — the Stravinsky in Three Movements and the Tchaikowsky Symphony No. 1 in G minor — and the Mozart "Exsultate jubilate" motet for soprano and small orchestra, which is also not heard too often.

Mr. Thomas had complete command of all three, widely ranging, works. The Stravinsky was bright, incisive, and sensitively balanced.

The Mozart was everything it should be, with the soloist, Benita Valente, singing superbly. The young conductor, whose style is reminiscent of Leonard Bernstein's, and orchestra partnered her impeccably.

The audience which almost filled the hall warmly applauded with some giving forth with "bravos." The Boston Symphony which displayed its traditional virtuosity in the Stravinsky and the Mozart, also revealed its great sound in its exciting performance of the Tchaikowsky.

The program will be repeated tonight at 8:30 for subscribers to the Washington National Symphony's Tuesday night series.

—M.B.

NEW YORK POST, THURSDAY, APRIL 2, 1970 64

Words & Music

HARRIETT JOHNSON

Thomas Leads Boston Symphony

Michael Tilson Thomas, born in 1944, is an infant as conductors go, and except for music director William Steinberg's illness, he might have continued indefinitely his relatively passive role of assistant conductor.

When however, he replaced Steinberg last December on short notice, he measured up, and from then on he has been busier than he had expected. Last night he returned to lead the final pair of Philharmonic Hall concerts this season with the Boston Symphony.

His program offered more than usual interest: Symphony for Double Orchestra in E Flat Major, Op. 18, No. 1; Stravinsky's Symphony in Three Movements (completed between 1942-45;) Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 1 in G Minor, Op. 13, "Winter Daydreams."

Tilson has a swinging air about him, bounding cheerily on and off the podium, and hailing the concertmaster as his friend; [illegible] showing his proficiency immediately once the music starts.

It is easy to see and hear that his considerable opportunity and extensive experience (despite his youth) were not acquired by luck.

Grandson of Boris and Bessie Thomashefsky, founders of the Yiddish Theater in this country, Thomas gives no idea that he is a frustrated actor. His podium technique is relaxed, and not without the few histrionics which almost inevitably accompany the man, both athlete and musician, who wields the baton. Yet Thomas is a sensitive stylist—for the music. He knows what he is about.

The Bach was well articulated with the double orchestra clearly differentiated and interestingly so. Stravinsky's Symphony, which has moments looking back to "Le Sacre du Printemps" and ahead to "The Rake's Progress," is a piece whose drama is heightened by its free-wheeling form. A stentorian salute from the Horns accents the beginning but the Symphony continues with some of Stravinsky's most delicately intricate writing, notably the "Andante," highlighting the harp and flute.

While Thomas didn't achieve all of the ironic sharpness and wit of the music, especially in the opening string motif of Movement II which uses a theme, as John Burk points out in his program notes, associated with both Mozart's and Rossini's operatic barber, he made the formal patterns immensely alive.

The Tchaikovsky "First" is seldom heard in concert, and with some reason, though its folk-like themes are melodically endearing like all later Tchaikovsky. Taking 40 minutes to play, it goes on too long today for most sophisticated ears as its development is far more obvious than Tchaikovsky's treatment in his later works. Yet the Symphony is worth programming, and its interest is certainly more than merely historical. The interpretation lacked something in subtle contrasts of color and dynamics; possibly something in smoothness of transition, but the performance was, on the whole, excellent. The program will be repeated tomorrow, Saturday night the orchestra performs in Carnegie Hall. The program includes excerpts from Wagner's "Goeterdaemmerung" and Sibelius' Symphony No. 4.

Music: Thomas and Boston Symphony

Young Leader Shows Abundance of Talent

By HAROLD C. SCHONBERG

BECAUSE of the continued illness of William Steinberg, the 26-year-old Michael Tilson Thomas continues to flourish on the podium of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Last night he conducted the players at Philharmonic Hall in a program that consisted of J. C. Bach's Symphony for Double Orchestra in E flat, Stravinsky's Symphony in Three Movements and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 1.

Earlier this season Mr. Thomas made his debut in a completely unscheduled manner, stepping in where Mr. Steinberg could not complete the last half of a program. This time, presumably, Mr. Thomas had had the benefit of plenty of preparation, including run-throughs of this program at Symphony Hall.

He is an engaging figure on the podium—slim, intense youthful, with something of the charisma of a young Bernstein. And he makes music in an equally ardent way, though in his own manner. He still has a bit to learn about the ultimate subtleties of stick technique, though his beat basically is clear and firm, and he still is capable of a few rhythmic errors. Some occurred during the Stravinsky.

But there is talent to burn, and in one of the works on the program, the Tchaikovsky, it was hard to fault his work. He was a little less satisfactory in the work by Johann Christian Bach. Here he made the expected obeisance to authenticity, by reducing the strings and having a harpsichord plonk along. But there still were too many strings, and the sounds that were produced were much more in the 19th-century romantic vein than in the "style galant."

Nor did the Stravinsky entirely come off, though there was much to admire in the brightness and alertness of the interpretation. The big problem in conducting this work, aside from balancing out Stravinsky's meticulous sonorities, is in the rhythmic groupings, and here Mr. Thomas was a little unsure of himself. Sometimes there were accented upbeats that threw the patterns a little off, and at other times the shifting rhythms were not clearly defined.

Yet the interpretation did move smartly along, and Mr. Thomas had the men playing for him. Where everybody really dug in was in the Tchaikovsky First, the "Winter Daydreams" Symphony. Mr. Thomas's work here suggested that he might be that rarity among young conductors, one with a real feeling for the post-romantic style.

Without any eccentricity, without trying to underline the music, without trying to make it his piece, Mr. Thomas conducted an authentically big version of the score. The music proceeded in a natural, lyric manner, beautifully planned, handsomely accomplished. In this work there was absolutely no sense of the rhythmic strain that hte more difficult Stravinsky had posed. Instead there was a continuous forward movement, a big line, and an honest feeling for Tchaikovsky's youthful lyricism.

It also is nice to see the first three symphonies of Echaikovsky investigated. Up to the last movement, with its dreadfully awkward contrapuntal passages, this symphony is a jewel—lovely, sad, richly orchestrated, full of the combination of Weltschmerz and the world of the Imperial Ballet that was going to be so typical of Tchaikovsky's later symphonic music.

NEW YORK TIMES THURSDAY APRIL 2 1970 3 Ses.

The Program

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Michael Tilson Thomas, conductor. At Philharmonic Hall.
Symphony for Double Orchestra in E flat ..... Bach
Symphony in Three Movements Stravinsky
Symphony No. 1 ..... Tchaikovsky

Tchaikovsky's First Is Done With Sympathy

74

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 441,961 SUN. 423,790

APR 6 1970

CRITIC-AT-LARGE by Byron Belt

'Sun-Treader' Explodes

Carl Ruggles' "Sun-Treader" burst from the Carnegie Hall stage Saturday night with the spectacular beauty and power of a rocket launching into space. Matching the music's stupendous power all the way, Michael Tilson Thomas and the Boston Symphony Orchestra scored one of the season's most significant triumphs.

Ruggles is the iconoclastic Yankee composers who was born in 1876 and is still very much alive. As more of his music receives the calibre of performances Lucas Foss provided for his recent Buffalo Philharmonic presentation of "Men and Mountains," and Thomas accomplished Saturday, Ruggles will be recognized as the master he is.

With the disciplined intellectual language of Schoenbergian atonality, the sensitive lyricism of Alban Berg and the muscular thrust of a man storming the heavens, Ruggles has made "Sun-Treader" into one of the half dozen or so major orchestral scores of this century. It is, quite simply, marvellous music, and it was pedformed to a faretheewell by the aristocratic Bostonians.

Readers should shortly be able to discover how cautious we are really being in our enthusiasm, for "Sun-Treader" has been recorded by the Boston symphony under young Thomas, and if the grooves can contain it, it should be a conic explosion to clean out the cobwebs from the most timid ears.

Due to the unfortunate illness of music director Wililam Steinberg, assistant conductor Michael Tilson Thomas has been pressed into service to a degree which might frighten a more experienced conductor. Judging from performances of the Sibelius Fourth Symphony, the Ruggles, and "Dawn" and "Siegrfied's Rhine Journey" by Wagner, the young musician has the respect of his colleagues. And the ability and insight to make music of utmost beauty.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
WILLIAM STEINBERG
Music Director

TWO CONCERTS
This
WEDNESDAY and FRIDAY
April 1/3 at 8:30 P.M.
PHILHARMONIC HALL LINCOLN CENTER
MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS Conductor

J.C. BACH:
Sinfonia for double orchestra
STRAVINSKY:
Symphony in three movements
TCHAIKOVSKY:
Symphony no. 1

TICKETS AVAILABLE AT PHILHARMONIC HALL BOX OFFICE
TICKETS: $4, 5, 7, 7.50, 8.50, 9.
Baldwin Piano TELEPHONE—TR 4-2424 RCA Records

Thomas Clicks With Boston

NEW YORK—Michael Tilson Thomas continues to impress as a conductor. Conducting the Boston Symphony at Philharmonic Hall, April 3, the 26-year-old artist securely handled J.C. Bach, Tchaikovsky and Stravinsky.

While Bach's "Symphony for Double Orchestra, Op. 18, No. 1" and Stravinsky's exciting "Symphony in Three Movements" were handily directed, it was in Tchaikovsky's "Symphony No. 1 (Winter Daydreams)" that Tilson Thomas' feel for the music was most in evidence.

The illness of William Steinberg, the Boston's music director, has afforded Tilson Thomas more conducting opportunities than expected this season, and he has come through expertly. He clearly is tomorrow's conductor today. The Boston currently records for RCA Records, but is switching to Deutsche Grammophon. Tilson Thomas also is the pianist with the Boston Symphony Chamber Players and has recorded as a pianist for Angel. FRED KIRBY

BILLBOARD
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 24,000

APR 18 1970

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 473,000

APR 11 1970

THE twenty-six-year-old conductor Michael Tilson Thomas is an extraordinary phenomenon. Not that twenty-six-year-old conductors haven't shown remarkable technical accomplishments in the past, as well as a remarkable command of the qualities of leadership that a virtuoso conductor must have. But Mr. Thomas is different. He is, apparently, a fully mature maestro. He does not need any theatrical effects to get himself noticed. His podium demeanor is serious, earnest, unexhibitionistic, and masculine. His beat is clear, and since I last watched him it has become more reserved and modest—or perhaps it has merely become more assured; on that occasion he substituted at the last minute for William Steinberg and may have been nervous and overanxious. At any rate, here is a young conductor with everything the profession demands, and I shall watch his career with special interest.

Last Wednesday evening, Mr. Thomas appeared in Philharmonic Hall as conductor of the Boston Symphony—a post he has been filling during the illness of Mr. Steinberg. His program involved three entirely different kinds of music, and he seemed equally at home in all of them. He started off with Johann Christian Bach's not very often played Symphony for Double Orchestra in E Flat, Opus 18, No. 1. It is a work of Mozartian character, except that very little use is made of the wind instruments. They are limited, virtually all of the time, to supporting roles. As a consequence, strings dominate all movements. It is nevertheless a quite engaging composition in the classical manner—formal and melodious—and Mr. Thomas, to my mind, did it full justice. Then came Stravinsky's Symphony in Three Movements, a work dating from 1945 and containing almost all the basic elements of the Stravinsky style, varied and eclectic though that style has been from time to time. It is a strong composition and an intricate one, admirably clear, and free of stuffing of any kind. It even contains some charming moments in the interlude of the adagio. The outer movements have some of that pounding, machine-like character that is typical of much Stravinsky. But one only need compare Stravinsky's pounding with, say, Honegger's to see immediately how superior in every way Stravinsky's is. And then there are those off-balance rhythmic techniques by which Stravinsky leads you to expect a strong beat and then fools you. I enjoyed hearing the Symphony, and I thought that Mr. Thomas's handling of it was expert. It is, by the way, a completely tonal composition.

After the intermission, Mr. Thomas conducted Tchaikovsky's not very often heard First Symphony, and showed that he is a capable Romantic as well as a classical and twentieth-century conductor. This is, in general, an appealing work, though I find its last movement a bit long and tedious. There are passages that recall Rachmaninoff until one realizes that Rachmaninoff must have got his ideas from Tchaikovsky, who thought them up much earlier. The Russian folk idiom is prominent here—stronger, in fact, than it is in some of Tchaikovsky's later and more popular symphonies. Taken as a whole, the evening was an enjoyable one, and it showed that Mr. Thomas has considerable skill in building interesting programs, along with all the other skills he seems endowed with.

75

CHAMBER REVIEWS

CONCERTS GIVEN DURING THE 1969-1970 SEASON BY THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CHAMBER PLAYERS

JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN violin
BURTON FINE viola
JULES ESKIN cello
HENRY PORTNOI double bass
DORIOT ANTHONY DWYER flute
RALPH GOMBERG oboe
GINO CIOFFI clarinet
SHERMAN WALT bassoon
JAMES STAGLIANO horn
ARMANDO GHITALLA trumpet
WILLIAM GIBSON trombone
EVERETT FIRTH percussion
MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS piano

October 12 – Pequot Library, Southport, Connecticut p. 75
November 2 – St Mark's, Southboro, Massachusetts
March 1 – University of Connecticut, Storrs

BEETHOVEN	Trio in C minor op. 1 no. 3
SCHOENBERG	String trio
MOZART	Divertimento in E flat for string trio K. 563

October 15 – St Botolph Club, Boston

PISTON	Trio for flute, clarinet and bassoon (1926)
PERSICHETTI	Pastorale (1943)
TAFFANEL	Quintet

December 7 – Sanders Theater series (1) p. 76

BEETHOVEN	Piano quartet in E flat op. 16b
SCHOENBERG	String trio op. 45 (1946)
STREET	String trio
SCHUMANN	Piano trio in D minor op. 63

January 14 – St Botolph Club, Boston with Ann Hobson harp

DEBUSSY	Sonata for cello and piano
	Sonata for flute, viola and harp
	Sonata for violin and piano

January 18 – Sanders Theater series (2) p. 77 with John Holmes oboe
Pasquale Cardillo clarinet
Ernst Panenka bassoon
Harry Shapiro horn

BEETHOVEN	Rondino in E flat for wind octet op. 146
BUDD	New work, no. 1
PISTON	Trio for flute, clarinet and bassoon (1926)
MESSIAEN	'Le merle noir' for flute and piano
MOZART	Wind serenade in C minor K. 388

January 25 – Pine Manor Junior College, Chestnut Hill with Bethany Beardslee soprano
Max Hobart violin
Ann Hobson harp
Arthur Press percussion
Charles Smith percussion

PISTON	Trio for flute, clarinet and bassoon (1926)
LERDAHL	'Wake' for string trio, percussion, harp and voice conducted by David Epstein
DEBUSSY	Sonata for flute, viola and harp
DVOŘÁK	String quintet in G op. 77

February 15 – Sanders Theater series (3) p. 77
with Ann Hobson harp
Arthur Press percussion
Charles Smith percussion

DEBUSSY	Sonata for cello and piano
	Sonata for flute, viola and harp
	Sonata for violin and piano
LERDAHL	'Wake' for string trio, percussion, harp and voice conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas
STOCKHAUSEN	'Kontakte' for piano, percussion and prepared tape

March 1 – Wheaton College, Norton

DANZI	Quintet in G minor
PISTON	Trio for flute, clarinet and bassoon (1926)
POULENC	Trio for horn, trumpet and trombone
ANDRIESSEN	Trio for flute, oboe and bassoon
TAFFANEL	Quintet

March 8 – Union College, Schenectady, New York

DANZI	Quintet in G minor
PISTON	Trio for flute, clarinet and bassoon (1926)
POULENC	Trio for horn, trumpet and trombone
ANDRIESSEN	Trio for flute, oboe and bassoon
ETLER	Wind quintet no. 2

March 15 – Sanders Theater series (4) p. 78 with Max Hobart violin
Robert Levin harpsichord

MOZART	Adagio from Divertimento in E flat for string trio K. 563 in memory of Mrs Talcott M. Banks
TELEMANN	Quartet for flute, oboe, violin and continuo
CARTER	Sonata for flute, oboe, cello and harpsichord
ETLER	Wind quintet no. 2
DVOŘÁK	String quintet in G op. 77

April 19 – Sanders Theater series (5)

BEETHOVEN	Serenade in D for flute, violin and viola op. 25
ROCHBERG	Duo for oboe and bassoon
BEETHOVEN	Septet in E flat op. 20

April 26 – Newton Junior College, Newtonville

BEETHOVEN	Trio in C minor op. 1 no. 3
SCHOENBERG	String trio
MOZART	Divertimento in E flat for string trio K. 563

April 28 – University of Massachusetts, Amherst

SCHUBERT	String trio no. 1 in B flat D. 471
POULENC	Trio for horn, trumpet and trombone
ANDRIESSEN	Trio for flute, oboe and bassoon
BEETHOVEN	Septet in E flat op. 20

BOSTON STRINGS IN AREA CONCERT

The first in a series of three chamber music concerts sponsored by the Pequot Library association will take place Oct. 12 at 4 p.m. in the library auditorium, 720 Pequot road, Southport.

The Boston Symphony String trio will perform Beethoven's "Trio, No. 3 in C Minor Opus 1 No. 3," Schoenberg's "String Trio, Opus 45" and Mozart's "Divertimento in E Flat for String Trio."

Tickets, at individual, subscription or student rates, may be purchased at the library or at the door on the afternoon of the concert. Further information may be obtained by contacting the library.

Sunday's three performers are members of the faculty at the New England Conservatory of Music.

Joseph Silverstein, the concertmaster, joined the Boston Symphony orchestra in 1955 at the age of 23. He has taken part in two competitions, one of which was the 1959 Queen Elizabeth of Belgium International competition. He was the only American in the top ten competitors and won third place.

Mr. Silverstein, who also won the Walter Naumburg award in 1960, is a member of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences and an avid golfer.

Burton Fine, principal viola, came to the Boston Symphony from the National Space and Aeronautics administration where he was a research chemist.

He has played with various chamber music ensembles and holds a PhD from the Illinois Institute of Technology. Mr. Fine also studied four years at the Curtis institute.

Jules Esken, principal cello, is a winner of the 1954 Naumburg Foundation award. He also has studied at the Curtis institute. Prior to joining the Boston Symphony orchestra he played with Casals in Puerto Rico and Marlboro.

POST
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
(E) 33,000 (S) 87,000

OCT 3 1969

Ballet, String Trio Feature Area Weekend Cultural Fare

Dance and chamber music constituted the principal cultural fare during the weekend, with the Ballet Brio opening the Milford Community Concert season Saturday evening in Jonathan Law auditorium, and the Boston String Trio playing a Sunday afternoon concert in the Pequot library, Southport.

In the course of a program of short ballets by their artistic director and Choreographer, Thomas Andrew, members of the pocket sized dance company (there are six on its performing roster), established themselves as competent and engaging young artists. As is frequently the case, the best roles were assigned to the ballerinas, rather fortunate in this instance because they were, individually and as a group, superior to their male colleagues.

A Regal Ballerina

Although insecurity stemming from insufficient resin on stage prevented the company from putting forth its best effort during the introductory 'Segments For Six', the feminine members of the company executed subsequent dances with a beguiling exhibition of lyric grace and technical assurance. Foremost among them was Rose Marie Menes, a regal young women whose superbly detailed interpretative movements of hand, foot and limb, joined with effortless, lofty elevations, yielded many rewards and won much admiration.

Not so arresting visually or technically as Miss Menes, Sandra Balesti demonstrated a very uniform style, good rhythmic sense, and evinced a fetching sprightliness, employed to particularly good advantage in humorous moments.

Weights, rather than wings, might have been attached to the heels of the gentlemen. Although Gaudio Vacacio and Conrad Peterson were not incompetent or bare of authority, the male dancers generally were inclined to choppy phrasing and less technical refinement. I suppose one might have said it was ladies' night at the ballet.

Armed with scores from Beethoven, Mozar and Schoenberg, the fiddlers three from Boston scored a complete victory. Rarely, but rarely, have American chamber musicians functioned with such technical finesse, appealing tonality, and emotional conviction. All members of the Boston Symphony orchestra, they are Joseph Silverstein, violinist, Burton Fine, violist, and Jules Eskin, cellist.

They opened with Beethoven's early String Trio No. 3 in C minor, a key for which the composers's affinity is well known. Before the agitated first movement was concluded, the musicians' rapport with the material at hand and each other, their easy precision and observance of small detail, had secured my whole hearted approval. The second movement was sublime, and the finale possessed a marvelous air of fluidity. So rich and cohesive was the reading that, with eyes closed and imagination working just a trifle, one could believe that a string quartet, not a trio, was holding forth. Naturally, we must not overlook the facility of the composer in the matter.

Centrally placed was Schoenberg's String Trio, Opus 45, a late work in one movement dating from 1946. With the composer's habitual perpetual variation, textural variety, and the free flowing rhapsodic character of the composition, the challenges posed were perhaps the most technically formidable of the afternoon. But, once again there was absolute unanimity, for a reading of lyric outpouring and high tension.

Last, but certainly not least, was Mozart's Divertimento in E flat, K. 563, the composer's sole work for string trio and one of his most profound and dramatic statements. The poetry of the first movement was suprebly realized, while the second acquired a poignant sweetness. The minute was a model of graceful buoyancy, the folk tune variations jubilant, and the closing rondo recalled a sun-drenched mountain stream. It was one of the most beautiful chamber concerts in my experience. Hats off to the men from Boston!

—RICHARD DAY

POST
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
(E) 33,000 (S) 87,000

OCT 13 1969

Boston Trio Sunday

The first of the Pequot Library Concert Series will take place tomorrow afternoon at 4 p.m. in the auditorium of the Pequot Library in Southport with the performance of the Boston Symphony String Trio. The players are Joseph Silverstein, violin; Burton Fine, viola and Jules Eskin, cello in a program including Trio No. 3 in C minor, Op. 1 No. 3 by Beethoven; String Trio, Op. 45 by Arnold Schoenberg and Divertimento in E for String Trio, K. 563 by Mozart.

Tickets may be purchased from the Pequot Library or at the door before the concert.

TOWN CRIER
WESTPORT, CONN.
(M) 11,050 (S) 9,100

OCT 11 1969

76.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

BOSTON SYMPHONY CHAMBER PLAYERS

Principals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

SANDERS THEATER SERIES

3 p.m.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 7
Beethoven: Piano quartet op. 166
Schoenberg: String trio op. 45
Street: String trio
Schumann: Piano trio op. 45
SUNDAY, JANUARY 18
SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 15
SUNDAY, MARCH 15
SUNDAY, APRIL 19

SERIES TICKETS: 5 for the price of 4, $6, 10, 14
SINGLE TICKETS: if any remain $1.50, 2.50, 3.50

Tickets available in person or by mail:

HARVARD COOP
BOX OFFICE, SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON, MASS.

Telephone 266-1492

Baldwin Piano RCA Records

Chamber music at Harvard

This afternoon at 3 in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, the Boston Symphony Chamber Players will give the first in a series of five Sunday afternoon concerts.

Most programs will include one or more works by composers associated with Harvard. The opening program, for example, will include the String Trio by Arnold Schoenberg, commissioned for the symposium on music criticism at Harvard in 1947, and the String Trio by Tison Street, a graduate student at Harvard and a pupil of Leon Kirchner. Today's program also will include Beethoven's Piano Quartet in E flat, Op. 16b, and Schumann's Piano Trio in D minor, Op. 63.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
DEC 7 1969 New England

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850
DEC 9 1969

Chamber players

By Louis Snyder

Cambridge, Mass.

Perhaps the proximity of announcement to first performance in the Boston Symphony Chamber Players' 1969-70 series accounts for the less-than-capacity house that heard the opening concert on Sunday afternoon in Sanders Theater. Regrettable, because this was an occasion for fine playing and concentrated listening under exalted auspices—Harvard's Department of Music and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Participants in the series are the orchestra's first desk players, with other colleagues joining when needed, and it is a purpose of these concerts to present contemporary works in balance with classics on its programs.

On Sunday the players were Joseph Silverstein, violinist; Jules Eskin, cellist; Burton Fine, violist; and Michael Tilson Thomas, pianist—a talented group to encounter under any circumstances.

Beethoven's Piano Quartet in E flat opened the program, and Schumann's Piano Trio in D minor closed it. Being the grandly classic and suavely romantic pieces they are, they provided the most uncomplicated listening. Since it had been the less known musical quantity hereabouts until Sunday, the extraordinarily distinguished and sensitive playing of Mr. Thomas was an added bonus to the familiar sounds of the BSO's three first string men.

Musical messages

Between came two string trios—the first by Arnold Schoenberg (his opus 45 of 1946), and the other by Tison Street, a degree candidate at Harvard, and also a violinist. Both gave the chamber music devotee chances to test his investigative powers, particularly since the performances were models of precision and clarity. Neither employs a musical idiom that gratefully fits the ordinary ear, but they are hardly of the same caliber, even in their abstruseness.

Just how much pleasure the Schoenberg is able to give the most receptive auditor is questionable. One wonders if attention is allowed to wander purposefully so that it can be brought up short by such a wonderful passage as the beginning of the third movement, all gossamer texture and bizarre sound. In any case, it doesn't deliver its message readily, and of course there's no reason why it should.

Mr. Street's short Trio is also of the heavy-going persuasion. Again, the first-time listener is hard put to it to know whither it's bound before it reaches a sudden end. Vitality and some interesting devices squeeze between the handfuls of notes, but Mr. Street is asking a lot of his audience to swallow all of this inspiration at once. He was there to accept the cordial applause directed at his work and its three skilled exponents.

The four concerts remaining in the series (Jan. 18, Feb. 15, March 15, and April 19) will cover a variety of chamber works for many different instrumental combinations. On the basis of this auspicious opener, it would be a disservice to oneself to miss them.

Arts & Amusements (12-4-69)

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
DEC 8 1969 New England

Chamber group offers first concert

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

This year the Boston Symphony Chamber Players are giving a series of five Sanders Theater concerts in co-sponsorship with the Harvard Music Department. The programs, individually and as a series, are the most interesting the Chamber Players have offered.

It is a great pity, then, that the concerts have been planned so as to add further to the overcrowding of the Sunday afternoon calendar. Specifically, the first four concerts in the series conflict with concerts in Boston by the Beaux Arts Quartet, Sviatoslav Richter, David Oistrakh, and the Juilliard Quartet. That, as management, is neither clever nor considerate.

The music at the first concert yesterday afternoon was all for strings and piano. The players were violist Joseph Silverstein, violist Burton Fine, cellist Jules Eskin, and, in his first appearance here with the Chamber Players, Michael Tilson Thomas, the Symphonys' assistant conductor, as pianist.

Thomas was disappointing. He has lots of keyboard facility, and it is clear from his conducting that he is a first-rate musician; he ought, therefore, somehow to play better. What we got Sunday, however, aggravated no doubt by the diffuse acoustics of a nearly empty Sanders Theater, had litle character, color, or clarity. At its best, Thomas's playing was smoothly elegant in a way that matched the string playing. But that still failed to buoy it up and invigorate it as the playing of two of his predecessors, Claude Frank and Richard Goode, used to do.

There were two pieces with piano. One was Beethoven's Quartet, Opus 16b, an arrangement of his Quintet for Piano and Winds. I like the arrangement, for its actual sound, and not least because it calls less attention than the original to the Mozart Quintet that Beethoven used as a model, thus allowing one to be more aware of the character and the strengths of this youthful piece of Beethoven. The concert ended with Schumann's D minor Trio. The Beethoven got a superficial reading that just about went; the Schumann was performed too insipidly to engage the attention or even, at times, to make complete sense.

The most rewarding part of the concert was Silverstein's, Fine's, and Eskin's performance — a superb one in their characteristically restrained and elegant manner — of Schoenberg's String Trio. There is in that wonderful music a mastery and, at times, a serenity that took 72 years of living and half a century of composing to produce. Yet there is no work in which Schoenberg is younger, more forward-looking.

The trio is, for me, the only one of Schoenberg's 12-tone works that recaptures the spontaneity, the sense of grappling with an overwhelming flood of invention, the immediacy and intensity of communication, that characterize his music until the early 1920s.

To hear it — and there have been quite a few opportunities in Boston in recent years — is always exciting. A case could be made for a harder, riskier sort of performance, but this one was the most "audible" of any I have heard and in all respects unusually beautiful.

There was also a performance of a String Trio written about six years ago by Tison Street, then a 20-year-old undergraduate at Harvard. It seems in a way to continue Schoenberg's Trio, both heard directly and through the filter of Street's teacher, Leon Kirchner. Hearing it again after some years, I found it still interesting to listen to, expressive, assured, a bit stiff in form perhaps and rather careful, but the work of a real composer. It had a good performance, smooth, and perhaps not quite so interesting as a more sharply profiled one I remember hearing at Marlboro in which the composer played the violin part.

Symphony Chamber Players in Concert

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players, principal players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announce the second program of a special five concert series at Sanders Theater, Harvard University, Cambridge, to be given on Sunday, Jan. 18 at 3 p.m.

The program includes Beethoven's "Rondino in E flat for wind octet;" Piston's "Trio for flute, clarinet, and bassoon;" Messiaen's "Le merle noir," for flute and piano; Mozart's "Wind serenade in C minor," Michael Tilson Thomas conducting; and finally "New work" by Harold Budd, a young composer from California.

The Sanders Theater series is sponsored by the Harvard University Department of Music and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Tickets may be purchased in person or by mail from the Symphony Hall Box Office, from the Harvard Coop the week preceding the concert, and at the door the day of the concert.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,305 (S) 293,557
Dec 30 1969 En Ne

CHRONICLE-CITIZEN
BROOKLINE, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 8,150
JAN 1970

ADVOCATE
ARLINGTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 9,000
JAN 8 1970 New England Newsclip

Chamber Concert

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players, principal players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will hold the second program of a special five concert series at Sanders Theater, Harvard University, Cambridge, on Sunday, Jan. 18 at 3 p.m.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
FEB 4 1970 New England Newsclip

BSO Players In 3d Concert On Feb. 15

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Chamber Players' Sanders Theater series will be held Sunday afternoon, Feb. 15 at 3. The program consists of Debussy's Three Sonatas, Lerdahl's "Wake" and Stockhausen's "Kontakte."

Soprano Bethany Beardslee and conductor Michael Tilson Thomas appear in the Lerdahl piece, and New York City-based Filmore East's famed Joshua Light Show appears in the Stockhausen work. Debussy's Three Sonatas were written in the three years preceding the composer's death in 1917.

The second piece on the program, Fred Lerdahls' Wake" for string trio, percussion, harp and voice, is based on a text from James Joyce's "Finnegan's Wake." It contains highly concentrated serial writing in a dramatic form. Noted soprano Bethany Beardslee appears as soloist and Thomas conducts.

The final of the program is the German composer Karlheinz Stockhausen's "Kontakte" for electronic tape, piano and percussion. The work is the composer's first large scale piece written primarily for the electronic media.

With the tape recorder are two parts for live musicians, piano, to be played by Thomas, and percussions, played by Everett Frith, principal timpanist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The piece will be performed in the mixed media format now approved by Stockhausen, and includes light show visuals by the New York-based Joshua Ligh show.

Symphony chamber players —with a conductor

CSM 20 1/20/70

By Allan Sly

Cambridge, Mass.

The Sanders Theater Series of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, sponsored by the Harvard University Department of Music, attracted a medium-sized but enthusiastic young audience on Sunday afternoon. The Beethoven Rondino, Opus 146, engaged pairs of oboes, clarinets, bassoons, and horns; the same forces concluded with Mozart's Serenade, K. 388. Michael Tilson Thomas conducted these works, though without successfully demonstrating, to this observer, why. It may have saved rehearsal time (tidy ensemble is hard for eight players to achieve among themselves); it may have added possibilities of expansiveness in Beethoven's later, at times reflective—even ruminating — style; it may have achieved heightened dramatic effects in the Mozart; but it also may have inhibited the spontaneity of potential soloists so that the normal inward glow of chamber music was not often evident.

Some years ago, on the same stage, the late Melville Smith guided eight players through the Hindemith octet. Memories of that event persist: large chamber music is better guided than controlled; the conductor's usual function needs to be transcended, surpassed by wise and patient counseling in the act of performance, the initiative being passed around according to the composer's thought.

Cerebral basis

Between these two classic bulwarks came three engaging works of today: In Harold Budd's "New work no. 1" Ralph Gomberg (oboe), Sherman Walt (bassoon), and Mr. Thomas (piano) showed chamber music playing at its best. The two winds sat back to back—which seemed to emphasize the cerebral rather than visceral basis for what they were doing. In Walter Piston's Trio for flute (Doriot Anthony Dwyer), clarinet (Gino Cioffi) and bassoon, the listener had an easy time admiring both the writing and the playing. In Messiaen's "Le merle noir" Mrs. Dwyer and Mr. Thomas collaborated so successfully that the audience insisted on hearing the work twice. It seemed to be concerned with birdsong, also with rhythmic and tonal designs quite aurally acceptable while mentally challenging.

Mr. Thomas's piano playing in the Budd and the Messiaen showed him to be easily among the very best exponents of today's frontier styles. We may confidently follow where he leads. His intentions in the classics were similarly irreproachable—it's only the conducting of chamber music that is called in question. We still have not really heard what some of our city's celebrated orchestral soloists might say for themselves in a chamber music context.

Boston Symphony Chamber Players perform

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

For their concert in Sanders Theater on Sunday afternoon, the Boston Symphony Chamber Players put an interesting, if excessively long, program together: all three Debussy Sonatas, Fred Lerdahl's "Wake," and Stockhausen's "Kontakte."

Debussy's final illness and death kept him from realizing a fantastic project of six sonatas for various instruments. He was able to write three, for cello and piano; for flute, viola, and harp; and for violin and piano; the three others, for oboe, horn, and harpsichord; for trumpet, clarinet, and bassoon; and last a kind of "grand piece de concert" for all the instruments used in the first five sonatas plus double bass, are nothing but a tantalizing notebook entry.

It is clear, specifically from the "special" instrumentation of four of these works and more generally from what the rest of Debussy's late music is like, that he meant his sonata cycle to become an exploration of texture and color as prime compositional elements. That is evident in the flute, viola, and harp piece, but the rare occasion of hearing all three sonatas in immediate succession revealed fascinatingly how deeply textural concerns determined the outcome in the two conventionally scored sonatas as well, the play between piano staccatos and cello pizzicatos in the second movement of the first sonata presenting the most obvious, but by no means the only example.

Moreover, for all the differences among their surfaces, the three sonatas seem to inhabit a unified expressive world. It is one defined by a sense of reseve, by the suggestion of masked players of games, by the constant condition of flux that is produced now mercurially and now by the subtlest transformations, and there is something mysterious and a bit carnivalesque about it all. The performances (Jules Eskin, cello, Michael Tilson Thomas, piano, Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute, Burton Fine, viola, Ann Hobson, harp, Joseph Silverstein, violin), were careful, but, except for that of the Violin Sonata, rather lacked in animation.

Lerdahl is a composer in his 20s, now at Berkeley. My perception of "Wake," which is written for voice, string trio, harp, and percussion, was prejudiced first by someone's decision that it was more useful to put an advertisement for the next concert on the free page of the program than the text for this one, and then because the way soprano Bethany Beardslee sang, I could not understand more than five or six of the words, and never more than two in a row.

The changing vowels and consonants became part of the colristic components of the music, but I was left hungering for the meaning that I presume the text of "Wake" carries, and distracted by the effect of straining to hear it. I was left with a strong impression of a piece of considerable expressive intensity as well as of precision and delicacy of facture, of something altogether interesting, but the experience was frustratingly incomplete. Michael Tilson Thomas conducted, the percussion parts were played by Everett Firth, Arthur Press, and Charles Smith, and I should add that apart from the verbal lack Miss Beardslee's singing was impressive.

Stockhausen's "Kontakte" dates, I believe, from the early sixties. The 30 minutes or so of "Kontakte" provide a couple of engaging outbursts and a really beautifully imagined transition from sound to silence at the end, but mostly it strikes me as lazy, self-indulgent, and tedious. It was to have been served with a contribution by the Joshua Light Show; the bad weather, however, left some of the Joshuas stranded somewhere in Connecticut, leaving "Kontakte" to be revealed in its awful musical emptiness.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,987 (E) 194,700
(S) 56[illegible]
FEB 16 1970
New Engla

Debussy loses at hands of BSO Chamber Players

Boston Globe WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 25

by Stephen Smoliar

It may be accepted as a necessary evil that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is intolerant of advanced music but when it reaches the point where they cannot—or will not—handle Debussy properly, it is time to raise a cry of protest.

With the heritage of Pierre Monteux behind them, one should have been able to anticipate great things in the Boston Symphony Chamber Players performance of Debussy's three sonatas at their Feb. 15 concert. Admittedly, these are rather advanced works, written in the last years of the composer's life (not after his death, as the dates on the program might lead you to believe). Nevertheless, they are musically sound—certainly not (shudder) "avant-garde"—and they merely deserve a decent amount of rehearsal time which, apparently was not accorded them.

To begin the program, Jules Eskin performed the 1915 sonata for cello and piano accompanied by Michael Tilson Thomas. Anyone familiar with Debussy knows that clarity is of the utmost importance in any performance of this composer's music, and clarity was most severly lacking in Eskin's playing. Whenever he had to play more than 30 notes a minute, his articulation became muddled to the brink of indistinguishability. Combine this with a most awkward sense of timing which completely upset the dramatic spirit of the piece (Debussy had proposed the programmatic title Pierrot fache avec la lune) and you have an embarrasing injustice to a great composer.

Under such circumstances, Michael Tilson Thomas may well deserve a medal for service above and beyond the call of duty. Perhaps it was the experience of rehearsal which enabled him to keep up with Eskin's vagaries, or perhaps he is just one of the few musicians in Boston who plays with his ears open. Whatever the case, he served as an excellent accompanist—fully comprehending the performance situation, however disasterous, at all times.

The second sonata was composed for flute, viola, and harp in 1916. Here it was flautist Doriot Anthony Dwyer who was amiss in articulation, although not as critically, while violist Burton Fine and harpist Ann Hobson handled their parts relatively capably. But again the performance suffered from awkwardness in timing—making for phrases which were practically devoid of any sense of breath. It was the sort of performance one might have expected from an extraordinarily good sight reading—which is to say the work was probably under-rehearsed.

The violin sonata, performed by Joseph Silverstein with Thomas again accompanying, was by far the most satisfactory presentation of the program. While Silverstein's performing without music may have been a bit showy (and he is a ham of the first order), it at least displayed a familiarity with the score, which is more than can be said of the preceding performances. The only annoying factor was an almost malicious tendency of Silverstein's to hasten to retune his instrument at the end of each movement—abruptly shattering the spell of Debussy's magical writing.

There isn't much that can be said about Fred Lerdahl's Wake except that it was performed by string trio (Silverstein, Fine, Eskin), percussion trio (Everett Firth, Arthur Press, Charles Smith), harp (Ann Hobson), and soprano (Bethany Beardslee—all under the direction of Michael Tilson Thomas. No one line of the work could be said to be articulate, nor did the work appear to possess any particular textural qualities. One can only hope that, as in Finnegain's Wake (from which the text was drawn) an intensive analysis will yield far more interesting fruits, but on first listening, the piece was quite tedious.

The program concluded with Stockhausen's Kontakte which was supposed to have featured special lighting effects by the Joshua Light Show. "Inclement weather" put an end to that, however; and so one was forced to pay attention to the music. It would be nice to be able to comment on the relative merits of this work in the field of electronic music (particularly since Stockhausen's four-channel tape entailed some beautiful spatial effects) were it not for the ineptness of the "live" performance by Michael Tilson Thomas and Everett Firth. It is reasonable to assume that they read through the work at least once prior to performing it; but with all their overtly panicked glances, they certainly did not display any sort of fluent feeling for the music in their execution. If they hadn't the time for adequate preparation, why didn't they just strike the work from the program? As it was, the concert ended with a hesitant sizzle by both performers, sustained by each staring at the other in an attempt to ascertain when to stop.

Good-night, Michael.
Good-night, Everett.

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR Tuesday, February 17, 1970

Din is light enough

By Louis Snyder

Cambridge, Mass.

Bad weather en route prevented the Joshua Light Show from keeping its engagement Sunday afternoon as part of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players' series at Sanders Theater, but the large audience that did make it heard (and saw) an unusual and diverting program, even without benefit of mixed media.

It started with a large but pleasant helping of Debussy—three beautiful sonatas in three different instrumental combinations, expertly and beautifully played: Jules Eskin and Michael Tilson Thomas, the sonata for cello and piano (1915); Doriot Anthony Dwyer, Burton Fine, and Ann Hobson, the 1916 trio sonata for flute, viola, and harp; and Joseph Silverstein and Mr. Thomas, the violin and piano sonata (1916-17). Performing honors were even, and the less often heard trio was especially welcome in a tasteful finished rendition.

Harbinger of things to come was the appearance of soprano Bethany Beardslee, for whom the newest music holds no terrors. Surrounded by the Silverstein-Fine-Eskin strings, three percussionists (Everett Firth, Arthur Press, and Charles Smith), Miss Hobson at her harp, and Mr. Thomas as conductor, she launched into Fred Lehrdahl's "Wake," a composition left to make its way alone to the audience without program notes, text words (". .to me," ". .tell me," "my branches," beside the river," "it's ended now," ". . .never"), or any other easily assimilable identifying devices.

Miss Beardslee's voice, which remains a lovely facile organ in spite of the stringent demands of a career in contemporary music, trilled like a modern Lucia. She projected her words as best she could through a tight mesh of instrumental sound, and held her place valiantly in the ensemble of her similarly hardworking colleagues. Their efforts were generously appreciated by the audience, but what was being purveyed — a "Wake" of eye-opening persuasion or the traditional Irish variety — was anybody's guess.

After intermission, BSO manager Thomas D. Perry Jr. announced the absence of the Joshua Light Show and its equipment, but by this time everyone's interest had been absorbed by a stageful of gongs, woodblocks, wind-chimes, drums of every variety, cymbals and other percussion musts. In the midst of all this stood Mr. Firth, while at the piano sat Mr. Thomas, with what appeared to be a red velvet tray of oversized dentist's tools at his side, along with a tam-tam, bamboo bells, and an asbestos ice pitcher. There were two loud speakers onstage, too, and in the shadows stage left, Richard Kay, on signal from Mr. Thomas, set the electronic tape in motion.

Michael Tilson Thomas

. . . appeared as pianist, conductor, and juggler par excellence in Sunday's concert in the Boston Symphony Chamber Players series.

Well! For the next 34 minutes one and all were treated to Karlheinz Stockhausen's "Kontakte," which must be the loudest, busiest, if not the funniest, thing to happen before the public since that late lamented vaudeville extravaganza, "The Plasterers." This is no deprecation. Timing of the split-second variety was essential in both cases, and Mr. Firth and Mr. Thomas produced what must be one of the most accurate realizations of this "score" that has ever occurred. Their poise and ease as they performed against a background of taped wheezes, snorts, rings, buzzes, whirrs, beeps, burps, grunts, whistles, hisses, jet, wind, and cricket sounds, was a marvel of rhythmic and tonal coordination.

How did it sound? Interesting at first in its ingenuous use of timbres, progressively less as the minutes lengthened. Tiresome long before it slowed to a pianissimo halt. Many listeners sat it through, but don't let anyone tell you that the enlightened have an indefinite span of attention, light show or no.

Patriot Ledger Jan. 20, '70

. . . Chamber Players' Contemporary Offering

By Dorothy Newell

Time was when a program of orchestra or ensemble music might include as a token one of those contemporary pieces that can best be described as snatches of sound with no apparent relationship to each other.

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players, in their debut of the decade Sunday afternoon, switched the program about, giving the entre and benediction alone to tradition. The token has taken over.

The winds were segregated from this celebrity-stuffed group for the concert in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge. The only brass were the sweet-toned horns, and the only percussion-strings, the piano.

Harold Budd's "New Work" for oboe, bassoon and piano set the tone for the January program. Ralph Gomberg and Sherman Walt sat back-to-back. Pianist Michael Tilson Thomas was also conductor for the traditional pieces. The winds passed bits and pieces back and forth, now a sustained note that whipped off into a frenzy in highest, then lowest range. The piano simply added accent.

More understandable were two pieces featuring the flute (Doriot Anthony Dwyer), Piston's Trio for Flute, Clarinet and Bassoon, and Messiaen's "Le Merle Noir," for flute and piano.

There were shades of similarity in the Trio's three movements. The flute and clarinet (Gino Cioffi) were in close harmony — though at different speeds — for the Allergo scherzando and Lento, with Walt providing a methodical um-pah for effect. The flute was like a bird's song in the Allegro, with the other two winds breathing accompaniment.

Miss Dwyer was called for an encore for her blackbird's song. She played it twice, apologizing, "It might not be the same bird." But if it wasn't the same it was the sister of blackbird No. 1, complete to the fascinating triple-time trill.

Gomberg was predominent in the players' finale, Mozart's Wind Serenade in C minor K. 388. The only flaw was a rattling bassoon in low-loud range in the Allegro. Sweet tone in the top scale was compensation enough.

Pine Manor To Present Chamber Players Jan. 25

A concert by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players will be presented on Sunday, January 25, at 3 p.m., in Ellsworth Hall, the new performing arts center of Pine Maro, Junior College in Chestnut Hill. The concert, which will be open to the public, will be the first event in the Ellsworth Hall Dedication Series. Miss Bethany Beardslee, soprano, will be the guest artist.

Tickets without charge for the January 25 concert may be obtained by writing to Ellsworth Hall, Pine Manor Junior College, 400 Heath st., Chestnut Hill, Mass. 02167, and enclosing a self-addressed, stamped envelope for the return of the tickets.

Other events in the Ellsworth Hall Dedication Series, also open to the public, will be:

First Chamber Dance Company, 8:30 p.m., Thursday, February 19; Lillian Gish and the Movies, 8:30 p.m., Wednesday, March 4; The Barrow Poets, 8:30 p.m., Sunday, April 19.

CHAMBER CONCERT

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players will present a concert today at 3 p.m. at Pine Manor Junior College in Chestnut Hill.

SUNDAY FORUM
BRAINTREE, MASS.
(S) 5,000
JAN 25 1970

TOWNSMAN
WELLESLEY, MASS.
WEEKLY 8,600
JAN 15 1970

78.

Boston Symphony Quintet to Play Sunday Night at Watson Auditorium

GAZETTE
TAUNTON, MASS.
(E) 13,611

FEB 26 1970

NORTON — The Boston Symphony Quintet will present a public concert on Sunday at 8 p. m. in Watson Auditorium, Wheaton College.

The program will consist of works by Danzi, Piston, Poulenc, Andriessen and Taffanell.

The artists are all principal players with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flutist, joined the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1952 as the first woman to be engaged by the orchestra as a principal. Mrs. Dwyer's teachers included Ernest Liegl, Georges Barrere, William Kincaid, and also Joseph Mariano at the Eastman School of Music, of which Mrs. Dwyer is a graduate.

Before coming to Boston she was a member of the Los Angeles Philharmonic and was chosen by Bruno Walter as first flute with the Hollywood Bowl Symphony the year he was musical director there. Since her appointment to the Boston Symphony she has served on the faculties of the Berkshire Music Center, the New England Conservatory, and Boston University.

Ralph Gomberg, oboe, studied under Marcel Tabuteau. Following his studies at the Curtis Institute, he was appointed by Stokowski as principal oboe of the Baltimore, New York City Center (under Leonard Bernstein), and Mututal Broadcasting Orchestra in 1949 under Charles Munch. Gomberg teaches at Boston University, the New England Conservatory, and at Tanglewood.

Gino Cioffi, clarinet, was born in Naples where he studied at the conservatory with Piccone and Carpio, celebrated clarinetists under Toscanini. Following his graduation at the age of 17, he performed with the outstanding opera, ballet, symphony and chamber orchestras of Italy. Since his arrival in America, he has been the principal clarinetist with the Pittsburgh Symphony under Reiner, the Cleveland Symphony under Rodzinsky and Leinsdorf, the NBC Symphony under Toscanini, and the New York Philharmonic. In addition to his current responsibilities with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he joined in his present post in 1950, he is a member of the faculties of the New England Conservatory, Boston University and the Berkshire Music Center.

Sherman Walt, bassoon, received his musical education at the University of Minnesota before his move to the Curtis Institute where his teachers included Ferdinand Del Negor and Marcel Tabuteau. Military service during World War II, in which he won the Bronze Star, interrupted his career, but upon returning to civilian life he became principal of the Chicago Symphony where he remained until he joined the Boston Symphony as principal bassoon in 1952. Walt is a teacher at the New England Conservatory and the Berkshire Music Center and devoted considerable time to chamber music.

James Stagliano, horn, has been the principal horn in the St. Louis, Chicago, and Los Angeles orchestras. Prior to coming to the Boston Symphony in 1945, he was with the Cleveland Orchestra under Erich Leinsdorf with whom he was reunited in 1962 when Leinsdorf was appointed music director of the Boston Symphony. In 1949 at Tanglewood he played the first performance of the Strauss Horn Concerto No. 2.

CHRONICLE
WILLIMANTIC, CONN.

FEB 25 1970

Ensemble Will Perform Here On March 1st

STORRS — Three of the mainstays of the Region's leading orchestra will perform here as a chamber ensemble March 1, when the Boston Symphony String Trio appears at the University of Connecticut.

The performance, which is scheduled at 8:15 p.m. in the Von Der Mehden Ricital Hall, will consist of Beethoven's "Trio in C Minor," Opus 1, No. 3; Schoenberg's "String Trio," Opus 45; and Mozart's "Divertimento in E Flat Major for String Trio," K.563.

Members of the trio are violinist Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster; Burton Fine, principal violist, and Jules Eskin, principal cellist.

Silverstein joined the Boston Orchestra in 1955 at the age of 23, becoming concertmaster seven years later. He has appeared frequently as soloist with the BSO and the Boston Pops. He teaches at the New England Conservatory of Music and is chairman of the Berkshire Music Center faculty.

Fine joined the Boston Symphony as second violinist in 1963, after nine years as a research chemist with NASA. He assumed his present chair at the start of his second year after winning extensive auditons in competition with orchestral and chamber music players across the nation.

Eskin joined the BSO from the Cleveland Orchestra where he had been principal cello three years. He has studied under Gregor Piatigorsky, Leonard Rose and Janos Starker, and won the 1954 Naumburg Foundation Award.

Each of the trio members studied at the Curtis Institute of Music.

Three of the mainstays of the region's leading orchestra will perform at Storrs as a chamber ensemble Sunday when the Boston Symphony String Trio appears at the University of Connecticut. The performance is scheduled at 8:15 p.m. in the Von der Mehden Recital Hall. Members of the trio are violinist Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster, Burton Fine, principal violinist, and Jules Eskin, principal cellist.

Office of Dr. John W. Suplicki, closed until Friday March 13th. Adv.

BULLETIN
NORWICH, CONN.
(M) 31,475 (S) 28,895

FEB 25 1970

MAR 4 1970

Boston String Trio Offers Fine UC Recital

By The Chronicle Music Critic

A very fine offering of the chamber music series at the University of Connecticut took place on Sunday evening. The Boston Symphony String Trio consisting of Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster, Burton Fine, principal viola, and Jules Eskin, principal cello, presented a program consisting of Beethoven, Schoenberg, and Mozart. This trio of instrumentalists have fine tones individually and they blend together into an excellent chamber organization.

The program opened with the Beethoven Trio in C minor. (Some checking of references would indicate an error in the opus number as listed in the program.) It is an early work, easy to listen to, and shows the composer's sense of form even before he began his great series of quartets. Particularly interesting is the spirited and yet delicated Menuetto which the Boston Trio performed with fine contrast.

The Schoenberg String Trio, Opus 45 (1946), a trio in one movement, followed next. It probably should be stated that the music of Schoenberg is a matter of individual taste. Another was to state it would be that it appeared to one listener, at least, as a composition without much musical substance, or much to do about nothing. For those who like it, fine.

It was with a sense of relief and a brightening horizon that the Trio turned to the music of Mozart following the intermission and performed the Divertimento in E flat major for string trio, K. 563. This is a long trio, but fine Mozart all the way.

The opening Allegro is almost quartet writing in its style and scope. The Adagio which follows is powerful with the considerable depth of feeling which often was seen in many of Mozart's chamber works. A classic Menuetto is followed by two more short movements before the familiar Allegro finale which bounces along in the composer's finest style.

This is one of those choice Mozart melodies which can make an audience leave the recital hall whistling what they have just heard. The Boston Trio was very good, indeed, in the Mozart; the forward movement of the music was excellent, the balance was fine.

An enthusiastic applause was rewarded with an encore in the form of the Andante of the first string trio of Beethoven. This was the first visit of the Trio to the University and it was a considerable success.

Boston Chamber Players Appear at Union Sunday

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players, an ensemble of the Boston Symphony's principal artists, will appear in concert at the Union College Memorial Chapel at 7:30 p.m. Sunday.

* * *

Their appearance is sponsored by the Union College-Schenectady Museum Concert Committee as part of its 1969-1970 music series.

Now in their sixth season, the Chamber Players have well achieved the symphony's goal of introducing its members to the public as individual artists of considerable merit.

Appearing in Sunday's concert will be Gino Cioffi, clarinet; Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute; Armando Ghitalla, trumpet; William Gibson, trombone; Ralph Gomberg, oboe; James Stagliano, French horn; and Sherman Walt, bassoon.

Beides appearing in many states in this country, the group has played in London and has toured Germany and the Soviet Union. In 1966, their first recordings received the coveted "Grammy" award.

* * *

Sunday's program will feature "Woodwind Quintet in G minor," by Franz Danzi; "Three Pieces for Flute, Clarinet, Bassoon," by Walter Piston; "Trio for Horn, Trumpet, Trombone," by Francis Poulenc; "Trio No. 4 for Flute, Oboe, Bassoon," by Jurriaan Andriessen; and "Quinter for Wind Instruments," by Paul Taffanell.

Tickets, at $3 for adults, $1 for students, will be available at the door or in advance at the Schenectady Museum.

SCHENECTADY GAZETTE
Tuesday, March 3, 1970

Albany Knickerbocker News
Friday, March 6, 1970

BOSTON'S BEST—These are five of the seven members of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will play Sunday at 7:30 in Union College's Memorial Chapel. The program will include works by Danzi, Piston, Poulenc, Andriessen and Taffanell.

Weekend chamber music

BSCP

By Louis Snyder

Cambridge, Mass.

The pleasurable rewards of chamber music, expertly and lovingly played, were liberally dispensed by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players on Sunday afternoon in Sanders Theater. Four string players — Joseph Silverstein (violin), Burton Fine (viola), Jules Eskin (cello), and Henry Portnoi (bass), and four woodwind players — Doriot Anthony Dwyer (flute), Ralph Gomberg (oboe), Gino Cioffi (clarinet), Sherman Walt (bassoon), and James Stagliano (horn), were joined by two associates, Max Hobart (violin) and Robert Levin (harpsichord), for something newer by Elliott Carter and Alvin Etler, and something older by Telemann and Dvorak.

There were four fine sounds (flute, oboe, violin and harpsichord) for the Telemann Quartet which rippled and sang and only briefly put on a serious face. The Carter Sonata, however, which uses the same instruments except cello instead of violin, is a large order to play and to hear. Rhythmically intricate, it seems composed of an infinite number of fragmentary ideas, none of which is held on to long enough to be assimilated. Can one learn to love this piece? Time will tell. (The musicians came through it with flying colors.)

Two quintets

Mr. Etler's Wind Quintet No. 2 is a congenial work from the outset, knowledgeably scored for the woodwind family and handsomely played by five of its most distinguished members. It ends with a jolly Vivace preceded by an impressive Adagio, both of which built a solid foundation for the rousing reception it received.

There was another rousing reception for the Dvorak String Quintet in G, which also was given a stunning performance. By turns fiery, solemn, exhilarating, and continually melodious, the five movements were exquisitely played, each seemingly more than the last.

The concert began with a finely etched performance of the Adagio from Mozart's Divertimento in E-flat, played in memory of Mrs. Talcott M. Banks, late friend of the orchestra, by Mr. Silverstein, Mr. Eskin, and Mr. Fine.

NEWS
FRAMINGHAM, MASS.
(E) 19,654

MAR 9 1970

Symphony Players In 4th Concert

BOSTON — The Boston Symphony Chamber Players, a group composed of the principals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, give the fourth of their five concert series in Sanders Theatre, Harvard, Sunday, March 15, at 3 p.m.

This series is sponsored jointly by the Harvard University Dept. of Music and the Boston Symphony Orchestra and includes in each program at least one work of a Harvard or regional composer.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

MAR 16 1970

BSO Chamber Players perform Mozart, Hindemith

The comparatively small audience that attended the Boston Symphony Chamber Players concert yesterday at Sanders Theater was treated to an afternoon of very enjoyable music and fine ensemble playing. The variety of instruments and styles made this program a particularly interesting one.

In memory of Mrs. Talcott M. Banks, Mozart's Adagio from the Divertimento in E Flat for string trio, K.563 opened the program. Although stripped from the other movements, this Adagio communicates the deep pathos and drama that prevail in Mozart's later works.

The Telemann Quartet for flute, oboe, violin, and continuo was well played in general, but it lacked, at times, the rhythmic vitality that is so essential to the Baroque style.

The high point of the program was the Elliott Carter Sonata for flute, oboe, cello, and harpsichord (1952). The choice of instrumentation here was an especially felicitous one. In the first movement the "metrical modulation" technique that Carter frequently uses was most apparent. The slow movement of the piece is hauntingly expressive with the cello, flute, and oboe making short epigrammatic statements set against the predominantly harpsichord writing.

The end of this movement is cut suddenly by a short, rhythmic toccata-like utterance only to return to the original mood. The harpsichord introduces a lyrical waltz-like section in the last movement, which later becomes more complex and contains vertical and horizontal textures that lead up to a climactic orgy of sounds. The playing was clear and exciting, particularly in the harpsichord (where the writing was not very idiomatic) and in the difficult flute passages.

The Alvin Etler Wind Quintet No. 2, which opened the second half of the program, conveyed strong overtones of Hindemith. One cannot avoid comparing the work with the Carter Sonata, which is such a uniquely individual piece. Both works were composed in the early 1950's. Etler's woodwind writing, however, is very effective (since he is an oboist himself.

The final composition on the program was Dvorak's String Ouintet in G (1875). Although this piece bears the opus number 77, it was originally composed earlier as Opus 18. The later version, Op. 77, contains only some minor changes. This is a delightful and charming piece with a strong Bohemian flavor. It shows traces of the influence of Schubert and Brahms and foretells Dvorak's later and more mature quartets and especially the piano quintet. This particular quintet received a spirited, intense performance filled with vigor and spontaneity — a fitting end to a highly successful concert.

HUSNU ONARAN

BLANK PAGE

80

Festival Quartet gives Hub Concert

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

The Festival String Quartet, which gave a concert in Jordan Hall yesterday afternoon, is made up of four of the youngest players in the Boston Symphony Orchestra: violinists Christopher Kimber and Ikuko Mizuno, violist Yizhak Schotten, and cellist Jerome Patterson.

It is a good quartet. I remember that it made a strong impression on the audience at the finals of the state Arts Council sponsored Young Musicians: Performance in Prospect competition last December — though not unfortunately on the jury — and it was interesting and rewarding to have a chance to hear them in a full concert of their own. The program: Leon Kirchner's String Quartet No. 1, the Beethoven F major, Op. 59, No. 1, and, with Victor Rosenbaum, Schumann's Piano Quartet in E flat, Op. 47.

The four players are strong and sure as instrumentalists. Their sound is brilliant and transparent, they don't scratch, and they play admirably in tune. They are good musicians, too.

Their ideas are seriously considered and they make sense. Moreover, unlike many of the chamber ensembles that the Boston Symphony has spawned — and I am thinking particularly of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players — the Festival Quartet is evidently a responsible group that is willing to work hard to achieve real ensemble. They know that chamber music involves rehearsing beyond that minimal point at which one can be sure that the performance won't actually break down, and new as they are, they already sound like a real and unified quartet.

The indebtedness to Bartok is at times so obtrusive as to be disturbing in Kirchner's 1949 Quartet, but the work has enough invention, intensity of feeling, and vitality, to overcome that problem and to emerge as one of the most appealing of contemporary quartets. I thought the Festival Quartet stated the case for it brilliantly and compellingly.

Their Beethoven performance was sometimes hot, sometimes cool, not often warm. It was coherent and lucid, completely absorbing to listen to, and I was glad to hear the first movement played as a real Allegro, not as the solemn Andante that has become so fashionable as a mode of misrepresenting the big first movements of Beethoven's middle period. The performance was just a little treble-heavy — the first violinist's tone and phrasing are exceptionally intense and the cellist needs to compensate for this rather more than he now does — and I hope that the players will catch on to the fact that a pianissimo in Beethoven means something more than a slighter softer piano, that it implies a distinction in kind and character much more than merely one of dynamic degree.

This is not the BSO Chamber Players, but rather BSO musicians who formed another group. Another review may be found on page 181.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

MAY 5 1970 Ne

BSO Chamber Players will appear here

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players will present a concert in Chapin Hall on the Williams College campus May 18 at 8.30 p.m.

Sponsored by the Council on the Arts and Humanities in cooperation with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the concert is one of a series to be presented this spring in six Massachusetts communities. Also included is a concert set for May 19 at 8.30 p.m. at Berkshire Community College in Pittsfield.

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players were formed in 1964 by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to provide a new performing experience for its first desk members. Under the management of the orchestra the chamber players offer numerous concerts of chamber music to the public, in Boston and across the country.

The members of the chamber players are: Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster; Burton Fine, principal viola; Jules Eskin, principal cello; Henry Portnoi, principal bass; Doriot Anthony Dwyer, principal flute; Ralph Gomberg, principal oboe; Gino Cioffi, principal clarinet; Sherman Walt, principal bassoon; James Stagliano, principal horn; Armando Ghitalla, principal trumpet; William Gibson, principal trombone; and Everett Firth, principal timpanist. Their pianist is Michael Tilson Thomas, the orchestra's assistant conductor.

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
(E) 13,500

MAY 4 1970

Chamber players . due in 6 towns

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players will give concerts in six communities, presented by the Council on the Arts and Humanities in cooperation with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

All concerts will be given free, and will be held in the following places:

Lawrence (the Bruce School), at 6:30 p.m., May 16.

Lawrence (the Kane School), at 6:30, May 17.

Williamstown (Chapin Hall, Williams College), at 8:30, May 18.

Pittsfield (Berkshire Community College), at 8:30, May 19.

Orleans (the Nauset Regional High School), at 8:20, May 20.

Falmouth (the Lawrence High School), at 8:20, May 21.

Barnstable (the Barnstable High School), at 8:20, May 22.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

MAY 5 1970 N

Boston Symphony Chamber Players In Free Concerts

785

The Massachusetts Council of the Arts and Humanities, in cooperation with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will present a series of free spring concerts by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players in six Massachusetts communities.

They are Lawrence, May 16, Bruce School, 6:30 p.m.; Lawrence. May 17, Kane School, 6:30 p.m., Williamstown, May 18, Chapin Hall, Williams College, 8:30 p.m.; Pittsfield, May 19, Berkshire Community College, 8:30 p.m.; Orleans, May 20, Nauset Regional High School, 8:30 p.m.; Falmouth, May 21, Lawrence High School, 8:30 p.m. and Barnstable, May 22, Barnstable High School, 8:20 p.m.

Boston SymphonyPlan Concerts

785

BOSTON —The Council on the Arts and Humanities, in cooperation with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will present a series of spring concerts by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players in six Massachusetts communities: Lawrence, Williamstown, Pittsfield, Orleans, Falmouth, and Barnstable.

Regional Sponsors

The concerts are being organized in each community by regional sponsors. The South Mountain Association of Berkshire County has arranged two concerts, one with the Department of Music at Williams College and one with the Berkshire Community College.

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players were formed in 1964 by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to provide a new performing experience for its first desk members.

They are more flexible than a single ensemble with a fixed number of performers. They take advantage of their special situation to draw upon the wide variety of instrumental combinations available among the orchestra's virtuoso principal players. This enables them to present chamber music which is not frequently performed, from duos to septets and nonets, as well as works for the more standard ensembles.

The schedule of concerts in Western Massachusetts is as follow: Williamstown, May 18, Chapin Hall, Williams College, 8.30; Pittsfield, May 19, Berkshire Community College, 8.30.

All concerts are being given free of charge.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77

MAY 6 1970

GAINESVILLE, FLA.
SUN
D. 21,000 S. 22,000

MAR 1 1970

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players, the first-desk players from all of the sections of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be in residence during the week of May 4 on the university campus, sponsored jointly by Student Government Productions with the aid of a grant from the National Foundation on the Arts and the Humanities, administered through the Fine Arts Council of Florida. The chamber players will present four concerts Tuesday through Friday, May 5-8. In addition, they will present more than 20 master classes, or clinic-workshops, for musicians on the University campus and from the surrounding community. Please mark these outstanding events on your calendar and plan to attend and to participate.

Boston Chamber on Cape

Three concerts by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players will be presented on the Cape by the Council on the Arts and Humanities, in cooperation with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. They are sponsored by the Cape Cod Conservatory of Music and Arts.

The Chamber Players, headed by Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster, will perform at Nauset Regional High School in Orleans on May 20 at 8:20 p.m.; Lawrence High School in Falmouth, May 21, 8:20 p.m.; and Barnstable High School on May 22 at 8:20 p.m.

Audiences that rarely have the opportunity, will be able to enjoy these fine concerts free of charge.

ADVOCATE
PROVINCETOWN, MASS.
WEEKLY 3,345

MAY 7 1970 Ne

BOSTON SYMPHONY CHAMBER PLAYERS

Presented by the Cape Cod Conservatory of Music and Arts, the Boston Symphony Chamber Players will appear in invitation concerts on the Cape. On Wednesday, May 20, at Nauset Regional High School in Orleans, at 8 p. m. and on Friday, May 22, at Barnstable High auditorium at 8:30 p. m., featured works by Schubert and Beethoven and a wind quintet by Alvin Etler will be played.

The Chamber Players, comprising the principals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, were established as a separate ensemble in 1964 and have since toured extensively in this country and Europe. They include Joseph Silverstein, violinist and concertmaster, Burton Fine, viola; Jules Eskin, cello; Sherman Walt, Bassoon; Henry Portnoi, bass; James Stagliano, horn; Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute; Gino Cioffi, clarinet, and Ralph Gomberg, oboe.

Receptions are planned following each of the concerts: the Lower Cape reception at Wequasset Inn on Pleasant Bay, East Harwich and the Midcape reception at Holiday Inn in Hyannis.

Regional volunteer committees are in charge of all arrangements. The Rev. C. David White is general chairman for the Lower Capel and Mrs. William C. Lundquest of West Hyannis Port and Mrs. John Bambara of Osterville are co-chairmen of the general committee for the concert and reception in Hyannis. Friends of the Conservatory who have received invitations are urged to mail their returns promptly so that any available seats can be assigned to persons whose names are on waiting lists.

ORACLE
ORLEANS, MASS.
WEEKLY 10,206

MAY 14 1970

81.

radio & television

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

SEP 11 1969

New England Newsclip

Four-Channel Stereo For BSO Broadcasts

A unique cooperative venture between two Boston radio stations begins Sept. 27 when WGBH-FM and WCRB AM-FM join forces to broadcast all Saturday night Boston Symphony concerts in four-channel stereo.

Marking William Steinberg's first concerts as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the program will include the overture "Consecration of the House" by Beethoven, Shubert's Symphony No. 9 (The Great), Six pieces for Orchestra by Webern and Richard Strauss' "Til Eulenspiegels's Merry Pranks".

WGBH and WRCB will continue to air all Saturday concerts in four-channel stereo; WGBH will also broadcast Friday afternoon programs, live and in 2-channel stereo starting at 2 pm Friday, Sept. 26.

Owners of mono sound systems can achieve the stereo effect by using two ordinary monaural radios, one tuned to WGBH, the other to WCRB.

VARIETY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W.-CIRC. N. AVAIL.

SEP 10 1969

IN BOSTON . . .

Paul Steele, former producer director at WBZ-TV, joined WKBG-TV . . . Unique co-op venture between two radio stations starts Sept. 27 when WGBH-FM and WCRB-AM-FM join forces to broadcast all Saturday night Boston Symphony concerts in four channel stereo . . .WEEI radio newsman Howard Nelson back from working vacation in Switzerland where he attended International Youth music festival as trustee of Boston Youth symphony . . . WBZ-TV's "Eyewitness News" and "New England Today" prepping series on college campus mood for telecasting week of Sept. 14 . . . N.Y. Post sports columnist Larry Merchant doing twice a week sports commentary for WBZ-TV, and femme pro football expert Elinor Kaine returns to Group W station with gridiron commentary . . . Gene Davis, adpromo chief WOWO Ft. Wayne, named audience promo manager at WBZ-TV . . . New tv station, WXPO-TV (Ch. 50), Lowell, starts full programming Sept. 28 . . . Helen Peters, p. r. director for WGBH-TV, holding NET previews Sept. 25 for 1969-70 new programs . . . WEEI give away of cameras hit the 100 mark in a promotion in which entrants match final zip code digit with last telephone digit of caller on air when prize alarm sounds.

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901

SEP 22 1969

Upcoming Concerts

William Steinberg, newly appointed music director of the Boston Symphony, will conduct the first live televised concert of the season at 8:30 p.m. Oct. 7 on channel 2. It will telecast direct from Boston's Syphony Hall in color.

In another concert, at the other end of the musical spectrum, folksinger Judy Collins and jazz trumpeter Don Ellis and his orchestra are presented in a concert recorded by WGBH this summer at Tanglewood. You can see and hear it on channel 2's "N.E.T. Festival" at 8 p.m. Oct. 8.

Announcements of specific live broadcasts (such as these announcements) will be found with the program announcements & reviews of those concerts.

BSO on TV

William Steinberg, recently appointed music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct the first ~~live~~ televised concert of the season Tuesday, Oct. 7 at 8:30 p.m. on Channels 2 and 44.

Concert will be broadcast direct from Symphony Hall in color and will be aired simultaneously in stereo by WGBH radio 89.7 FM). Program includes Haydn's Symphony No. 55 (The Schoolmaster). Concerto for Violin, Cello and Orchestra by Robert Starer (Joseph Silverstein, violin; Jules Eskin, cello) and Elgar's Symphony No. 2 in E Flat, Op. 63.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

SEP 25 1969

ALBANY TIMES UNION
Friday, September 19, 1969

047

Compass Points Of Capitaland

By Barnett Fowler

Friday Musical: Quite obviously a strong source of public opinion has been trapped in the desire of many for a radio station devoted to far better music than that offered generally by Marconi outlets in this area. Mail volume has gone up insofar as we're concerned and we are under the impression that many also are sending letters of support to Channel 17 Sch'dy, in its efforts to obtain FCC approval for a non-commercial station, to be devoted to sounds better than the current squeals, grunts, groans, sobs and tonal butchery which greet most of us—if and when we turn the knob.

It is not the desire of this column to pit one station against the other. We have, in the past, brought out the fact that WAMC, the FM radio station of Albany Medical College, broadcasting at 90.3 MHZ, has done yeoman duty in its offering of classics. The following, therefore, will be of interest:

Spec:

Channel 17 putting in for an FM station to broadcast classical music is about like WAMC filing a TV application so Misterogers can be seen in this area.

By Sept. 30, we will have broadcast approximately 152 hours of classical music this month, including the first LIVE concerts of the new season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra: two programs produced by us from the South Mountain concerts; another locally produced program from the Albany Chamber Music Society—not to mention weekly broadcasts from the New England Conservatory of Music, Radio Nederland, Deutsche Welle, the Canadian Broadcasting Corp., the French and German Broadcasting Systems, the Gardner Museum concerts from Boston, the Pan American concerts from Washington, the radio piano course of Prof. Findlay Cockrell of SUNY-Albany, and, for good measure, Ed Beach, who does the finest jazz show on anybody's air.

It's apparent readers bewailing loss of the Troy Station as the loss of ALL classical music in this area, just don't know what they're talking about; I can only assume they've become so conditioned to scratchy phonograph records and malaprop c[illegible] on them, that they've lost the incentiv[illegible] thing better.

Although WAMC is oper[illegible] by the Albany College for Medical LAS VEGAS, NEV.

SUN
D. 33,500 S. 32,000

SEP 28 1969

BOSTON SYMPHONY — Tonight Inga Swenson will be featured on the "Boston Symphony Orchestra" on Channel 5. Erich Leinsdorf, conductor, and the Boston Symphony will present Brahms, "Variations on a Theme of Haydn" and Mendelssohn's Overture" (Op. 21), and Incidental Music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" (Op. 61). The Overture, Scherzo, Nocturne, and Wedding March will be performed. Miss Swenson will be the speaker.

Radio To Air BSO Concerts In 4-Channel Stereo Sound

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

AUG 16 1969

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

AUG 26 1969

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

AUG 18 1969

NEWS
FRAMINGHAM, MASS.
(E) 19,654

AUG 21 1969

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and radio stations WCRB and WGBH plan to broadcast the Saturday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony during the orchestra's coming winter season in four-channel stereophonic sound. These broadcasts will be the first public presentation anywhere of a new technique which brings realism and concert-hall dimension to reproduced sound.

The broadcasts from Symphony Hall in Boston will begin with the concert of Sept. 27, and will continue each Saturday at 8:30 p.m. through April 25. On those weekends when the orchestra is not playing in Boston, specially prepared tape recordings of other actual Boston Symphony concerts in four-channel stereo will be presented by both stations in synchronization.

Loud Speakers

These special programs will be transmitted by WGBH-FM at 89.7 mc and WCRB-FM at 102.5 mc in fm multiplex. Stereo receivers tuned to each station will be needed to reproduce the four channels of sound.

The stations recommend that listeners place their additional two loud-speakers in the rear corners of their listening rooms, with WGBH's "left" channel at their left rear, WGHB's "right" channel at their left front, WCRB's "left" channel at their right front, and WCRB's "right" channel at their right rear. The broadcasts are designed to allow a number of satisfactory two-channel stereo reception possibilities in addition to the four-channel sound. Listeners who do not have two multiplex stereo receivers may obtain two-channel stereo by receiving either station alone in fm multiplex or by receiving both stations on monophonic receivers with WGBH on the left. It will also be possible to use a receiver tuned to WGBH-FM and one tuned to WCRB (AM) at 1330 kc. Mono reception will be possible from any of the stations.

82

BAY STATE BUSINESS WORLD
NORWOOD, MASS.
W.-CIRC. 5. AVAIL.

OCT 8 1969

Radio stations WCRB and WCBH will broadcast the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Saturday evening concerts during this Winter season in four-channel stereophonic sound. This new sound reproduction technique was developed in part by Acoustic Research, Inc., Cambridge, sponsor of the broadcasts.

To reproduce the four sound channels in concert-hall dimensions, you will need stereo receivers tuned to each station—WGBH-FM at 89.7 Mc and WCRB-FM at 102.5 Mc.

Listeners who do not have two multiplex stereo receivers may obtain two-channel stereo from either station alone in FM multiplex or can receive both stations on monophonic receivers, with WCBH on the left.

Conventional monophonic or stereophonic recording is generally thought to record the instruments being played, for which the speaker systems are then substitutes. The new four-channel recording aims at recording the exact sound, direct and reflected, heard in a certain location in the concert hall.

Four-channel stereophonic reception requires a sizable amount of equipment, but the result, for those who prefer to listen at home, should be well worth it.

by Ian Alberts

Has Success Spoiled FM?

THE BIGGEST NEWS in FM broadcasting these days, certainly where lovers of concert music are concerned, has been the advent of four-channel stereo FM transmissions. In the Boston area this fall two stereo FM stations, WCRB and WGBH, are regaling listeners with live and taped quadriphonic broadcasts of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts. The concerts can be received in mono or stereo by listening to either station. But if you receive both stations, and play them through stereo systems on opposite sides of your listening room, you will be hearing four separate and distinct channels of musical information: four-channel stereo, in fact, which adds a new and dramatic sense of realism and "hall ambience" to the program heard at home. The system was worked out jointly by engineers from the two stations, Acoustic Research, Inc. (which will sponsor the broadcasts), and the Boston Symphony Transcription Trust.

Whether or not this system becomes widely used in other communities, it does represent, and in a big way, FM on the move. And move it must, since technical improvements are badly needed. Of the three basic program sources—FM, disc, and tape—FM gets the lowest grade for sonic quality by a substantial margin. What progress has been made in the last few years has applied mostly to the receiving, rather than to the broadcasting, end.

It has been significant progress, though. In fact, many experts now allow that the best of today's stereo tuners and receivers are capable of receiving better sound than is customarily being transmitted. [See "How We Judge Stereo Tuners" in this issue.]

There also has been progress in antenna designs. The more highly directional an antenna, the less likely it is to pick up reflected signals coming from other directions. Antenna design is very esoteric—understandable mainly to a few engineers and war-

BILLBOARD
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 24,000

NOV 1 1969

Boston Concerts' Unique Hookup

BOSTON — Two Boston operations have teamed to present the Saturday night Boston Symphony concerts in unique four-channel stereo. Stations are WCRB, WCRB-FM, and WGBH-FM. The transmissions are reportedly compatible in ordinary stereo for people with only one FM stereo receiver. But those who own two FM stereo receivers supposedly benefit from a sense of presence when setting a dial to each station.

ENTERPRISE & TIMES
BROCKTON, MASS.
(E) 53,254

NOV 15 1969

New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert Due on Tuesday

The brilliant young Japanese-born conductor Seiji Ozawa will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carl Orff's "Carmina Burana" to highlight the second live Symphony color telecast of the season Tuesday at 8:30 P.M. on Channel 2.

The full program will be telecast live from Symphony Hall and broadcast simultaneously in stereo by WGBH-FM.

The concert opens with November Steps No. 1 by Takemitsu, followed after intermission by Orff's Carmina Burana, a work of dramatic vitality that demands virtuoso singing from soloists and chorus alike. For the performance guest conductor Ozawa, music director of the Toronto Symphony has invited soprano Evelyn Mandac, tenor Stanley Kolk, baritone Sherrill Milnes and the New England Conservatory Chorus.

Television producer for this Symphony telecast is Jordan Whitelaw, William Cosel is the TV director. Symphony announcer is William Pierce.

SYRACUSE HERALD JOURNAL
Wednesday, November 19, 1969

CLASSICAL MUSIC: Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the Boston Symphony in Stereo. Selections are Varese's Deserts for Orchestra and electronic sound; Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 4 in G, and Stravinsky's "The Firebird," Ballet Suite. 8 p.m., WONO-FM.

IN SPITE OF CRITICISMS of the Boston Symphony Orchestra lately, the highlight of my viewing is attending a concert via TV cable. Those evenings don't come often enough for me. Bob Hope's Christmas Special is an annual star performance, and never fails to bring tears to my eyes.

TRANSCRIPT
PETERBOROUGH, N. H.
WEEKLY 4,150

JAN 15 1970

N Eng

RECORDER-TRANSCRIPT
JAFFREY, N. H.
4,100

JAN 15 1970

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 130,000

OV 1969

nhn New Hampshire Network Highlights

NHN's Column Eight looks at "The State of the State" in an interview with J. Oliva Huot, newly named chairman of New Hampshire's Democratic Party, conducted by Jack Hubbard and Neal Seavey today at 7:30 p. m. on Channels 11 Durham, 15 Hanover, 40 Berlin, 49 Littleton and 52 Keene. The program will be repeated Friday, Dec. 12 at 3 p. m. and Sunday, Dec. 14 at 7:30 p.m.

Soames files for divorce, naming Jo in his suit; June and Jolly go to South Africa to aid victims of the Boer War in "The Forsyte Saga" Sunday, Dec. 14 at 9 p.m. The continuing drama, produced by the BBC and based on the novels of John Galsworthy chronicling the lives of one of Britain's most influential families, is repeated Mondays at 2:30 p.m. and Thursdays at 9 p.m. on NHN.

NET Journal presents the dramatic odyssey of a man searching through Israel for a friend with whom he survied his detention in a German concentration camp, titled "Kaddish," Monday, Dec. 15 at 9 p.m. on NHN.

UNIONLEADER
MANCHESTER, N. H.
(M&E) 57,003

DEC 11 1969

New Engl Jour

"The World and Work of Winslow Eaves," a portrait of the East Andover sculptor, filmed in his studio, home and at exhibitions of his work, is telecast in color Tuesday, Dec. 16 at 8 p.m. and repeated Friday, Dec. 19 at 2:30 and Sunday, Dec. 21 at 6 p. m.

Author Theodore White and William F. Buckley Jr. discuss White's "The Making of a President" on "Firing Line," Tuesday, Dec. 16 at 9 in color.

The Modern Jazz Quartet performs on NHN when NET Festival presents "Jazz at Tanglewood," recorded at the 1968 Berkshire Music Festival, Wednesday, Dec. 17 at 8 p.m., repeated Sunday, Dec. 21 at 8 p.m. in color.

New Hampshire Network programming is telecast on Channel 11 Durham, Channel 15 Hanover, Channel 40 Berlin, Channel 49 Littleton, Channel 52 Keene and cable television systems throughout the state.

Classroom TV Music Series Using Contemporary Format

BLOOMINGTON, Ind. — A rock 'n' roll group will star in a proposed series of educational television programs available to schools next year in an unprecedented effort to present music in U.S. classrooms through modern electronic communications. The program has the backing of widely recognized music educators and the American Music Conference (AMC) and is budgeted at $523,000. AMC executive vice-president James Bixby is asking members of the music industry to help fund the project which is being produced by the National Instructional Television Center (NIT) here.

Said Bixby: "The 16-part mu- a variety of instrumentation, including keyboard and all families of brass, woodwinds, strings and percussion. The programs are beamed at youngsters at an age level when they are most seriously motivated to become involved in music."

The program, which grew out of a 1967 study by the Tanglewood Symposium, will involve WGBH-TV, Boston, which will put on staff a rock group in the 17-19-year-old age bracket worksic program series, that includes the indoctrination of classroom teachers, is of particular significance, we believe, because of its broad range of instruction involving all forms of music and ing with jazz and classical musician and teacher Newton Wayland. "We aim to lead a student

(Continued on page 68)

BILLBOARD
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 24,000

DEC 13 1969

Classroom TV Music Series

• Continued from page 66

into an understanding of his teacher's jazz and classical music and to give the teacher an understanding of his students' love of rock music," said Bixby, describing the philosophy of the series.

Those wishing to contribute or obtain additional information may write: Larry Walcoff, program associate, National Instructional Television, Box A, Bloomington, Ind. 47401 or phone (812) 339-2203.

locks—but it seems reasonable to assume that there will be improvements here too.

The same basic idea—improving the signal going into the tuner—lies behind the growth of cable FM. A properly designed cable system is immune to multipath problems, and just about any form of interference. In addition, the signals of stations too far away for reception on home antennas can be picked up and piped in—which accounts for the cable's popularity in suburban and rural areas. In urban centers the main demand for a cable has to do not with the desire for more stations but with cleaner reception of the stations already available.

But cable FM is still in its early stages. Indeed, it is usually considered merely as an added attraction that cable-TV operators can add at little extra expense. As such, it may receive far less attention than the TV signals that pay its way on the cable. FM pickup, for example, often is managed with a single, relatively modest antenna—as opposed to the array of highly directional jobs that pick TV signals, channel by channel, from the ether. So, while cable FM reception may be better than home antenna reception, it often could stand improvement.

What is most distressing is that even with a "perfect" tuner and a "perfect" antenna or cable system, the sound quality of FM would be inferior to tapes and records. This has nothing to do with inherent limitations on the potential quality of a broadcast signal. It's just that most FM stations seem to have discouragingly low standards. Any really good home stereo system is sure to have better record-playing equipment than you'll find in many radio studios. One of the reasons is that the finest phono cartridges are much too delicate to put up with demands made by professional use. And the sturdy equipment doesn't always have the highest fidelity.

As home audio equipment improves, some pressure for improvement may begin to be felt by the broadcast industry. At present, there isn't much pressure. Signal quality is "adequate," and there doesn't seem to be much prospect of significant improvement in the near future. Broadcasting traditionally has shown little inclination to be ahead of its audience. But home equipment is getting better and will continue to get better, so the radio stations are bound to get better too. When the general public has learned the gospel of high fidelity, it will start demanding good sound. Till then—well, the sound is adequate.

Signal quality also can be limited by program sources of course; and those sources reflect station programming policy which, in turn, reflects the economics of broadcasting. And in FM, the economic realities have changed radically in the last few years. In some cities, FM set penetration has reached nearly eighty per cent. Between 1960 and 1967, the number of FM receivers in the country increased by 670 per cent. And during the same period, FM time sales increased by a healthy 326 per cent. Again, while the single most important reason for this growth is FM's potential for quality sound, the sound is nowhere near as good as it could be. But it is mile ahead of AM, the clincher being the introductio of stereo FM.

The figures make clear just how fast the growt of stereo broadcasting has been. In June 1961, ther were only two stations broadcasting in stereo. B the beginning of this year, there were 738. Mos experts believe that the number will soon reac 1,000. AM shows no signs of dying out, but if FM keeps on growing at its present rate it may becom the predominant broadcasting medium. It is this tre mendous audience growth, plus the effects of som recent government decisions, that are going to hav the major impact on FM's development during th next few years.

Uncle Sam Steps In

The precise role of the government—or more exactly, of the Federal Communications Commission—is hard to pinpoint. In the past, the FCC has seemed unsure of just what it wanted to do. Perhaps this uncertainty doesn't really matter much, though, since most of the government decisions had results quite different from those expected. Sometimes the FCC has acted as if it were "out to get" FM. Take, for example, what happened in 1945: the FCC decided that the band of frequencies being used by FM should be given over to television, and every FM receiver in the country instantly became obsolete. The effects of more recent decisions haven't always been very much better, but at least the FCC's intentions have been good.

Since there was little money to be made in FM in its early years, there was a need for the cheapest possible programming. This encouraged the practice of "simulcasting"—transmitting the same material over both the AM and FM outlets of the same broadcasting company. As far as advertisers were concerned, the FM audience was simply thrown in as a bonus. The FCC finally concluded that this was a waste of valuable air space. There are just so many broadcast channels to go around—using two of them for the same programs seemed rather profligate.

Furthermore, the FM picture was beginning to look rosy around the edges. Some stations had found that the quality-sound medium could be used effectively to sell quality goods and services. To put it bluntly, FM had snob appeal. Its audience tended to have a higher median income—and more disposable dollars—than AM listeners, and comprised a higher proportion of college graduates and professional people. Airlines, gourmet restaurants, mutual funds, cultural institutions, and distributors of specialty products were finding that they could reach a fertile upper-middle-class urban and suburban market through FM. It seemed apparent that FM, freed of simulcasting, could develop this audience profitably while AM went its mass-appeal way.

So, in 1964, the FCC handed down the word: in cities numbering more than 100,000 souls, jointly owned AM and FM stations would be required to have independent programming for at least half of their air time. There was just one problem: profit and quality programming did not always go hand in hand, particularly when the operating economies of simulcasting were no longer available. So the rush was on to find the next-cheapest possible programming. The result has been an increase in automated—"canned"—material, often making use of vast libraries of background music recorded on slow-speed tape supplemented with specialty items recorded on endless-loop tape cartridges. In other words, simplicity even at the expense of fidelity. But the savings in eliminating disc jockeys and program directors alone would make any accountant happy. The figures have a horrifying charm all their own. In 1966, roughly twenty per cent of the stations used canned programming. By 1967, the figure was up to twenty-five per cent. And last year, a full thirty-eight per cent were automated.

For those stations that found automation unacceptable, there was the alternative of using one or another of the services that offer prepackaged, sometimes virtually mass-produced programming. Some of the prepackaged programs are similar—or even identical—to those used by automated stations. Others can be extremely high in quality. The trancription services of some major symphony orchestras are an example of packaged programming at its best. In 1968, twenty-four per cent of the FM stations were using such a program service.

These statistics point out how unpredictable are the effects of FCC dicta. And even if it were easy to forecast the influence of the commission's actions, it's all but impossible to tell what those actions may be. One move that has been under consideration for some time would prohibit common ownership of more than one broadcast outlet—AM, FM, or TV—in the same market. When you consider the power and influence a company can have when it controls a newspaper, a local television station, and an AM/FM operation, all aimed at the same community, the prohibition appears to be a potentially valuable move. But again, practice may prove otherwise.

The FCC's first step toward banning joint ownership was an announcement that it planned to prevent sale to a single owner of AM and FM operations in the same market. Within a few days, KFAC-AM/FM in Los Angeles, the city's long-time good-music outlet, requested FCC permission for the sale of the operation. The FCC refused, pending a decision on its proposed rule, which would of course prohibit the sale. The station countered by running an ad in the Los Angles Times explaining why, in its view, single ownership of both its AM and FM outlets is necessary if KFAC is to continue offering the kind of programming on which its reputation—and its audience—has been built. Some 12,000 letters from listeners—almost all of them in support of the station—poured into KFAC as a result of the ad and were forwarded to the FCC with a petition to allow the sale of the station, whatever the rules might ultimately turn out to be (remember that the commission had announced only its intention to make a rule). That was months ago, and the FCC, at this writing, has yet to take action on the matter.

Another move soon expected from the government is a law requiring all radios sold in the country to have both AM and FM sections—a law comparable to that causing all television sets sold to have UHF in addition to the conventional VHF band. Obviously such a law would result in even greater penetration for FM. But what the results of that would be are impossible to predict.

Government's search for ways to put AM and FM on equal footing emphasizes a fact that has become increasingly obvious: FM is turning into a true mass medium. Other mass media have shown a natural tendency to become even more so: that is, to appeal to an ever larger part of the audience. In television, this tendency has led to programs of stupefying banality. FM has been a minor cultural haven for years. But recently it hasn't done too well in resisting the economic blandishments of its mass appeal.

A recent study by the National Association of FM Broadcasters showed that only six per cent of FM stations had classical music as a major programming category. (I suppose things could be worse—only five per cent of the records sold in a year contain classical music.) The biggest single category was "middle-of-the-road," which added up to a resounding forty-seven per cent. This was followed by "beautiful music"—simply a euphemistic name for background music. It collected twenty-five per cent. Third, with eleven per cent, was "modified contemporary," generally known as "easy listening." These three categories add up to eighty-three per cent of the "major programming" offered by FM stations.

There are some minor bright spots, principally the "underground rock" stations. For what it's worth, there are as many of them as there are "top 40" rock stations. Not quite so minor is the persistence of noncommercial radio. The three Pacifica stations (KPFA-Berkeley, KPFK-Los Angeles, and WBAI-NY) are perhaps the best known. Despite low budgets and the resulting slipshod quality of much of the programming, these three stations have produced an amazing number of excellent and provocative shows. And noncommercial radio extends well beyond Pacifica. In New York City, for example, some half-dozen stations are run by colleges, one is run by the city, and another by a church. It may be unfortunate that noncommercial stations are needed. But at least they are there.

In its rather short career, FM has withstood all sorts of indignities—including patent fights, unfortunate government decisions, and so on. Prediction may be uncertain, but one question must be answered—can FM stand success? At the moment, the answer seems to be no. And that is a damn shame.

The author's work, both as writer and as editor, has appeared in publications devoted to high fidelity and FM programming.

BILLBOARD
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 24,000
NOV 1 1969

Boston Concerts' Unique Hookup

BOSTON — Two Boston operations have teamed to present the Saturday night Boston Symphony concerts in unique four-channel stereo. Stations are WCRB, WCRB-FM, and WGBH-FM. The transmissions are reportedly compatible in ordinary stereo for people with only one FM stereo receiver. But those who own two FM stereo receivers supposedly benefit from a sense of presence when setting a dial to each station.

SYRACUSE HERALD JOURNAL
Wednesday, November 19, 1969

CLASSICAL MUSIC: Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the Boston Symphony in Stereo. Selections are Varese's Deserts for Orchestra and electronic sound; Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 4 in G, and Stravinsky's "The Firebird," Ballet Suite. 8 p.m., WONO-FM.

IN SPITE OF CRITI
phony Orchestra lately, is attending a concert v don't come often enough mas Special is an annual fails to bring tears to my

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY
NOV 1969

Jack Hubbard and Neal Seavey today at 7:30 p. m. on Channels 11 Durham, 15 Hanover, 40 Berlin, 49 Littleton and 52 Keene. The program will be repeated Friday, Dec. 12 at 3 p. m. and Sunday, Dec. 14 at 7:30 p.m.

Soames files for divorce, naming Jo in his suit; June and Jolly go to South Africa to aid victims of the Boer War in "The Forsyte Saga" Sunday, Dec. 14 at 9 p.m. The continuing drama, produced by the BBC and based on the novels of John Galsworthy chronicling the lives of one of Britain's most influential families, is repeated Mondays at 2:30 p.m. and Thursdays at 9 p.m. on NHN.

NET Journal presents the dramatic odyssey of a man searching through Israel for a friend with whom he survied his detention in a German concentration camp, titled "Kaddish," Monday, Dec. 15 at 9 p.m. on NHN.

UNIONLEADER
MANCHESTER, N. H.
(M&E) 57,003
DEC 11 1969

"The World and Work of Winslow Eaves," a portrait of the East Andover sculptor, filmed in his studio, home and at exhibitions of his work, is telecast in color Tuesday, Dec. 16 at 8 p.m. and repeated Friday, Dec. 19 at 2:30 and Sunday, Dec. 21 at 6 p. m.

Author Theodore White and William F. Buckley Jr. discuss White's "The Making of a President" on "Firing Line," Tuesday, Dec. 16 at 9 in color.

The Modern Jazz Quartet performs on NHN when NET Festival presents "Jazz at Tanglewood," recorded at the 1968 Berkshire Music Festival, Wednesday, Dec. 17 at 8 p.m., repeated Sunday, Dec. 21 at 8 p.m. in color.

New Hampshire Network programming is telecast on Channel 11 Durham, Channel 15 Hanover, Channel 40 Berlin, Channel 49 Littleton, Channel 52 Keene and cable television systems throughout the state.

Classroom TV Music Series Using Contemporary Format

BLOOMINGTON, Ind. — A rock 'n' roll group will star in a proposed series of educational television programs available to schools next year in an unprecedented effort to present music in U.S. classrooms through modern electronic communications. The program has the backing of widely recognized music educators and the American Music Conference (AMC) and is budgeted at $523,000. AMC executive vice-president James Bixby is asking members of the music industry to help fund the project which is being produced by the National Instructional Television Center (NIT) here.

Said Bixby: "The 16-part mu- a variety of instrumentation, including keyboard and all families of brass, woodwinds, strings and percussion. The programs are beamed at youngsters at an age level when they are most seriously motivated to become involved in music."

The program, which grew out of a 1967 study by the Tanglewood Symposium, will involve WGBH-TV, Boston, which will put on staff a rock group in the 17-19-year-old age bracket worksic program series, that includes the indoctrination of classroom teachers, is of particular significance, we believe, because of its broad range of instruction involving all forms of music and ing with jazz and classical musician and teacher Newton Wayland. "We aim to lead a student

(Continued on page 68)

BILLBOARD
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 24,000
DEC 13 1969

Classroom TV Music Series

• Continued from page 66

into an understanding of his teacher's jazz and classical music and to give the teacher an understanding of his students' love of rock music," said Bixby, describing the philosophy of the series.

Those wishing to contribute or obtain additional information may write: Larry Walcoff, program associate, National Instructional Television, Box A, Bloomington, Ind. 47401 or phone (812) 339-2203.

Henri Dauman

Robert Casadesus, pianist, is the guest on WQXR's "Boston Symphony Orchestra," tonight at 8:06 P.M.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 895,505 SUN. 1,445,507

JAN 4 1970

Berkshire Center's 'Wozzeck' on the Air

The August 1969 Berkshire Music Center production of Alban Berg's opera "Wozzeck," will be broadcast on Sunday Feb. 8 at 3 p.m. by radio stations WCRB and WGBH-FM.

Wozzeck was produced at Tanglewood as part of the Berkshire Music Center's 1969 Festival of Contemporary Music. Conducted by former Boston Symphony Music Director Erich Leinsdorf, the production included members of the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra and members of the Center's Vocal Music Program under the direction of Charles Wilson. Concert staging was by Joseph Gifford and Andrew Raeburn. Musical preparation was by Michael Tilson Thomas.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

JAN 10 1970

Carlo Maria Giulini is guest conductor of Boston Symphony on WFLN-FM Tuesday at 8:05 P. M.

Philadelphia Inquirer
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
D. 504,669 SUN. 935,458

JAN 18 1970

WOZZECK ON FM

Alban Berg's opera "Wozzeck" will be on WCRB-FM (102.5mc) and WGBH-FM (89.7 mc) in four channel stereo, Sunday, Feb. 8, 3-5 p.m. Performance was recorded at the 1969 Berkshire Festival and features Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

JAN 29 1970

Erich Leinsdorf conducts varied program on WXPN Tuesday night, midnight to 3 A. M.

Philadelphia Inquirer
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
D. 504,669 SUN. 935,458

FEB 1 1970

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its two-hour concert-broadcast on WQXR and WQXR-FM tonight at 8:06 with Carter's Holiday Overture. Aaron Copland conducts.

Other works to be featured on this recorded program are:

Pelleas and Melisande Suite .....Faure
Sinfonia India ..... Chavez
Inscape .....Copland
Ode .....Stravinsky
Billy the Kid Suite .....Copland

Newark Sunday News
NEWARK, N. J.
SUN. 429,829

FEB 8 1970

Leinsdorf To Lead Symphony

WFTL-FM will feature Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony at 8 p.m. Sunday.

The program opens with two numbers by Berg: "Three movements from the Lyric Suite arranged for String Orchestra" followed by "Five Altenberg Songs Op. 4" with Evelyn Lear as soprano.

The program concludes with Berg's "Three excerpts from the opera Wozzeck Op. 7" with Evelyn Lear and William Wright as soloists followed by Tchaikovsky's "Symphony No. 6 in B Minor Op. 74" (Pathetique).

★ ★ ★

The Works of Mendelssohn, Chopin, and Tchaikovsky will be featured on the Studio Concert at 8 p.m. Monday on WFTL-FM-Stereo.

The program opens with Leonard Bernstein conducting the New York Philharmonic in Mendelssohn's "Hebrides Overture" followed by Chopin's "Fantasia in F Minor for Piano" with Gina Bachauer as pianist.

The program concludes with Otto Klemperer conducting the Philharmonic Orchestra in Tchaikovsky's "Symphony No. 6 in B Minor" (Pathetique).

Fort Lauderdale News
FORT LAUDERDALE, FLA.
D. 83,316

FEB 13 1970

83.

Cambridge, Mass.

An article on page 3 of your issue of December 1 carries a headline and begins with a lead sentence which are both untrue. The first regular 4-channel stereo broadcasts were presented early in October 1969 by Acoustic Research through the facilities of FM stations WCRB and WGBH here in Boston. Production of the broadcasts and development of the 4-channel technique involved considerable testing and preparation by the broadcast staff for the Boston Symphony, as well as considerable effort by the WCRB and Acoustic Research staffs.

The series consists of the entire Boston Symphony season, broadcast every Saturday night.

I believe that it would be a service to your readers as well as an act of fairness to all of those who helped to pioneer these broadcasts if you made clear to your readers that the programs mentioned in your article are not the "first regular 4-channel stereo broadcasts" as the article incorrectly states.

Robert Berkovitz
Acoustic Research, Inc.

AUDIO TIMES
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SEMI-MONTHLY 9,000

MAR 1 1970

boston arts FM program guide

APRIL

WTBS 88.1 WERS 88.9 WGBH 89.7 WBUR 90.9

APRIL PROGRAM SCHEDULES

WEDNESDAY 1

WCRB-AM/FM

10:05 Morning Concert
Schumann: Genoveva, Op. 81 (A); Corelli: Con. Grosso, Op. 6, No. 7 (A); Prokofiev: Peter and the Commissar

2:00 Afternoon Symphony
Handel: Oboe Con. No. 1 (A); Pergolesi: Fl. Con. No. 5 (L); Haydn: Sym. No. 82 in C (C)

8:00 Evening at Symphony
Handel: Two Horn Con. in F (Vx); Chadwick: Sym. No. 3 in F (Mia)

WGBH-FM

7:00 Morning Pro Musica (S)
Joseph Krauss, Funeral Can.; Rameau: Les Indes Galantes; Tchaikovsky: Manfred, Symphonic Poem, Op. 58; Hindemith: Opera "Cardillac."

2:00 Fred Calland Presents (S)
Telemann: "The Patient Socrates" Musical Comedy in 3 acts; Gounod; "Faust," scenes

7:30 Music for Small Ensemble (S)
Brahms: Horn Trio, Op. 40.

8:00 Ba-Ta-Clan
Offenbach's operetta about a mythical island and its improbable inhabitants. Simulcast

WHRB-FM

9:00 Evening Concert (S)
Piston: The Incredible Flutist Suite (Hanson) (M); Couperin: 25th Ordre (Marlowe) (D); Beethoven: Piano Con. No. 1 (Barenboim, Klemperer) (A); Rachmaninoff: Cello Son., Op. 19 (Shapiro, Wild) (None); Telemann: Con. Grosso in D (Ormandy) (V)

11:00 Great Singers
A program of surprises!

THURSDAY 2

WCRB-AM/FM

10:05 Morning Concert
Vivaldi: Vl. Con. No. 6 (A); Dvorak: Slavonic Dance, Op. 46 No. 7 (C); Bach, J. C.: Hps. Con. Op. 7 (C)

2:00 Afternoon Symphony
Dvorak: My Home: Over. (L); Mozart: Adagio and Fugue, K. 546 (A); Bach: Suite No. 2 in b minor (L)

8:00 Evening at Symphony
Bach: Triple Con. in a (None); Beethoven: Sym. No. 1, Op. 21 (E)

WGBH-FM

7:00 Morning Pro Musica (S)
Tolar: Son. for 4 trumpets, 4 bassoons and continua; Dag Wiren: Serenade for strings, Op. 11; Prokofiev: Piano Son. No. 6 inA and Sym. No. 3.

1:00 From the Center
"Technology and the Ethics of Glut" Pros and cons of population and product control (from the Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions)

2:00 Fred Calland Presents (S)
Bach: Son. No. 1 in G for solo violin; Salamone Rossi: Madrigals, Motets and Sinfonias; Bloch: Sacred Service; Kosa: Sym. No. 8

7:30 This Week at Symphony
Andrew Raeburn, program editor, Boston Sym.

8:30 Concerts from the New England Conservatory of Music (S)
Claude Helffer, piano. Berio: Sequenza IV; Amy: Son.; Ravel Gaspard de la Nuit; Bartok: Son.

FRIDAY 3

WCRB-AM/FM

10:05 Morning Concert
Handel: Con. Grosso, Op. 9, No. 6 (L); Haydn: Notturno No. 3 (None); Bruch: Kol Nidre, Op. 47 (A)

2:00 Afternoon Symphony
Debussy: Prelude to the afternoon of a Faun (Cross); Mozart: Pf. Con. No. 11, K. 413 (E); Bach: Brandenburg Con. No. 2 (Van)

8:00 Evening at Symphony
Foote: Suite in E, Op. 63 (V); Hartmann: Sym. No. 4 (DGG)

WGBH-FM

7:00 Morning Pro Musica (S)
J. S. Bach: Harpsichord recital by Fernando Valenti; Wieniawski: Violin Con. No. 2; Spanish guitar music played by Rey de la Torre; Roussel: Bacchus & Ariane Suite No. 2

2:00 Boston Symphony Orchestra (S)
(recorder at Sym. Hall)
William Steinberg, Cond. David Oistrakh, violin soloist. Berlioz: Over. to "Benvenuto Cellini"; Mozart: Violin Concerto in A-major, K. 219; Brahms: Violin Con. in D-major, Op. 27

4:00 Fred Calland Presents (S)
Milhaud: Con. for Viola and orch. "Les Amours de Ransard," Con. for harp and orch.

7:00 Music for Small Ensemble (S)
Brahms: Clarinet Trio, Op. 114

8:30 Chamber Music from the Library of Congress (S)
The Mozarteum Woodwind Qnt. of Argentina, Haydn: Divertimento; Maragno: Divertimento; Carter: Etudes Nos. 1, 4, 5, 6, 8, and a Phantasy; Danzi: Qnt. Op. 56, No. 1; Villa-Lobos: Quinteto en forma de choro

WHRB-FM

1:30 Special Afternoon Concert (S)
Hindemith: "Cardillac" (Dietrich-Dieskau, Leonore Kirchstein, Donald Grobe, Karl Christian Kohn, Kolner Rundfunkchor and Kolner Rundfunk-Sinfonie-Orchester, Joseph Keilberth Cond. (DGG) Beethoven: Trio No. 4 in D, Op. 70, No. 1 (Suk Trio) (Cross); Boyce: Sym. No. 4 in F (English Chamber Orch., Hurwitz cond.) (L); Bruckner: Qnt. in F (Amadeus Qnt. with Cecil Aronowitz) (DGG); Haydn: Sym. No. 43 in E-flat, "Mercury" (Little Orch. of London, Jones cond.) (None)

SATURDAY 4

WCRB-AM/FM

10:05 Morning Concert
Beethoven: Leonore Over. No. 2; Weber: Cl. Con. No. 1, Op. 73 (A); Britten: A Simple Sym. (Ph)

2:00 Afternoon Symphony
Live from Lincoln Center
Bellini: Norma

8:27 Boston Symphony Orchestra
Program to be announced
Live 4-channel stereo (With WGBH-FM from Symphony Hall

WGBH-FM

7:00 Morning Pro Musica (S)
Vivaldi: C-major Con. for 2 trumpets; Haydn: Con. in E-flat for trumpet; Scarlatti: Son. for harpsichord; Schubert: Oct in F-major

5:00 The German Radio Hour
Neue deutsche Texte: Peter Handke, Franz Lehar-Oscar Strauss—"Der Letzte Walzer."

6:00 This Week at Symphony
Andrew Raeburn, program editor, Boston Sym. Orch.

8:00 The Poet Speaks
Martin Robbins interviews Robert Fitzgerald, Boylston Professor of Rhetoric at Harvard

8:30 Boston Symphony Orchestra
Live from Sym. Hall in four-channel stereo with WCRB (see Friday, 3rd 2 p.m. for program)

SUNDAY 5

WCRB-AM/FM

3:00 Sunday Afternoon Symphony
Dvorak: Dance, Op. 72, No. 7 (C); Mozart: Sym. No. 36 (01); Lalo: Vcl. Con. in C (E)

5:05 Boston Pops
Shostakovitch: Festive Over.; Wagner: Traume; Chopin: Pf. Con. No. 1, Op. 11; Leigh: Man of La Mancha: exc.

11:05 Night Music

ANCHORAGE, ALASKA
TIMES
31,500

JUL 18 1970

Beethoven Festival Broadcasts Continue

The Boston Symphony's Beethoven Festival continues with this week's live performance broadcast of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, heard on KNIK-FM at 8 p.m. this Sunday. Max Rudolph will conduct the program.

The program opens with Beethoven's Overture "Leonore no. 2", followed by the "Piano Concerto no. 1 in C," with Rudolf Serkin as soloist. The concluding number will be the "Piano Concert no. 3 in C minor," again with Serkin as soloist at the Steinway piano.

Tuesday's live performance broadcast of the Boston Pops Orchestra will open with Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance," Mascagni's Intermezzo from "Cavalleria Rusticana" and other numbers.

The program continues with Prokofieff's "An Old Time Fairy Tale—Peter and the Wolf", with Mrs. Joan Kennedy as narrator. Closing numbers will include traditional Pops encores, among them Lehar's "Merry Widow Watlzes," Raskin's "Those Were the Days," and "Stars and Stripes" by Sousa.

George Szell will conduct Thursday's live performance broadcast of the Cleveland Orchestra, at 8 p.m. The program will include Weber's "Oberon Overture," Beethoven's "Piano Concert No. 2 in B flat," and two works of Dvorak: "Two Slavonic Dances," and the "Symphony No. 8 in G."

Live performance broadcasts of the Boston Symphony, the Boston Pops and Cleveland Orchestras are heard each Sunday, Tuesday and Thursday evening at 8 p.m. on Knik-FM Stereo, 105.5 Mhz.

(M) Dave Mach...
The Revolving Door
Contemporary Concert
Blues
(Th) Bird Nests and Weird

6 PM
WBUR 6:30 Festival of Foreign Music
WBZ News
6:30 Just Jazz.
WCRB 6:00 News
6:15 Candlelight Serenade
WGBH Que Tal, Amigos
6:30 Reading Aloud
WHRB (M, W, F) The Cool And The Quiet
(T) Things Ain't What They Used To Be
(Th) Impressions
WTBS (F) M.I.T. This Week

WGBH Ne...
12:30 Ne...
WKOX (M) ...
(T-F) Brother D...
"All-Hit Radio Show"

1 PM
WBUR (Th) the Early Concert
WCOP Simulcast

FM GUIDE
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MONTHLY CIRC. N. AVAIL.

JUN 1970

(COURTESY OF DR. WALTER P. SHEPPARD) KOUSSEVITZKY

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY CONDUCTS THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA IN "THE PASSION OF OUR LORD, ACCORDING TO ST. MATTHEW" BY BACH TONIGHT AT 8:30 P.M. ON THE RIVERSIDE RADIO (WRVR 106.7). THE HARVARD GLEE CLUB AND THE RADCLIFFE CHORAL SOCIETY ARE FEATURED SINGERS.

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,387

APR 9 1970

ST. LOUIS

James R. Herd was named v.p. and general manager of KPLR-TV (an indie), replacing Michael McCormick who is going to WOR-TV New York. Herd was formerly station manager at KPLR-TV. McCormick had held the top position since March 1966 . . . KMOX-TV (CBS o&o) bought a package of 39 pix from 20th-Fox TV. The pix have seen prior network duty . . . Gordon L. French' new g.m. of KMOX-TV, was guest of honor at a meeting of St. Loo chapter of the Emmy Academy . . . St. Louis Variety Club's annual telethon for handicapped children got $250,000 in pledges. KPLR-TV aired marathon over recent weekend with David Canary of "Bonanza," Shari Lewis, Maureen Arthur and Smilin' Jack Smith.

Russ Carter's young-folk oriented "St. Louis Hop" will mark its 13th anni on KSD-TV with a special hour on Saturday (21) that will have Mark Lindsay and Freddie Weller ("The Games People Play") as co-hosts. Russ claims his "hop" is one of the longest-running of the genre in the country . . . David Layman joined KPLR-TV's news staff, coming from WGEM-TV Quincy, Ill. . . . KSD-TV purchased a series of 14 one-hour programs featuring the Boston Symphony Orch. Series will be recorded this spring at Boston's Symphony Hall, and station here will air it next fall

TV-Radio Production Centres in the U.S. and Abroad

VARIETY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W.-CIRC. N. AVAIL.

MAR 4 1970

WGBH Awarded Grant To Continue 'The Advocate'

NEW YORK (AP) — The Corporation for Public Broadcasting has awarded a grant of about $1.5 million to WGBH, Boston, and KCET, Los Angeles, for continued production of a public affairs program "The Advocates."

The two stations also received grants of $750,000 each to produce 19½ hours of national programs.

The grants were announced yesterday by John V. Macy Jr., chairman of the public broadcasting corporation, in a speech to the 1970 Public Television Conference.

They were among more than $17 million in grants to the nation's educational television stations.

WGBH also received $500,000 for a 13-week series of hour-long concerts of the Boston Pops Orchestra, to be broadcast this summer.

84.

RECORDINGS

RCA has released the following recordings by the Boston Symphony Orchestra since May 1969:

RED SEAL ALBUMS

under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf

BEETHOVEN	Symphony no. 1 in C op. 21 Symphony no. 8 in F op. 93	92 pp. 89, 94, 95, 97
	Symphony no. 6 in F op. 68 'Pastoral'	pp. 86, 91, 95
	Symphony no. 9 in D minor op. 125 (Marsh, Veasey, Domingo, Milnes, Chorus Pro Musica, New England Conservatory Chorus) Symphony no. 5 in C minor op. 67	85 pp. 87, 88, 91, 92, 94, 95, 96, 98, 101, 103
SCHOENBERG	A survivor from Warsaw op. 46 (Milnes, New England Conservatory Chorus)
BRAHMS	Ein deutsches Requiem op. 45 (Caballé, Milnes, New England Conservatory Chorus) Four serious songs op. 121 (Milnes, Leinsdorf piano)	pp. 92, 93, 94, 96, 98, 99
MOZART	Symphony no. 36 in C K. 425 'Linz' Symphony no. 39 in E flat K. 543	94 & 95
PROKOFIEV	Piano concerto no. 5 in G op. 55 (Browning)	pp. 86, 91, 96, 97, 98
WEILL	Kleine Dreigroschenmusik
SCHARWENKA	Piano concerto no. 1 in B flat op. 32 (Wild) Piano works by Glinka-Balakirev, Medtner, D'Albert (Wild)	pp. 89, 92, 93, 94, 96, 97, 98, 99

under the direction of William Steinberg

SCHUBERT	Symphony no. 9 in C 'The great'	pp. 99, 101, 102

under the direction of Georges Prêtre

BERLIOZ	Symphonie fantastique op. 14a	pp. 87, 91, 92, 94, 95, 96, 98

VICTROLA ALBUMS

under the direction of Charles Munch

BEETHOVEN	Overtures (Coriolan, The creatures of Prometheus, Fidelio, Leonore nos. 1 and 3)
	Piano concerto no. 1 in C op. 15 (Richter) Piano sonata no. 22 in F op. 54 (Richter)
SCHUMANN	Symphony no. 1 in B flat op. 38 'Spring' Symphony no. 2 in C op. 61

The following recordings by the Boston Pops Orchestra, Arthur Fiedler Conductor, have been released by RCA since May 1969:

RED SEAL ALBUMS

Chet picks on the 'Pops'
Motion picture classics
Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops play the Beatles
Carmen ballet (Bizet-Shchedrin)
Fiedler's choice

VICTROLA ALBUMS

Grand Canyon suite (Grofé)
An American in Paris (Gershwin)

Orpheus in Hades
Offenbach favorites

The following album by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players has been released by RCA on the Red Seal label:

BRAHMS	Piano trio in B op. 8	pp. 87, 88, 89, 93, 94, 96, 97, 99
DAHL	Duettino concertante for flute and percussion
MARTINU	Nonet
POULENC	Sextet for piano and woodwind quintet
SCHUBERT	Quintet in A op. 114 'The Trout'
WEBERN	Concerto for nine instruments op. 24

Wagner - Orches. Selections
Leinsdorf - p. 87

Stravinsky - "Rite of Spring"
arr. for piano duet - Thomas + Grierson (Angel) - p. 88.

Coupling Schoenberg And Beethoven

By HAROLD LUNDSTROM
Deseret News Music Editor

MUSICAL WHIRL

ON RECORD — RCA-Victor has brought together in one two-record package, three vitally important musical statements of the human condition.

Schoenberg

The coupling, for the first time, brings Schoenberg's "A Survivor from Warsaw," Opus 46, with Beethoven's "Symphony No. 5" and "Symphony No. 9." ("Choral Symphony").

The package begins with one of the important works of this century concerned with the spirit of man: Schoenberg's "A Survivor from Warsaw," which is narrated by Sherrill Milnes and features the men of the New England Conservatory Chorus. The dramatic impact of the brutalization of man, as told in this contemporary work, ends like Beethoven's "Ninth," in the affirmation of the human spirit.

Erich Leinsdorf performed this combination of works at his farewell concert in Boston as music director of the Boston Symphony last April. Of the performance, Michael Steinberg, music critic of the "Boston Globe" and a guest critic at the Utah Symphony Orchestra's Festival of Contemporary Music three seasons ago, wrote, "Leinsdorf's 'A Survivor from Warsaw' will be remembered as one of the most valued, distinguished and exciting achievements in (the conductor's) seven-year directorship."

Of Milnes' narration, Mr. Steinberg said: "It was one of the greatest vocal performances I have ever heard."

Performing with the Boston Symphony in the last of Beethoven's nine symphonies are Jane Marsh, Josephine Veasey, Placido Domingo, and Sherrill Milnes, along with the Chorus Pro Musica and the New England Conservatory.

Miss Marsh made her orchestral debut in 1965 with Mr. Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony in a performance of the Beethoven "Ninth," a few months after making her operatic debut in Spoleto as Desdemona in "Othello." Since catapulting to fame after winning first prize for singers in 1966 in Moscow's Tchaikovsky International Music Competition, Jane Marsh has become a leading soprano of international scope.

Josephine Veasey, a leading mezzo at Covent Garden, made her debut at the Metropolitan Opera last season in Von Karajan's production of "Das Rheingold." Later she sang the Dricka in "Die Walkure," and in 1970 she is scheduled to make her debut at La Scala.

Placido Domingo also made his Metropolitan Opera debut in 1968, unexpectedly advanced and unanimously acclaimed in "Adriana Lecouvreur." Previously, the Spanish-born, Mexican-reared baritone - turned - tenor has been best known to New York opera audiences for his roles at the City Opera.

Sherrill Milnes is, of course, one of the leading baritones with the Metropolitan Opera, where he made his debut in December, 1965. His association with the Beethoven "Ninth" goes back eight years when he participated in Fritz Reiner's recordings of the same work — as a member of the chorus.

The package also includes Leinsdorf's conducting the Boston Symphony in a new recording of the most popular of all the Beethoven symphonies, the "Fifth." A century and a half after it was written, the "Fifth" remains the most frequently played work in the symphonic literature.

The two-record album was recorded in Boston Symphony Hall.

MUSICIANS ODYSSEY — John Chatelain, who served as concertmaster, and Norma Lee Madsen, who served as assistant concertmistress of the Utah Symphony this past week, have recently returned from the 32nd annual Carmel Bach Festival that was conducted by Sandor Salgo.

Both John and Norma Lee were listed on the concert programs as assistant concertmasters of the Bach Festival Orchestra, and they alternated in the various programs. Norma Lee was also one of the three soloists in the "Brandenburg Concerto No. 3" which requires three soloists — "and all this was on the 24th of July" Norma Lee notes, "which was very appropriate!" . . .

Deseret News
SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
D. 84,855

AUG 12 1969

THE LP
Shaping Things to Come

"I don't know how we ever did without the LP," says Composer Roy Harris. "It is to music what the printing press was to literature."

Comparing the influence of the long-playing record to Gutenberg is not as far-fetched as it sounds. When they were first put out in 1948, LP records seemed to offer only an assortment of mechanical advantages: economy, convenience, less surface hiss. Like the 78 r.p.m., though, the LP at first was still just that —a record, a means of preserving for posterity some of the leading concert-hall interpretations of the day. Twenty-one years later, all that has changed. In a McLuhanesque transformation of musical culture, the LP is no longer a mere documentary device. For composers, listeners and musicians, it is a dramatic shaper of musical progress.

Part of the LP's influence has to do with distribution. Today virtually every form of sound known to and made by man, from primitive African chants to serialistic chamber music—"the old, the new, the modern, the academic, the screwball," as Conductor Erich Leinsdorf puts it—is easily available to increasingly sophisticated listeners. What the composer writes is indelibly affected by that fact. Italy's Luciano Berio notes that Debussy was influenced by Javanese music, but had to discover it by pure chance. If it had not been performed at the Paris Universal Exhibition in 1889, he would never have known of its existence. "Today," adds Berio, "recordings provide a constant Universal Exhibition."

Beyond the LP's value as a source of information, however, is the precision and virtuosity of LP recordings as a means of encouraging and communicating difficult new pieces of music. Today's stereo records capture details often missed in the auditorium, and for many of the complex scores now being written that kind of clarity is its own kind of reward. Composer Elliott Carter admits that such works as his Pulitzer prize-winning Second String Quartet (1959) and the Double Concerto for Piano and Harpsichord (1961) were initially written with stereo in mind. In the dense antiphonal Double Concerto, for example, each solo instrument is set off against the other—one to a stereo channel—and each has its accompanying coterie of winds and strings. The resulting dialogue is almost Joycean in its plural textures and moment-to-moment subtleties. Recording studios also offer new technical means of composing, through such devices as the echo chamber, multi-track recording and tape superimposition. "In this way," says Poland's Krzysztof Penderecki, "the process of recording itself has become a means of composition as well as communication." Of course, none of this technical expertise would be possible without tape, on which all LPs are originally recorded. And there are those who see tape—especially video tape, with which the home listener may some day be able to see as well as hear an opera—as the LP of the future.

Different Esthetic. There was a time when the thrill of a composer's life was a concert performance of one of his works. Now most composers see the concert hall and the LP as separate, but equally rewarding, mediums. Penderecki prefers to hear romantic music in the concert hall, but listens to Bach and Handel in the quiet and privacy of his home. As for his own music, he thinks the dramatically extroverted St. Luke Passion belongs in the auditorium because it should involve people as a group. When it comes to such works as Polymorphia and Dies Irae, Penderecki believes that they sound better on LP because they explore instrumental and vocal techniques in a new way; he does not want listeners to be diverted from the music by extraneous theatrical matters.

The ultimate creation of the recording process are composers who create only for the electronic idiom. To them, composition means either recording real-life sounds on tape and then transforming them electronically (musique concrète), or starting from scratch with an electronic sound synthesizer like the Moog (TIME, March 7). Electronic composers "write" on tape; their music was never intended for the traditional concert hall. "The trouble with the concert hall," says California's electronic composer Morton Subotnick, "is that it requires a social and theatrical esthetic that really has nothing to do with our music." Germany's Karlheinz Stockhausen, who today works primarily in the electronic idiom, agrees: "I make everything for stereo records. The record is the document of how I want my music to sound."

What pleases all composers is the way the LP has broadened the taste and intelligence of the listener. "Once only kings made love to music," says Berio. "Now everybody does." Adds Germany's Hans Werner Henze: "Audiences have learned to hear pieces of music more than once and thus have acquired a training in hearing musical structures." That kind of knowing audience has made possible a new mode of composition in which snippets from, say, the Baroque, French Impressionism and Viennese post-Romanticism are pasted into surrealistic aural collages that would lose much of their point for anyone who had not heard LPs of the originals. Perhaps the outstanding example of that style is Berio's four-movement Sinfonia, a great critical success last fall when premièred by the New York Philharmonic (TIME, Oct. 18). This week Sinfonia comes out on a superbly engineered Columbia LP. Even though Berio conducted the première, he believes that the LP release will probably be a more satisfying event. From a purely esthetic point of view, the work will be clearer and more forceful than any concert-hall performance so far. A concert, moreover, is heard today and gone tomorrow. But the LP Sinfonia will be sold, perhaps for years, all over the world.

VITTORIANO RASTELLI

CARTER AT PIANO
Encouraging Joycean dialogue.

KLAUS BARISCH

STOCKHAUSEN WITH ELECTRONIC EQUIPMENT
Writing directly for stereo.

TIME, AUGUST 29, 1969
TIME
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 3,473,000

AUG 29 1969

FROM THE EDITOR:

OFFICIAL announcements have not been received at this writing, but it can be reported with certainty nevertheless that the Boston Symphony (and also its springtime alter ego, the Boston Pops), after an aggregate of something over a half-century with RCA (née Victor), will join the roster of Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft upon the expiration of current contracts in 1970. More about this extraordinary development in due course. Meantime, an all-BSO release next month will pretty much exhaust the accumulation of Leinsdorf recordings. But naturally there will be further Boston material from RCA under the incoming William Steinberg; a Schubert C major Symphony, I see, has been scheduled for later this year. . . Speaking of Boston, I hear that Columbia—a label not generally associated with that metropolis—has been up there for an extensive Ives chamber-music project. Gunther Schuller, now head of the New England Conservatory, reconstructed several of the scores not previously performable. . . Operaphiles will be reassured to hear that the Leontyne Price Aida, about to be withdrawn by RCA pursuant to a decade-old agreement, will be right back again on the London label come September. (Likewise the Sutherland Norma, but that will not return until sometime next winter.) On the other hand, RCA Victrola will release in September what may be the all-around best Aida recording of them all: the old mono-only Rome performance under Jonel Perlea featuring Zinka Milanov, Jussi Bjoerling, Leonard Warren, Fedora Barbieri, and Boris Christoff. . . The RCA schedule for September includes an Ormandy/Philadelphia Mahler First, an all-Takemitsu program by the Toronto Symphony under Seiji Ozawa, and an item entitled "The Moog Strikes Bach [sic]. . . To Say Nothing of Chopin, Mozart, Rachmaninoff, Paganini, and Prokofieff". The foregoing is taken from the release sheet verbatim, ellipsis and all. What it portends for our delectation, I do not dare to conjecture. But "Switched-On Bach" (Columbia) has sold a million copies.—J.L.

AMERICAN RECORD GUIDE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 21,100

JUL 1969

85

RECORDINGS

BSO, Pops to record only with Grammophon

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft (DGG) of Hamburg, Germany, have jointly announced that the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops orchestras will record exclusively with DGG at the end of the orchestras' present contracts with RCA Victor, in September, 1970. The Boston Symphony's recording contract with the latter company began in 1917.

The decision was reached after several months of discussions between representatives of the two groups in Hamburg and New York. Talcott Banks, president of the Boston Symphony trustees, and Kurt Kinkele, deputy managing director of DGG, said a basic agreement has been reached and that details are being worked out.

Jerry Schoenbaum, president of Polydor, Inc., DGG's New York-based subsidiary in this country, commented that the moves ". . . adds greatly to DGG's roster of international artists. Of special significance, too, is the Boston Pops Orchestra, which fills a gap too long neglected in our catalogue."

Banks paid tribute to DGG as one of the pioneers of the recording industry and added that he looks forward to the challenge of the new relationship. He expressed gratitude as well to RCA for the orchestra's long, successful collaboration with that company.

Kinkele stated that it has long been the wish of DGG to have an exclusive contract with a first-rank U.S. orchestra, adding: "We are delighted to have come to an understanding with the great Boston Symphony."

The new contract is the second recent recording shift among major Eastern symphony orchestras. After years of recording on the Columbia label, the Philadelphia orchestra returned to RCA Victor last year. The New York Philharmonic remains affiliated with Columbia.

The ARTS

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

AUG 9 1969

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

AUG 9 1969

BSO and Pops Sign New Pact For Recordings

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft of Hamburg, Germany, have jointly announced that the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops orchestras will record exclusively for the Deutsche Grammophon label following the conclusion of the orchestras' present contracts with RCA Victor Records in August 1970.

BSO recording contract

Announcement has been made jointly by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Deutsche Grammophon recording company that as of September, 1970, Boston Symphony and Boston Pops will record exclusively for the German firm.

According to Talcott M. Banks, president of the BSO trustees, and Kurt Kinkele, deputy managing director of the recording company, a basic agreement has been reached with details to be worked out before the expiration of the BSO's present contract with RCA Victor in August, 1970.

Of particular significance is the opening up of a large foreign market for recordings by a first-rank American orchestra, and the addition to the Hamburg-based company's catalog of Pops albums long neglected among its listings.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

AUG 11 1969

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

AUG 9 1969

Symphony, Pops To Record for German Label

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox—The Boston Symphony and Boston Pops orchestras will record exclusively for Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft of Hamburg, Germany, following the conclusion in August 1970 of the orchestra's present contract with RCA Victor records.

In making the joint announcement, Talcott M. Banks, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony and Kurt Kinkele, deputy managing director of Deutsche Grammophon, said that details of the contract were currently being worked out.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 895,505 SUN. 1,445,507

AUG 9 1969

Boston Symphony to Record For Deutsche Grammophon

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will record exclusively for Deutsche Grammophon beginning in September, 1970. The announcement was made yesterday by Talcott M. Banks, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony, and Kurt Kinkele, deputy managing director of Deutsche Grammophon.

No details concerning conductors, soloists or repertory were available yesterday from either the orchestra or the recording company.

86.

Boston Symphony Joins DGG in '70 And Ends a 50-Year Link with RCA

The oldest continuous relationship between a recording group and a disk company, the 50-year-old tie between the Boston Symphony and RCA, comes to an end August, 1970, when the orchestra moves under the wing of Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft. Deal was wrapped up by Jerry Schoenbaum, prexy of Polydor, the U.S. subsid of DGG.

Exit of the Boston Symphony from the RCA roster underscores the tight economic situation in the classical disk market. RCA now has a longterm deal with the Philadelphia Orchestra and apparently was unable to foot the bill for another major symphony organization.

The classical squeeze has become particularly painful in light of the sharply higher recording costs involved in the recent pact with the American Federation of Musicians. Scales are now heading over $90 per man per three-hour recording session.

For DGG, the Boston Symphony represents the first American symphonic recording venture. It also brings to DGG the highly successful Boston Pops, the light classical symph which has racked up strong sales under the baton of Arthur Fiedler.

It's believed that Fiedler's continuing role as Boston Pops conductor was an essential condition of the DGG deal. William Steinberg will be conductor of the Boston Symphony next season.

The Boston Pops will be filling a gap in the DGG catalog in the American market and will give the label's other merchandise a wedge into areas where DGG was unable to enter heretofore.

DGG will record the Boston Symphony in America. Up to now, DGG has recorded exclusively in Europe even though it has numerous American talents on its roster.

Arg. Disk Best Sellers

Buenos Aires, Aug. 12.

Shivering ..... Donald (RCA)
Rose Rose ..... Sandro (CBS)
Again on Tracks .. Naufragos (CBS)
I Give You Eyes ... G. Ferri (RCA)
It's Already Cool ..... Nada (RCA)
Long Live Life ..... Ortega (RCA)
Goodbye ..... Mary Hopkin (EMI)
Away from Eyes ... Django (RCA)

VARIETY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WEEKLY AMUSEMENTS

AUG 13 1969

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901

AUG 12 1969

★ ★ ★

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Boston Pops Orchestra will record exclusively for the Deutsche Grammophon label following the conclusion of the orchestra's contract with RCA Victor. It is an extremely good label and may well be just as good for the orchestra as RCA. Incidentally, the RCA has signed The Philadelphia Orchestra. It was formerly with Columbia.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

AUG 17 1969

Exclusive for Deutsche

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft of Hamburg, Germany, have jointly announced that the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops Orchestras will record exclusively for the Deutsche Grammophon Label following the conclusion in August, 1970, of the orchestra's present contract with RCA Victor Records.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

AUG 21 1969

MAINE SUNDAY TELEGRAM
PORTLAND, MAINE
(S) 100,181

AUG 24 1969

Records in Review

BSO Goes to Deutsche Grammophon

By WILLIAM A. STORRER

One year from now the Boston Symphony and Pops orchestras will end their long association with RCA Victor and enter the fold of Polydor. New releases will appear on Deutsche Grammophon, top-of-the-line label from this German-based company that ranks with British Decca (London in the USA), Philips of Holland, Columbia, EMI (Electrical Musical Industries of England, Angel here) as the world's leading recording organizations.

One might have expected the RCA-Boston split since Erich Leinsdorf came to Boston. Leinsdorf's appointment as artistic director of the BSO was clouded with many rumors, chief of which was that his position was dictated from RCA. Rumor also had it that RCA had specifically vetoed Pittsburgh's Steinberg and had demanded Georg Solti in Chicago. Boston took Leinsdorf and kept RCA. Chicago did not get Solti and lost RCA. Now Boston has Steinberg, but no RCA, while Chicago has obtained Solti, and gotten both London and Angel in the bargain.

So Boston may not have "lost" RCA, but gained Deutsche Grammophon. Technically the step up the ladder cannot be faulted. Poor quality pressings have bothered critics and audiophiles alike for many years. Discs come through with the center hole so off-center that pitch varies noticeably with every revolution. Surface noise from dust particles is so loud that one cannot detect the wonderful effects of Dolby noise reduction in the master. If any company consistently licked these problems, it has been Deutsche Grammophon. It will be a welcome change to hear the Boston musicians without snaps, crackles but only as "Pops" and Symphony.

In the early part of this decade American companies recorded the Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Cleveland, Chicago, Detroit, Eastern-Rochester and Minneapolis orchestras. No American orchestra was under contract to a non-American company. Now it is the last year of the decade and we see the Los Angeles Philharmonic recorded on London for the past few years. Chicago recording with Angel and London, and the Boston Symphony going to Deutsche Grammophon. Columbia ha sgiven up Philadelphia and RCA Boston.

These changes in recording contracts are only the superficial manifestations of deep-seated problems within the American recording industry and in the whole problem of America's consistently poor support of serious art, a problem which, and we can say it with pride, does not generally afflict the readers of the Advocate. Let us all hope that the new affiliation between Boston Symphony and Pops with Polydor and their DGG label will be a fruitful one and return to glory the name of Boston on the international recording scene, a glory the likes of which has hardly been known since the halcyon days of Koussevitzsky.

* * *

DGG Signs Boston Symphony

In a sensational swoop, Polydor Incorporated has captured the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops Orchestras, according to Jerry Schoenbaum, Polydor President. Schoenbaum announced the agreement today, simultaneously with Hamburg and Tanglewood, where the orchestra is performing for the remainder of August.

This arrangement marks the nature by Deutsche Grammophon, parent company of Polydor Inc. The wooing was mutual, as Deutsche Grammophon has been interested in forming such a liaison since it opened Polydor Inc. in this country. Hitherto the Hamburg-based firm has recorded only in Europe, although numerous American talents are on its roster.

It is not yet known what repertoire may be involved, though actual albums will be released on the Deutsche Grammophon label and distributed in this country by Polydor Inc. The agreement has been made, but actual details remain to be worked out. In any case, the orchestras' current obligations run through August 1970.

BERKELEY, CALIF.
GAZETTE
D. 14,500

AUG 18 1969

A Switch In Labels

By JOHN THORNTON

THE DECISION of the Boston Symphony to record exclusively for Deutsche Grammophone Gesellschaft is a precedent shattering move for a major American orchestra.

At one time serious consideration was given to the orits records with RCA-Victor. To be sure, not all contract negotiations were conducted happily, but the two parties had signed on the dotted line every few years for decades.

at one time serious consideration was given to the orchestra making tapes with its own engineering staff and farming out the masters. This would have allowed greater freedom of recorded repertoire, but for various economical reasons the plan was abandoned.

Later, when RCA and BSO trustees disagreed on guarantees, London Records made a strong bid for the Boston contract. That was after Munch had succeeded Koussevitzky and when Reiner had replaced Kubelik at Chicago.

RCA romanced the Reiner-Chicago Symphony combination and for two years made relatively little with the BSO. As record royalties and musician recording fees are an important part of an orchestra's economy, relation between Boston and New York became strained.

RCA won again and quickly made more albums with Munch. Then came the sad day when Munch retired and Leinsdorf took over at Boston. The early days of that joining were ecstatic, causing one writer to state: "Never did such a man need such an orchestra; nor such an orchestra need such a man."

BY 1968 THE BLOOM was off the rose. Nor were BSO LP's with Leinsdorf exactly breaking sales records.

Leinsdorf's subsequent resignation, the disagreement between conductor and trustees carried in Boston press and finally the appointment of William Steinberg, has diminished the kind of image the B.S.O. enjoyed in the Golden Era of Koussevitzky.

For years Steinberg, who will also remain music director and conductor of his Pittsburgh Symphony, has recorded with Capitol and other companies. His codirection at Boston does not mean much commercially, since Steinberg's albums have never been runaway best sellers.

To be blunt: trustees like to make appointments for their orchestras that will charm the record buying public. Lots of sales means lots of royalties to treasuries in sore need of replenishing. And Steinberg, although a conductor of great talent, does not have the commercial attraction of Eugene Ormandy or Leonard Bernstein. Besides, he comes to Boston as a divided man, half of him belonging to Pittsburg, a situation that does not please the Hub Old Guard.

Never in its history has the Boston Symphony signed up a music director who shared his talent with another orchestra. That must be considerd estill another factor in the break betweeen RCA and the BSO.

RCA on the other hand finally succeeded last year in wooing the Philadelphia Symphony back to the fold, thus taking from Columbia Records one of its chief assets. It is natural to assume RCA will record and promote its "new" orchestra to the extent it will receive a lion's share of attention.

The Chicago Symphony since the death of Reiner is no longer a valued commercial property, at least not until it engages a strong personality. If Solti finally takes over, that situation will change.

BSO trustees, who do not talk much to the press about their recording interests, no doubt saw some handwriting on the wall and after consulting the sales returns of the last few years decided to make the break that came as a stunning suprise to most collectors.

AFTER MONTHS of talks in Hamburg and New York, final agreement was reached between Talcott M. Banks, president of the board of trustees, and Kurt Kinkele, deputy managing director of Deutsche Grammaphon. A basic contract has been agreed upon with details to be finalized.

This marriage between DGS and the BSO could turn out very happily. DGS is an excellent company with a reputation for superior engineering. Its LPs produced in Germany are better than the U.S. product. Whether DGS pressings will be made abroad or in this country has not yet been announced. An import tax may make it impractical to press in Hamburg.

The biggest question(What will be the recorded repertoire? What artists will be engaged? Will, for example, Von Karajan be able to conduct the BSO in a number of releases? Such a combination offers great commercial possibilities.

It is surprising that Columbia Records, after losing its Philadelphia property, to RCA did not contract with the BSO. Its major orchestra is of course the New York Philharmonic. But will Pierre Boulez "sell' like Leonard Bernstein? Columbia will become very busy recording top orchestras in England and Europe and further develop the Cleveland Symphony.

In August of 1970, RCA's agreement with the Bostoners comes to an end It would be normal for RCA to ease up on future issuance of BSO recordings, except to fullfill the conditions of its contract.

Record collectors should rejoice over this news. DGS, anxious to make good on the first major agreement between atop ranking American orchestra and a foreign manufacturer, will spend lots of money and time to release a quality product, both musically and technically.

Another powerful factor is that the Boston Pops Orchestra is included in the agreement. Arthur Fiedler's releases have made lots of money for the organization and certainly DGG is aware of the enormous profits to be made from producing Pop's records.

DGG's whole sales framework may change as a result of this unique contract. BSO and Pop's recordins under its leadership will be widely exploited in the European market as well as in the United States.

Schoenbaum Directs Polydor Policy Of Creating Hits, Not Typing Music

NEW YORK — "Too much emphasis is being placed on giving music readily identifiable names such as rock, jazz, folk," says Jerry Schoenbaum, president of Polydor Records, and he is setting out to operate his label in a manner that does not "type" music. "If it's good, it will sell," he says, "and the barriers between forms are rapidly diminishing. Our concept is to have a wholly creative record company with priority given at the A&R end where the sound and quality is what counts."

Polydor, the independent American subsidiary of the huge European Polydor label, bowed on the American market a few months ago. The label's first hits were "Good Old Rock 'n' Roll," by Cat Mother And The All Night News Boys, and the follow-up album, "The Street Giveth And The Street Taketh Away," which is currently experiencing strong chart action.

Polydor recently concluded a deal for the Boston Symphony and the Boston Pops Orchestras to record for the classical Deutsche Grammophon label, beginning about a year from now. Deutsche Grammophon, subsidiary of European Polydor, is a specialist in recording German ensembles and has long provided American listeners with German classical recordings of high quality. With the signing of the Boston orchestras, it is expected that the label will be able to reach areas in the U.S. that never before handled the line. The Boston signing is expected to take Deutsche Grammophon out of its specialized category and permit it to compete with labels long recording national orchestras and also make the diskery more sought after by young American talents who previously may have shied away because of the European connotation.

Working closely with Jerry Schoenbaum are Andy Miele, Jr., director of marketing and merchandising for the Polydor label, and Jim Frey, director of marketing and merchandising for the classical division, which, besides Deutsche Grammophon, includes the Archive and Heliodor labels. Miele and Frey lend important assistance to Schoenbaum in the development of American Polydor.

Schoebaum is busy looking for talent to sign. He recently inked British blues great John Mayall, whose first Polydor album is due for release this week. Jerry Corbitt, formerly of the Youngbloods, will make his Polydor debut with an album due out in a fortnight. Jazz drummer Tony Williams and his group, Lifetime, will have a set out soon. A new group, Area Code 615, is being introduced on Polydor in the near future.

Famed European bandleader James Last, a solid artist on European Polydor, interprets the Broadway smash, "Hair," on a forthcoming album set for release here, and a potpourri album of hit tunes performed by the Gunter Kallman Chorus is also in the works.

New and forthcoming albums from Deutsche Grammophon include: a deluxe seven-record edition of "Mozart's Great Symphonies," played by the Berlin Philharmonic, Karl Boehm conducting; a set containing Dvorak's Cello Concerto and Tchaikowsky's Rococo Variations, performed by Russian cellist Mstislav Rostropovich and the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, Herbert Von Karajan conducting; and "Siegfried," the third package in Von Karajan's series of albums devoted to Richard Wagner's operatic tetrology, "The Ring Of The Nibelung."

Polydor is also thoroughly involved in tapes (see the tape section in this issue for details).

All in all, Polydor has established a footing in the U.S. that indicates that it is a label to be watched closely.

CASH BOX
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 16,000

AUG 30 1969

The Detroit News
D. 702,591 SUN. 953,929

AUG 27 1969

The Boston Symphony will start recording for the Deutsche Grammophon label after its contract expires with RCA in 1970. DGG will record the Boston Pops as well as the Boston Symphony and the records will be distributed in this country by the German firm's subsidiary, Polydor.

The new Boston Symphony-DGG agreement ends speculation that began when the Philadelphia Orchestra rejoined RCA last year. RCA also records the Chicago Symphony. This is DGG's first American recording venture.

Boston Symphony music director Erich Leinsdorf will relinquish his post at the end of this summer's Tanglewood series. Leinsdorf resigned more than a year ago, blaming overwork. William Steinberg will take over this fall and Leinsdorf will return as guest conductor.

86a.

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,387

AUG 14 1969

BSO International

LENOX (UPI) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra next year will become only the second American orchestra to sign a recording contract with a foreign company. The Boston Symphony and Boston Pops orchestras will start recording in late 1970 for Deutsche Grammaphon Gesellschaft of Hamburg, Germany.

Deseret News
SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
D. 84,855

AUG 23 1969

LOUD & SOFT — In a sensational swoop, Polydor Incorporated has captured the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops Orchestras from RCA Victor. The scoop marks the first American recording venture by Deutsche Grammophon (DGG), parent company of Polydor Inc. Of special significance is the Boston Pops Orchestra, which will now fill a very essential gap, too-long neglected in the DGG catalog. . . .

BOSTON TO DGG —INCLUDE POPS

BOSTON—Deutsche Grammophon has signed the Boston Symphony, effective August 1970, which will end the orchestra's 52-year association with RCA. Included will be the Boston Pops.

The orchestra is the first U.S. ensemble ever signed by DGG, which is distributed by Polydor, Inc., in this country. The planned recording sessions will be the first by DGG in the U.S.

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO
W. 24,000

AUG 16 1969

CASH BOX
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 16,000

AUG 16 1969

DDG Inks Boston Pops, Symphony

NEW YORK — DGG Records has signed the Boston Symphony & Boston Pops Orchestra, according to an announcement by Jerry Schoenbaum, president of Polydor Records, the DGG unit in the U.S. Both orchestras have recorded for many years on RCA Records. Arthur Fiedler is conductor of the Boston Pops, while Erich Leinsdorf is the Boston Symphony's present conductor, although he leaves the post at the end of this summer season. Signings are DGG's first of an American orchestra.

Staten Island Advance
STATEN ISLAND, N. Y.
D. 62,519 SUN. 59,089

AUG 31 1969

* * *

Something akin to renaming Copley Square has come to jar the even way of life in Boston. That is a reshuffling of affiliations by which the records produced by its famed symphony orchestra will appear in the future on the label familiar to consumers as DGG (Deutche Grammophon Gesellschaft).

This clearly is a countermove on the part of the orchestra's management to the undertaking by which RCA acquired the services of the Philadelphia Orchestra some months ago.

It is, however, a shock of sorts, for the Boston Symphony and Victor (later RCA Victor and then RCA) have been synonymous since recordings of orchestras started to be made in the 1915-16 era.

Indeed, the finale of Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony, played by the Boston Symphony under the direction of Karl Muck, was among the earliest of such works to be found in American homes. The famed Boston "Pops", will, of course, go along with the parent organization.

* * *

William M. Judd (whose father, George, was for many years manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra) has decided to leave his long association with Columbia Artists' Management Inc. to open his own artists' management bureau. Judd, who began his career with Columbia in the late 30s, has been identified with such prominent performers as Rudolf Serkin, Claudio Arrau, Jascha Heifetz, and more recently Andre Watts.

Judd's reason for the move he is making is summed up in the words: "I have always considered the personalized guiding of artists' careers the most important aspect of my profession, and, unfortunately, there is increasingly little room for it in this day of conglomerate corporation structure and mass bookings."

Reginald Allen, long prominent in musical affairs of Philadelphia and New York, has been named executive vice president of the American Academy in Rome. Allen has been manager of the Philadelphia Orchestra (during Leopold Stokowski's directorship), a principal officer of the Metropolitan Opera (under the general managership of Edward Johnson as well as Rudolph Bing), and first administrative director of Lincoln Center for the Performing Arts (in association with General Maxwell Taylor during the construction period).

STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163,400

SEP 1969

EDITORIALLY SPEAKING

QUADRASONIC STEREO

IT MAY sound like heresy, sacrilege, or worse, but I must confess, in all candor, that although I was intellectually impressed by the supreme technical accomplishment that has just put two residents of this planet on the moon, I could not share the emotional responses of wonder, awe, and excitement that gripped many of my friends. I blame this loss of innocence (current pop-psych jargon would call it Affekt) on Arthur C. Clarke, Isaac Asimov, Robert Heinlein, and others whose science fiction tales have explored all this ground and more.

To descend abruptly from the celestial to the worldly plane, I blame some of these same prescient gentlemen for spoiling a good part of my pleasure in another area where reality is at last catching up with fiction. In your run-of-the-mill space opera, the pleasures of music usually emanate from a "sound cube" which, when dropped into some little black box or other, immediately produces a sonic envelope that completely surrounds the listener. And "Surround Stereo" is the name Vanguard Records has chosen to give to the first releases of recordings intended for (simultaneous) four-track playback, a system "capable of reproducing music and the acoustical properties of the auditorium in which it was recorded." Risking an ill-omened paraphrase, I can say that I have heard the future, and it works. The four-channel recording technique is, on the face of it, simplicity itself: two microphones pick up ordinary stereo sound from the front while two others pick up hall reverberations from the sides and rear. Playback requires four separate channels of amplification (two stereo amplifiers) and four speakers. There is, of course, more to it than that. Microphone placement even for "simple" stereo still remains, after over a decade of experience, more an art than a science, and the addition of two channels may increase difficulties exponentially rather than arithmetically. In playback too, speaker placement and playback levels (particularly for the two rear channels) are likely to require very nice adjustment in the home.

As for format, Vanguard will release its first recordings (Berlioz's Requiem and the Mahler Ninth among them) in reel-to-reel tape. A four-channel disc is technologically feasible (by multiplexing the rear-channel signals on a 25-kHz carrier that many modern cartridges are capable of reproducing), but is not being considered presently. The cassette is also a possibility, but patent-holder Philips (at least for now) is determined to preserve the compatibility of this medium—its licensees are not permitted to depart from the two channels forward, two channels back arrangement nor, indeed, the 1⅞-ips speed. There are several reel-to-reel tape machines currently available that will play back four channels simultaneously, and others can be adapted for the chore rather simply through head rearrangement or addition.

The sonic impression is, I might add, spectacular in its realism: the "hall sound" is palpably there when the whole system is "go," and for an old concert-goer like this one, the experience is gratifyingly musical. Audiophiles blessed with the proper equipment will have an opportunity to check this themselves with the Vanguard releases, and those along the Boston-New York axis can hear it on the air or in audio salons—see page 56 for details.

STEREO REVIEW

Thomas Mowrey, of the Eastman School staff, listening to a control-room playback of an experimental four-channel stereo recording of Warren Benson's Symphony for Drums and Wind Orchestra as performed by the Eastman Wind Ensemble.

FOUR-CHANNEL STEREO

A PROGRESS REPORT BY ROBERT BERKOVITZ

FOUR-CHANNEL (360-degree) stereo has for months been widely discussed—and seldom heard. However, beginning this month, Acoustic Research, Inc. is going to give millions of music listeners in the New York and Boston areas an extended opportunity to hear four-channel stereo. This new—and still experimental—audio technique, which uses four speaker systems in a room for full 360-degree reproduction, will be demonstrated by AR in Boston-area FM broadcasts which properly equipped listeners can hear at home. Four-channel 360-degree tape recordings will also be demonstrated at the AR listening rooms located in New York's Grand Central Terminal and near Harvard Square in AR's home town of Cambridge.

The FM broadcasts represent a significant technical experiment, in addition to their musical importance. The entire twenty-four-concert Saturday-night season of the Boston Symphony will be presented on two stereo FM broadcasting stations: WCRB-FM and WGBH-FM. Listeners to either station (in mono or two-channel stereo) will hear the same excellent sound quality as that broadcast in past years. However, those able to obtain an extra stereo receiver and an additional pair of speaker systems can be participants in an extraordinary acoustical experiment, in which the world-famous orchestra will seem to be spread around their listening rooms in the unique acoustical setting of Symphony Hall. There will be no attempt to duplicate the sound field at some hypothetical best seat; the aim will be rather to exploit the sonic potentialities of the new medium creatively. The technique for microphone pickup, broadcast, and listening arrangement was worked out cooperatively by Roy Allison and the writer, representing Acoustic Research; Richard L. Kaye of WCRB-FM; Jordan Whitelaw, Radio and Television Producer for the Boston Symphony; and William Busiek of WGBH-FM. The technique used was arrived at through evaluation of numerous recordings made during actual concerts earlier this year.

In the AR music rooms in New York and Cambridge, the medium will be four-channel, ¼-inch tape. All recording companies now own multi-channel recorders, and units capable of simultaneous recording of twenty-four channels are used regularly in some studios. However, the tapes made on such machines are not intended for reproduction by an equal number of amplifiers and loudspeakers; the multiple channels are used to record separately, but simultaneously, different sections of the performing group. The purpose of the multiple-track recording is to provide the producer and engineers full control over instrumental balance when the material is mixed down into the normal two-channel stereo recording released to the public.

The idea of using such recorders experimentally to make true three-, four-, or more-channel recordings for playback through as many speaker systems is not new. A recent article in the Journal of the Acoustical Society of America by Marvin Camras of the ITT Research Institute reports on experiments with twelve-channel recording and playback: five speakers in front, two at each side, two at the rear, and one overhead.

AR's experiments, some of which I discussed in an article in the May issue of STEREO REVIEW, began as an investigation of the extent to which two-channel stereo, rather than the quality of the components, is the major obstacle to accurate reproduction of music. And, in part, the experiments also were aimed at discovering what a listener would hear if he were placed, through electro-acoustics, in a living-room duplicate of the reverberant field of the concert hall. The recordings were made using multiple microphones, playback being done with the front speakers left in their normal stereo locations and two extra speakers (driven by separate amplifier channels) set up in the upper rear corners of the listening room. The microphones in the concert hall were arranged to provide the most realistic results with such a speaker arrangement.

(Continued on page 59)

The idea is not different in principle from that of Camras, or of other experimenters who preceded him in various countries in earlier years. The different element is the new possibility that home listeners might soon be given the opportunity to enjoy such music reproduction. It was for this reason that AR began its experiments with four channels, in the belief that this number represents a practical limit of cost and complexity for most listeners.

Some of AR's first experiments were at the New England Conservatory of Music in the conservatory's Jordan Hall. At the writer's suggestion, Thomas Mowrey of the Eastman School of Music began experimenting with the technique, his efforts culminating in a spectacular recording of "spatial music" by composer Henry Brant, in which the musicians were arranged in various parts of the auditorium. The Eastman tape was played for several interested executives of major recording companies—and provoked considerable excitement.

IN the meantime, Acoustic Research had found an ally in a major recording company which had been investigating four-channel techniques for some time, even to the extent of having commissioned works of music for the medium. That company—Columbia Records—will supply most of the four-channel tapes AR will be demonstrating in its music rooms. Columbia has issued no statement about their experiments and is understood to have no plans to release the tapes commercially. Vanguard Records will soon be releasing the special stereo tapes that were demonstrated to selected members of the New York audio press in semi-private sessions on June 25 of this year. The Vanguard tapes will also be on hand at the AR music rooms.

The system to be used at the music rooms is one in which standard one-quarter-inch tape has four parallel tracks in the same way as the normal four-track stereo tapes. For four-track stereo, all four tracks are recorded simultaneously in the same direction and, of course, they are also played back the same way. Whether the resultant sound will be that of the immediately foreseeable future or not will depend, to some extent, on listeners' reactions to the AR demonstrations.

86b

AMERICAN RECORD GUIDE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 21,100

SEP 1969

PROKOFIEV: Piano Concerto No. 5 in G, Op. 55; John Browning (piano); Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf; WEILL: Kleine Dreigroschenmusik; Lois Schaefer (piccolo), James Pappoutsakis and Phillip Kaplan, (flutes), Gino Cioffi and Pasquale Cardillo (clarinets), Peter Hadcock (soprano and tenor saxophones), Felix Viscuglia (alto saxophone), Sherman Walt and Ernst Panenka (bassoons), Armando Ghitalla and André Come (trumpets), William Gibson (trombone), Chester Schmitz (tuba), Charles Wilson (piano), Robert Karol (banjo, guitar), Martin Hoherman (accordion), Everett Firth (timpani), Charles Smith and Arthur Press (percussion), conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. RCA Stereo LSC-3121, $5.98. (23, 19¾ mins.)

Prokofiev:
Brendel, Sternberg, Vienna State Op....Turn. 4160
Richter, Rowicki, Warsaw Phil.....DGG ⓢ138075
Hollander, Leinsdorf, Boston Sym....RCA ⓢ2732

ⓢALTHOUGH Browning gives an exceedingly fine and virtuosic performance of the Prokofiev, I much prefer the piano-orchestral balance, favoring orchestral definition, in the earlier Leinsdorf/Boston recording with Lorin Hollander. Too much orchestral detail is lost in the stereophonic recesses of the new release, for Leinsdorf's lightly sketched-in accompaniment needs all the timbre it can get when the piano is going full tilt (as noted in earlier releases of the same Browning/Leinsdorf Prokofiev cycle). It is true that Browning himself frequently plays more delicately than Hollander, and with less pedal. But in the middle of the Larghetto movement, for example, where the big unison string theme comes in, forte, under the solo piano (cue 70, molto cantando ed espressivo), it now sounds miles behind the piano, and cannot make the grandiose effect it does in the Hollander version, nor in the equally splendid Richter/Rowicki version on DGG. Rowicki and the Warsaw Philharmonic occasionally inject more sting into the orchestration than Leinsdorf and the BSO. Unlike the other soloists, Browning attacks the Vivo while his closing pedal from the Larghetto is still down, so there is no dividing band on the record here. And incidentally, Leinsdorf and Rowicki surprised me in that lovely fifth-movement stretto-coda which begins Allegro non troppo with a tune strikingly reminiscent of The Holly and the Ivy (cue 104). The theme is marked "con eleganza", and unpredictably it is Rowicki who gives it more of that quality. Another fine soloist on a mono reissue, Alfred Brendel, is severely hampered by his accompaniment.

To those previously acquainted with the deleted recordings of Kurt Weill's marvelous concert arrangement of the overture, songs, and finale from The Three-Penny Opera, as led by Klemperer (Angel) and Izler Solomon (MGM), Leinsdorf's version must come as a disappointment. Klemperer himself is, of course, steeped in the atmosphere of the late-twenties in Berlin as evoked by Weill (indeed, the composer made the concert suite in 1929 at Klemperer's suggestion). Solomon at least made a highly convincing approximation of it. Leinsdorf just doesn't seem to have the feel of this idiom and its characteristic rhythms in his bones: the Charleston, the fox-trot, the languorously insinuating tango, etc. Have you ever heard a brisk tango? Well, here it is. Many of his tempi are too fast both by the score and by ordinary instinct; in the case of the Overture (Maestoso), they are 80 per cent too fast! Thus the phrasing often wants bite (e.g. the third number's opening duet for clarinets and trumpet), while crucial bits of color like the tolling of bells in the finale are somehow wholly missed in the recording. To one who has been increasingly distressed by Klemperer's growing rigidity of beat, as I have, to hear again his delicious flexibility and general know-how in this work, as recorded in 1962, comes as a double treat. And so, although his recording omitted one of the eight pieces—No. 3, The "Instead of" Song (Klemperer giveth and Klemperer taketh away)—the new and numerically complete version hardly can be recommended to any one who has known and admired it even though the RCA is, at present, all there is. —J.D.

RECORDING OF SPECIAL MERIT

BEETHOVEN: Symphony No. 6, in F Major, Op. 68 ("Pastoral"). Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf cond. RCA LSC 3074 $5.98.

Performance: Excellent
Recording: Good
Stereo Quality: Good

It does not seem to be in style these days to like Leinsdorf, but frankly I think this is a first-class reading of the "Pastoral" and I have no hesitation at all in recommending it to anyone on the lookout for a strong, lyrical, crystalline performance that sounds and moves. The playing is excellent—Boston at its best. All kinds of details shine forth in unaccustomed splendor, but the piece is never allowed to become a mass of finicky details; it moves right along in a stream of beautifully shaped sound. The recording is a bit resonant for my taste and, as is the case so often with recent RCA pressings, the signal-to-noise ratio was not always ideal. But these problems are minor next to the value of the performance. E. S.

STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163.400

SEP 1969

Artists Return to London As Contract With RCA Ends

PAGE ONE

By FRED KIRBY

NEW YORK — A wealth of material cut by some of the biggest names in the classical field has reverted to British Decca, London's parent company, from RCA. The material, whose production was originally financed by British Decca, appeared on the RCA label through July, when an agreement between the two companies was terminated.

The first album to appear on London from this group is Verdi's "Aida" featuring soprano Leontyne Price, tenor Jon Vickers, mezzo-soprano Rita Gorr, baritone Robert Merrill and Giorgio Tozzi. George Solti conducts the Rome Opera Orchestra and Chorus in the three-LP package formerly on RCA. The set's September release was geared to coincide with Miss Price's opening of the Metropolitan Opera season in "Aida," but the season has been postponed because of stalled contract negotiations with Met unions.

Among the other major artists involved in the massive prod-

(Continued on page 53)

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO
W. 24 000

SEP 13 1969

Disks of Famous Artists Go to London from RCA

• Continued from page 1

uct switch are Joan Sutherland, Leontyne Price, Jussi Bjoerling, Birgit Nilsson, George London, Herbert von Karajan, Cesare Siepi, Pierre Monteux, Erich Leinsdorf, Antol Dorati, Leonie Rysanek, Jan Peerce, Zinka Milanov, Leonard Warren, Roberta Peters, Giuseppe di Stefano, Marilyn Horne and Fritz Reiner.

EMI in 1958

A similar transfer of product occurred in 1958, when RCA and EMI severed their relationship. Material, previously on RCA, which switched to EMI at that time included recordings of Puccini's "La Boheme" with Victoria de los Angeles and Jussi Bjoerling, Sir Thomas Beecham conducting; Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde" with Kirsten Flagstad, Wilhelm Furtwaengler conducting; the complete Beethoven piano sonatas by Artur Schnabel; Verdi's "Don Carlo" with Tito Gobbi and Boris Christoff; and Beethoven's "Symphony No. 9" with Elisabeth Schwarzkopf, Furtwaengler conducting.

Another former RCA title slated for release on London's full price line is Bellini's "Norma," which features Miss Sutherland and Miss Horne, were slated to star in a new Met production of the opera this season. Richard Bonynge, who was to have conducted the new production, conducts the London Symphony in the three-LP package.

Tebaldi's Cavalleria

Other product by Miss Price switching over include Puccini's "Tosca" with De Stefano, Giuseppe Taddei and the Vienna Philharmonic, Karajan conducting; and Verdi's "Requiem" with Rosalind Elias, Bjoerling, Tozzi and the Vienna Philharmonic, Reiner conducting.

Miss Tebaldi's set is Mascagni's "Cavalleria Rusticana" with Bjoerling, Ettore Bastianini and the Maggio Musicale Fiorentino, Alberto Erede conducting. The package is completed with a Bjoerling operatic recital. Another Verdi title is "Falstaff" with Geraint Evans, Eva Ligabue, Mirella Freni, Giulietta Simionato, Alfredo Kraus, Merrill and the RCA Italiana Opera Orchestra and Chorus, Solti conducting.

Opera by Miss Milanov are Verdi's "La Forza del Destino" with Miss Elias, Di Stefano, Warren, Tozzi and the Accademia di Santa Cecilia, Rome, Fernando Previtali conducting; and Ponchielli's "La Gioconda" with Miss Elias, Di Stefano, Warren, and the same orchestra and conductor. The latter, which was on Victrola, is among the product which will probably wind up on a low price label, such as Richmond.

Mozart Sets

A package of Mozart's "Don Giovanni" features Miss Nilsson, Miss Price, Cesare Valletti, Siepi, Fernando Corena, and the Vienna Philharmonic, Leinsdorf conducting. Another Mozart opera with Leinsdorf and the Vienna Philharmonic features Miss Peters, Lisa Della Casa, London, Tozzi and Corena.

Two Wagnerian operas in the transfer are "Die Walkuere" with Miss Nilsson, Gre Brouwenstein, Vickers, Miss Gorr, London and the London Symphony, Leinsdorf conducting; and "Der fliegende Hollaender" with Miss Rysanek, Miss Elias, Karl Liebl, London, Tozzi and the Royal Opera House Orchestra, Dorati conducting.

Leinsdorf also conducts the Vienna Philharmonic in Richard Strauss' "Ariadné auf Naxos" with Miss Peters, Miss Rysanek, Sena Jurinac, Peerce, and Walter Berry. Most of the instrumental recordings by Karajan and Monteux that are included are with the Vienna Philharmonic although the latter also conducts the London Symphony and the Paris Conservatoire Orchestra.

Plans call for all product issued on London to be remastered to London's sound standards. During the agreement between RCA and British Decca, the latter financed many recordings and released and pressed RCA product in England and parts of continental Europe. Some recordings, such as "Tosca" even were produced by British Decca personnel.

Delos Smith

Leinsdorf Will Be Missed

NEW YORK UPI — Now that Erich Leinsdorf is no longer music director of the Boston Symphony and merely another entry on the list of available guest conductors, it is time to wonder about his future as a recording conductor.

His tenure as head music man in Boston put him among the most prolific recovers but the record-maker, RCA, has always done much with the orchestra regardless of who was the music director. It may well be Leinsdorf will now have fewer recording opportunities.

But whatever his future, his recent past as recorder is a glorious one, a fact underlined by the newly released record completing his series devoted to Prokofieff's five piano concertos, with John Browning as soloist 3121.

It is of the fifth concerto and again you are given the conviction that conductor and soloist understood the composer precisely the same way other conductor - soloist combination ever did. Leinsfort's strength is in conveying unquestioned authority.

Presumably he has completed the project of recording all the Prokofieff symphonies with the Boston. The 3rd, 5th and 6th he has done and the 2nd is newly released 3061. Also newly at hand are his interpretations of Beethoven's 1st and 8th symphonies, on one record 3098. But he served all the masters, modern and classical, well in Boston and may the recordings long survive!

Sir John Barbirolli is a new torchbearer for oddball Frederick Delius who has had no outstanding popularizer since Sir Thomas Beechan died.

Beecham devoted many an album to his music. In these long-play days Barbirolli needed only one record to survey the tedious but often exquisitely lovely Delius output.

Included are "In a Summer Garden" and "A Song Before Sunrise." Barbirolli conducted them with perhaps a little too much sentiment with the Halle Orchestra, Angel - 36588.

A recommended listing experience: The eloquent baritone, Hermann Prey, singing from Johannes Brahms' collection of German folk songs, "All Mein Gedanken" Deutsche Grammophon, 139375.

EAGLE-TRIBUNE
LAWRENCE, MASS.
(M&E) 45,050

BINGHAMTON PRESS
Saturday, August 30, 1969

JAMESTOWN POST JOURNAL
Saturday, August 30, 1969

SEP 3 1969

The Washington Post
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 479,644 SUN. 526,111

SEP 3 1969

THE ARTS

Boston Symphony Switches

By Paul Hume

It just isn't safe to go away on a vacation any more. Back at my desk and what do I see?

The Metropolitan Opera has canceled its opening night, set for Sept. 15, and does not know when or even if it will begin the season. The problem revolves around two organizations with whom the management has not been able to come to terms: the Musicians Union, which is to say the orchestra; and the American Guild of Musical Artists, which means the singers. When you think of it, opera is a little tough to put on without singers and orchestral players.

Then comes this news: The Boston Symphony Orchester has signed a contract with Polydor Incorporated and will, starting a year from now, make its recordings for the Deutsche Grammophon label!

The Boston has been an RCA Victor exclusive property since the day in 1917 when Karl Muck took his players down to Camden, N.J., and conducted the first recording ever made by an American symphony orchestra. Playing in the orchestra that day, by the way, was Arthur Fiedler, now the renowned conductor of the Boston Pops.

The new contract does not take effect until September, 1970. But it opens up all kinds of fascinating speculations in which the names of conductors like William Steinberg, the Boston's new music director, and Herbert von Karajan, DGG's top man, stand out in large characters. There is also the German company's superb list of internationally known soloists. The contract is a package affair which includes both the Boston Symphony and the Boston Pops. It does not, however, thus far include the name of Arthur Fiedler.

The new arrangement will leave RCA, at least as of the present time, with the Philadelphia and Chicago orchestras in its stable.

MUSIC NOTES

Cincinnati also provides its share of news. Conductor Max Rudolf has resigned as conductor of the Cincinnati Orchestra immediately, a year ahead of the time his previously announced retirement was to take place.

Giving "complete exhaustion following the orchestra's recent European tour" as his reason, Rudolf has been relieved of all responsibility for the coming season. Thomas Schippers has been named his successor for next year. In the meantime, Erich Kunzel, the orchestra's outstanding associate leader, will take over the approaching year. Cincinnati might find, as Kunzel is given these larger responsibilities, that he has a stature worth greater attention.

Cincinnati is also getting another new music auditorium in the Patricia Corbett Pavilion now under construction in conjunction with the Cincinnati College-Conservatory of Music. The new building, which will include a 440-seat theater, will cost around $3 million, bringing Corbett's contributions to the Cincinnati complex up to something like $9 million in recent years.

Chicago's Ravinia Festival has named Istvan Kertesz principal conductor for the next three seasons. This is the summer festival of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra. Kertesz succeeds Seiji Ozawa in the post.

On the home front: the National Symphony and the Musicians Union have no further news to announce at the moment concerning negotiations for a new contract.

Obituaries: Clarence Dickinson, surely the man entitled to be thought of as dean of church musicians in this country, died on Aug. 2 at the age of 96. He had been organist of Brick Presbyterian Church in New York City for 50 years, plus ten years more as organist emeritus.

CHARLESTON W. VA.
GAZETTE-MAIL
SUN. 107,000

SEP 14 1969

DISC-CUSSION

Sound of the future in Spanish dress

"Moog Espana" RCA stereo.

If you are very much of a hi-fi buff or spend much of your time reading about sound, sound systems and sound equipment, you're probably as familiar with Robert Moog of Trumansburg, N. Y. as I am.

Moog—pronounced Moag, I'm informed — has worked out an electronic synthesizer that can copy any sound on earth and make some that have never been heard before. More importantly, it can combine sounds and come up with some of the weirdest combinations imaginable.

Now all this is done with mathematics and electronics — and a bit of dickering, since Moog's synthesizer is still in the embroyo stage. So far, Moog can't make a chord sound in just one shot, but he can make two or more tapes and overlay them so that you do get a chord.

"Moog Espana" is the result of Andy Wiswell of RCA experimenting on the Moog synthesizer. Jacket notes on the back of the album tell how it was done, but the important thing is what he got.

If "Moog Espana" isn't voted the album of the year, it should be. The titles are all familiar Spanish pieces: 'Espani Cani," "Playera," "Granada," "Mantilla," "Mama Inez," "Malaguena," "Spanish Flea," "Lady of Spain," "Valencia," "Peanut Vendor," and "Ritual Fire Dance."

As you might expect, a record that starts out as a gimmick, sometimes gimmicks the music to death, but tucked away among the gimmicks are some sounds that are beautiful beyond words. And, there are sounds that will make you burst out laughing they are so unique and unexpected. The basses — if your speakers can handle them — actually vibrate you internally. There's one that's best described as Grog (of the comic strip B. C.) belching.

To my mind, the best selection is "The Spanish Flea," easily worth the price of the whole album, which contains a guitar-like twang at the end that is twisted up into silence in a writhing spiral of pure beauty.

This kind of music definitely has a big place in the future.

(HCG)

Triumph of Spirit

"Beethoven Symphonies Nos. 9 and 5; Schoenberg's "A Survivor from Warsaw," Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony. RCA.

There may be some fresh words to use in describing Beethoven's 5th and 9th symphonies, but they are beyond my meager talent. In his jacket notes on this two-record album, Robert Offergeld dwells briefly on what would be the result if "a giant erasure were somehow to delete the Ninth Symphony from history." Horrible thought!

Offergeld says:

"The eraser that eliminated the Ninth would simultaneously efface, or at least badly blur, innumerable pages of Schubert, Wagner, Brahms, Berlioz and Mahler, not to mention more recent composers less conspiciously affected but nevertheless deeply obligated."

Offergeld says the Beethoven Fifth Symphony "has been exploited on a global scale as a kind of portable, one-work, cultural task force." He says, that, after the wheel, the Fifth "may well be the nearest thing we have to a universally successful product of the mind."

Certainly, these two Beethoven symphonies should be enough for any music lover, deeply moving and human as they are, but as an appetizer, Leinsdorf and RCA have added Arnold Schoenberg's "A Survivor from Warsaw" as a prelude to human triumph over Nazi beastiality. Some appetizer!

"Survivor from Warsaw" is a short, intensely concentrated music drama culminated by the singing of the Shema Yisroel. It was written in 1947, the last orchestral work Schoenberg completed, and he seems to have had the story from an actual Warsaw survivor.

As contrasting works magnifying the human spirit, the selections of this album set some kind of high-water mark. As far as I know, history has provided the only one comparable. That was Warsaw Radio, in September, 1939, endlessly playing Chopin's "Polonaise in A Flat" while the Stukas dive-bombed the city to rubble.

(PC)

CASH BOX
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 16,000

SEP 20 1969

Classical Picks

SCHUBERT/BRAHMS/POULENC/WEBERN/MARTINU/DAHL — Boston Symphony Chamber Players — RCA Red Seal LSC 6189

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players offer a program ranging from Schubert's "Trout" Quintet to Ingolf Dahl's Duettino Concertante, written in 1966, in this three-record package. In between are chamber works by Brahms, Francis Poulenc, Anton Webern and Bohuslav Martinu. The variety of and contrasts among the musical styles of the six composers should provide an interesting listening experience for chamber music buffs.

LIBRARY JOURNAL
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SEMI-MONTHLY 46,000

SEP 15 1969

WAGNER. Orchestral Works; Selections. Vienna Sym. O. Sawallisch, cond. Turnabout (S only) TV 34246, $2.50;

———. Orchestral Works; Selections. New York Philharmonic. Bernstein, cond. Columbia (S only) MS 7141, $5.79;

———. Orchestral Works; Selections. Boston Sym. O. Leinsdorf, cond. RCA Victor (S only) LSC 3011, $5.98

While the selections differ, it can be said that these releases share in common the fact that they all are competently conducted and played. The recording jobs on the Bernstein and the Leinsdorf issues are superior to that accorded Sawallisch, though. One need not rush to purchase any one of these, but, at the same time, any one of them would be a fitting addition to a collection. Space limitations preclude a detailed contents; one should see Schwann for this.

Story of Warsaw ghetto

Schoenberg Opus

THE MIAMI NEWS
MIAMI, FLA.
D. 87,421 SAT. 80,390

AUG 27 1969

By TERRY JOHNSON KING
Miami News Music Editor

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of Erich Leinsdorf, has recorded two Beethoven Symphonies (5 and 9) for RCA.

But the important portion of the record — for everyone goes the Beethoven route sooner or later — is Schoenberg's "A Survivor from Warsaw, Opus 46."

It is narrated by Sherrill Milnes, backed by Lorna Cooke de Varon conducting the New England Conservatory Chorus — a choral group which contains a sprinkling of very talented Miamians.

The Schoenberg takes as its subject an episode in the Warsaw ghetto. A survivor tells the story of a group of Jews, who, at the moment of their deportation to the death camp, suddenly in a last flaring of spirit and faith burst into singing the prayer "Shema Yisroel."

Schoenberg, who heard the story from an actual Warsaw survivor, wrote the piece in 1947, and it was the last orchestral work he completed. He shaped the narrative so that the singing of the prayer is its culmination.

Milnes' narration is done with no trace of cheap pathos, and it is indeed a powerful work.

★ ★ ★

THE NASHVILLE TENNESSEAN
D. 141,842 SUN. 234,036

SEP 14 1969

Boston's Leinsdorf Featured

By LOUIS NICHOLAS

RCA RELEASES this month feature the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf.

A two-record album has Symphonies 9 and 5, with Schoenberg's "A Survivor from Warsaw" — his last completed orchestral work. This is a brief, powerful work in which the music vividly underlines and amplifies the emotion of the narrative spoken with great dramatic impact by Sherrill Milnes, and culminates in the climactic singing by unison male chorus of the Jewish affirmation of faith — the "Schima Yisroel."

Leinsdorf's concept of the 9th Symphony is one of irresistible force and logic of design, with amazing clarity of textures, even when the tempi are very fast. The slow movement has most carefully adjusted balances, beauty of tone, and depth of emotion.

The last movement starts with a hushed, yet ecstatic quality that rises to a tremendous height of impassioned eloquence.

The soloists of the last movement — Jane Marsh, Josephine Veasey, Placido Domingo and Milnes—all have very fine voices, and they, and the Chorus Pro Musica sing securely and cleanly.

Leinsdorf's account of the 5th Symphony is noble in utterance, and partakes of the same qualities as the 9th.

He plays Symphony No. 1 with point, clarity and elegance befitting its Haydnesque character (LSC-3098), but Symphony No. 8, though played with equal precision, has far less tonal allure, and more than a few hints of roughness and unconcern.

Leinsdorf is in happy vein with the Mozart Symphonies Nos. 36 in C ("Linz"), K. 425, and 39 in E-flat, K. 543, and the Boston Symphony plays its polished best (LSC-3097). Both symphonies are sensitively phrased, graciously paced, and caressingly voiced.

Prokofiev Concertos

With LSC-3121, John Browning, Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony complete their recording of all five of the Prokofiev Piano Concertos. Except for the desire for completeness, there would seem small reason for this recording of No. 5, though it is competent in every way.

Lorin Hollander recorded this concerto with Leinsdorf and the Bostonians before Browning entered the picture, and his is the more desirable version both pianistically and orchestrally. The Browning version is faster, has less variation in pace when the composer directs it, and is far less expressive. The general effect is blander and far less interesting than the of the earlier recording. Hollander's piano is farther forward, too, and this is an advantage.

But the music from Kurt Weill's "The Threepenny Opera," played by a small group of wind and percussion (banjo, piano, guitar) instruments from the orchestra is entirely delightful with its wry and biting harmonies in the ragtime rhythms of the early thirties.

✦ ✦ ✦

Beethoven's Ninth

Odyssey (32 16 322) brings Bruno Walter's performance of Beethoven's 9th Symphony with the New York Philharmonic and the Westminster Choir. The first three movements were recorded in 1949 and the choral movement in 1953 with a particularly experienced quartet of soloists — Frances Yeend, Martha Lipton, David Lloyd, and Mack Harrell. Though these do not, perhaps, have as fine voices as the quartet in the Boston Symphony recording, they sing more expressively and balance ever so much better.

There is less strain evident in the Westminster Choir than in the Pro Musica Chorus, but the work of the latter, as that of the Boston Symphony, is much cleaner than here.

Walter phrases caressingly and gets voluptuous tone in the slower portions, but he is not as rhythmically secure.

MAINE SUNDAY TELEGRAM
PORTLAND, MAINE
(S) 109,181

SEP 21 1969 New England

Records

By STELLA MILLS

LEINSDORF and the Boston Symphony can be acquired in three recent RCA releases: a coupling of the Beethoven First and Eighth Symphonies; a pair of Mozart, No. 36, "Linz" and No. 39, as the Prokofieff Piano Concerto No. 5 with John Browning as soloist, plus music from Weill's "Three Penny Opera." Sad to say, the trio of LP's are marked with mediocre interpretation, listless conducting and automatic performances, except for "Three Penny Opera," which at least sounds as if the musicians were interested.

By sharp contrast, RCA's issue to the Cherubini Symphony in D, with the Haydn Symphony No. 60 "Il Distratto," featuring the late Chamber Symphony of Philadelphia, is a gem. Listening to this reading and its conductor-orchestra rapport provides a real treat.

Anshel Brusilow has proved to be a conductor of sensitivity and imagination. It is a loss to music that the Philadelphia ensemble could not stay together because of financial trouble. Both works are given bustling treatment, especially the little Haydn, which is not a symphony at all, but a collection of charming incidentals taken from his score to play LeDistrait,

The Collegium Aurem is a magnificent little orchestra which has made C.P.E. Bach's Four Hamburg Symphonies for RCA-Victrola. A handful of virtuosi, seven violins, two violas, three cellos, double bass and harpsichord sound like an orchestra twice as large; and the tone is miraculous. Don't be frightened off by the high-sounding title. This is a prize recording, a bargain at any price.

WHEN THE great rash of Mozart recordings reached the market a few years ago, Vox released quite a few with the young pianist Ingrid Haebler, then almost unknown in this country. She now records for Philips, and helped by improved engineering, has made four concertos of Mozart, 21, 23, 20 and 26 in that order.

This time she has the London Symphony for accompaniment and two conductors, Witold Rowicki and Alec Galliera. Haebler is remarkably right for Mozart and her style, always good, has improved with her musical maturity.

Neither Rowicki nor Galliera attempt to cloud her lines with overly loud accompaniment. This is a splendid realization of all four concerti, but restrained, more European than American.

RCA Victor has recorded the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Georges Pretre conducting, the Berlioz Symphonie Fantastique. This is the first of the composers in the symphonic genre and it is an elegant combination of melody and rhythm. The music reaches grand heights and is filled with this melody as well as strange noises which follow the script upon which the work was based. The work is a lovely tone picture.—Chris Black

The El Paso Times
D. 58,283 SUN. 85,588

SEP 14 1969

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

SEP 21 1969 New England

Mancini goes 'Pop'

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Staff

Notes from the Funeral Baked Meats Department: Before the ink was dry — or perhaps before it was even wet — on the contract that shifted the Boston Pops, one of the most Deutsche Grammophon, RCA had invented and signed up something new, the Philadelphia Orchestra Pops, which, with Henry Mancini conducting, has come out with a first album called "Debut!" The music is all Mancini's own and much of it, as titles like "Strings in Fire" and "Drummer's Delight" suggest, is specifically designed to show off the Philadelphia virtuosity.

Disc jockeys also get a record with canned interviews with Mancini. It works a bit like the 9-W game in which you start with the answer, the point being to think of the question that leads to it. Mancini gives answers, some al-purpose ("Well, I'm always happy to talk about something that I'm especially proud of"), some more specific ("Well, I'm fortunate in that I picked a profession that, ah, kinda forces you to go off in different directions. . . ."), some still more so ("Well, I think if there's any section of the Philadelphia Orchestra that has personality . . ."), and the disc jockey feeds the questions. For the DJ who's not too bright, RCA writes out questions the way the Hollywood studios send out reviews with their PR materials.

By way of reassurance, RCA tells the DJs: "This is not an attempt to 'fool' the public into thinking that Henry Mancini is actually there in the studio with you. Instead, we suggest that you promote the interview as 'pre-recorded specially for this program.' This is exactly no more and no less than the fact of the matter."

88

The Oregonian
PORTLAND, OREGON
D. 245,132 SUN. 407,186
SEP 21 1969

IN THE GROOVE

By MADISON DERROW
Special Writer, The Oregonian

Does Anybody Miss Me (United Artists) — Shirley Bassey shows the beauty and quality of her fine voice as she sings "Does Anybody Miss Me?" and follows with nine other beautiful tunes. Shirley grooves along through "We," "Hold Me, Thrill Me, Kiss Me," with such beauty one must hear it to really enjoy this marvelous lady. Other tunes include "I'll Never Fall in Love Again," "Never, Never No," "Picture Puzzle," "I Only Miss Him," "My Way of Life," "Give Me You," and "It's Always 4 A.M." UAS — 6713.

Once Upon A Time in the West (United Artists) — Leroy Holmes has done a fine job in selecting tunes for this album that western music lovers are sure to enjoy. I enjoyed listening to 'Ole Turkey Buzzard, a tune long gone but not forgotton. "True Grit" is included along with 11 other western grooves, "The Days of Anger," "Hang 'Em High," "100 Rifles," "The Stalking Moon," and "The Big Gundown." UAS—6710.

Love Theme from Romeo and Juliet (United Artists) — Don Tweedy must surely have felt romantic to put together such a love-lovely album. All 12 songs are themes from recent motion pictures and combine to make one album that is ideal for quiet romantic evenings. "Ole Turkey Buzzard," is on this one, too. Other enchanting grooves include "Love Theme from Romeo and Juliet," "Oliver," "Hushabye Mountain," "The Windmills of Your Mind," "Jean," and "The Night They Raided Minsky's." UAS — 6716.

Nashville Zodiac (United Artists)—Billy Edd Wheeler really has gone all out to showcase the Nashville sound. "Mississippi Magic" tells a good story in its lyrics about blacks and whites. I hope you can dig it. "Having a Baby" is a unique set of lyrics put to music. Billy does 12 Nashville sides beginning with "The Interstate Is Coming Through My Outhouse," "The Coon Hunters," "Bernard," "Fried Chicken and a Country Tune," "My Uncle Abel," "The Big Put On," "You Fight Your Fight and I'll Fight Me," "Sweet Joe Blon," "Three Fingered Banjo Pickin' Man" and "The Bow of Love." UAS — 6711.

Why You Been Gone So Long (United Artists) —. Johnny Darrell comes on strong with 11 deep country tunes in this album. Country listeners are sure to enjoy his singing talent and choice of songs. "Margie's at the Lincoln Park Inn" is a deeply moving song about a man torn between love of family and the girl in the title. Songs include "River Bottom," "Jimmy Jacob," "Hungrey Eyes," "The House on The Hill" and "Ain't That Livin'." UAS — 6707.

By HILMAR GRONDAHL
Boston Chamber Players: The principals of the Boston Symphony are busy recording choice chamber music items. The latest RCA Victor album contains Schubert's "Trout" Quintet, the Brahms Piano Trio in B, Poulenc's Sextet, the Webern Concerto, Martinu's Nonet, and a duet for flute and percussion by Ingolf Dahl. This fine ensemble includes concertmaster Silverstein, violinist Eskin, cellist Eskin, flutist Dwyer, oboist Gomberg, hornist Stagliano, etc. Guest pianist is Richard Goode, who is good in the Brahms and Poulenc especially, but overly assertive in the Schubert. Three discs filled with delightful music.

Schumann Songs: Twenty songs by Schumann are on a new DGG disc sung by Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau with Jorg Demus at the piano. None of the cycles here, but a range of individual songs from "Liebesbotschaft" to Chamisso's tragic poem of the tender young maiden and the affectionate lion. Dieskau is ever the expressive musician, and Demus seems destined to become Moore's successor.

Sessions Symphony 3 — A first recording of the Third Symphony of Roger Sessions is on a new RCA-Red Seal disc in a performance by Igor Buketoff and the Royal Philharmonic. Sessions has not been a very prolific composer, but he is a master of orchestration, as one can notice from a single hearing such as this. Discmate is the Benjamin Lees Concerto for String Quartet and Orchestra. It is skillful the way he has set these two forces in contrast and consonance. Nothing avant garde about either of these.

Mozart Concertos — Ingrid Haebler, the Austrian pianist, is heard on a two disc Philips album playing four concertos with the London Symphony. They are No. 20 in D-minor, No. 20 in C (the slow movement of which is the music for Arpino's ballet "Secret Places"), No. 23 in A, and No. 26, the "Coronation." Alec Galliera conducts No. 20, the rest are by Witold Rowicki. Great music, most of its handsomely played, but not always expertly microphoned.

Fantastic Berlioz — At a concert of the Boston Symphony last season the French conductor Georges Pretre programmed the Berloiz Symphonie Fantastique. Thereafter it was recorded for RCA and is now available. It is a surprisingly just and romantic reading from one whose reputation for the flexiblity of direction has not been notable in this style. The orchestral sound is gorgeous, the total effect fine.

COSHOCTON TRIBUNE
COSHOCTON, O.
P.M. & SUN. - CIRC. 10,39?
SEP-24-69 047

NY

Leinsdorf Numbers Available

NEW YORK (UPI)—For his last Boston concert as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last spring Erich Leinsdorf conducted Beethoven's 9th symphony and Schoenberg's "A Survivor from Warsaw."

Now, less than six months later, they're available on two records in a nice album, along with Leinsdorf's interpretation of Beethoven's 5th symphony (7055). RCA usually doesn't work that fast.

It's noteworthy for two reasons. RCA is heavily committed with the Philadelphia Orchestra. Next year it is giving up its generations-long recording command of the Boston.

A European record-maker (Deutsche Grammophon) is taking over but it can't be the same. One has to surmise that RCA decided to concentrate on just one name orchestra and chose the Philadelphia over the Boston. Meanwhile, it is cashing in its Boston investments.

Leinsdorf's conductorial management of the Beethoven symphonies or any other dramatic score, such as the Schoenberg, is compelling. His sense of pace and his feeling for climax and his ability to sustain heights are all on the uncanny side.

His soloists for Beethoven's 9th were Jane Marsh, Josephine Veasey, Placido Domingo and Sherrill Milnes, and Milnes was the narrator in Schoenberg's "Survivor," a piece which grows in power with each carefully planned performance such as this one.

Two older recordings of Beethoven's 9th are again available, on budget-price reissues. One has the late Bruno Walter conducting the New York Philharmonic. He recorded the first 3 movements in 1949 and the 4th, the choral movement, in 1953. As is well remembered, Walter was a relaxed rather than a high-tension conductor; his is a meditative 9th (Odyssey 32160322).

The other 9th is the one the late Andre Cluytens made with the Berlin Philharmonic not long before his death in 1967. Like the Walter version it has the advantage of being on one record but Cluytens' manner with it can seem slack rather than relaxed (Seraphim-60079).

Oregon Journal
PORTLAND, ORE.
D. 139,332 SAT. 131,534
SEP 22 1969

These We Like...

By ANTHONY CRESSWELL
Journal Staff Writer

Concert

An entrancing cross section of chamber music is offered in a boxed three-record set by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players under the RCA imprimatur. The six selections are taken from such disparate composers as Schubert, Brahms, Poulenc, Webern, Marinu and Dahl. Further contributing to the variety of the program is the instrumentation — variously for two, three, five, six and nine players. And finally adding to the disparate element is the period of time covered — from the early 19th century (Schubert's "Trout" quintet) to the late middle 20th century (Dahl's Duettino concertante".) RCA, LSC-6189.

DEBUT! HENRY MANCINI is being promoted to the fullest by RCA Records — and with reason. The album is the first recording of the Philadelphia Orchestra Pops, Mancini conducting. Also it is the first recording of some of Mancini's own works. The major original is an autobiographical suite, which for ears attuned to Mancini's time and scene is pleasantly revealing sound. Some contemporary ears perhaps will be startled a bit by the somewhat abrupt introduction of old march-master sounds—shades of Edwin Franko Goldman — but these sounds, surprising perhaps to mod disc hangers-on, are true Mancini sounds. The "sound-master" knew what he was doing when he composed "Beaver Valley — '37." And the Philadelphia Orchestra Pops' master musicians also knew what he was doing. The result is a fresh sounding pops album. It's not Boston Pops. In this one Mancini pops. RCA LSC-3106.

FOR THOSE with an itchy wide band of comic opera in their listening souls "Hary Janos" will be a scratcher. The music is by Zoltan Kodaly and libretto by Bela Paulini and Zsolt Harsanyi. Narrator for this voice-music counterbalanced production is Peter Ustinov. The Edinburgh Festival Chorus, Wandsworth School Boys Choir and the London Symphony Orchestra conducted by Istvan Kertesz make the listener easily both forget and identify with the story of the comic piece. To enjoy fully this two-record album one should read carefully the accompanying libretto. Also keep in mind that Kodaly's music here "consists of 31 numbers, 16 songs, all of them arrangements of actual folksongs which at the time Kodaly wrote the work could all still be heard in the villages of Hungary." The music is very good listening. London, OSA-1278.

Popular

Johnny Mathis is one of those one-of-a-kind singers you can't do certain songs without. The Mathis mood is put to full use in his new album featuring the love theme from "Romeo and Juliet," backed up with "Aquarius," "I'll Never Fall In Love Again," and other favorites. Columbia, CS 9909.

BEN COLDER'S latest, "Have One On Ben Colder," is strictly for the party room. His ribaldry is mild, however, compared to those records in the plain brown wrapper or available under the counter. Selections include Colder's classic "Life Gets Tee-Jus Don't It," and his whimsical wonderment, "Where Does The Light Go (When It Goes Out)? MGM, SE-4629.

LIKE SO MANY new groups, "A.B. Skhy" thinks it must have a gimmicky name to draw attention. It doesn't. The music and interesting arrangements speak loud and clear. Instrumentally, "A.B. Skhy" opens with a heavy drum and moves into a distinctive horn corral that carries the record throughout. Members of the group are Jim Marcotte (bass), Terry Andersen (drums and vocal), Howard Wales (keyboard) and Dennis Geyer (guitar and vocal). The main feature is the horn accompaniment that takes this record out of the ordinary. MGM, SE-4628.

"NOW COUNTRY" with Tompll and the Glaser Brothers is not country music. The offering is sometimes reminiscent of the days when trios, particularly the Kingston Trio and Limelighters, were popular in the mid and late '50s and early '60s. One track, "Wicked California," is a commentary on the hurly-burly life in Southern California. There is a wide variety of tempos and tunes. MGM, SE-4620.

WHEN HANK WILLIAMS died in 1953 at age 29, he was already a living legend in country and western music as both a performer and song writer. Today his records are perhaps even more popular. At least 20 albums have preceded "The Essential Hank Williams," but this one includes 13 of his biggest hits. Included are "My Bucket's Got a Hole In It," and the Williams' lament for the big hearted cigar store Indian. MGM, SE-4651.

Disc Data

Leinsdorf's Finale On Record

By DELOS SMITH

For his last Boston concert as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last spring, Erich Leinsdorf conducted Beethoven's 9th symphony and Schoenberg's "A Survivor from Warsaw."

NG

Now, less than six months later, they're available on two records in a nice album, along with Leinsdorf's interpretation of Beethoven's 5th symphony (7055). RCA usually doesn't work that fast.

It's noteworthy for two reasons. RCA is heavily committed with the Philadelphia Orchestra. Next year it is giving up its generations-long recording command of the Boston.

A European record-maker (Deutsche Grammophon) is taking over but it can't be the same. One has to surmise that RCA decided to concentrate on just one name orchestra and chose the Philadelphia over the Boston. Meanwhile it is cashing in its Boston investments.

Leinsdorf's conductorial management of the Beethoven symphonies or any other dramatic score, such as the Schoenberg, is compelling.

His soloists for Beethoven's 9th were Jane Marsh, Josephine Veasey, Placido Domingo and Sherrill Milnes, and Milnes was the narrator in Schoenberg's "Survivor," a piece which grows in power with each carefully planned performance such as this one.

* * *

TWO OLDER recordings of Beethoven's 9th are again available, on budget-price reissues.

One has the late Bruno Walter conducting the New York Philharmonic. He recorded the first three movements in 1949 and the 4th, the choral movement, in 1953.

As is well remembered, Walter was a relaxed rather than a high-tension conductor; his is a meditative 9th (Odyssey 32160322).

* * *

THE OTHER 9th is the one the late Andre Cluytens made with the Berlin Philharmonic not long before his death in 1967. Like the Walter version it has the advantage of being on one record but Cluytens' manner with it can seem slack rather than relaxed (Seraphim-60079).

BUFFALO EVENING NEWS
Saturday, September 27, 1969
JAMESTOWN POST JOURNAL
Saturday, September 27, 1969
THE ADVERTISER TRIBUNE
TIFFIN, O.
P.M. - CIRC 11,284
OCT-23-69

Beethoven records ready

NEW YORK (UPI)—For his last Boston concert as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last spring Erich Leinsdorf conducted Beethoven's 9th symphony and Schoenberg's "A Survivor from Warsaw."

Now, less than six months later, they're available on two records in a nice album, along with Leinsdorf's interpretation of Beethoven's 5th symphony (7055). RCA usually doesn't work that fast.

It's noteworthy for two reasons. RCA is heavily committed with the Philadelphia Orchestra. Next year it is giving up its generations-long recording command of the Boston.

A European record-maker (Deutsche Grammophon) is taking over but it can't be the same. One has to surmise that RCA decided to concentrate on just one name orchestra and chose the Philadelphia over the Boston. Meanwhile, it is cashing in its Boston investments.

Leinsdorf's conductorial management of the Beethoven symphonies or any other dramatic score, such as the Schoenberg, is compelling. His sense of pace and his feeling for climax and his ability to sustain heights are all on the uncanny side.

His soloists for Beethoven's 9th were Jane Marsh, Josephine Veasey, Placido Domingo and Sherrill Milnes, and Milnes was the narrator in Schoenberg's "Survivor," a piece which grows in power with each carefully planned performance such as this one.

Two older recordings of Beethoven's 9th are again available, on budget-price re-issues. One has the late Bruno Walter conducting the New York Philharmonic. He recorded the first 3 movements in 1949 and the 4th, the choral movement, in 1953. As is well remembered, Walter was a relaxed rather than a high-tension conductor; his is a meditative 9th (Odyssey 32160322).

The other 9th is the one the late Andre Cluytens made with the Berlin Philharmonic not long before his death in 1967. Like the Walter version it has the advantage of being on one record but Cluytens' manner with it can seem slack rather than relaxed (Seraphim-60079).

MIDDLETOWN RECORD
Tuesday, September 23, 1969 record reviews

by Michael Steinberg

Another piano recording of unusual interest and of a very special sort is one of Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring," played in the composer's own arrangement for piano duet by Michael Tilson Thomas, the Boston Symphony's new 25-year-old Assistant Conductor, and Ralph Grierson (Angel). Arrangement is actually not the accurate word: this is really the proto-Sacre as it existed before Stravinsky did the orchestral scoring, and it is the version in which Diaghilev, Nijinsky, Debussy, and Ravel, among others, first came to know the work, to be deeply impressed and excited by it. The performance, with its superbly judged tempi, marvelous clarity and rhythm, is absolutely stupendous.

boston arts

september 75

Omaha World-Herald
OMAHA, NEBR.
(MORNING)
D. 125,376 SUN. 273,394
SEP 28 1969

89

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
W. 24,000
SEP 25 1969

Records

Mendelssohn's 'Engaging' Music

By Vernon L. Hoyt

MENDELSSOHN'S always engaging, if at times a little common, music was never more ingratiating than it is in "Die Erste Walpurgisnacht," which Lili Chookasian, contralto, Ernst Haefliger, tenor, Herman Prey, baritone, and Raymond Michalski, bass-baritone and the Musica Aeterna Orchestra and Chorus produce for Decca (DL 710164).

From the sprightly overture to the triumphant final baritone solo and chorus, this is a rich, precise, intelligent and realistic performance of both dark and light-textured music.

Handel

Britain's favorite composer, Handel, is heard as an Italianized German youth rather than an English composer in four sonatas for recorder played by Hans-Martin Linde with Gustav Leonhardt at the harpsichord.

Linde and Leonhardt give these so much bounce they're a joyous bit of listening, although nothing much of moment happens at any time on this RCA Victrola (VICS 1429).

Much more happens and a far larger slice of Handel comes forth from "The Royal Fireworks Music" written when Handel was nearing the end of his career. Yehudi Menuhin, directing the Menuhin Festival Orchestra, manages a grand scale presentation of this florid and gaudy stuff on Angel (S-36604).

Paired with the "Fireworks" is the "Violin Concerto in B Flat" by Handel with the brilliance of Menuhin's fiddle always evident; and a slighter yet still significant "Concerto in B Flat" for double woodwind choir, orchestra and organ, with Leslie Pearson at the organ.

Organ

Jean Demessieux, at the grand organ of the Paris Church of the Madeleine, shows a mastery of technique and fine sense of balance in his performance of "Overture of the Twenty-ninth Cantata" by Bach, Liszt's "Prelude and Fugue on the Name of Bach" and Franck's "Grande Piece Symphonique" and "Prelude, Fugue and Variation."

But there are interludes in which he seems to be playing music all from the same composer on this Societe Francaise du Son (115.007), particularly in the Franck prelude sandwiched between the Bach and the Liszt. The reproduction is excellent; the organ is superb.

Beethoven

Erich Leinsdorf brought the First and Eighth symphonies of Beethoven together for RCA (LSC-3089) with the Boston Symphony Orchestra as his instrument. Both symphonies are vivacious to start with and Leinsdorf gives them even more gaiety and sparkle, particularly in the last movement of the Eighth, which is of fun all compact.

Reissue

Nadia Boulanger inspired a fresh look at the music of Monteverdi when she produced his "Madrigals" for vocal and instrumental ensemble.

They are offered again on Seraphim (60125) in a monaural version which is surprisingly clear, in another of the "Great Recording of the Century" series.

20th Century

Commissioned by the Koussevitzky Foundation, four pieces by contemporary composers are expertly put together and comprehensively played but they're not likely to be assimilated by ears which were initiated on classical music.

Richard Tutello conducts, for Columbia (MS 7281), the Festival Chamber Ensemble in "Dorian Horizon" by Takemitsu; "Akrata" by Yannis Xenakis; "Canciones a Guiomar" by Luigi Nono, and "Syzygy" by David Del Tredici. These reflect the appalling influence of Schoenberg and Webern.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
SEP 28 1969

Record Time

Discology

Play it again Richard

By MICHAEL STEINBERG

If I could pick one performance I heard in 1968 to hear again, it might well be the one of the Brahms B. major Trio given on the last Sunday morning at Tanglewood by Joseph Silverstein and Jules Eskin of the Boston Symphony and the pianist Richard Goode. It turns out now that the three did record the Trio, and the recorded performance turns out to be fully as beautiful as the one I remember from the concert 13 months ago. Goode, like Claude Frank, his predecessor with the Boston Symphony chamber Players is an outstanding ensemple pianist, and a player, altogether of remarkable intelligence and with extraordinary control of the instrument.

The very opening is breathtaking, the vastness and the lyrical beauty, to begin with, of Brahms's paragraph, then the grandeur with which Goode launches into it, then his subtle, yet urgent, support of Eskin's noble, gorgeou-toned, beautifully punctuated playing when the cello picks up the melody. What is characteristic of the level of playing being done here is that this is no isolated purple passage, but rather a beginning from which the whole strong and expressive work unfolds splendidly and consistently.

It is, among other things, a classic demonstration of how to play warmly and expressively, but without any nonsense, the exact opposite of the sort of self-indulgent, vulgar, and instrumentally coarse playing to be heard on the recent Barenboim-Du Pre recording of the two Brahms Cello Sonatas.

The Goode-Silverstein-Eskin performance is the finest of the B major Trio that I have heard on records, and that in the face of considerable competition by the Stern-Rose-Istomin Trio (Columbia) and the Heifetz-io (RCA). The new performance is included in the Rubinstein - Feuermann third album by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players (RCA, three records), a release that is better than either of its predecessors, though still, like them, essentially spotty.

The customer is the victim of a nasty packaging and merchandizing system that obliges him to spend money on uninteresting pieces or inferior performances in order to get a couple of things he does want. In Europe, you can, for example, get the superb performance of the Brahms C minor Piano Quartet by Claude Frank with Silverstein, Burton Fine, and Eskin, as a single record; here it is available only in the first of the Chamber Players album, as part of an exceedingly doubtful package. What makes the newest of these albums better is that the proportion of valuable things in it is higher.

There is the Brahms Trio, and next I would recommend the album for its inclusion of Webern's Concerto for Nine Instruments, Op. 24, a really quite accessible bit of neo-Brandenburgiana, witty, and with a quietly and delicately expressive slow movement. The performance is good without being good enough. The music makes more sense here than in any previous recording and comes closer to sounding as attractive as it can, but the playing still leaves much to be desired in matters like sharply profiled phrasing and vividly differentiated dynamics.

Beyond that you get a good performance, a bit on the hard and dry side perhaps, of Schubert "Trout" Quintet; a competent one of Poulenc's Sextet for piano and winds, a work to whose alleged charm I remain impervious; one of a painfully feeble Nonet by Martinu; and an appropriately slick one of a pleasant bit of fluff, Ingolf Dahl's Duettino Concertante for flute and percussion.

24 Young Pianists Await Cliburn Competition

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Some 24 young pianists from the United States and eight foreign countries have been industriously memorizing Norman Dello Joio's "Capriccio on the Interval of a Second," which none of them had seen until a month ago.

It's a required work for the third Van Cliburn International Quadrennial Piano Competition. Five days of preliminary auditions will begin tomorrow on the Texas Christian University campus, Fort Worth.

The 12 survivors will participate in three days of chamber music. On Oct. 10, three finalists will appear with the Fort Worth Symphony Orchestra. The winner will be announced the following evening.

$10,000 Prize

First prize is $10,000. Nine additional prizes total $12,350, plus a $500 gold watch, managerial affiliation and opportunities to give solo recitals and perform with orchestras.

Winner of the 1962 competition was Ralph Votapek, now a member of Michigan State University faculty. Radu Lupu won first place in 1966. He is now "concertizing throughout Europe."

The 1958 Tchaikovsky Competition in Moscow has been far more rewarding to Cliburn than the competition that bears his name has been to its winners.

However, the $10,000 offered in Texas is said to be the largest piano prize in history.

ELECTRONIC MUSIC composer Karl-Heinz Stockhausen will give a series of four concerts at famed Jeita Grotto in Lebanon in November.

These will be noteworthy events because Stockhausen has all but abandoned concert appearances and is now composing almost exclusively for stereo records. He says the resulting record becomes a document of how he wants his music to sound.

Stockhausen has shunned the traditional concert hall in favor of Jeita Grotto because of the latter's giant subterranean lake, caves and caverns.

The November programs will be given on the electric block flute, and electronic sounds associated with what the composer calls "concrete music."

BOSTON SYMPHONY and Boston Pops Orchestra association with RCA Victor Records ends with the conclusion of the present contract in August, 1970. Both orchestras will then record for Deutsche Grammophon of Hamburg, Germany.

THE OSIPOV BALALAIKA Orchestra from Moscow will make its American debut in Symphony Hall, Boston, Wednesday at 8:30 p.m.

Victor Dubrovsky will conduct the 71-member company of singers, dancers and instrumentalists. The Soviet Union's foremost folk singer, Ludmilla Zykina, will be featured, also Valerie Tetrov, described as the "world champion accordionist."

BERKLEE SCHOOL OF MUSIC in Boston has a record

MUSIC

Raymond Morin

enrollment of 1,300 students from this country and abroad. Among the students from this area, enrolled at the famed jazz school, are Stephen B. Ambush, George Evans, Thomas H. Herbert and John C. Pezanelli of Worcester; Jeffrey R. Cobb, Westboro; Stanley B. Aldrich, Joan A. Mazzarelli, and Robert J. Tamagni, Milford; Anthony C. Lada, Webster.

BOSTON WILL be well represented in the national capital's music season which begins officially with the opening concert of the National Symphony, Oct. 14.

Arthur Fiedler will celebrate his 75th birthday year by conducting the orchestra Feb. 3 and 4. The Boston Symphony will make its annual appearances on March 30 and 31.

For the final program of the season, on April 28 and 29, the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society will sing for the first time with the National Symphony in Belshazzar's Feast by William Walton.

TED SHAWN and John Christian, directors of Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival at Lee, report that this summer's festival had a 10 per cent drop in attendance compared with last season, which was on the upward trend.

However, they describe the festival and the associated University of the Dance as having been "artistically and educationally rewarding." Enrollment for the school was at capacity, with a student body of 78.

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52,185 (S) 108,376
SEP 28 1969
New England

Records in Review

No More Snap, Crackle or Pop?

By WILLIAM A. STORRER

When the Boston Symphony and Pops come under the roof of Polydor next year and recordings start appearing on the Deutche Grammophon label we should experience the end of snaps, crackles and pops. Back in the mid-fifties, DGG recordings were released by American Decca, but when DGG started marketing their own recordings they also started importing them from Germany rather than shipping the master tape to America for local processing. DGG imported pressings have always been noted for more quiet surfaces and freedom from dust than their American counterparts. Boston recordings should profit from this change rather noticeably.

Boston recordings will also appear non-Dynagrooved. This development of RCA was essentially an attempt at negative feedback in the earliest stage of the playback system. The sound was pre-distorted in what was supposed to be exactly the opposite manner from the distortion that would be produced by the playback system. The resultant signal would be a composite of a negative and positive distortion of equal shape and magnitude, or zero distortion. In practice it never worked that way, for no two systems distort the record groove signal the same way or to the same extent. So RCA discs have often exhibited considerably more distortion than discs not "pre-distorted."

The need to eliminate noise of whatever sort on discs, rather than simply cut the price of existing quality discs, has been demonstrated on several fronts. The Dolby noise reduction system made a clearly audible improvement in the direction of natural acoustical environment on even the best of discs. Standardization of the fifteen degree cutting angle reduced both distortion and noise.

What is left to reduce noise? Produce better quality in the pressing. DGG solved that only by pressing in Germany, not America. Now Philips and London seem to be following suit. The former has announced that all classical releases will be pressed in Europe and exported world-wide, including to America. The latter has just announced the release of the Leontyne Price Aida that was originally issued seven years ago by RCA. The discs will be pressed in England and shipped to the U. S. for distribution.

What all these changes both in who records with who and in where the discs are being pressed means is not yet certain. The cost of recording in America is prohibitive for all but a few centers of population that by themselves can offer a large base of sales for the recording of their local orchestra. Apparently it is also cheaper to press the discs in Europe and ship them to America, shipping costs and import duties included, than to try to obtain quality pressings here. American entrepreneurs obviously have an eye to what the public wants and know where they can find quality labor at reasonable prices.

New Releases

More new releases have arrived and are listed below so you may watch for your favorites in the coming issues of the Advocate.

From Mercury comes a disc entitled "Norwegian Rhapsody" featuring music of Scandinavia. The Grieg and Schumann Piano Concerti are performed by Claudio Arrau and Beethoven's Cello Sonatas Two and Five by Casals and Horszowski. In the reissue list are Szerying's accounts of Sibelius and Prokofiev Violin Concerti released as part of a three-disc album a year or so ago and a

CLASSICAL

SCHARWENKA: CONCERTO No. 1 —Wild / Boston Symphony (Leinsdorf).
RCA Red Seal LSC 3080 (S)

Here is a masterful performance of a concerto that is a difficult and showy composition. A brilliant technique is apparent throughout, and is maintained for the very pianistic compositions by Balakireff, Medtner and d'Albert on Side II.

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO
W. 24,000
SEP 27 1969

CLASSICAL

SCHUBERT / POULENC / BRAHMS —Boston Symphony Chamber Players.
RCA Red Seal LSC 6189 (S)

This distinguished unit adds a new dimension to their credits as it displays its skills in a cross-section of music spanning 147 years. Martinu, Webern and Brahms are some of the composers whose works get the blazing brilliance from the group. It's all musical art at its best.

SIGHT AND SOUND MARKETING
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY - CIRC. N. AVAIL.

OCT 1969

MUSIC... VOICE... VISION

Tape Recording

Four-channel stereo puts you in the middle

by Edwin S. Bergamini

WERE YOU, dear dealer, perhaps looking forward in coming seasons to a comfortable resolution of the conflict between the several tape systems? Were you perhaps prepared to settle down with either cassette or eight-track tape? Or to stock the right amount of each system in the event of no really clear winner, with a proper nod to the industry's continuing state of the art, open-reel tape?

Did it seem that simple? Well . . . complications you may not have heard of are rearing their interesting heads.

The newest development-trend is multi-channel — very likely, four-channel—tape. And just as the advent of stereo gave your customers a quality rise in recorded sound—and indeed meant a long-range stimulus to sales, both of the new recordings and the equipment needed to reproduce them—multi-channel techniques could have a similarly beneficial effect within the next few years. In the meantime, however, it could cause a considerable amount of confusion.

"What's so new about this multi-channel business?" someone may ask. "Haven't various recording companies been making multi-track tapes at their recording sessions?"

We've all very likely heard of elaborate multi-track recording techniques used by one label or another. What is important here is that at least one firm is now offering four-channel tape recordings designed for home reproduction.

September's opening release by the Vanguard label offered four-channel, open-reel tapes for play at 7½ ips. For their properties to be appreciated, these tapes must be reproduced over four channels.

This means that for a record/play unit, eight preamplifiers will be required, four record and four playback. (Sound like pretty much? In these days of transistors and integrated circuits, this number of preamps is not an insurmountable obstacle for the equipment manufacturer.) Of course, an additional stereo amplifier and pair of speakers will be needed. The speakers go in the back corners of the room, to match those in the front.

What's on the four channels? In the case of most longhair music, two channels handle the standard left and right of the stereo stage. The two new channels, made from microphones looking away from the stage and back into the recording hall, utilize reverberation from the sides and back, and thus pick up the quality of the recording chamber. The idea is to give the listener, rather more specifically than ever before, the ambiance of Carnegie Hall or Symphony Hall in his own listening room.

One should note there are a few classical scores which can benefit especially from four-channel reproduction, such as the Dies Irae from Berlioz's Requiem, where the composer has special brass choirs placed to the left and right rear. In this application of the four-channel technique, the two rear channels are used, not just for reverberation and ambiance, but to provide distinct musical information from two new areas of origin.

This brings us to the growing catalog of music, including serious stuff, being written for reproduction on four channels (Columbia/CBS is one label sponsoring such composition). Here the listener is emphatically set down right in the center of the doings being reproduced. Action ping-pongs all around him.

Will the four-channel tapes be playable on present equipment? Yes, but the degree of compatibility depends on the type of material being reproduced. A four-channel tape of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, played on today's two-channel systems, would give us only the two main, or front, channels; but it would sound in stereo as we are used to hearing it, and we would hardly be disappointed.

But where the rear channels have definite information of their own, only four-channel reproduction will do the total recording justice. The recording manufacturer can accomplish a partial compatibility for two-channel reproduction by mixing some of the rear channels' information into his two front channels, but this is a compromise, with the material being recorded determining its success. The Berlioz Requiem's Dies Irae in a normally reverberant hall should work out better here than a center of the room, the balanced and thoroughly convincing ambiance quickly reasserted itself. Whenever the engineer cut out the two rear channels during the demonstration, one indeed felt deprived.

A quick check around some of the recording labels drew a grab-bag of answers to: "What is your company doing about this or a similar multi-channel system for the consumer?"

Columbia/CBS is readying masters for what its spokesman, Robert Altshuler, referred to as "Quadriphonic Sound," a four-channel system similar to Vanguard's. "When the market is ready, we'll be ready," Altshuler said.

Other labels were less encouraging. Some stated that they definitely had no plans to go into multi-channel recordings for the consumer at this time. Spokesmen for several prominent labels professed no knowledge of their company's plans in this area; one suggested that the move to multi-channel might even added that much to conventional home stereo techniques. His company is not doing anything with consumer multi-channel recordings at present.

Several companies manufacturing tape equipment are coming up with the tape heads, transport systems, and additional preamplifiers needed to set up a four-channel system. One such four-channel-ready component is TEAC's A-4010 SRA, a tape deck with four record and four playback preamps.

TEAC also has been fashioning some four-channel tapes for dealer demonstration only, which may be intended for use with a different speaker layout than the speaker-in-each-corner concept shown by Vanguard. Here TEAC's spokesman, David Monoson, described three speakers in a semi-circular surround, with a fourth speaker of a non-directional, mass-activator type providing the background or "ambient" channel remaining. Monoson felt that this multi-channel method deck, with a playback-only deck available shortly. At least two other units are scheduled for next year. Viking's Russ Molloy stressed the significant expense of the four-channel tape head in the total cost of these tape systems.

He also suspects, as does the writer, that balancing out the sound levels of the four channels—front-to-rear must now be juggled against left and right—may give the consumer some problems. A newly designed hand remote control may turn out to be the best solution here. Molloy had not encountered listener fatigue in his exposure to the Vanguard system.

Nortronics' BQQ series of four-channel tape heads should have the model to fit the needs of those who wish to convert their two-channel equipment, according to this company's Paul Lund. Nortronics supplies four-channel heads for Viking.

A new breakthrough for stereo?

(Continued on next page)

PHOTO DEALER
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MONTHLY 9.500

OCT 1969

Four-Channel Stereo Tape Next Innovation?

Sound Section

by ROBERT ANGUS
Tape & Sound Editor

"Four channel may be just the thing to get the hard-core audiophile back in the store," one tape & sound dealer observes. "In this industry, there's room for a major technological advance every ten of 11 years. In 1951 we had the first prerecorded tape. It took three or four years to catch on. In 1958, the stereo cartridge first came along and it took until 1967 to take over. Now I think the market is ready for four-channel stereo tape and we should expect a break-in period before it catches on with the mass market.

Visitors to the Los Angeles High Fidelity music show got their first chance to listen to four-channel stereo when Acoustic Research Inc., H. H. Scott and Telex, demonstrated the system. "It's like discovering stereo all over again," said one listener, who reported that the effect not only gives width to music, but provides depth as well. According to AR's Bob Berkovitz, the system uses a conventional left and right channel placed in front of the listener, plus two speakers placed left and right behind the listener which reproduce hall reverberation and musical sound picked up by left and right microphones at the rear of the recording studio.

Last month, the Boston Symphony began experimental four-channel stereo broadcasts, using the facilities of FM stereo stations WGBH and WCRB. The broadcasts, which will be carried by the stations every Saturday through April 25, use WGBH to provide left-channel sound and WCBR for the right channel sound. According to spokesmen, the normal WGBH left channel feeds the left rear, or reverberation speaker, while the normal right channel feeds the left front speaker. WCRB's normal left channel feeds the right channel front speaker, while the normal right signal feeds the right reverberation speaker. The stations claim that two mono receivers tuned to the two stations will produce perfect two-channel stereo. or that a conventional multiplex receiver tuned to either station will provide a satisfactory signal.

According to industry insiders, four-channel stereo is feasible on FM by using live program sources, as the Boston stations are doing; on four-track stereo tape; even on stereo records. But they agree that the hardware to make records isn't currently available; and that virtually nobody now has tape playback equipment. The Boston stations have cooperated in the experiment. It was said that by using both supplemental carriers (FM multiplex stations now use one to transmit the difference stereo signal), a single FM station could carry all four stereo channels. However, a new type of receiver would be needed to translate the broadcasts into four-channel programs in the home.

continued on page 76

FOUR-CHANNEL STEREO

from page 68

The Acoustic Research demonstration utilized four-channel tapes prepared by Telex and Vanguard Records. Recorded on standard quarter-inch recording tape. the four programs run side-by-side in the same direction. Although there are very few playback units (TEAC makes one, for example), experts believe that there is no shortage of recorded material for the new format. Vanguard Recording Society prepared by Telex and Vanguard has been experimenting with the new medium for sometime, and Columbia Records has produced some experimental four-channel recordings for AR. In addition, most major recording companies now record from 12 to 24 channels of sound in the studio. "These can be mixed down to one channel for mono, two channels for conventional stereo, four channels or anything else you want," said record executive Ralph Stein of Springboard Productions. Stein noted that the libraries at Victor, Columbia, Warner-7 Arts, Capitol, London and elsewhere are filled with multi-channel masters of pops, classics, jazz, rock, shows and the like which can be mixed for the new medium. "It isn't the same situation as two-channel stereo, when all the record companies got caught with their pants down," he said.

Theoretically, four - channel stereo could be matrixed on a record as well as over the air or on tape by utilizing a 25 kc difference signal (a technique originally proposed for stereo records by Jerry Minter of Components Corporation in the mid-1950's). It is said that most of today's stereo cartridges could reproduce the signal satisfactorily. However, many record men wonder, with the problems which already exist in stereo discs, how the quality might stand up.

According to several equipment manufacturers, who declined to be quoted directly, the hardware needed for listening to the WCRB-WGBH stereocasts are two FM multiplex receivers and four loudspeakers. At the moment, although loudspeaker manufacturers may be rubbing their hands with glee at the prospect of a boom in sales, electronics manufacturers are sitting back to see what will happen. A quick check reveals that no manufacturers currently have a four-channel receiver in the works —or if they do, they aren't talking about it.

Tape manufacturers, again speaking off the record, are more sanguine about the prospects of four-channel head," one engineer said. "The user may need another stereo amp or receiver to plug it into, but we have only to replace the head to make it a four-channel unit." Some experts feel that the proximity of the four parallel tracks may limit channel separation. "Some of our better machines have channel separation of 55 db or more," one said. "The best information I have is that a four-channel head would produce channel separation on the order of 35db." He noted that a possible solution to the problem would be to stagger four-channel heads — mounting tracks 1 and 3 some one to 1½ inches before the heads for tracks 2 and 4. This technique was used on early stereo prerecorded tapes and recorders to solve the same problem.

Super Sales are now running about 60% consoles to 40% portables. The best selling portable size is the 18-inch.

The second biggest seller will be black-and-white television. Most of these will be portable sizes. "We sell some consoles, but not many," he said.

Stereo should be about the same as last year, he predicted. Modulars are picking up in demand.

Overall, he expects a good season, despite an anticipated decline of 7% to 10% in color sales.

Early season

Sam Gordon, Madison, New Jersey, believes color buying will be strong and start early. Talk of price increases will prod people who had been holding back.

Most of the sales will be in the middle range—medium-priced consoles and the better portables. The high-end is almost forgotten, he stated.

He takes a dim view about stereo, comparing the current situation to the last year of mono when people knew stereo was on the horizon. "Today they are looking for consoles with cassette or eight-track built in. They don't want a console to be strong. The outlook for modular stereo looks bright, he added. He does not, however, anticipate a boom in either big-screen color television or console stereo.

"We maintained the same sales volume from January through August as last year," Taylor noted. "September started slow. Unit sales have been good, but lack of high-ticket sales holds the dollars down. You have to sell a lot of $300 portables to make up for it."

23 and 14

Fred Bodamer, partner in the leased department at Adam, Meldrum and Anderson Company, Buffalo, New York, department store, is looking forward to a first-rate fall.

Color has been going very well, he said, with 23-inch consoles and 14-inch portables the best sellers.

Color television consoles were much better than usual in August. He bought closeouts of 1969-model Zenths and RCAs at $50 off and was able to cut the retail price by $70 or $80.

Black-and-white portable television sales have been good. Console sales had been moving but slowed to set one.

Console stereo was not moving and modulars sold "once in a while."

Radio sales were up 25% despite the fact that Bodamer stopped handling $5-$6-$7 transistors. Transistor prices now start at $13. Sales would have been even greater, said Bodamer, if there had not been a forty-two-day bus strike. The walkout hurt sales of pick-up items throughout the department store, he said. People used their own cars to come down for larger merchandise.

Lower dollar tickets

Color television will sell well this fall, but the demand will be for smaller sets with lower tickets, according to Mort Farr, who operates under his own name in Upper Darby, Pennsylvania, a suburb of Philadelphia. Less than 50% of sales will be 23-inch consoles, he predicted.

"Stereo won't be as strong as it once was," he observed. "Some of the demand will be switched to consoles, but we haven't been strong in that area. Most of this business goes to the dealer who sells components and knows more than his customer

(Continued on page 24)

90.

PHOTO DEALER
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MONTHLY 9.500

OCT 1969

Sound Section

Four-Channel Stereo Tape Next Innovation?

by ROBERT ANGUS
Tape & Sound Editor

"Four channel may be just the thing to get the hard-core audiophile back in the store," one tape & sound dealer observes. "In this industry, there's room for a major technological advance every ten of 11 years. In 1951 we had the first prerecorded tape. It took three or four years to catch on. In 1958, the stereo cartridge first came along and it took until 1967 to take over. Now I think the market is ready for four-channel stereo tape and we should expect a break-in period before it catches on with the mass market.

Visitors to the Los Angeles High Fidelity music show got their first chance to listen to four-channel stereo when Acoustic Research Inc., H. H. Scott and Telex, demonstrated the system. "It's like discovering stereo all over again," said one listener, who reported that the effect not only gives width to music, but provides depth as well. According to AR's Bob Berkovitz, the system uses a conventional left and right channel placed in front of the listener, plus two speakers placed left and right behind the listener which reproduce hall reverberation and musical sound picked up by left and right microphones at the rear of the recording studio.

Last month, the Boston Symphony began experimental four-channel stereo broadcasts, using the facilities of FM stereo stations WGBH and WCRB. The broadcasts, which will be carried by the stations every Saturday through April 25, use WGBH to provide left-channel sound and WCBR for the right channel sound. According to spokesmen, the normal WGBH left channel feeds the left rear, or reverberation speaker, while the normal right channel feeds the left front speaker. WCRB's normal left channel feeds the right channel front speaker, while the normal right signal feeds the right reverberation speaker. The stations claim that two mono receivers tuned to the two stations will produce perfect two-channel stereo. or that a conventional multiplex receiver tuned to either station will provide a satisfactory signal.

According to industry insiders, four-channel stereo is feasible on FM by using live program sources, as the Boston stations are doing; on four-track stereo tape; even on stereo records. But they agree that the hardware to make records isn't currently available; and that virtually nobody now has tape playback equipment. The Boston stations have cooperated in the experiment. It was said that by using both supplemental carriers (FM multiplex stations now use one to transmit the difference stereo signal), a single FM station could carry all four stereo channels. However, a new type of receiver would be needed to translate the broadcasts into four-channel programs in the home.

continued on page 76

FOUR-CHANNEL STEREO

from page 68

The Acoustic Research demonstration utilized four-channel tapes prepared by Telex and Vanguard Records. Recorded on standard quarter-inch recording tape. the four programs run side-by-side in the same direction. Although there are very few playback units (TEAC makes one, for example), experts believe that there is no shortage of recorded material for the new format. Vanguard Recording Society prepared by Telex and Vanguard has been experimenting with the new medium for sometime, and Columbia Records has produced some experimental four-channel recordings for AR. In addition, most major recording companies now record from 12 to 24 channels of sound in the studio. "These can be mixed down to one channel for mono, two channels for conventional stereo, four channels or anything else you want," said record executive Ralph Stein of Springboard Productions. Stein noted that the libraries at Victor, Columbia, Warner-7 Arts, Capitol, London and elsewhere are filled with multi-channel masters of pops, classics, jazz, rock, shows and the like which can be mixed for the new medium. "It isn't the same situation as two-channel stereo, when all the record companies got caught with their pants down," he said.

Theoretically, four - channel stereo could be matrixed on a record as well as over the air or on tape by utilizing a 25 kc difference signal (a technique originally proposed for stereo records by Jerry Minter of Components Corporation in the mid-1950's). It is said that most of today's stereo cartridges could reproduce the signal satisfactorily. However, many record men wonder, with the problems which already exist in stereo discs, how the quality might stand up.

According to several equipment manufacturers, who declined to be quoted directly, the hardware needed for listening to the WCRB-WGBH stereocasts are two FM multiplex receivers and four loudspeakers. At the moment, although loudspeaker manufacturers may be rubbing their hands with glee at the prospect of a boom in sales, electronics manufacturers are sitting back to see what will happen. A quick check reveals that no manufacturers currently have a four-channel receiver in the works —or if they do, they aren't talking about it.

Tape manufacturers, again speaking off the record, are more sanguine about the prospects of four-channel head," one engineer said. "The user may need another stereo amp or receiver to plug it into, but we have only to replace the head to make it a four-channel unit." Some experts feel that the proximity of the four parallel tracks may limit channel separation. "Some of our better machines have channel separation of 55 db or more," one said. "The best information I have is that a four-channel head would produce channel separation on the order of 35db." He noted that a possible solution to the problem would be to stagger four-channel heads — mounting tracks 1 and 3 some one to 1½ inches before the heads for tracks 2 and 4. This technique was used on early stereo prerecorded tapes and recorders to solve the same problem.

Robert Berkovitz, left, of Acoustic Research discusses his firm's work in four-channel stereo with Edwin S. Bergamini, tape recording editor of Sight & Sound Marketing, at the AR Music Room in New York's Grand Central Terminal.

contemporary percussion score recorded in a sound studio, where the directional demands would be starker and much less open to compromise.

At present, the only recording company which has actually announced a four-channel tape release is Vanguard. This label has already intrigued the press with a demonstration of excerpts from its first Surround Stereo release: the Berlioz Requiem, the Third and Ninth Symphonies of Mahler, an album each by Joan Baez and Buffy Sainte-Marie, and "The Amazing Electronic Sound of Jean Jacques Perrey."

At the demonstration, the Berlioz and Mahler Third symphony excerpts impressed more than the synthesized Perrey material. Worth special note was the four-channel sound in the finale of the Mahler. This movement has only reverb information on the two rear channels; but when these were switched in at the event, the difference was considerable, the envelopment exciting.

It was also surprising to discover here the amount of sound emanating from the rear speakers. To the listener seated in the center area of the room, the level from those speakers wasn't obtrusive, but as one approached either rear corner, it was higher than one might have expected. When one returned to the center of the room, the balanced and thoroughly convincing ambiance quickly reasserted itself. Whenever the engineer cut out the two rear channels during the demonstration, one indeed felt deprived.

A quick check around some of the recording labels drew a grab-bag of answers to: "What is your company doing about this or a similar multichannel system for the consumer?"

Columbia/CBS is readying masters for what its spokesman, Robert Altshuler, referred to as "Quadriphonic Sound," a four-channel system similar to Vanguard's. "When the market is ready, we'll be ready," Altshuler said.

Other labels were less encouraging. Some stated that they definitely had no plans to go into multichannel recordings for the consumer at this time. Spokesmen for several prominent labels professed no knowledge of their company's plans in this area; one suggested that the move to multi-channel might even be getting too complex electronically for consumer comfort!

Enoch Light of Project Three Recordings said that he had done multi-channel experimenting in the past, but said "we didn't feel it added that much" to conventional home stereo techniques. His company is not doing anything with consumer multi-channel recordings at present.

Several companies manufacturing tape equipment are coming up with the tape heads, transport systems, and additional preamplifiers needed to set up a four-channel system. One such four-channel-ready component is TEAC's A-4010 SRA, a tape deck with four record and four playback preamps.

TEAC also has been fashioning some four-channel tapes for dealer demonstration only, which may be intended for use with a different speaker layout than the speaker-in-each-corner concept shown by Vanguard. Here TEAC's spokesman, David Monoson, described three speakers in a semi-circular surround, with a fourth speaker of a non-directional, mass-activator type providing the background or "ambient" channel remaining. Monoson felt that this multi-channel method made for more presence, and for less listener fatigue on extended listening.

Viking (Telex Communications Division) has available its Model 230 four-channel record/playback deck, with a playback-only deck available shortly. At least two other units are scheduled for next year. Viking's Russ Molloy stressed the significant expense of the four-channel tape head in the total cost of these tape systems.

He also suspects, as does the writer, that balancing out the sound levels of the four channels—front-to-rear must now be juggled against left and right—may give the consumer some problems. A newly designed hand remote control may turn out to be the best solution here. Molloy had not encountered listener fatigue in his exposure to the Vanguard system.

Nortronics' BQQ series of four-channel tape heads should have the model to fit the needs of those who wish to convert their two-channel equipment, according to this company's Paul Lund. Nortronics supplies four-channel heads for Viking.

A new breakthrough for stereo?

(Continued on next page)

(Continued from preceding page)

The concept is exciting enough to look like it, one thinks. What system will win is anyone's guess. Vanguard has now staked a claim, however modest. At least one alternative technique (TEAC's) has been suggested. At this point one watches and waits for further developments. While four channels seem to make sense in feasibility (having not a little to do with most stereo tape formats today being in four, or two times four, tracks) it's conceivable that three, five, or x channels will be finally found in the New Stereo.

And on open reel? Cartridge? Cassette? Something else? Let's guess that the new technique is best introduced on open-reel, if sound quality is to be kept to the highest standard. But the idea of a cartridge or cassette unit feeding a scattering of small speakers in a module system has to intrigue any but the veriest high fidelity perfectionists. People were bowled over by the way some of the first stereo modular units with good small speakers sounded. And the New Stereo modulars could let many of us in for a new round of amazement.

Want to hear some multi-channel stereo? Acoustic Research is offering a series of broadcasts in the Boston area during the 1969–1970 winter season, using the stereo FM signals of two radio stations, WGBH and WCRB. These live broadcasts will be of the entire twenty-four concert Saturday night season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There will also be broadcast four-channel tapes of the orchestra, made last summer at Tanglewood. You'll need a second receiver and pair of speakers to reproduce these broadcasts properly.

Harry Maynard will demonstrate the new system in New York on his October 26 and November 3 "Men of Hi-Fi" broadcasts. Listeners with two FM stereo radios can hear the front channels on WNYC and the rear channels on WKCR. If transmitting equipment is ready in time, all four channels will be multiplexed simultaneously on WNYC.

Acoustic Research has two listening rooms where four-channel demonstrations will be heard this season. One is in Cambridge, Massachusetts, at Harvard Square; the other in New York City's Grand Central Terminal (near the Vanderbilt Avenue entrance).

AR is also working with the Eastman School of Music in Rochester, New York, to produce four-channel tapes of various performing ensembles there in works by Warren Benson, Henry Brant, Krzysztof Penderecki, and others. At this time, however, there are no plans for commercial release of any of these tapes.

Choice of programs

Topping the Lear Jet line of home units is the Model H-460, which includes an eight-track tape player, four-speed automatic phonograph and AM/FM stereo radio.

The set, styled in three-piece modular format, includes matching air suspension speakers. $289.95. Stereo Division, Lear Jet Corporation, 13131 Lyndon Avenue, Detroit, Michigan 48227.

Half-hour cassette

The 3M Company's Scotch C-30 cassette, using Dynarange low noise tape like the rest of the line, is available in a file album for $2.25 suggested list or in a Post Office-approved mailer for ten cents more. 3M Company, Magnetic Products Division, 3M Center, St. Paul, Minnesota 55101.

Auto cassette

Sony/Superscope's new Model 20 stereo automobile cassette player features Insta-Load, a foolproof push-in front-loading facility allowing one-hand cartridge insertion by "feel" from a busy driver on the road. There's automatic cassette ejection, a program search capability with fast-forward and rewind, and complete compatibility with any prerecorded cassette.

Eighteen watts (IHF) of dynamic music power make the Model 20, Sound. Sales are now running about 60% consoles to 40% portables. The best selling portable size is the 18-inch.

The second biggest seller will be black-and-white television. Most of these will be portable sizes. "We sell some consoles, but not many," he said.

Stereo should be about the same as last year, he predicted. Modulars are picking up in demand.

Overall, he expects a good season, despite an anticipated decline of 7% to 10% in color sales.

Early season

Sam Gordon, Madison, New Jersey, believes color buying will be strong and start early. Talk of price increases will prod people who had been holding back.

Most of the sales will be in the middle range—medium-priced consoles and the better portables. The high-end is almost forgotten, he stated.

He takes a dim view about stereo, comparing the current situation to the last year of mono when people knew stereo was on the horizon. "Today they are looking for consoles with cassette or eight-track built in. They don't want a console tables to be strong. The outlook for modular stereo looks bright, he added. He does not, however, anticipate a boom in either big-screen color television or console stereo.

"We maintained the same sales volume from January through August as last year," Taylor noted. "September started slow. Unit sales have been good, but lack of high-ticket sales holds the dollars down. You have to sell a lot of $300 portables to make up for it."

23 and 14

Fred Bodamer, partner in the leased department at Adam, Meldrum and Anderson Company, Buffalo, New York, department store, is looking forward to a first-rate fall.

Color has been going very well, he said, with 23-inch consoles and 14-inch portables the best sellers.

Color television consoles were much better than usual in August. He bought closeouts of 1969-model Zenitths and RCAs at $50 off and was able to cut the retail price by $70 or $80.

Black-and-white portable television sales have been good. Console sales had been moving but slowed

(Continued on page 24)

Console stereo was not moving and modulars sold "once in a while."

Radio sales were up 25% despite the fact that Bodamer stopped handling $5–$6–$7 transistors. Transistor prices now start at $13. Sales would have been even greater, said Bodamer, if there had not been a forty-two-day bus strike. The walkout hurt sales of pick-up items throughout the department store, he said. People used their own cars to come down for larger merchandise.

Lower dollar tickets

Color television will sell well this fall, but the demand will be for smaller sets with lower tickets, according to Mort Farr, who operates under his own name in Upper Darby, Pennsylvania, a suburb of Philadelphia. Less than 50% of sales will be 23-inch consoles, he predicted.

"Stereo won't be as strong as it once was," he observed. "Some of the demand will be switched to consoles, but we haven't been strong in that area. Most of this business goes to the dealer who sells components and knows more than his customer to sell one.

PHOTO DEALER
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MONTHLY 9,500

OCT 1969

Four-Chann
Stereo Tap
Next Innovatio

by ROBERT ANGUS
Tape & Sound Editor

"Four channel may be ju thing to get the hard-core phile back in the store," on & sound dealer observes. " industry, there's room for a technological advance every 11 years. In 1951 we had t prerecorded tape. It took t four years to catch on. In the stereo cartridge first cam and it took until 1967 to tak
Now I think the market is for four-channel stereo tap we should expect a break-in before it catches on with th market.

Visitors to the Los Angele Fidelity music show got the chance to listen to four-c stereo when Acoustic Re
Inc., H. H. Scott and Telex onstrated the system. "It discovering stereo all over said one listener, who re that the effect not only gives to music, but provides de well. According to AR's Berkovitz, the system uses ventional left and right c placed in front of the li plus two speakers placed le right behind the listener wh produce hall reverberatio musical sound picked up l and right microphones at th of the recording studio.

Last month, the Boston phony began experimental channel stereo broadcasts, the facilities of FM stereo s WGBH and WCRB. The casts, which will be carried

FOUR-CHANNEL STEREO
from page 68

The Acoustic Research demonstration utilized four-channel tapes prepared by Telex and Vanguard Records. Recorded on standard quarter-inch recording tape. the four programs run side-by-side in the same direction. Although there are very few playback units (TEAC makes one, for example), experts believe that there is no shortage of recorded material for the new format. Vanguard Recording Society prepared by Telex and Vanguard has been experimenting with the new medium for sometime, and Columbia Records has produced some experimental four-channel recordings for AR. In addition, most major recording companies now record from 12 to 24 channels of sound in the studio. "These can be mixed down to one channel for mono, two channels for conventional stereo, four channels or anything else you want," said record executive Ralph Stein of Springboard Productions. Stein noted that the libraries at Victor, Columbia, Warner-7 Arts, Capitol, London and elsewhere are filled with multi-channel master pops, classics, jazz, rock, show the like which can be mixe the new medium. "It isn't the situation as two-channel s when all the record compani caught with their pants dow said.

Theoretically, four - ch stereo could be matrixed on cord as well as over the air tape by utilizing a 25 kc diffe signal (a technique originally posed for stereo records by Minter of Components Co tion in the mid-1950's). It is that most of today's stereo ridges could reproduce the satisfactorily. However, many rd men wonder, with the lems which already exist in discs, how the quality might up.

According to several equip manufacturers, who declined quoted directly, the hard needed for listening to the W WGBH stereocasts are two multiplex receivers and four speakers. At the moment, alth loudspeaker manufacturers m rubbing their hands with gl the prospect of a boom in

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 130,000

OCT 1969

LENOX, MASSACHUSETTS

DGG and Boston

As if the Philadelphia Orchestra's change-over from Columbia to RCA had not been sufficiently startling, we now learn of another big-league exodus in the making. The Boston Symphony and the Boston Pops Orchestras, noted for their long-standing and prolific affiliation with RCA, have announced their plans to record exclusively for the Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft label at the conclusion of their present contract with RCA in August 1970.

DGG is no sluggard in recording outside its home country. Witness the recordings made in Poland, or in the Eastern European countries, or, most recently, at the Fonogram studios in Madrid (reported in HF Aug. 1969, "Behind the Scenes"). But their hands-across-the-sea collaboration with the BSO and the Pops gives them what they previously lacked—a tie-in with a major American ensemble. The recordings are to be made in Boston's Symphony Hall, as they were for RCA; but the engineers will be DGG's German team.

The ending of the BSO-RCA union doubtlessly resulted from a number of factors. It is no secret, for instance, that sales of BSO recordings have in recent years been poor in comparison to other major orchestras. Meanwhile, RCA is going all-out in promoting its new Philadelphia Orchestra series.

In view of all this, and with the BSO-RCA contract drawing to a close, one might anticipate a slowdown in recording activity for the Bostonians during the next ten months. It will be a well-deserved rest for the country's most notoriously overworked orchestra.

Nothing definite has been announced regarding what projects the orchestra will undertake when it switches to DGG, but the likelihood seems good of cross-fertilization between it and DGG's roster of star conductors, which includes Kubelik, Maazel, Böhm, and Karajan. One DGG representative contacted was Jerry Schoenbaum, President of Polydor, Inc. (DGG's American affiliate). Mr. Schoenbaum did not mention any specific projects for the Bostonians, but he did express hope that certain gaps in the DGG catalog might be filled—one possibility being music by American composers. He also expressed hope that the Pops albums might widen DGG's network of distribution.

One hopes he is right on both counts. One also hopes that DGG will look over some of the BSO's more interesting past ventures with a view towards possible recording—such ventures as the original versions of Fidelio and Ariadne auf Naxos. Or Schumann's Scenes from Goethe's Faust—a performance which included Beverly Sills and Hermann Prey and has become one of the prizes on the noncommercial market. JACK HIEMENZ

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 130,000

OCT 1969

BEETHOVEN: Symphony No. 6, in F, Op. 68 ("Pastoral"). Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, cond. RCA Red Seal 3074, $5.98.

Leinsdorf's Pastoral makes one think more of Boston's Public Gardens than of the Vienna Woods. Everything, to be sure, is certainly pleasing and, to a degree, bucolic; yet the prevailing formality of the execution, the neatly adjusted instrumental balances, and the almost rigorous exactitude of rhythm are suggestive of well-kept lawns and carefully trimmed hedges. In short, then, this recorded Beethoven Sixth is conceived in terms of the strictest classicism along with Toscanini's NBC version, the Dorati/LSO on Mercury, and—in a rather different way—the strangely deliberate Klemperer/Philharmonia performance for Angel.

There is happily little of that lethal stolidity that sometimes creeps into Leinsdorf's work. He seems less literal-minded on this occasion, and even permits himself the liberty of omitting the exposition repeat in the first movement (luckily the more essential third movement repeat is observed). I could have gladly done without those meretricious little ritardandos that the bassoon makes in the first movement development section, but this is "the tradition" and Leinsdorf is far from being the only sinner in that respect. The conductor gets an excellent sense of flow in the brook scene: there is a real lilt to the rhythm without ever becoming as uncomfortably fast as in the Szell recording. The Peasants' Merrymaking is perhaps a trifle flatfooted but much more animated than Klemperer's account of this section. Leinsdorf's storm is spectacular—easily the most dramatic reading since Toscanini's—and his Thanksgiving captures the necessary clover-scented fragrance. The BSO plays with high polish and, in its disciplined way, with expression too. RCA's sound is bright, clear, and naturalistic. A fine disc. H.G.

Erich Leinsdorf: Beethoven by the book.

EAGLE
CLAREMONT, N. H.
(E) 6,709

OCT 3 1969

Leinsdorf Final Hub Appearance Now on Records

NEW YORK (UPI)—For his last Boston concert as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last spring Erich Leinsdorf conducted Beethoven's 9th symphony and Schoenberg's "A Survivor from Warsaw."

Now, less than six months later, they're available on two records in a nice album, along with Leinsdorf's interpretation of Beethoven's 5th symphony (7055). RCA usually doesn't work that fast.

It's noteworthy for two reasons. RCA is heavily committed with the Philadelphia Orchestra. Next year it is giving up its generations-long recording command of the Boston.

A European record-maker (Deutsche Grammophon) is taking over but it can't be the same. One has to surmise that RCA decided to concentrate on just one name orchestra and chose the Philadelphia over the Boston. Meanwhile, it is cashing in its Boston investments.

Leinsdorf's conductorial management of the Beethoven symphonies or any other dramatic score, such as the Schoenberg, is compelling. His sense of pace and his feeling for climax and his ability to sustain heights are all on the uncanny side.

His soloists for Beethoven's 9th were Jane Marsh, Josephine Veasey, Placido Domingo and Sherrill Milnes, and Milnes was the narrator in Schoenberg's "Survivor," a piece which grows in power with each carefully planned performance such as this one.

Two older recordings of Beethoven's 9th are again available, on budget-price reissues. One has the late Bruno Walter conducting the New York Philharmonic. He recorded the first 3 movements in 1949 and the 4th, the choral movement, in 1953. As is well remembered, Walter was a relaxed rather than a high-tension conductor; his is a meditative 9th (Odyssey 32160322).

The other 9th is the one the late Andre Cluytens made with the Berlin Philharmonic not long before his death in 1967. Like the Walter version it has the advantage of being on one record but Cluytens' manner with it can seem slack rather than relaxed (Seraphim-60079).

New Book Lists, Evaluates Low Price Classic Records

By Bert Willard
News-Press Staff Writer

A new and invaluable book, to be published Oct. 10, has come to my attention — and for those who have wanted a guide to low-priced classical records, as well as critical evaluation, this volume certainly fills the void.

Name of the book, which probably will be in local bookstores soon, is Guide to Low-Priced Classical Records by Herbert Russcol (Hart Publishing Co., New York, $10 hardcover, $2.95 paperback).

Included in the volume are reviews of more than 3,000 LP records by more than 300 composers, with short biographies of the composers and brief discussions of their works. Russcol's guide deals specifically with classical records selling under $2.50.

HAS CREDENTIALS

You may or may not agree with Russcol's evaluations and preferences, but he has the credentials. He was born in Boston, educated at New England Conservatory of Music and the Tel Aviv Academy of Music. He is a musician; a French horn player formerly with the Pittsburgh Symphony, Boston Pops and Israel Philharmonic, and his written works have included articles on music in High Fidelity, New York Times, Stereo Review, House and Garden, Holiday and Venture.

✓ ✓ ✓

RCA Victor Records, the most venerable in the recording field, has decided to cast its lot with one name orchestra, choosing the Philadelphia over the Boston Symphony which for years has been a bulwark of RCA. Next year, RCA gives up its Boston commitments with a major European record-maker (Deutsche Grammophon) taking over command of the Boston group.

But RCA Victor, like its competitor, Columbia, prefers to cash in on its Boston "investments," and to that end, it has come up with a blockbuster — a recording by the Boston Symphony and Erich Leinsdorf which may make them regret their decision to drop BSO.

LAST CONCERT

For his last concert as music director of the Boston Symphony, Leinsdorf conducted and recorded Beethoven's Ninth Symphony and the powerful and moving Schoenberg classic, "A Survivor From Warsaw" (RCA Victor 7055.).

The two-record album has an additional bonus —Leinsdorf's interpretation of the Beethoven Fifth Symphony, one of the finest versions of this old standard I've heard.

Leinsdorf's conducting of the Beethoven works, and of the Schoenberg dramatic opus, is well nigh uncanny and impeccable. His sense of pace and his feeling for climax, together with his ability to sustain the power and drama of the performance, are stunning and sonically superior.

Soloists for the Beethoven Ninth were Jane Marsh, California soprano; Josephine Veasey, Placido Domingo and Sherrill Milnes. Milnes also was narrator in Schoenberg's "Survivor from Warsaw," and he stands out like a beacon.

✓ ✓ ✓

SANTA BARBARA, CALIF.
NEWS-PRESS
D. 38,000 S. 41,000

OCT 4 1969

Your attention is called to attached tearsheet of our record review column as it appears in the current issue of

- ☑ Senior Scholastic (circ. 500,000)
- ☑ World Week (circ. 450,000)
- ☑ Practical English (circ. 405,000)
- ☑ Science World (circ. 500,000)
- ☐ Co-ed (circ. 850,000)
- ☐ Junior Scholastic (circ. 1,400,000)
- ☐ Scholastic Scope (circ. 650,000)
- ☑ Scholastic Teacher (circ. 180,000)

91.

Newsday
GARDEN CITY, N. Y.
D. 427,270

OCT 7 1969

THE BEST NEW LPs, CASSETTES & CARTRIDGES

DISCUSSIONS

BY ROY HEMMING
with Dave Finkle, Ed Coach

CLASSICAL ALBUM OF THE WEEK

Leinsdorf: matching the noble and ignoble

Beethoven: Symphonies No. 9 & 5 —& Schoenberg: A Survivor from Warsaw—Boston Symphony, Erich Leinsdorf [RCA Red Seal LSC7055]. Leinsdorf's just-concluded years as music director of the Boston Symphony were strangely inconsistent ones, especially with regard to his recordings. Often he was disappointing. But when he was good he could be exceptionally good — as with the Prokofieff symphonies, the Bartok Concerto for Orchestra, and now this exceptional coupling (2 LPs) of two great Beethoven symphonies with Schoenberg's brief but profoundly moving music-drama about the Nazi slaughter of Warsaw's Jews in 1943.

Both Beethoven's 9th and 5th are performed with the combination of drive and forcefulness, inner clarity and structural strength that represent Leinsdorf at his best. His singers in the 9th — Jane Marsh, Josephine Veasey, Placido Domingo, Sherrill Milnes, and the New England Conservatory Chorus — are all excellent. Milnes is also a powerful narrator (in speech-song style) in the Schoenberg Survivor.

The combining of the three works in one album makes a brilliant alliance — posing a starkly gripping depiction of man at his most ignoble with stirring performances of two of the noblest of all symphonic works. All three works have much to say to the 1960's. (R.H.)

Stravinsky: The Rite of Spring (for Piano Duet)—Michael Tilson Thomas & Ralph Grierson [Angel S36024]. Somehow the very idea of Stravinsky's Rite, with its historically daring orchestral textures, being played on just a piano seems completely wrong — yet then comes the realization that that's the way Stravinsky himself first heard his landmark score. The composer's piano arrangement may not be as overpowering as the orchestral version, but it is fascinating for what it reveals about Stravinsky's rhythmic pulse. The pianists — Canada's Grierson, 27, and California's Thomas, 24 (the latter just recently named Assistant Conductor of the Boston Symphony for 1969-70) — perform admirably in one of the more interesting "curios" of the year. (R.H.)

SEVENTEEN
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 1,362,000

OCT 1969

The dazzling, colorful rhythms of Prokofiev's Concerto No. 5, with John Browning (right) at the piano, are coupled with the sardonic strains of Kurt Weill's Music from "The Threepenny Opera" by Erich Leinsdorf, who leads the Boston Symphony in a virtuosic musical display. RCA.

CONSUMER BULLETIN
WASHINGTON, N. J.
MONTHLY 110,000

OCT 1969

Beethoven: Symphony No. 6. Boston Symphony under Leinsdorf. RCA Victor LSC 3074. $5.98. The "Pastoral" Symphony you hear is warmhearted, atmospheric, Mozartean. It builds up to a climactic storm. Others, at times, play with more vigor, but the clear texture of the orchestra, beautifully recorded here, is a joy. AA AA

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
(M) 66,728 (S) 208,349

OCT 5 1969

TWO RECORDINGS by the Boston Symphony Orchestra are on the RCA label. Georges Pretre conducts the Symphonie Fantastique by Berlioz and every poetic nuance of the score is there. We were fortunate enough to have heard Mr. Pretre here last season with the Boston group. He betrays his French heritage in the interpretation of Berlioz. It is splendid.

Happy 200th Birthday, Ludwig

By Bob Micklin

The year 1970, as all faithful "Peanuts" followers most assuredly know, is the 200th anniversary of the birth of Ludwig van Beethoven. Such an occasion is made to order for the got-to-have-a-gimmick world of the recording industry, which sells classical albums a bit more discreetly but just as competitively as it pushes the pop sounds.

No surprise, then, is the flow of Beethoven works already starting to seep into the retail record racks. Of the albums to grace our turntable, two recent releases stand out as being among the finest Beethoven recordings we've heard in a long while. One, a re-issue in Columbia's Odyssey series, is the 1951 packaging of Beethoven: The Six Quartets, Op. 18 by the Budapest String Quartet.

The other, on RCA, features Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony in performances of Beethoven's Fifth and Ninth ("Choral") Symphonies, with a bonus of Schoenberg's intriguing music drama "A Survivor from Warsaw" narrated by baritone Sherrill Milnes.

To start with, the Budapest Quartet's three-disc set is simply an indispensible album if one intends to own any Beethoven at all. Included are the six early quartets (about 1798-1800), in F, G, D, C minor, A and B flat, which show Beethoven's youthful admiration of Mozart and Haydn.

At the time of these recordings, the Budapest ensemble comprised violinists Joseph Roisman and Jac Gorodetzky, violist Boris Kroyt and cellist Mischa Schneider. After the death of Gorodetzky in 1955, Alexander Schneider joined the quartet. The Budapest has not changed personnel since.

And may they go on forever. The playing on these recordings is as perfect as one could ever possibly hope to hear. Such great style, such deep understanding of ensemble rhythm and dynamics, such intuitive blending of instrumentation—these are the hallmarks of superior musicians whose empathy has been refined by years of association.

One critical analysis of the recordings has said that "the four instruments sound almost like one," and an interesting footnote to that aspect is that the discs were made with a quartet of priceless Stradivari instruments, now permanently housed in the Library of Congress, where these recordings were made 18 years ago in the Elizabeth Coolidge Auditorium.

The Boston Symphony's double-disc set is also an impressive one, albeit for different reasons. Opening the album is the Schoenberg piecé, a short but powerful musical setting over which is dramatically told the fearful tale of a group of Warsaw Jews about to be executed by the Nazis. Milnes' impassioned narration is excellent.

Immediately following is Beethoven's massive "Choral" Symphony, with Milnes, tenor Placido Domingo, sopranos Jane Marsh and Josephine Veasey and the Pro Musica and New England Conservatory Choruses. In a work of such Olympian size scope, it is all too easy to settle for a series of partial successes. However, Leinsdorf and the Boston are, if anything, Beethoven specialists, and if I were asked to choose any American orchestra to handle this one, I would trust the Boston to do the best job.

As they do on this recording, Leinsdorf conducts his men with just the right degree of restrained authority, and paces the music judiciously so as to capture both the reflective romanticism and churning power of the first three movements. Moreover the final presto movement in which the vocal elements are built in layer by layer to produce the surging, thundering finale, is superbly realized.

There's also a fine reading of that dot-dot-dot-dash Fifth Symphony that makes this album totally satisfying, even if you already own other recordings of the separate works. Especially nice is the live sound of the music, very much as if one was hearing it in a superior concert hall. Once in a while, it's nice to listen to an orchestra on record that doesn't sound like every instrument was miked for stereo in an isolation booth.

* * *

Notes From the Overground: The Philadelphia Orchestra maintains it's magnificent sound and feeling on Brahms: Variations On a Theme by Haydn and Handel (Columbia). It's a top effort by Ormandy and his ensemble. Lovely pianistics, impeccably recorded, can be heard on Columbia's Philadelphia Orchestra album of Schumann's A minor and Mendelssohn's G minor Piano Concertos with the ageless Rudolf Serkin.

92.

Schoenberg's "A Survivor From Warsaw" takes less than 10 minutes to perform, but is one of the most poignant challenges in the modern repertory. It is a tiny music drama in which a survivor recounts the final moments of a group of Jews as they are deported from the Warsaw Ghetto to a death camp.

The composer utilizes a narrator as the central protagonist, speaking over a marvelously complex yet expressive (12-tone) orchestral structure. At the climax, the moment of deportation, a male chorus in unison rises above the chaos and dissonance in a prayer, "Shema Yisroel."

The narrator's role is a difficult one. Schoenberg prescribed the rhythm of the vocal line exactly, but provided only vague indications of pitch and intervallic relationships. He intended the part to be spoken in an eerie, musically oriented manner, and asked the performer to alter tone quality when he switches from the agonized words of the Survivor to the cruel commands of the Nazi sergeant.

This is "Sprechgesang," to be sure, but not the formalized sort found in "Pierrot Lunaire" and, much later, "Wozzeck."

When Los Angeles last heard the work, performed by Zubin Mehta and the Los Angeles Philharmonic in November, 1968, there arose a bit of controversy regarding the narrator's part. Mehta selected an actor (a fine actor) rather than a musician and permitted him to ignore most of the composer's rhythmic and melodic instructions.

When, in a review of the performance, I complained that there had been too little "Gesang" (singing) and too much "Sprechen" (speaking), the conductor wrote a letter accusing me of misunderstanding Schoenberg's intentions.

The new RCA recording, I am relieved to say, confirms the "Sprechgesang" interpretation. Sherrill Milnes, of the Metropolitan Opera, gives a virtuosic vocal performance, with careful attention to rising and falling inflections and fastidious rhythmic articulation. This not only heightens the dramatic impact of the work, but also imparts to it a stylistic unity damaged when casual speech patterns are substituted.

The conductor on the recording and, presumably, the man to be credited with its stylistic philosophy, is Erich Leinsdorf. He leads the Boston Symphony in a performance that conveys tragedy through clarity of texture and brilliance of orchestral impulse.

The same qualities produce marvelously executed but somewhat impersonal performances of Beethoven's Symphonies Nos. 5 and 9, which probably give the release its commercial raison d'etre. Milnes, incidentally, finds the bass solos in the Ninth uncomfortably low. But his warmth of timbre and superb freedom in the top register are impressively documented on another release, this devoted to arias of Handel, Rossini, Verdi, Wagner, Thomas, Offenbach, Tchaikovsky, Puccini and David Marvin Levy (LSC-3076). The baritone's flair for the conventional operatic challenge makes his success with Schoenberg doubly impressive.

Los Angeles Times
LARGEST CIRCULATION IN THE WEST
D. 917,082 SUN. 1,219,382
OCT 5 1969

LAFAYETTE, IND.
JOURNAL AND COURIER
D. 45,500
OCT 11 1969

★ ★ ★

Berlioz' "Symphonie Fantastique" has some beautiful passages. It is given a fine interpretation by the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Georges Pretre on an RCA Victor stereo album (LSC-3096).

It is the first of Hector Berlioz' works in the symphonic genre. The first movement opens with a long introduction followed by some excellent developments which involve the flutes and violins. The second movement, "The Ball," is lovely and suggests movement of people across the dance floor. The third movement is in the countryside and the pastoral theme is heard. The fourth becomes a bit more violent and the fifth is a bit more peaceful. The Bostonions really know how to play, and Berlioz surely would have approved.

The Boston Symphony, this time under Erich Leinsdorf, performs almost to perfection Beethoven's Symphonies Nos. 1 and 8 on another RCA Victor stereo album (LSC-3098). The First Symphony is in a cheerful mood, as is the Eighth for that matter. But Beethoven was 30 when the First was premiered in Vienna and it reflects some maturity. He wasn't so serious in this first one as he later became. There is some humor in the Eighth, more so than in the First. Both are an invitation to fun, but especially the Eighth.

KINGSTON FREEMAN
Saturday, October 18, 1969

GAZETTE
TAUNTON, MASS.
(E) 13,611
OCT 11 1969

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(C) 113,754
OCT 12 1969

Erich Leinsdorf Revives 'Circus'

By DELOS SMITH

NEW YORK (UPI)—To Earl Wild and Erich Leinsdorf we owe gratitude for reviving a super-spectacular pianistic circus of the late 19th century when such orgiastic displays were a major form of musical entertainment. It is Xaver Scharwenka's 1st piano concerto now recorded by Wild as soloist and the Boston Symphony, Leinsdorf conducting (RCA 3080).

Both Scharwenka and his music are largely forgotten but in his day he was a kingly figure both as piano virtuoso and in the larger world of music. He composed to give himself awesome feats to perform on the keyboard, and to beguile romantically minded audiences with schmaltz.

To current ears his prize showoff piece, this 1st concerto, is much fun and no enlightenment. But what's wrong with that? While laughing at the trickery you can admire Wild for his mastery of it, for his ability not only to play the long piece but to play it well. Also on the record are virtuoso pieces of the same genre, by Balakireff, Medtner and D'Albert.

SCHOLASTIC MAGAZINE SCIENCE WORLD
NEW YORK, N.Y.
16 TI. a YR. 385,400
OCT 20 1969

MAINE SUNDAY TELEGRAM
PORTLAND, MAINE
(C) 109,181
OCT 12 1969

Recordings

By STELLA MILLS

LEINSDORF'S farewell concert at Tanglewood consisted of the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven and Schoenberg's "A Survivor From Warsaw," and it was an event that earned warm parting praise from Michael Steinberg, the Boston Globe music critic, who has not always been kind to the conductor. RCA has recorded the same music, with soloists Jane Marsh, Josephine Veasey, Placido Domingo and Sherrill Milnes for the Beethoven, with Milnes also narrating the Shoenberg.

The Ninth is given terse treatment, with the accent on lines, and it leads to a reading of luminous vitality. But as to the Fifth Symphony filling out side four, the question is: Why did RCA see fit to crowd the C Minor masterpiece on one side, with the expected sound deterioration that resulted?

The Fifth does not come off well, but the beginning of side one, devoted to the Schoenberg, is a marvel, with Milnes perfect in the role of this short, tragic testament to the incredible cruelty of "civilized" man.

ANOTHER FINE RCA issue is the Boston Symphony performance of Berlioz "Symphonie Fantastique," directed by George Pretre. While the old, hard to find Munch recording of the same music packed more drive, it also suffered a bit from hysteria. Pretre leads a more controlled account of this masterpiece, releasing its lyrical qualities, holding back over-dramatization.

SCHOLASTIC TEACHER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD WEEK EDITION
OCT 1969

THE BEST NEW LPs, CASSETTES & CARTRIDGES

DISCUSSIONS

BY ROY HEMMING
with Dave Finkle, Ed Coach

Scharwenka: Piano Concerto No. 1—Earl Wild, Boston Symphony under Erich Leinsdorf [RCA Red Seal Stereo LP LSC3080].

History is full of examples of artists who achieved fame in their lifetimes, and then faded into obscurity after their deaths. Scharwenka is such a case — a Polish-born pianist and composer who was once the toast of Berlin, Vienna, and New York (one of his operas was produced at the Metropolitan Opera in 1907). Whoever's idea it was to dig back and dust off this concerto (composed in 1877, when Scharwenka was 27) deserves a medal—for the concerto is a marvelous one in its old-fashioned way. It is full of technical razzle-dazzle, lush harmonies, and rich melody—sort of a combination of Liszt, Saint-Saens, and a gigantic Warsaw Concerto. Earl Wild is staggeringly brilliant as the soloist, who gets more of a workout than in two average piano concertos. And Leinsdorf again proves that there are few conductor-accompanists who can match him. Overside, Wild dusts off some similarly neglected solo pieces by Balakireff, Medtner, and d'Albert, playing them with style and aplomb. One of the piano albums of the year. (R.H.)

a Wild workout

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 895,505 SUN. 1,445,507
OCT 12 1969

Austere Brahms, Meticulous Strauss

By RAYMOND ERICSON

BRAHMS's "A German Requiem" and Richard Strauss's "Salome" have practically nothing in common, but they lend themselves to joint consideration here for one interesting reason: They have been newly recorded by RCA, and in both works you will hear the singing of Montserrat Caballé and Sherrill Milnes and the conducting of Erich Leinsdorf.

It can be said immediately that A German Requiem comes off the better of the two (two disks, stereo, LSC 7054). Leinsdorf here is conducting the orchestra that, until this fall, was his own, the Boston Symphony. His first-rate chorus is that of the New England Conservatory, whose director is Lorna Cooke de Varon.

*

It is the nature of the work that lends itself so well to Leinsdorf's interpretation. For the Brahms is a relatively austere piece, which represented a kind of neo-classicism in the midst of 19th century's romanticism. Yet the work has its very personal aspects, in the nonsectarian choice of Biblical passages that deal with death and comforting the mourning, in the absence of much drama in the music. Despite a score that is splendidly crafted, Brahms was not out to let it develop any theatrical flourishes. There are contrasting tempos, yet the total effect is slow-moving, and this sets traps for any conductor leading it.

Leinsdorf avoids the traps with a performance that is superbly proportioned. He does not adulterate the slow tempos, but he gives them a simultaneous weight and motion that keep the music both majestic and vital. What climaxes there are arise naturally out of the serene flow of the score. Leinsdorf has often been accused of being an impersonal conductor, but given his skill and care, this "Requiem" profits from these qualities. More emotional performances play havoc with it.

Miss Caballé sings her one soprano solo with a lovely floating tone that is right for this sublime section, and Milnes's two baritone solos have the benefit of his handsome voice and his obvious sympathy for the work and style.

Since the "Requiem" takes only three sides, the album is filled out, appropriately enough, with Brahms's Four Serious Songs, sung by Milnes, with Leinsdorf making a rare appearance as pianist. The virility of the baritone's voice and the ease of his singing in these difficult, wide-ranging songs is a pleasure to hear. Still relatively young, Milnes is, however, no Fischer-Dieskau, and there is not much penetration to his performance. For so intelligent an artist, this will probably follow in time.

For Salome, Leinsdorf conducts the London Symphony Orchestra and a cast that is, in lesser roles, largely English (two disks, stereo, LSC 7053). Technically, the overall performance is a superior one. The playing and singing are polished and sometimes more than that, yet this erotic, kaleidoscopic opera seems studio-bound, lacking the expected theatrical excitement or intense brooding power.

*

Miss Caballé's performance in the title role is fascinating in terms of her career as Americans know it. In this country she has kept pretty close to the Italian repertory and she made her first sensational appearance here in one of the Rossini operas of the bel canto school. If her voice is not large, it has the concentration of tone that helps it to compete with the orchestra without forcing.

She understands, or intuits, a lot about the tempestuous moods of Salome, and she is surprisingly adroit in coloring the voice to suit a particular line. But it is not, as a whole, a performance that has the electricity or passion of such a Salome as was Ljuba Welitsch's, a soprano with a voice of comparable size. It is good to hear a voice of such lyric beauty in the part, for it suggests the character's youthfulness, but for all her good intentions, Miss Caballé is not consistently compelling in the part.

Milnes, cast as Jokanaan, again offers excellent vocalism and care in his reading of the text. He does not succeed in making the prophet more than a noble bore, whereas a more experienced singer can give both a larger and a subtler dimension to the character.

Richard Lewis plays the part of Herod for its royal dignity rather than its neurotic peevishness, and there is much to be said for this approach, especially since the tenor sings so well and is such a fine artist. Regina Resnik's Herodias has great personal strength. Two of the smaller roles are extravagantly cast and probably have never been better sung, the Narraboth of James King and the Page of Julia Hamari.

Leinsdorf's meticulous treatment of the score is apparent at every point, but "Salome" is not a young lady to be handled quite so immaculately.

The New York Times (Tim Kantor)

Baritone Sherrill Milnes
As Jokanaan in "Salome" he offers excellent vocalism

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 895,505 SUN. 1,445,507
OCT 19 1969

93

Recordings

With Brahms, No One Steals the Show

By THEODORE STRONGIN

An air of infinite leisure surrounds chamber music playing in its truest form. When chamber music players really know what they're doing, they give off a sense of having all the time in the world for the quick, little inner things that release the full warmth of companionable playing.

No matter that those quick inner things—accents, emphases, minute changes of color and so on — demand mutual agreement in advance down to the last detail of nuance, and that a common sense of direction and absolute precision in execution are essential. The best chamber music, no matter how precisely played, has a quality that transcends precision. It is a sort of apotheosis of ease. It seems to be re-creating itself spontaneously every moment.

Two recent chamber music albums illustrate the point, one positively, one negatively. The first, a Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft release (139398, stereo), is devoted to Brahms. Christoph Eschenbach, piano, Eduard Drolc, violin and Gerd Seifert, horn, play the Trio (Op. 40) on one side and on the other, Eschenbach, Karl Leister, clarinet and Georg Donderer, cello, play the Trio (Op. 114). On the second album, the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, with Richard Goode as guest pianist, play music of Schubert, Brahms, Poulenc, Webern, Martinu and Dahl (RCA Records LSC-6189, stereo, three disks).

Every one of the musicians on both disks is fully professional. None of them, as individuals, consciously tries to steal the show or call attention to himself at the expense of the composer.

And yet the composer is served differently on each album. The DGG has a true chamber music feel from start to finish, the RCA only rarely so.

The DGG musicians are obviously steeped in Brahms and are rich and sure in every move, separately and together. Both trios are full of happy contradictions in performance — in true chamber music fashion. The players pound away like mad, free as can be, but are so secure with each other that they never miss joint subtleties. The slow movement of the horn trio, for instance, is not only patient, but also fiery. Another example: Eschenbach, in both trios, is not always tidy, although everything he does sounds casual and warm. But when the ensemble demands it, his rhythm is right on the spot, pointed and exact.

In the clarinet trio, there is fond attention to detail, especially where clarinet and cello double each other breezily and where clarinet and piano toss cascading arpeggios back and forth as though playing a game.

The horn part was written for the valveless hunting horn. Seifert is not afraid to abandon the sophisticated vibrato and bolder tone of the modern, valved instrument—badges of virtuosity—in favor of the older kind of sound. As a result, the mellow-sounding horn binds the other instruments together without subtracting from their identity.

Of the two trios, the clarinet one is richer Brahms, but the horn one is much less often heard. A fine pairing.

*

In quantity the Boston album is a super concert: Schubert's "Trout" Quintet, the Brahms Piano Trio (Op. 8), the Poulenc Sextet (piano and winds), the Webern Concerto (Op. 24), the Martinu Nonet (winds and strings) and Ingolf Dahl's Duettino Concertante for Flute and Percussion (1966).

The older works—the Schubert and the Brahms — are given with tremendous verve and obvious affection. But compared with the DGG album, there are walls between the performers. They are individually superb but marginally responsive to each other, especially when it counts. The big points are made, to be sure. The little ones are not.

Among the newer works, the Poulenc is typical. Goode is a sensitive pianist, the wind players are among the best in the business, full of assertiveness and solid tone. Together, they capture Poulenc's slapdash, but, glossing over the amenities, they lose his iron wit. Attacks are crisp, passagework is not. Everyone dashes madly along, jostling the composer to the side. Not on purpose, mind you. The basic spirit is there, but not the responsiveness in depth.

The Webern is a total loss. It lacks line, and the microscopic superintensity that makes this tiny piece loom large, is missing. Here, as elsewhere in the Martinu and Dahl, everyone is a genuine individual star. But no one is very luminous as a chamber music player, at least not on this album.

Steve Schapiro

Pianist Christoph Eschenbach
"Casual and warm"

MAINE SUNDAY TELEGRAM
PORTLAND, MAINE
OCT 26 1969

Recordings

By STELLA MILLS

ONE OF the prize recordings of the whole year has just been released by RCA: Boston Symphony Chamber Players' mixture of Schubert ("Trout" Quintet), Brahms Piano Trio in B, Op. 8, Poulenc Sextet, Webern Concerto Op. 24, Martinu "Nonet" and Dahl's Duettino Concertante for flute and percussion.

There is not a note nor an accent that is not perfect in this perfect album, and everything in it at the same time is endowed with all the human qualities necessary: love, humour, excitement.

The versatile Boston musicians, Joseph Silverstein, violin, Burton Fine, viola, Jules Eskin, cello, Henry Portnoi, bass, Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute, Ralph Gomberg, oboe, Gino Cioffi, clarinet, Sherman Walt, bassoon, James Stagliano, horn, Armando Ghitalla, trumpet, William Gibson, trombone and Everett Firth, percussion, have never sounded better. They are among the greatest orchestra principals in the world.

For the chamber music lover who wants to embrace impeccable performance of music from Schubert to Dahl, and who has a wide open mind for all schools of the art, this album is a treasure.

Bread and Lollipops

by HERBERT WEINSTOCK

In an era during which too-frequent rehearings—in concert, by radio and even television, and through recordings—of established masterpieces of music have deprived many of them of every element of surprise, what could be more natural than for jaded performers and listeners to turn, for the refreshment of adventure, to smaller music not yet or no longer hackneyed? The torrents of performed and recorded music by baroque composers of every size and shape that began a few years ago to answer this question now appear to be receding a little. They too (for too greedy, or gourmand, listeners) have begun to sound hackneyed, the "one concerto six hundred times" of a vicious but not entirely baseless jest about Vivaldi's output. More recently, some performers have begun to explore instead that long-démodé era, high nineteenth-century (or baroque) romanticism, and particularly the most despised of its constituents. We have begun to hear such almost troglodytic-sounding names, particularly in solo-piano music and the concerto, as Anton Rubinstein, Kalkbrenner, Pixis, Thalberg, Henselt, D'Albert, and Tausig. Columbia Records has instituted a long-term program for recording several varieties of the music of their period; its guide will be Raymond Lewenthal, who has been largely responsible for bringing back the music of Alkan and of Liszt's operatic transcriptions. We are, it seems, to be permitted to indulge in entertainments that delighted our great grandparents.

Who, for example, was Xaver Scharwenka? Answer: a Polish-German-American pianist of international renown and a minor composer of stylish glitter whose name preceded Rachmaninoff's in being known for both pianism and composition. He was born in unpronounceable Szamotuly in 1850 and died at Berlin in 1924. Now the protean Earl Wild, with Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has recorded the B-flat minor Piano Concerto that Scharwenka wrote as his Opus 32 when he was twenty-seven. Played for all it is worth, it provides genuine relief from our long-clotted, immobile repertoire. Foolishness would enter in only if someone were to try placing this alternately virtuosic and sentimental, but always craftsmanlike, concerto near the highest level of musical creation. Taken on its own terms, it surely on occasion can supply a very welcome replacement for the trillionth hearing of Tchaikovsky's First, Rachmaninoff's Second, even—dare one say so?—Beethoven's Fifth, Schumann's Only, and Brahms's Both. Leinsdorf's conducting and the playing by his Bostonians match the bravura of Mr. Wild's remarkably clean, highly controlled, many-shaded pianism. As lagniappe, the recording (RCA, LSC-3080, $5.98) tosses in Mr. Wild's solo performances of Balakirev's Lisztian "Reminiscences of Glinka's Opera A Life of the Tsar," Nikolai Merdtner's Improvisation (Opus 31, No. 1), and Eugen d'Albert's Scherzo (Opus 16, No. 2), of which only the Merdtner sounds uncomfortable in Scharwenka's company.

SATURDAY REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 443,000
OCT 25 1969

The Washington Post
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 479,644 SUN. 626,111
OCT 19 1969

also on London, on 6473, by Julius Katchen and Jean-Pierre Marty.

The Brahms Requiem and Four Serious Songs are out in a two-record set by the Boston Symphony under Leinsdorf, with the New England Conservatory Chorus and soloists Montserrat Caballe and Sherrill Milnes.

Leinsdorf also serves Milnes as pianist in the songs, all on Victor 7054. Everything in the set is perfectly in place, the singing and playing is unflawed. And the whole thing is bland to the point of being dull.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
OCT 19 1969

Leinsdorf conducting Brahms' 'German Requiem'

By GEORGE GELLES
HT Music Critic

CLASSICAL RECORDS

Perhaps the single best performance at Tanglewood season before last was that of the Brahms' German Requiem" led by Erich Leinsdorf. In it, Leinsdorf was at peak form, which he seemed only to reach when faced with later-19th century works with German texts (think also of his fine in-town readings of the opening act of Wagner's "Die Walkuere" or of Schumann's "Scenes from Faust"). And now we have much the same performance on a new RCA release (LSC 7054).

The work itself occupies a special place in the Brahms canon, both by its size and intent. It is the largest canvas the composer left us, and in it he broke decisively with a well-established tradition.

Instead of setting the traditional Roman Catholic rite, Brahms compiled his own text from the German Bible. Whereas the Latin prayer is addressed to the dead, Brahms faces the living with lines of consolation, reconciling them with the idea of suffering and death.

As I said, the reading is first-rate. Leinsdorf sets tempi that are conservatively slow, but the pacing is so sure that there's never any loss of vital rhythmic pulse, never any ebbing of life. Rather, there is great concentration and a real sense of each movement being drawn out and sustained through its full growth.

Wonderful in the live performance was the way Leinsdorf made clear both the musical and philosophical parallels of paired movements (the first and seventh, second and sixth, third and fifth), and in part this quality is lost on record, if for no other reason than the need to flip sides.

Orchestral playing from the Boston Symphony is responsive and beautifully grained throughout, and singing from the New England Conservatory Chorus, trained by Lorna Cooke deVaron, excellent as well.

The soprano soloist is Montserrat Caballe, who seems somewhat of a cold fish. Her tone is lovely, if rather thin, and her intonation secure, but she shows little involvement with the words in her mouth. Sherrill Milnes, the baritone, is more at home in the dramatically more potent (more operatic?) second solo, rather than the first ("Herr, Lehre doch mich"), where his piety sounds false.

RCA should fire somebody for the album jacket, which is in execrable taste, and captures perfectly just that feeling of phony sentiment and maudlin religiosity so studiously shunned by Brahms.

Complimenting the "Requiem" is a release of "Motets and Chorale Preludes" by Brahms (on Argo ZRG 571). The motets are all of a sacred nature, and the range in technique and expression is wide.

In his earliest period, represented here by the "Geistliches Lied" Opus 30, Brahms' speech was lovely and fresh and exuberant, but as the years passed he seems, in his motets, at least, to have turned inward philosophically and to have relied increasingly on compositional devices from an earlier age, on strict canon and fugues. And though the late works (the selection here reaches to the Opus 110s of 1889) are more introspective and restrained than the earlier pieces, they're possibly more deeply felt, as well.

Simon Preston, who plays the organ Chorale Preludes heard here (and plays very well, too) leads the New English Singers. The group makes a lovely sound, but Preston's conducting is often over-articulated and choppy. And the readings were recorded in a far too resonant hall, for there's plenty of echo.

Still, it's valuable to have these pieces on disc, and the performances are never less than sensible and serviceable.

94.

Orchestral Albums Dominate Rush of Classical Releases

By MAX PRICE

Denver Post Staff Writer

THE PRE-CHRISTMAS rush is not yet upon us, but the avalanche of new classical releases from the major recording companies continues unabated.

The orchestral albums dominate the latest batch, and of these, three "farewell" releases from RCA devoted to Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra stand out. Leinsdorf is ending a memorable association with the BSO, and RCA is bringing to a close a much longer association with the great ensemble. In the months ahead, the orchestra under a new musical director will be making its recordings for Deutsche Grammophon.

Included in the Leinsdorf-BSO collaborations for RCA are a quartet of exceptional performances of Beethoven symphonies. The interpretations are typically Leinsdorf—that is, they are lean, crystalline and impeccably shaped. Most impressive of the group is a two-disc album (LSC-7055) that includes the Symphony No. 9 in D Minor, Op. 125 ("Choral"), the Symphony No. 5 in C Minor, Op. 27, and Schoenberg's short, dramatic "A Survivor From Warsaw," Op. 46. The "Choral" performance draws on the talents of soprano Jane Marsh, mezzo-soprano Josephine Veasey, tenor Placido Domingo, baritone Sherrill Milnes, the Chorus Pro Musica and New England Conservatory Chorus.

LEINSDORF'S second Beethoven album (LSC-3098) offers the Symphonies No. 1 in C, Op. 21, and No. 8 in F, Op. 93. And the final release (LSC-3097) is devoted to Mozart's Symphonies No. 36 in C, K. 425 ("Linz") and No. 39 in E Flat, K. 543. They are, along with "Choral" package, highly recommended. Fine stereo.

Another example of the musical chairs that the recording firms are engaged in is the latest RCA release of Eugene Ormandy and the Philadelphia Orchestra. After many years with Columbia, which is still producing Philadelphia discs, Ormandy and his orchestra recently switched to RCA. Using a different recording hall, RCA hasn't yet been able to capture fully the rich Philadelphia sound, but it does quite well indeed with Ormandy's vigorous readings of Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsodies Nos. 1 and 2, Smetana's Bartered Bride (Overture, Polka and Furiant) and Dvorak's Scherzo Capriccioso. The disc number is LSC-3085.

DVORAK'S MUSIC also fares extremely well in the hands of three fast-rising young conductors. Zubin Mehta draws an exciting, boldly shaped performance of Dvorak's Symphony No. 7 in D Minor from the Israel Philharmonic. The stereo effects are extraordinary. The two-disc London album (CSA) 2224) also includes a bright reading of Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 5 in E Minor, Op. 64.

Also from London is a Dvorak concert of overtures (In Nature's Realm, Carnival and Othello) and also the Scherzo Capriccioso. Istvan Kertesz is an ideal interpreter of these works and the London Symphony Orchestra gives ideal performances here. Again, the reproduction for the disc (CS 6574) is first rate.

Not to be outdone, Colin Davis also draws on the London Symphony Orchestra for brilliant readings of Dvorak's Symphonic Variations, Op. 78, and Serenade in E for Strings, Op. 22. The Philips stereo for the album (PHS 900-196) doesn't measure up to the standards of the forementioned London discs, but the release is still exceptional.

SPECTACULAR STEREO is the major selling point of a new London Phase 4 release. Henry Lewis and the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra produce a polished, richly hued performance of Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 6 in B Minor ("Pathetique"). Unlike earlier recordings in this series, the engineers have remained clear of gimmickry. The disc number is PHS 900-234.

Igor Markevitch has produced a splendid set of readings of Tchaikovsky's symphonies for Philips. He and the New Philharmonia Orchestra also have recorded performances of Tchaikovsky's Francesca da Rimini, Op. 32, and Hamlet, Op. 67a. Again, Markevitch offers surprises, along with a deft touch. The disc (PHS 900-234) has balanced sound.

Along similar lines musically is a new album on Vanguard's Cardinal label. The release (VCS-10060) displays the Utah Symphony Orchestra under Maurice Abravanel's baton to full advantage. Included in the album are robust performances of Rimsky-Korsakov's Antar Symphonic Suite, Op. 9, Ippolitov-Ivanov's Caucusian Sketches, Op. 10 (complete) and Gliere's Russian Dance from the ballet, The Red Poppy, Op. 70. Balanced stereo.

MOVING ON to the efforts of soloists, the new releases focus attention on some of to-

(Continued on Page 15).

The Denver Post
The Voice of the Rocky Mountain Empire
D. 252,198 SUN. 311,155

OCT 26 1969

Leinsdorf, BSO 'Farewells' Highlight Classical Releases

(Continued from Page 12).

day's leading pianists, including Denver's John Browning. Prokofiev's Concerto No. 5 in G, Op. 55, is the perfect vehicle for Browning's impressive talents. He gets solid support from Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony. The second side of the album gives the orchestra's first-chair people an opportunity to shine in a fine adaptation of the music from Weill's "The Threepenny Opera." RCA's sound for the album (LSC-3121) gives you the best seat in the house.

Browning collaborates with Seiji Ozawa in a thoroughly engrossing interpretation of Tchaikovsky's Concerto No. 1 in B Flat Minor, Op. 23. In many ways this performance, with the London Symphony, is every bit the equal of Van Cliburn's older celebrated version. RCA's stereo for Browning's recording is sharply focused, and Ozawa's contribution is ideal. The disc number: LSC-3069.

When it comes to Mozart, few of today's younger pianists can match the playing of Vladimir Ashkenazy. In a new London release (CS 6579), Ashkenazy gives performances, that can best be described as definitive, of Concertos No. 20 in D Minor, K. 466, and No. 6 in B Blat Major, K. 238. The backing provided by Hans Schmidt-Isserstedt and the London Symphony Orchestra leaves little to be desired. And London's stereo is up to its high standards.

ALSO OF A HIGH ORDER are the interpretations of Mozart's Concertos No. 15 in B Flat Major, K. 450, and No. 11 in F Major, K. 413, offered by Geza Anda. As in his previous recordings for Deutsche Grammophon, Anda directs (Camerata Academica des Salzburger Mozarteums) as well as performs on the piano. The results are gratifying in both instances. DGG's sound, as always, is excellent for the disc (139 393).

If you like your Mozart a bit on the subdued, ultra-refined side then Ingrid Haebler's fine two-disc album for Philips (PHS 2-906) should be to your liking. The package includes pleasing performances of the Concertos No. 21 in C, K. 467; No. 23, in A, K. 488; No. 20 in D Minor, K. 466; and No. 26 in D, K. 537. Conductors Witold Rowicki and Alec Galliera and the London Symphony Orchestra give her admirable support. Good stereo.

Pianist Bruce Hungerford has produced some extraordinary performances of Beethoven sonatas for Vanguard. He continues his efforts, with the same outstanding results, in readings of Beethoven's Sonatas No. 12 in A Flat Major, Op. 26 ("Moonlight") and No. 25 in G Major, Op. 79. Vanguard's stereo is close up and balanced. The disc number is VCS-10056.

STEPHEN BISHOP impressed this reviewer with his contribution as an accompanist for cellist Jacqueline du Pre. In a new recording for Philips (PHS 900-200), Bishop comes into his own as a soloist with brilliant interpretations of Beethoven's 33 Variations in C, on a Waltz by Anton Diabelli, Op. 120. He gets a fine assist from Philips' engineers.

Another of today's younger pianists who is destined for the front rank is Alexis Weissenberg, who offers superb performances of Debussy's "Children's Corner" Suite, La Fille aux Chevenx de Lin, L'Isle Joyeuse Etude Pour les Arpeges, Suite Bergamasque, and La Plus Que Lente. Each is a gem in his hands. The album (LSC-3090), for RCA, has fine stereo.

The genius of Franz Schubert combined with the genius of pianist Wilhelm Kempff guarantees memorable performances. And that is what you get with Kempff's new readings of the "Wanderer" Fantasia in C Major, D. 760, Op. 15, and Moments Musicaux, D. 780, Op. 94. The recital, on a Deutsche Grammophon disc (139 372), is a sheer delight. Great reproduction.

IN THE REALM of reissues are two albums from London and one from RCA, offering performances worth owning—and at low cost—of the late Ernest Ansermet with L'Orchestre de la Suisse Romande and the late Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Ansermet does wonders with Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 in a Major, Op. 92, in a London Stereo Treasury release (STS 15067) that also includes the Fidelio Overture, Op. 72. In the same series, Ansermet offers a balanced reading of Beethoven's Symphony No. 2 in D Major, Op. 36. The disc (STS 15068) has the Leonore Overture No. 2, Op. 72, on the second side.

Munch and the BSO are perfectly at home with Prokofiev's music for the ballet, Romeo and Juliet. The recording (Victrola VICS-1412), cut originally in 1958, has remarkably good stereo effects.

THE NASHVILLE TENNESSEAN
D. 141,842 SUN. 234,036

OCT 26 1969

Schubert, Brahms Played Superbly

By LOUIS NICHOLAS

THE latest album from the Boston Symphony Chamber Players (RCA LSC-6189) is a fragrant bouquet of beautiful works superlatively played and unusually well recorded.

Schubert's "Trout" Quintet, Brahms' Piano Trio in E, Op. 8, Poulenc's feather-light and pastel shaded Sextet for piano and woodwind quintet, Webern's terse Concerto, Op. 24 for flute, oboe, clarinet, horn, trumpet, trombone, violin, viola and piano, Martinu's winsome Nonet, and Ingolf Dahl's intriguing Duettino Concertante (1966) for flute and percussion, are played by first chair players of the Boston Symphony and guest pianist Richard Goode in a manner to successfully challenge the very strong competition in the Schubert, Brahms and Poulenc. The Webern is available only in the 4-album Complete Works of Webern (Columbia), and the Martinu and Dahl are not otherwise recorded.

Dayton Daily News
Dayton, O.
P.M.-circ. 162,448
Sun.-circ. 216,401

OCT-26-69

Requiem With Vitality

By BETTY DIETZ KREBS

THE BRAHMS REQUIEM all too often comes off as ponderous, stuffy listening —with a few lovely moments. Then comes a performance like the Boston Symphony's new one for RCA Victor with some of the spine-tingling excitement of the Verdi and you begin to understand. The Brahms suffers from frequently ponderous treatment. This, fortunately, you cannot say of the Boston's performance.

Betty

This is not to say the Requiem has been pummeled and driven to extremes. Instead, Erich Leinsdorf has given to the Brahms Requiem that which it deserves. The result is a sublimely fascinating performance with some moving choral work on the part of the New England conservatory chorus and equally stirring and radiant singing from soloists Montserrat Cabelle and Sherill Milnes.

To fill out the four sides of the album (RCA LSC-7054), Milnes teams up with Leinsdorf at the piano for the Four Serious Songs of Brahms.

A novelty guaranteed to intrigue the purists and the military band buffs is "The Band of Musick"—18th century music and 18th century instruments, a sampling of the era from Colonial Williamsburg. The players are the men of the Williamsburg Fifes and Drums corps.

Classics

The album contains a potpourri of Revolutionary War cavalry marches, retreats, tatoos, etc.

Spectacular Piano Circus Is Revived

By DELOS SMITH

NEW YORK (UPI)—To Earl Wild and Erich Leinsdorf we owe gratitude for reviving a super-spectacular pianistic circus of the late 19th century when such orgiastic displays were a major form of musical entertainment. It is Xaver-Scharwenka's 1st piano concerto now recorded by Wild as soloist and the Boston Symphony, Leinsdorf conducting (RCA 3080).

Both Scharwenka and his music are largely forgotten but in his day he was a kingly figure both as piano virtuoso and in the larger world of music. He composed to give himself awesome feats to perform on the keyboard, and to beguile romantically minded audiences with schmaltz.

To current ears his prize showoff piece, this 1st concerto, is much fun and no enlightenment. But what's wrong with that? While laughing at the trickery you can admire Wild for his mastery of it, for his ability not only to play the long piece but to play it well. Also on the record are virtuoso pieces of the same genre, by Balakireff, Medtner and D'Albert.

virtuoso who uses the single name, Cziffra, is currently exhibiting technique in eight of the more difficult pieces of Franz Liszt. In some of them he also adds depth of feeling. Perhaps its absence from the others is not his fault. It may not be there. (Philips-Ampex tape 9005).

THE ADVERTISER TRIBUN
TIFFIN, O.
P.M. - CIRC. 11,284

OCT-27-69

JOURNAL HERALD
DAYTON, OHIO
D. 111,867

OCT 31 1969

Record Reviews Easy Shirtdress Has 'Confidence'

By Walt Kleine

I have often wondered just why it was that I liked a great deal of what Erich Leinsdorf did before he went to Boston, and relatively little of what he has done with the Boston Symphony Orchestra (BSO). This summer, by way of a couple of Tanglewood concerts and some of his final BSO recordings, I can now pinpoint at least what I don't like.

The concerts were one in which Daniel Barenboim led the BSO in an impassioned performance of the Beethoven Fifth Symphony, probably the best I've ever heard. It wasn't note-perfect nor did it adhere to the letter of the score, but it WAS Beethoven.

Later Leinsdorf gave a concert of the Beethoven Sixth and Third; careful, intellectual, rarefied readings with every note just so and every hair in place—and absolutely bloodless. There was no passion. Bloodless and passionless Beethoven is not.

THUS WITH Leinsdorf's recording of four Beethoven Symphonies, each fails essentially for that reason. None are bad performances; each has much to recommend it; but none allows the release of passion essential to Beethoven.

If you don't share my feeling about Leinsdorf, by all means try these: No. 9 and No. 5 RCA LSC 7055; No. 1 and No. 8 (RCA LSC 3098). His readings of the Mozart Symphonies No. 36 and No. 39 suffer much less, though the effect of intellectual reserve is present and doesn't help.

Despite the lack of final emotional commitment, they are among the better readings of these works and should be heard. I particularly liked No. 39, (RCA LSC 3097).

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52,185 (S) 108,376

OCT 26 1969

THE BERLIOZ "Symphonic Fantastique," which was the finale of the Friday concert at this year's Worcester Music Festival, is the subject of one of the most eloquent new recordings by the Boston Symphony Orchestra (RCA Red Seal).

Georges Pretre conducts a smooth, refined performance that has just the right amount of dash and bravura to make it a most pleasant listening experience. RCA has given it a live, mellow stereo sound that's quite suitable.

A FESTIVAL soloist this year, Itzhak Perlman has a new recording of the Lalo "Symphonic Espagnole" and Ravel's "Tzigane" with Andre Previn and the London Symphony (RCA Red Seal). Both are quite different from the music Perlman played on Thursday night. The Lalo is a warm, rhythmic, listening treat; the Ravel a virtuoso showpiece. Both come off very well in the Perlman-Previn handling.

HARRY ELLIS DICKSON, conductor of Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall, has managed to blend entertainment with education for the six-concert series beginning Nov. 8.

Opening program has Britten's "Young Person's Guide to the Orchestra," intended for students, grades five to 12. Which may suggest the reason why the same work "laid an egg" at Tanglewood on Parade this summer when narrator Sam Levenson tried to ad lib some of it to his own image.

Other works scheduled for Boston are Saint-Saens' "Carnival of the Animals," "Ballad for Americans," and an assortment of pieces by Stravinsky, Anderson, Milhaud, Haydn — and Gunther Schuller.

First series will be Nov. 8, Jan. 10 and March 14. Second series, Nov. 15, Jan. 17 and March 21 — all Saturday mornings from 11 to 1 o'clock.

Leinsdorf Among The Greats

By FLORESTAN CROCHE

